"The word inspire signifies to breathe into, and literally corresponds to the original in 2 Tim. iii. 16, 'All Scripture is inspired by God,' or breathed into the writers by God. It is, therefore, of the writing that the inspiration is asserted. The Greek compound word, corresponding to our phrase inspired by God, was applied among the heathens to such dreams as were supposed to be breathed into men by any of the gods. This inspiration, which, without any exception, variation, or gradation, is claimed by the writers of the Scripture, and which entitles the whole of it to be denominated 'The Word of God,' is of the highest kind, by which they were 'led into all truth.' It consists in that communication, made to their minds by the Spirit of God, of the ideas and words which they have recorded in that sacred book. Paul expressly calls the Old Testament Scriptures 'The ORACLES of God,' which were committed to the Jews. Rom. iii. 2. He afterwards gives the same denomination of 'oracles' to all the revealed truth of God. Heb. v. 12. The same expression was used by the Greeks to denote the responses given out in distinct words, which their priests made, in name of their deities, to those who consulted them. In the same sense, Stephen, speaking under the immediate influence of the Holy Ghost, designates the writings of Moses as 'lively oracles.' In this expression their verbal inspiration is distinctly asserted.

"In the passage above quoted, 'All Scripture is given by inspiration of God,' the same thing is distinctly affirmed. Paul does not say the meaning of all Scripture, or the ideas contained in it, but all Scripture—all writing, or all that is written (taking writing in the appropriated sense in which he uses it) is given by inspiration of God. We have here a most unequivocal testimony to the inspiration of the words of Scripture, for neither a meaning nor an idea can be expressed in writing, except by words. If any writing is inspired, the words of necessity must be inspired, because the words are the writing; for what is a writing, but words written? The thoughts and sentiments are the meaning of the words. To say that a writing is inspired, while the words are uninspired, is a contradiction in terms. The affirmation of Paul, then, respects the words as containing the meaning, and not the meaning as containing the words. To the same purpose, the Apostle Peter affirms, that 'the prophecy came not of old time [at any time] by the will of man, but holy men of God spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost.' If they spoke as they were moved, they did not choose the language they uttered, but the words which they spoke were given to them by the Holy Ghost. In the same manner the disciples, on the day of Pentecost, 'were all filled with the Holy Ghost, and began to speak with other tongues as the Spirit gave them utterance.' Here utterance, or the words they spoke, is expressly ascribed to the Holy Spirit. Nothing can more distinctly convey the meaning of inspiration than these words, 'Who by the mouth of thy servant David hast said.' Acts iv. 25. And this inspiration, which, without variation or exception, is claimed for the Scriptures, by the sacred writers, entitles the whole of them to be called 'The Word of God;' to which high designation they could not be entitled on any other ground.

"The words of Scripture, as used by the writers, were indeed their own words. But this does not imply that the Bible is partly the word of God, and partly the word of man. It is not the effect of any such co-operation, as supposes that one part was produced by God, and the other part by man, to make out a whole. The passages above quoted preclude our entertaining any such notion. Because the words were written by the prophets and apostles, this does not prevent them from being the words of God. The following remarks of President Edwards, when he is combating the deeply erroneous sentiment of the Arminians, respecting a co-operation between God and man in the work of grace, will explain this matter. 'In efficacious grace, we are not merely passive, nor yet does God do some, and we do the rest. But God does all, and we do all. God produces all, and we act all. For that is what he produces, viz., our own acts. God is the only proper author and foundation: we only are the proper actors. We are, in different respects, wholly passive and wholly active. In the Scriptures the same things are represented as from God and from us. God is said to convert, and men are said to convert and turn. God makes a new heart, and we are commanded to make us a new heart. God circumcises the heart, and we are commanded to circumcise our own hearts; not merely because we must use the means in order to the effect, but the effect itself is our act and our duty. These things are agreeable to that text, 'God worketh in you both to will and to do.'"

"We grant," says Dr. Owen, "that they" (the sacred writers) "used their own abilities of mind and understanding in the choice of words and expressions. So the preacher sought to find out acceptable words. Eccles. xii. 10. But the Holy Spirit, who is more intimate into the minds and skill of men than they are themselves, did so guide and operate in them, as that the words they fixed upon were as directly and certainly from him, as if they had been spoken to them by an audible voice."

"We are not, however, required to suppose, that while inspired, the ordinary exercise of the faculties of the penmen of the Scriptures was counteracted or suspended, or that their minds did not entirely go along with what was communicated to them. 'They were all filled with the Holy Ghost.' Acts ii. 4. 'They had the mind of Christ' (1 Cor. ii. 16); and were themselves cast into the mould of that doctrine which they delivered to others. We are certain, then, as appears from the whole of their writings, that as far as they comprehended the truths which they were employed to record, they both fully acquiesced in them, and powerfully felt their force. It forms no objection to their inspiration, that the words of Scripture are occasionally changed in parallel passages or quotations, by Him who dictated them. The Holy Spirit is not confined to any one mode of expression, and in such places his mind is conveyed in words which, though varied by him, are yet perfectly adapted to communicate his will.

"Nor does the difference of style which we find among these writers at all conclude against their having the words they were to write imparted to them. On the same ground that the term 'Scripture' includes the thoughts and words, so also does it necessarily comprehend the style in which it is written; which is, in fact, nothing more than the choice and arrangement of the words; for what is style, abstracted from the words that express it? The style that God was pleased to employ was used, and the instruments were such as that style was natural to, flowing, like the words, with their full consent, and according to the particular tone of their minds. The style of the Scriptures is the characteristic style of the different writers; but God is the author of it. The style is as truly God's as the matter; for if he has employed the style of different writers, he has likewise employed their expressions, thoughts, reasonings, and arguments. God did not leave them to the operation of their own mind, but has employed the operations of their mind in his Word. The Holy Spirit could dictate to them his own words in such a way that they would also be their own words, uttered with the understanding. He could express the same thought by the mouth of a thousand persons, each in his own style. Is it, then, because we cannot comprehend the mode of such an operation, that arrogant and weak mortals dare to deny the obvious import of Scripture declarations?

"The objection to verbal inspiration, taken from the variety of style among the sacred writers, or from the circumstance that the same fact is often variously related by them, though at first sight it may seem plausible, is, in reality, both unfounded and absurd. It is taking it for granted that two or more accounts of the same thing, differing in phraseology, though substantially agreeing, cannot all be the words of inspiration; which has not the smallest foundation in truth. If variety of expression in relating the same things in the Gospel, would not affect the truth of the narrative, on the supposition that the writers were uninspired men, why is it presumed that it would affect it on the supposition of their being inspired? and why should it be thought improper for the Holy Ghost to make use of that variety? Or, because one peculiar cast of style distinguished every man's writings, is it thought impossible that the Spirit of God can employ a variety of styles; or is it supposed that He must be confined to one single mode of expression? The simple statement of such an idea contains its refutation. It is evident, too, that variety of style militates no more against verbal inspiration than against the supposed inspiration of superintendence; for if the Holy Spirit sanctioned variety, it was equally consistent to dictate variety. And it might be shown that such variety is of essential importance in the Gospel narratives, in bringing out very interesting views, that could not be so well exhibited in a single narrative.

"Of the fact, however, that the variety of style which is found among the writers of the Scriptures does not in the smallest degree militate against that verbal inspiration by which they affirm that they wrote, we have conclusive proof. For while it is evident to all, that there is a certain characteristic distinction of style, that pervades the whole of the Scriptures, and sufficiently attests that they are the work of the same Author, it is equally certain that each one of the writers is distinguished from the rest by a style peculiar to himself. Now the difference of style is as great among the prophets, when predicting future events which they did not understand, where, as is admitted by all, the words they employed must necessarily have been communicated to them, as it is found to be among them when relating events with which they were previously acquainted. Here, then, we have positive proof on this subject, which it is impossible to set aside. The objection, too, that is founded on variety of style, to the communication of words, would equally militate against the communication of ideas. There is as great diversity of MODES OF THOUGHT, and of viewing their subjects, as of EXPRESSION AND STYLE, among the writers of Scripture. And can it for a moment be supposed that, either as to the one or the other, the Spirit of God is limited? 'He that planted the ear, shall he not hear? He that formed the eye, shall he not see?' 'Who hath made man's mouth, or who maketh the dumb, or the deaf, or the seeing, or the blind? did not I, the Lord?' He who conferred upon men all the varied powers and faculties which they possess, is he not able to communicate to their minds whatever to him seems good, in every possible variety of expression, and in every conceivable shape?

"It has been objected, that if the verbal inspiration of the whole of the Scriptures could be proved, it would follow that the words of all the speakers who are introduced in them, such as those of Job's friends, although their opinions were erroneous, nay, even the words of the devil himself, were inspired. This objection is so absurd, that, unless it had been sometimes gravely urged, it would be too trifling to be noticed. Is it not sufficiently plain, that while God dictated to the sacred penmen the words of those referred to, he dictated them to be inserted, not as his words, but as their words? Even the sayings of wicked men and of devils in the Scriptures are recorded by inspiration as truly as the sayings of Christ himself, and, as recorded by the Holy Ghost, suggest inspired instruction. Everything contained in the Bible, whether the words of the penmen, that contain the mind of God, or the words of others, that are inserted for the purpose of giving such information as he is pleased to impart, is equally, according to the express declarations of Scripture, dictated by God. It should, however, be observed, that it is not at all implied in the assertion of plenary verbal inspiration, that every example recorded in Scripture, without any judgment expressed with regard to the conduct, of good or even inspired men, should be for imitation. When the Word of God records human conduct, without pronouncing on its morality, whether it is sin or duty must be ascertained by an appeal to the general principles of Scripture.

"It is no valid objection to verbal inspiration, that the sacred writers were often acquainted beforehand with those facts which they recorded, and that they were directed to refer to this knowledge to establish their credibility. This no more proves that their relating these facts originated with themselves, than the previous knowledge of a messenger of the contents of the message he bears, proves that it originated with himself, or detracts from its truth or authority. Nor does it form any objection that the penmen of Scripture often appeal, in support of what they advance, to its own evidence, or that they reason from principles granted by those whom they addressed. This was practised by the Lord himself, as to whose words no Christian will affirm that they are not the words of God.

"There is a simplicity, harmony, and consistency, in that plan which represents the Scriptures as, in one point of view, the production of man, and in another wholly the book of God. This is precisely consistent with the language of the Apostle Paul, when he sometimes designates the Gospel, 'My Gospel,' and sometimes, 'The Gospel of God,' it being, in fact, both the one and the other. Though the deepest wisdom of man could never have anticipated such a scheme of inspiration, yet when it is submitted to the mind, it manifests itself to be divine. And nothing but this view will harmonize all the assertions of the Scriptures." See CHRISTIANITY—SCRIPTURE.

INSTINCT. This word has been well defined by Lord Monboddó, in his work entitled "Ancient Metaphysics," as "a determination given by Almighty Wisdom to the mind of the brute, to act in such or such a way, upon such or such an occasion, without intelligence, without knowledge of good or ill, and without knowing for what end or purpose he acts." Thus, following an original impulse of that constitution which God hath given them, the lower animals make no progress in the skill with which their operations are conducted. The first nest which a swallow builds, is as completely finished in all its parts as any which it will ever construct. But man improves. The rude shapeless hut and the splendid palace prove, by contrast with each other, the essential difference there is between the reason of man and the instinct of brutes.

INSTITUTE, INSTITUTION, an established custom or law; a precept, maxim, or principle. Institutions may be considered as positive, moral, and human. 1. Those are called positive institutions or precepts which are not founded upon any reasons known to those to whom they are given, or discoverable by them, but which are observed merely because some superior has commanded them. 2. Moral, are those the reasons of which we see, and the duties of which arise out of the nature of the case itself, prior to external command. 3. Human, are generally applied to those inventions of men, or means of honouring God which are not appointed by him, and which are numerous in the Church of Rome, and some of them even in Protestant Churches.

INSTRUMENT. The second causes whereby God executes his works of mercy or judgment are his instruments. Isa. xli. 15. Sword, famine, pestilence, and diseases, are his instruments of death. Ps. vii. 13. The evil instruments of the churl are the sinful methods which he uses to increase his wealth. Isa. xxxii. 7. Men's bodies or members are instruments of righteousness or unrighteousness—are, as it were, tools by which they work the one or the other in outward acts. Rom. vi. 13.

INSTRUMENTAL MUSIC, music produced by instruments of various kinds, in contradistinction from vocal music. See MUSIC.

INTEGRITY, purity of mind, free from any undue bias or principle. Prov. xi. 3. Many hold that a certain artful sagacity, founded upon knowledge of the world, is the best conductor of every one who would be a successful adventurer in life, and that a strict attention to integrity would lead them into danger and distress. But, in answer to this, it is justly observed—1. That the guidance of integrity is the safest under which we can be placed; that the road in which it leads us is, upon the whole, the freest from dangers. Prov. iii. 21, &c. 2. It is unquestionably the most honourable; for integrity is the foundation of all that is high in character among mankind. Prov. iv. 8. 3. It is the most conducive to felicity. Phil. iv. 6, 7; Prov. iii. 17. 4. Such a character can look forward to eternity without dismay. Rom. ii. 7.

INTEMPERANCE, excess in eating or drinking.

This is the general idea of it; but we may observe, that whatever indulgence undermines the health, impairs the senses, inflames the passions, clouds and sullies the reason, perverts the judgment, enslaves the will, or in any way disorders or debilitates the faculties, may be ranked under this vice. See TEMPERANCE.

INTERCESSION OF CHRIST, his interposing for sinners by virtue of the satisfaction he made to divine justice.

1. As to the fact itself, it is evident, from many places of Scripture, that Christ pleads with God in favour of his people. Rom. viii. 34; Heb. vii. 25; 1 John ii. 1.

2. As to the manner of it, the appearance of the high priest among the Jews in the presence of God, on the day of atonement, when he offered before him the blood of the sin-offering, is at large referred to by Paul, as illustrating the intercession of Christ. Heb. ix. 11, 14, 22, 26, x. 12, 21. Christ appears before God with his own body; but whether he intercedes vocally or not cannot be known, though it is most probable that he does not; however, it is certain that he does not intercede in like manner as when on earth, with prostration of body, cries, and tears, which would be quite inconsistent with his state of exaltation and glory; nor as supplicating an angry judge, for peace is made by the blood of the cross; nor as litigating a point in a court of judicature; but his intercession is carried on by showing himself as having done, as their surety, all that law and justice could require, by representing his blood and sacrifice as the ground of his people's acceptance with the Father. Rev. v. 6; John xvii. 24.

3. The end of Christ's intercession is not to remind the Father of anything which he would otherwise forget, nor to persuade him to anything which he is not disposed to do; but it may serve to illustrate the holiness and majesty of the Father, and the wisdom and grace of the Son; not to say that it may have other unknown uses with respect to the inhabitants of the invisible world. He is represented, also, as offering up the prayers and praises of his people, which become acceptable to God through him. Rev. viii. 3, 4; Heb. xiii. 15; 1 Pet. ii. v. He also pleads for the conversion of his unconverted ones; and for the consolation, preservation, and glorification, of his people. John xvii.; 1 John ii. 1, 2.

4. Of the properties of Christ's intercession, we may observe—(1.) That it is authoritative; he intercedes not without right. John xvii. 24; Ps. ii. 8. (2.) Wise; he understands the nature of his work, and the wants of his people. John ii. 25. (3.) Righteous; for it is founded upon justice and truth. 1 John iii. 5; Heb. vii. 26. (4.) Compassionate. Heb. ii. 17, iv. 15; Isa. lxiii. 9. (5.) He is the sole advocate. 1 Tim. ii. 5. (6.) It is perpetual. Heb. vii. 25. (7.) Efficacious. 1 John ii. 1, 2; John xi. 42.

5. The use we should make of Christ's intercession is this:—(1.) We may learn the wonderful love of God to man. Rom. v. 10. (2.) The durability and safety of the Church. Luke xxi. 31, 32. (3.) The ground we have for comfort. Heb. ix. 24; Rom. viii. 34. (4.) It should excite us to offer up prayers to God, as they are acceptable through him. Rev. viii. 3, 4. See ADVOCATE.

INTERDICT, an ecclesiastical censure, by which the Church of Rome forbids the performance of divine service in a kingdom, province, town, &c. This censure has been frequently executed in France, Italy, and Germany; and, in the year 1170, Pope Alexander

III. put all England under an interdict, forbidding the clergy to perform any part of divine service, except baptizing infants, taking confessions, and giving absolution to dying penitents. An interdict, in the language of Scotch law, implies a prohibition issued by the legal authorities against further procedure in any operation until the legality of such procedure be ascertained.

INTERIM, the name of a formulary, or confession of faith, obtruded upon the Protestants, after the death of Luther, by the Emperor Charles V., when he had defeated their forces. It was so called because it was only to take place in the interim, till a general council should decide all the points in question between the Protestants and Roman Catholics.

INTERMENT. See BURIAL.

INTERPRETATION. See BIBLICAL INTERPRETATION.

INTERPRETING OF TONGUES, a gift bestowed on the apostles and primitive Christians, so that in a mixed assembly, consisting of persons of different nations, if one spoke in a language understood by one part, another could repeat and translate what he said into the different languages understood by others. 1 Cor. xii. 10, xiv. 5, 6, 13. See GIFT OF TONGUES.

INTOLERANCE. See TOLERATION.

INVESTITURE, in ecclesiastical policy, is the act of conferring any benefice on another. It was customary for princes to make investiture of ecclesiastical benefices, by delivering to the person they had chosen a pastoral staff and a ring. The account of this ceremony may be seen at large in Mosheim's Ecclesiastical History.

INVOCATION, a calling upon God in prayer. It is generally considered the first part of that necessary duty, and includes—1. A making mention of one or more of the names or titles of God, indicative of the object to whom we pray. 2. A declaration of our desire and design to worship him. And, 3. A desire of his assistance and acceptance, under a sense of our own unworthiness.

In the Church of Rome, invocation also signifies adoration of, and prayers to, the saints. The Council of Trent expressly teaches, that the saints who reign with Jesus Christ are employed as the intercessors of men, and offer up their prayers to God, and condemn those who maintain the contrary doctrine.

IONIC PHILOSOPHY. Thales was the founder of this early sect of Greek philosophy. He was the first of the Greeks who gave a systematic form to philosophy. Our knowledge of the tenets of this school is necessarily imperfect, as none of the writings of either Thales or his followers, among whom the most celebrated are Anaximander, Anaximenes, and Anaxagoras, have come down to us. One thing seems to be acknowledged on all hands—that the studies of this sect were chiefly directed to natural objects. Thales held water to be the first principle of universal nature, from which all other objects originated. He believed in God as the soul of the world, and that the world was animated. Cicero has given a summary of the doctrine of Thales in the following terms: "Thales of Miletus, the first who engaged in these inquiries, says, that water is the original of things, and that God is that intelligence who from water formed all beings." Some of his followers, for example, Anaximander and Anaximenes, dropped from their systems the notion of God, and thus entered upon the path of a purely material cosmology. Anaxa-goras, however, brought back the primitive conception of Thales—matter as the subject of forms, and intelligence the active principle of forms.

IRENÆUS, bishop of Lyons, in France, one of the best Christian writers of the second century. He was a Greek by birth, and probably born of Christian parents. He was in early life a disciple of the venerable Polycarp, bishop of Smyrna, by whom he was sent to preach the gospel among the Gauls. His labours were remarkably useful. He employed his pen against the internal and domestic enemies of the Church, by attacking the monstrous errors adopted by some classes of professed Christians. His five Books against Heresies are yet preserved in a Latin translation, through the barbarity of which, though excessive, it is easy to discern the eloquence and erudition that reign throughout the original. Only the first book is yet extant in the original Greek.

IRON (barzel) occurs first in Gen. iv. 22, and afterwards frequently; and the Chaldee prezel, in Dan. ii. 33, 41, and elsewhere often in that book; Greek sidēros, Rev. xviii. 12, and the adjectives, Acts xii. 10; Rev. ii. 27, ix. 9, xii. 5, xix. 15; a well-known and very serviceable metal. The knowledge of working it was very ancient, as appears from Gen. iv. 22. We do not, however, find that Moses made use of iron in the fabric of the tabernacle in the wilderness, or Solomon in any part of the temple at Jerusalem. Yet, from the manner in which the Jewish legislator speaks of iron, the metal, it appears, must have been in use in Egypt before his time. He celebrates the great hardness of it (Lev. xxvi. 19; Deut. xxviii. 23, 48); takes notice that the bedstead of Og, king of Bashan, was of iron (Deut. iii. 11); he speaks of mines of iron (Deut. viii. 9); and he compares the severity of the servitude of the Israelites in Egypt to the heat of a furnace for melting iron (Deut. iv. 20.) We find, also, that swords (Numb. xxxv. 16), axes (Deut. xix. 5), and tools for cutting stones (Deut. xxvii. 5), were made of iron.

By the "northern iron" (Jer. xv. 12), we may probably understand the hardened iron, called in Greek chalubs, from the Chalybes, a people bordering on the Euxine Sea, and consequently lying on the north of Judea, by whom the art of tempering steel is said to have been discovered. Strabo speaks of this people by the name of Chalybes, but afterwards Chaldæi, and mentions their iron mines. These, however, were a different people from the Chaldeans, who were united with the Babylonians.

ISAAC, the son of Abraham and Sarah, was born A.M. 2108. The incident which gave rise to his name is recorded in Gen. xviii. 10-12. The character of Isaac does not appear conspicuous for any great exploits which he performed, or for any very striking events which happened to him. He ranks, however, as one of the Hebrew patriarchs. Jehovah declares himself as the God of Isaac as well as of Abraham; besides, we are informed (Luke xiii. 28) that he shall be an inhabitant of the kingdom of God. The birth of Isaac, who was emphatically "the child of promise," was attended with extraordinary circumstances, which are mentioned in Gen. xxi. &c. Very early in life he was exposed to the profane contempt of Ishmael, the son of the bondwoman, which the Apostle Paul states (Gal. iv. 29) to be typical of the persecution of God's people in all ages. When Isaac had arrived at a state of manhood, he was required to give a signal proof of his entire devotedness to God: Abraham was commanded to offer up his beloved son. The details of this remarkable trial are given in Gen. xxii. In this transaction Isaac was an eminent type of Jesus Christ. After the death of Abraham, God blessed his son Isaac. By faith he sojourned in the land of Canaan; and although he had been encouraged to expect a numerous family, nearly twenty years elapsed, and there appeared no prospect of a child. At length, however, two children were born to him at one time, concerning whom the Divine purpose was declared to the mother, that "the elder should serve the younger." Isaac loved Esau the elder more than Jacob the younger—a preference which led to many calamitous events. The whole life of the worthy patriarch, indeed, was full of troubles. Driven from Canaan by a famine, he took up his abode among the Philistines, where he was guilty of the sin of denying his wife, representing her as his sister. A very painful incident which occurred in the old age of the patriarch is recorded in Gen. xxvii., where we are informed of the dishonourable and fraudulent means by which Jacob obtained the birthright blessing in preference to Esau. The life of Isaac was protracted to a considerable length, for he died at the advanced age of 180 years.

ISAIAH. Though fifth in the order of time, the writings of the Prophet Isaiah are placed first in order of the prophetic books, principally on account of the sublimity and importance of his predictions, and partly also because the book which bears his name is larger than all the twelve minor prophets put together.

1. Concerning his family and descent nothing certain has been recorded, except what he himself tells us (Isa. i. 1), namely, that he was the son of Amoz, and discharged the prophetic office "in the days of Uzziah, Jotham, Ahaz, and Hezekiah, kings of Judah," who successively flourished between A.M. 3194 and 3305. There is a current tradition that he was of the blood-royal; and some writers have affirmed that his father Amoz or Amos was the son of Joash, and consequently brother of Uzziah, king of Judah. He must have exercised the office of a prophet during a long period of time; for the lowest computation, beginning from the year in which Uzziah died, when he is by some supposed to have received his first appointment to that office, to the reign of Manasseh, brings it to sixty-one years. But the tradition of the Jews, which has been adopted by most Christian commentators, that he was put to death by Manasseh, is very uncertain; and Aben Ezra, one of the most celebrated Jewish writers, is rather of opinion that he died before the decease of Hezekiah; which Bishop Lowth thinks most probable. Of his wife and two sons, we have notices in Isa. vii. 3, viii. 1-3. The name of Isaiah, as Vitranga has remarked, after several preceding commentators, is in some measure descriptive of his high character, since it signifies the Salvation of Jehovah; and was given with singular propriety to him, who foretold the advent of the Messiah, through whom "all flesh shall see the salvation of God." Isa. xl. 5; Luke iii. 6; Acts iv. 12. Isaiah was contemporary with the Prophets Amos, Hosea, Joel, and Micah.

2. Besides the volume of prophecies, which we are now to consider, it appears, from 2 Chron. xxvi. 22, that Isaiah wrote an account of "the acts of Uzziah," king of Judah. This has perished with some other writings of the prophets, which, as probably not written by inspiration, were never admitted into the canon of Scripture. There are also two apocryphal books ascribed to him, namely, the Ascension of Isaiah, and the Apocalypse of Isaiah; but these are evidently forgeries of a later date, and the Apocalypse has long since perished.

3. Isaiah is uniformly spoken of in the Scriptures as a prophet of the highest dignity. Bishop Lowth calls him the prince of all the prophets, and pronounces the whole of his book to be poetical, with the exception of a few detached passages. The scope of Isaiah's predictions is threefold, namely—(1.) To detect, reprove, aggravate, and condemn the sins of the Jewish people especially, and also the iniquities of the ten tribes of Israel, and the abominations of many Gentile nations and countries; denouncing the severest judgments against all sorts and degrees of persons, whether Jews or Gentiles. (2.) To invite persons of every rank and condition, both Jews and Gentiles, to repentance and reformation, by numerous promises of pardon and mercy. It is worthy of remark, that no such promises are intermingled with the denunciations of divine vengeance against Babylon, although they occur in the threatenings against every other people. (See BABYLON.) (3.) To comfort all the truly pious, in the midst of all the calamities and judgments denounced against the wicked, with prophetic promises of the true Messiah, which seem almost to anticipate the Gospel history, so clearly do they foreshow the divine character of Christ.

4. Isaiah has, with singular propriety, been denominated the evangelical prophet, on account of the number and variety of his prophecies concerning the advent and character, the ministry and preaching, the sufferings and death, and the extensive, permanent kingdom of the Messiah. So explicit and determinate are his predictions, as well as so numerous, that he seems to speak rather of things past than of events yet future; and he may rather be called an evangelist than a prophet. No one, indeed, can be at a loss in applying them to the mission and character of Jesus Christ, and to the events which are cited in his history by the writers of the New Testament. This prophet, says Bishop Lowth, abounds in such transcendent excellences, that he may be properly said to afford the most perfect model of prophetic poetry. He is at once elegant and sublime, forcible and ornamented; he unites energy with copiousness, and dignity with variety. In his sentiments there is uncommon elevation and majesty; in his imagery, the utmost propriety, elegance, dignity, and diversity; in his language, uncommon beauty and energy; and, notwithstanding the obscurity of his subjects, a surprising degree of clearness and simplicity. To these we may add, that there is such sweetness in the poetical composition of his sentences, whether it proceed from art or genius, that, if the Hebrew poetry at present is possessed of any remains of its native grace and harmony, we shall chiefly find them in the writings of Isaiah; so that the saying of Ezekiel may most justly be applied to this prophet:—

"Thou art the confirmed exemplar of measures, Full of wisdom, and perfect in beauty."

Ezek. xxviii. 12.

Isaiah also greatly excels in all the graces of method, order, connection, and arrangement; though in asserting this we must not forget the nature of the prophetic impulse, which bears away the mind with irresistible violence, and frequently in rapid transitions from near to remote objects—from human to divine. We must likewise be careful in remarking the limits of particular predictions, since, as in our version, they are often improperly connected, without any marks of discrimination; which injudicious arrangement, on some occasions, creates almost insuperable difficulties.

ISCARIOT. See JUDAS ISCARIOT.

ISHBOSHETH or ISHBAAL, the son and successor of Saul. By the arrangements of Abner, the general of Saul's army, Ishbosheth was recognised as king at Mahanaim while David was reigning as king at Hebron. When the son of Saul ascended the throne he was forty-four years of age, and his reign was short; for at the end of two years, he was assassinated by two captains of his own troops. This prince closed the line of Saul's descendants, B.C. 1048.

ISHMAEL, the son of Abraham by his bondmaid Hagar, whom he had taken by the advice of Sarah, as his inferior or secondary wife. The child received the name of Ishmael, because of the affliction of Hagar in being envied and hated by Sarah, and compelled to flee into the wilderness, where an angel of the Lord appeared to her and comforted her by the promise of a son, whose future character and destiny are thus foretold: "And he will be a wild man; his hand will be against every man, and every man's hand against him: and he shall dwell in the presence of all his brethren." Gen. xvi. 12. This prediction was remarkably fulfilled; for from Ishmael were descended the various tribes of Arabs who, both in ancient and modern times, have been a powerful people. Dr Keith remarks, "The descendants of Ishmael have ever maintained their prophetic character: they have remained under every change of condition a wild people; their hand has still been against every man, and every man's hand against them." The handmaid and her son were cast out of Abraham's house; and the Apostle Paul, commenting upon that incident, regards it as an allegorical representation of the covenant of works and the covenant of grace. On this point Dr Candlish, in his 'Exposition of Genesis,' makes the following observations:—

"Hagar, in the apostle's view, typified, first Mount Sinai in Arabia, and, secondly, Jerusalem as it then was. In other words, she is the symbol, first of the legal dispensation, and, secondly, of the Jewish Church under that dispensation. Of the former, it is said that it gendereth to bondage; of the latter, that she is in bondage with her children. For whatever might be the meaning of the old economy, spiritually apprehended, and whatever might be the intimations of gospel truth conveyed by it to a spiritually enlightened mind,—the law given by Moses was, to the nation at large, a method of salvation by works. As such, it laid upon the conscience a heavy load of unfulfilled obligation, and of accumulated, uncanceled guilt; and the people, looking for life according to its terms, were helplessly bound under its yoke of service and its sentence of condemnation. Their standing before God, therefore, in his Church on earth, is fitly compared to that of the bond-maid's son in the family; who is tolerated and put upon his good behaviour, as it were, but has no indefeasible title to the adoption or the birthright.

"Over against this condition and channel of life,—the legal covenant and Church,—the apostle sets one higher, more free, and incorruptible. And it is remarkable that he partly loses sight here of the symbol. He speaks not of Sarah, the proper antithesis to Hagar, in his ascending series of contrasts.

But, reaching at once the summit, he brings the Jerusalem which is above into antagonism with the Jerusalem which now is. He confronts 'the Church of the first-born, which are written in heaven,' with the Church constituted upon earth in terms of the law."

ISHTOB, a country situated at the northern extremity of the mountains of Gilead, towards Mount Libanus. 2 Sam. x. 6. See TOB.

ISLAMISM, the orthodox religion of the followers of Mohammed. Dr Henderson says, "The word signifies an entire submission or devotion to the will of another, and especially of God, and thence the security, peace, and prosperity which those who thus submit themselves enjoy. The profession of faith in the unity of God and the divine apostleship of Mohammed, is called aslama; and every one who makes such a profession, receives the name of Moslem; that is, one who has entirely embraced the true faith, and surrendered himself to the will of God. The plural of this would be Muslim; but the dual number, Muslimani, being commonly substituted for the singular by the Persians and Turks, the word Mussulman, or Musselman, has in these, as well as in the European languages, nearly superseded the shorter and more correct term."

ISRAEL (who prevails with God), a name given to Jacob by an angel, after having wrestled with him at Mahanaim, or Peniel. Gen. xxxii. 1, 2, 28–30; Hosea xii. 3. (See JACOB.) By the name Israel is sometimes understood the person of Jacob; sometimes the people of Israel, the race of Jacob; and sometimes the kingdom of Israel, or the ten tribes, as distinct from the kingdom of Judah.

ISRAELITES. See JEWS.

ISSACHAR, the fifth son of Jacob and Leah, was born about B.C. 1749. He had four sons—Tola, Phuvah, Job, and Shimron. Gen. xlvi. 13. We know nothing particular of his life. Jacob, blessing him, said, "Issachar is a strong ass, couching down between two burdens. And he saw that rest was good, and the land that it was pleasant, and bowed his shoulder to bear, and became a servant unto tribute." The Chaldee translates it in a quite contrary sense: "He shall subdue provinces, and make those tributary to him who shall remain in his land." The tribe of Issachar had its portion among the best parts of the land of Canaan, along the great plain or valley of Jezreel, with the half-tribe of Manasseh to the south, Zebulun to the north, the Mediterranean Sea west, and Jordan, with the south point of the Sea of Tiberias, east. See CANAAN.

ISSUE. The issues from death—that is, all the means of escape from sin or misery, and all the persons redeemed—belong to the Lord. Ps. lxviii. 20. Out of the heart are the issues of life. The holy thoughts and good works of men demonstrate spiritual life to be in their heart, and prepare them for eternal life. Prov. iv. 23.

ITALY. A large country of Southern Europe. We know not the ancient name of Italy in the Hebrew language. Jerome has sometimes rendered Chittim, Italy (Numb. xxiv. 24; Ezek. xxvii. 6); and in Isa. lxvi. 19, he translates Tubal, Italy; though, according to others, the Tibarenians are here meant. In the sacred books written in Greek, there is no ambiguity in the word Italy; it signifies that country of which Rome is the capital. See ROME.

The Italian band mentioned in Acts x. 1, is thought by Calmet to have been a cohort, named from Italica, a city in Spain, built by Scipio, A.D.C. 654, at the beginning of a peace with the Carthaginians. Appian informs us that Scipio collected his wounded soldiers into one city, which, from Italy, he named Italica. This name, however, appears rather to have been given by way of distinction, as being formed chiefly of Italians; since most of the cohorts and other forces of the Romans, then stationed in Syria and Judea, seem to have been raised from provincials. Thus Josephus relates that most of the recruits were derived from Syria. In Gruter's Inscriptions, mention is made of a voluntary cohort of Italian soldiers, which was in Syria. It seems to be admitted by all recent commentators and critics, that we are not to understand the Italian legion, which does not appear to have then existed, but the Italian cohort, which Dr. Doddridge supposes to have been the life-guard of the Roman governor.

ITHAMAR, Aaron's fourth son, who, with his descendants, exercised the functions of common priests only, till the high priesthood passed into his family in the person of Eli. The successors of Eli, of the family of Ithamar, were Ahitub, Ahiah, Ahimelech, and Abiathar, whom Solomon deposed. 1 Kings ii. 27.

ITUREA, a province of Syria, beyond Jordan. It was situated to the east of Batanæa, and to the south of Trachonitis. It seems to have derived its name from Jetur, the son of Ishmael, and was also called Auranitis from Hauran. Luke mentions that Philip was governor of both Iturea and Trachonitis, when John the Baptist entered on his public ministry. The Itureans were a bold, warlike people, much skilled in archery. They are generally supposed to be identical with the modern Druses, who have much of the independent spirit of their ancestors.

IVORY. (Heb. schenhabim, from schen, a tooth, and habim, elephants; Greek, elephantinos. Rev. xviii. 12.)

The first time that ivory is mentioned in Scripture is in the reign of Solomon. If the 45th Psalm was written before the Canticles, and before Solomon had constructed his royal and magnificent throne, then that contains the first mention of this commodity. It is spoken of as used in decorating those boxes of perfume, whose odours were employed to exhilarate the king's spirits. It is probable that Solomon, who traded to India, first brought thence elephants and ivory to Judea. 1 Kings x. 22; 2 Chron. ix. 21. It seems that Solomon had a throne decorated with ivory, and inlaid with gold; the beauty of these materials relieving the splendour, and heightening the lustre of each other. 1 Kings x. 18. Cabinets and wardrobes were ornamented with ivory, by what is called marquetry. Ps. xlv. 8. These were named "houses of ivory," probably because made in the form of a house, or palace; as the silver naoi of Diana, mentioned Acts xix. 24, were in the form of her temple at Ephesus; and as we have now ivory models of the Chinese pagodas, or temples. In this sense we may understand what is said of the ivory house which Ahab made. 1 Kings xxii. 39. As to dwelling-houses, the most we can suppose in regard to them is, that they might have ornaments of ivory, as they sometimes have of gold, silver, or other precious materials, in such abundance as to derive an appellation from the article of their decoration; as the emperor Nero's palace, mentioned by Suetonius, was named aurea, or "golden," because "overlaid with gold." This method of ornamenting buildings, or apartments, was very ancient among the Greeks. Homer mentions ivory as employed in the palace of Menelaus, at Lacedæmon.

Bacchylides, cited by Athenæus, says, that, in the island of Ceos, one of the Cyclades, the houses of the great men "glisten with gold and ivory."

IZHARITES, the descendants of Izhar, the son of Kohath. Numb. iii. 27.

J.

JAAZANIAH, son of Shaphan, one of the principal among the idolatrous Israelites, whom Ezekiel saw in vision. Ezek. viii. 11. Another person of this name is mentioned by the same prophet (chap. xi. 1) as one of the princes of the people, and son of Azur.

JAAZER, or JAZER, a place belonging to the Amorites, and taken by the Israelites. It was one of the encampments of the Israelites in the wilderness. Numb. xxi. 32, xxxii. 35.

JABAL, son of Lamech and Adah, father of those who lodge under tents, and of shepherds (Gen. iv. 20); that is, the first distinguished example of that class of men, who, like the Arab Bedouins, live under tents, and are shepherds.

JABBOK, a small brook rising in the mountains of Gilead, which falls into the Jordan eight miles below the Sea of Tiberias. Near the ford of this brook the angel wrestled with Jacob. Gen. xxxii. 22. Mr. Buckingham thus describes it: "The banks of this stream are so thickly wooded with oleander and plane trees, wild olives and wild almonds in blossom, with many flowers, the names of which were unknown to us, with tall and waving reeds, at least fifteen feet in height, that we could not perceive the water through them from above, though the presence of these luxuriant borders marked the winding of its course; and the murmur of its flow, echoing through its long, deep channel, was to be heard distinctly from afar. The river, where we crossed it at this point, was not more than ten yards wide, but it was deeper than the Jordan, and nearly as rapid; so that we had some difficulty in fording it. As it ran in a rocky bed, its waters were clear, and we found their taste agreeable." It is now called El Zerkah.

JABESH, or JABESH-GILEAD, the name of a city in the half tribe of Manasseh, east of Jordan. Nahash, king of the Ammonites, besieged it. 1 Sam. xi. 1, &c. The inhabitants were friendly to Saul and his family. 1 Sam. xxxi. 11, 12.

JABIN (1.) king of Hazor, in the northern part of Canaan. Josh. xi. 1, &c. Discomfited at the conquests of Joshua, who had subdued the south of Canaan, he formed, with other kings in the northern part along the Jordan and the Mediterranean, and in the mountains, a league offensive and defensive. With their troops they rendezvoused at the waters of Merom; but Joshua attacked them suddenly, defeated them, and pursued them to Great Zidon, and the Valley of Mizpeh. He lamed their horses, burnt their chariots, took Hazor, and killed Jabin, about A.M. 2555. (2.) Another king of Hazor, who oppressed the Israelites twenty years, from A.M. 2699 to 2719. Judg. iv. 2, &c. Sisera, his general, was defeated by Barak at the foot of Mount Tabor; and the Israelites were delivered.

JABNEEL, a city in the tribe of Judah (Josh. xv. 11), and also another in the tribe of Naphtali. Josh. xix. 33.

JABNEH, or JABNIA, a city of the Philistines, thirty miles east of Jerusalem (2 Chron. xxvi. 6), called Jamnia (1 Macc. iv. 15), and Jamneia (chap. v. 58). Its situation may be gathered from the passage last cited, as being not far from Jaffa or Joppa. The following is Dr. Wittman's account of it: "Yebna is a village about twelve miles distant from Jaffa, in a fine open plain, surrounded by hills and covered with herbage. A rivulet formed by the rains supplies water. It is conjectured that the rock Etam, where Samson was surprised by the Philistines, was not far from Yebna. North-east of Yebna is a lofty hill, from which is an extensive and pleasing view of Ramla, distant about five miles. On sloping hills of easy ascent, by which the plains are bordered, Yebna, Ekron, Ashdod, and Ashkelon, were in sight." Compare 2 Chron. xxvi. 6.

JACHIN (stability), the name of a brass pillar placed at the porch of Solomon's temple. (See BOAZ.) These two brazen pillars were considered so valuable, that Nebuchadnezzar removed them to Babylon.

JACINTH. This precious gem, which is mentioned in Rev. xxi. 20, where it is called in the Greek text hyacinth, as it also is in Pliny, is now thought to be the amethyst of the moderns. The amethysts of the ancients are now called garnets. There seems to be no reason for doubting the propriety of rendering the Hebrew ahalmah, and the Greek amethystos, by amethyst. Pliny says, the reason assigned for its name is, that though it approaches to the colour of wine, it falls short of it, and stops at a violet colour. Others think it is called amethyst, because its colour resembles wine mixed with water; and in this view, also, it derives its name from a, negative, and methy, wine. The Oriental amethyst or jacinth is an extremely rare gem. If heated, it loses its colour and becomes transparent, in which state it is hardly distinguishable from the diamond. See AMETHYST.

JACKAL. See FOX.

JACOB, the younger twin son of Isaac and Rebekah, and father of the twelve patriarchs. He was given in answer to much prayer. Before he and his twin brother Esau were yet born, it was revealed to their mother that they were to be the heads of two mighty nations, and that, contrary to the usual custom, the dominion should go to the younger, and the inheritance be entailed upon him. The two children of Isaac early displayed very different dispositions: "And the boys grew: and Esau was a cunning hunter, a man of the field; and Jacob was a plain man, dwelling in tents." Gen. xxv. 27. When they were advanced to a state of manhood, Jacob, who was the mother's favourite, fixed his eye upon the birthright, which Esau, who made light of it, was easily persuaded to renounce. For a mess of pottage Esau sold his birthright; and as it involved various sacred privileges, he is condemned, on this account, as "a profane person." From this time nothing remarkable happened for a considerable period in the history of Jacob. At length an incident occurred which is recorded in Gen. xxvii., and which throws no little blame upon both Jacob and his mother. When Isaac proposed to bequeath the blessing to Esau, Rebekah suggested a plan to Jacob, by which he succeeded in imposing upon his aged parent, and thus by a fraud obtained the blessing. In the wise providence of God he was punished for his deceit. Esau became his avowed enemy, and to escape his brother's vengeance he was obliged to flee to Mesopotamia. In the course of his flight he was favoured with a remarkable vision at Bethel. On reaching the house of his uncle Laban, he was received with great kindness, and agreed to serve him for seven years, on condition of obtaining his beloved Rachel to wife. But, at the expiration of the period, he was disappointed of the object of his choice, by the base artifice of her father, who, substituting Leah instead of Rachel, proposed that Jacob should receive the woman of his choice, on condition of serving him other seven years. No sooner was the stipulated term expired than he desired to be dismissed, that he might be in a situation to provide for his family. Laban was unwilling to lose so faithful a servant, and it was agreed between them that all the cattle which should be produced of a peculiar description should be Jacob's property. It was expected that these would be inconsiderable in number, but very soon the chief increase was in Jacob's favour, and Laban's stock was both diminished and of a feebler kind. Jacob became rich; and yet his difficulties were not removed, but rather increased. At length the Almighty interposed, and by an express revelation directed Jacob to return to Canaan. Having collected together, therefore, all his property, he set out with his wives and handmaidens to return to his father Isaac. In this long and perilous journey he was beset with many trials. Laban pursued him, Esau was advancing to meet him, both intent on his destruction, yet neither were permitted to hurt him. In the midst of these trials, the great Angel of the Covenant appeared to him, and wrestled with him until the breaking of the day. Jacob was permitted to overcome; and, in token of his acceptance, Jacob received the new name of Israel, a prince with God. In memorial of this mysterious contest, the patriarch called the place Peniel, "for," said he, "I have seen God face to face, and my life is preserved." This renewed token of the divine favour did not prevent this good man from fearing to meet his brother Esau. But, in the gracious providence of God, he found Esau's heart melted to kindness, and the two brothers met and parted in peace and love. Jacob having arrived at the land of Canaan, prepared a settlement for himself and his family. And yet how soon were his prospects of happiness clouded! Instead of repose and comfort in his outyard circumstances, he had little else but vexation and disappointment. Many were his domestic troubles and misfortunes. The impatience of his favourite wife, "Give me children, or I die;" her death in bearing her second son, Benjamin; the rape of his daughter Dinah; the perfidy and cruelty of her brothers, Simeon and Levi, to the Shechemites; the incest of Reuben; the supposed death of Joseph, his favourite son; these were altogether sufficient to have brought down his grey hairs with sorrow to the grave, had he not been divinely supported and encouraged throughout the whole of his pilgrimage. For the detail of the circumstances which led Jacob into Egypt, see art. JOSEPH. When the patriarch arrived in Egypt he was conducted to court, and introduced by Joseph to the notice of the king. He continued in a state of great prosperity, and enjoyed the society of his dear son Joseph for seventeen years more, and these were probably the most comfortable he had ever spent. But "Israel must die;" and when he felt his dissolution approaching, he sent for Joseph, and blessed him, praying for his two sons, Ephraim and Manasseh. Under the immediate influence of the Spirit, Jacob pronounced his parental benediction upon his twelve children, predicting the future condition of their descendants even in their last days. Gen. xlix. In firm dependence upon the Redeemer, the dying patriarch, in the midst of his address to his children, cried out, "I have waited for thy salvation, O Lord!" Thus at the age of one hundred and forty-seven years, he closed his afflicted life in peace, and faith, and joy.

JACOBITES, a sect of Christians in Syria and Mesopotamia; so called, either from Jacob, a Syrian, who lived in the reign of the Emperor Mauritius, or from one Jacob, a monk, who flourished in the year 550.

The Jacobites are of two sects—some following the rites of the Latin Church, and others continuing separated from the Church of Rome. There is also a division among the latter, who have two rival patriarchs, and consist of about thirty or forty thousand families, living in Syria and Mesopotamia. As to their belief, they hold but one nature in Jesus Christ. (See HYPOSTASIS—MONOPHYSITES.) With respect to purgatory, and prayers for the dead, they are of the same opinion with the Greeks and other Eastern Christians. They consecrate unleavened bread at the eucharist, and are against confession, believing that it is not of divine institution. They also practise circumcision before baptism. See NESTORIANS.

The name of Jacobites is also applied to the adherents of James II., particularly to the non-jurors who separated from the high Episcopal Church, simply because they would not take the oath of allegiance to the new king, and who, in their public services, prayed for the Stuart family.

JACOB'S WELL, a fountain near Sychar or Shechem. Gen. xxxiii. 19; John iv. 6. "The principal object of veneration here," says Dr. Edward Clarke, "is Jacob's well, over which a church was formerly erected. This is situated at a small distance from the town, in the road to Jerusalem, and has been visited by pilgrims of all ages, but particularly since the Christian era, as the place where our Saviour revealed himself to the woman of Samaria. The spot is so distinctly marked by the evangelist, and so little liable to uncertainty, from the circumstance of the well itself, and the features of the country, that, if no tradition existed for its identity, the site of it could hardly be mistaken. Perhaps no Christian scholar ever attentively read the 4th chapter of John's Gospel without being struck with the numerous internal evidences of truth which crowd upon the mind in its perusal. Within so small a compass it is impossible to find in other writings so many sources of reflection and of interest. Independently of its importance as a document, it concentrates so much information, that a volume might be filled with the illustration it reflects on the history of the Jews, and on the geography of their country. All that can be gathered on these subjects from Josephus seems but as a comment to illustrate this chapter. The journey of our Lord from Judea into Galilee; the cause of it; his passage through the territory of Samaria; his approach to the metropolis of this country; its name; his arrival at the Amorite field, which terminates the narrow valley of Sychem; the ancient custom of halting at a well; the female employment of drawing water; the disciples sent into the city for food, by which its situation out of the town is obviously implied; the question of the woman referring to existing prejudices which separated the Jews from the Samaritans; the depth of the well; the Oriental allusion contained in the expression, 'living water;' the history of the well, and the customs thereby illustrated; the worship upon Mount Gerizim;—all these occur within the space of twenty verses; and if to these be added what has already been referred to in the remainder of the same chapter, we shall perhaps consider it as a field which, in the words of Him who contemplated its ultimate produce, 'we may lift up our eyes and look upon, for it is white already to harvest.'" Maundrell thus describes it: "The well is covered at present with an old stone vault, into which you are let down through a very strait hole; and then removing a broad flat stone, you discover the mouth of the well itself. It is dug in a firm rock, and is about three yards in diameter and thirty-five in depth, five of which we found full of water." Mr. Buckingham informs us, that it is well known in the neighbourhood by the name of Bir-Samarea, or Well of Samaria.

JAEEL, or JAHEL, wife of Heber the Kenite, killed Sisera, general of the Canaanitish army. Judg. iv. 17-21. Why this woman violated the sacred rites of hospitality by murdering her guest, does not appear. Mr. Taylor suggests as probable—(1.) That Jael had herself felt the severity of the late oppression of Israel by Sisera; (2.) That she was actuated by motives of patriotism, and of gratitude toward Israel; (3.) That the general character of Sisera might be so atrocious, that at any rate his death was desirable. We find a similar proceeding in the case of Judith.

JAGUR, a town in the tribe of Judah. Josh. xv. 21.

JAH, one of the names of God; which is combined with many Hebrew words—as Idonijah, Hallelujah, Malachia: God is my Lord, Praise the Lord, The Lord is my king, &c. The word Jah stands simply for the divine essence, or for Him who is and who necessarily must be. See JEHOVAH.

JAHAZ, or JAHAZA, the first town of the Amorites on crossing the frontiers of Moab, and where consequently Sihon posted his army of resistance against the march of the Israelites. Numb. xxi. 23, 24. It was afterwards given to the Reubenites, and was one of the Levitical cities. Josh. xxi. 36.

JAILER. The keeper of a prison in Eastern countries was not laid under the same restrictions, in the treatment of prisoners, as among us. A discretionary power was given him to treat his prisoners as he pleased—all that was expected of him being only to produce them when required. Hence the conduct of the jailer at Philippi, in thrusting Paul and Silas into the inner prison, and making their feet fast in the stocks, was entirely gratuitous on his part. On the contrary, we find the jailer of the state-prison, in the house of Potiphar, the captain of the guard at the court of Pharaoh, king of Egypt, treating Joseph with the utmost lenity and kindness.

JAIR, of Manasseh, possessed the whole country of Argob beyond Jordan, to the borders of Geshuri and Maachathi. Judg. x. 3, 4. He succeeded Tola in the government of Israel, and was succeeded by Jephthah. His government continued twenty-two years—from A.M. 2795 to 2817. Compare Numb. xxxii. 41; Deut. iii. 14; Josh. xiii. 30; 1 Kings iv. 13; 1 Chron. ii. 22.

JAIRUS, chief of the synagogue at Capernaum, whose only daughter, twelve years of age, falling dangerously sick, was healed by Jesus. Mark v. 22.

JAMBRES. See JANNES.

JAMES, one of the twelve apostles, the brother of John, and the son of Zebedee and Salome. He is commonly called James the Greater or the Elder, to distinguish him from the other James, who is called the Less. They were both of them natives of Bethsaida in Galilee, and effectually called by Jesus while prosecuting their trade as fishermen. It would appear that even after the two sons of Zebedee had become followers of Christ, they were, for a long time, strangers to the true nature of his kingdom. Their mother, anxious to secure for her children places of distinction in the temporal kingdom which, as she imagined, Jesus was about to establish on the earth, came to the Saviour with this petition, "Grant that these my two sons may sit, the one on thy right hand, and the other on thy left, in thy kingdom." But Jesus said unto them, for it was evident to Jesus that James and John agreed with their mother in her earnest request, "Ye know not what ye ask. Are ye able to drink of the cup that I shall drink of, and to be baptised with the baptism that I am baptised with? They said unto him, We are able,"—evidently showing that they were total strangers to the spiritual nature of Christ's kingdom, and still under the dominion of worldly, unsanctified dispositions.

James and John were distinguished by the peculiar favour of Christ, and hence they, along with Peter, accompanied him on special occasions. We are told that Christ surnamed them Boanerges, which is, sons of thunder, probably on account of the powerful and energetic eloquence of their preaching. They appear to have both of them been men of a keen temper, so that when certain Samaritans refused to admit Jesus Christ into their city, they wished permission to pray for fire from heaven to consume them. Some days after the resurrection of our Saviour, they saw Jesus at the Sea of Tiberias, and both of them witnessed his ascension into heaven.

James appears to have been permitted to labour only for a short time after the apostles were endued with power from on high. He was the first of the apostles who suffered martyrdom. The account of his death is thus given in Acts xii. 1, 2: "Now, about that time Herod the king stretched forth his hands to vex certain of the church. And he killed James the brother of John with the sword." The Herod here mentioned was Herod Agrippa, who had been made tetrarch of Galilee by the Emperor Caligula, and afterwards King of Judea, and some neighbouring countries, by the Emperor Claudius. It was from a desire to please the Jews that he beheaded James, and in the righteous judgment of God an awful death awaited the royal persecutor. See Acts xii. 21–23. James has left no writings behind him; but in his life he was a powerful preacher of the truth, and in his death a noble martyr. One of the early fathers tells us that the man who had accused James before Herod was so struck with the firmness and unshrinking boldness of his testimony that he declared himself a convert to Christianity, and was put to death along with the apostle.

JAMES THE LESS, son of Alpheus. He is styled the Lord's brother; thus Paul says, "But other of the apostles saw I none, save James the Lord's brother." Gal. i. 19. The word brother was often applied to a near relation of any kind, and the general opinion is that he was the cousin of our blessed Lord, being the son of Cleophas or Alpheus, and Mary, sister to the mother of our Lord. He was surnamed the Just, on account of the remarkable purity of his life. He is said to have been a priest, and to have observed the laws of the Nazarites from his birth. Nothing is recorded in Scripture concerning him, until after our Lord's resurrection. It is to him that the Apostle Paul is supposed to allude, when he says, "After that he was seen of James." He appears to have been held in great esteem among the apostles. Thus Peter, when delivered from prison, said: "Go show these things unto James, and to the brethren." In the famous synod of the apostles and elders, held at Jerusalem, to consider the question how far the ceremonies of the law of Moses were binding on Christians, James presided as pastor of the church at Jerusalem, and thus spoke: "Wherefore my sentence is, that we trouble not them, which from among the Gentiles are turned to God: but that we write unto them, that they abstain from pollutions of idols, and from fornication, and from things strangled, and from blood." Acts xv. 19, 20. This opinion was adopted by the council, and given forth as the decree of the Church. The early historians agree in stating that James continued in Jerusalem after the ascension of Christ, and that so persevering, and active, and successful were his exertions in his Master's cause, that the jealousy and indignation of the Jewish rulers were strongly excited, and he was condemned by the Jewish council. Placing him on a pinnacle of the temple, they called upon him to address the multitude assembled in the court below. In obedience to the command, James cried with a loud voice, "Why do ye inquire of Jesus, the Son of Man? He sits on the right hand of the Majesty on high, and will come again in the clouds of heaven." The people hearing this, some of them began to exclaim, "Hosanna to the Son of David." This so enraged the Jews, who were standing beside the apostle on the roof of the temple, that they cast him down headlong. On reaching the ground he was still alive, and able to get on his knees to pray for his murderers. While thus engaged, the old man was slain by one of the bystanders with a club; and even the Jewish historian, Josephus, is said to have represented his death as a great national crime, which brought upon the Jews the destruction of the city and temple. James the Less has left behind him one Epistle, which forms one of the canonical books of the New Testament.

JAMES, GENERAL EPISTLE OF. Considerable doubts have been entertained respecting the author of this Epistle, but it is now generally admitted that it must be ascribed to James the Less. The date at which it was written is believed to be A.D. 61. Some diversity of opinion has prevailed concerning the canonical authority of the Epistle, but there is sufficient evidence to prove that it was written in the apostolic age. Clement of Rome has alluded to it twice, Hermas seven times. It was quoted as genuine by Origen, Jerome, Athanasius, and most of the subsequent ecclesiastical writers; and it is found in all the catalogues of the canonical books of Scripture which were published by the general and provincial councils. But the most decisive proof of its canonical authority is, that it is inserted in the Syriac version of the New Testament, executed at the close of the first or early in the second century. The design of the Apostle James, in writing this Epistle, is stated by Mr Horne to be as follows:—1. To prevent the Jewish Christians from falling into the vices which abounded among the Jews. 2. To set the Jewish Christians right as to the doctrine of justification by faith. 3. To prevent them from being impatient under their present persecutions or dark prospects. This Epistle of James is one of the most pathetic and instructive in the New Testament. Its style possesses all that beautiful and elegant simplicity which so eminently characterizes the sacred writers.

JANNES and JAMBRES. These were Egyptian magicians, who are thus referred to by the Apostle Paul: "Now, as Jannes and Jambres withstood Moses, so do these also resist the truth: men of corrupt minds, reprobate concerning the faith." 2 Tim. iii. 8. These two individuals are mentioned in the Rabbinical writings, and also in some profane authors of antiquity, as Numenius, Archelaus, and Pliny. They appear to have been priests at Memphis, and were among those who opposed their magic tricks to the miracles of Moses. The words of Numenius in reference to these magicians are, "Jannes and Jambres were sacred scribes of the Egyptians, who excelled in magic, at the time when the Jews were driven out of Egypt. These were the only persons whom the Egyptians found capable of opposing Moses, who was a man whose prayers to God were very powerful. These two men, Jannes and Jambres, were alone able to frustrate the calamities which Moses brought upon the Egyptians."

The Mohammedans have several particulars to the same purpose. Their recital supposes that the magicians wrought no miracle, but only played conjuring tricks, in which they endeavoured to impose upon the eyes of spectators. Moses, however, expresses himself as if Pharaoh's magicians operated the same effects as himself; so that Pharaoh and his whole court were persuaded that the power of their magicians was equal to that of Moses, till those magicians themselves were constrained to acknowledge, This is the finger of God! Exod. viii. 18, 19. See PLAGUES of EGYPT.

JANSENISTS, a sect of the Roman Catholics in France, who followed the opinions of Jansenius (Bishop of Ypres, and Doctor of Divinity of the Universities of Louvain and Douay), in relation to grace and predestination.

"In the year 1640, the two universities just mentioned, and particularly Father Molina and Father Leonard Celsus, thought fit to condemn the opinions of the Jesuits on grace and free-will. This having set the controversy on foot, Jansenius opposed to the doctrine of the Jesuits the sentiments of St Augustine, and wrote a treatise on grace which he entitled Augustinus. This treatise was attacked by the Jesuits, who accused Jansenius of maintaining dangerous and heretical opinions; and afterwards, in 1642, obtained of Pope Urban VIII. a formal condemnation of the treatise written by Jansenius, when the partisans of Jansenius gave out that this bull was spurious, and composed by a person entirely devoted to the Jesuits. After the death of Urban VIII., the system of Jansenism began to be more warmly controverted, and gave birth to a great number of polemical writings concerning grace; and what occasioned some mirth were the titles which each party gave to their writings. One writer published the Torch of St Augustine; another found Snuffers of St Augustine's Torch; and Father Veron formed A Gag for the Jansenists, &c. In the year 1650, sixty-eight bishops of France subscribed a letter to Pope Innocent X., to obtain an inquiry into and condemnation of the five following propositions, extracted from Jansenius' Augustinus: 1. Some of God's commandments are impossible to be observed by the righteous, even though they endeavour with all their power to accomplish them. 2. In the state of corrupted nature we are incapable of resisting inward grace. 3. Merit and demerit, in a state of corrupted nature, do not depend on a liberty which excludes necessity, but on a liberty which excludes constraint. 4. The Semi-pelagians admitted the necessity of an inward preventing grace for the performance of each particular act, even for the beginning of faith; but they were heretics in maintaining that this grace was of such a nature that the will of man was able either to resist or obey it. 5. It is Semi-pelagianism to say that Jesus Christ died or shed his blood for all mankind in general.

"In the year 1652, the Pope appointed a congregation for examining into the dispute relative to grace. In this congregation Jansenius was condemned; and the bull of condemnation, published in May 1653, filled all the pulpits in Paris with violent outcries and alarms against the Jansenists. In the year 1656, Pope Alexander VII. issued out another bull, in which he condemned the five propositions of Jansenius. However, the Jansenists affirmed that these propositions were not to be found in this book; but that some of his enemies having caused them to be printed on a sheet, inserted them in the book, and thereby deceived the Pope. At last Clement XI. put an end to the dispute by his constitution of July 17, 1705, in which, after having recited the constitutions of his predecessors in relation to this affair, he declared, 'That, in order to pay a proper obedience to the Papal constitutions concerning the present question, it is necessary to receive them with a respectful silence.' The clergy of Paris, the same year, approved and accepted this bull, and none dared to oppose it. This is the famous bull Unigenitus, so called from its beginning with the words Unigenitus Dei Filius, &c., which has occasioned so much confusion in France.

"It was not only on account of their embracing the doctrines of Augustine that the Jesuits were so embittered against them; but that which offended the Jesuits, and the other creatures of the Roman pontiff, was their strict piety and severe moral discipline. The Jansenists cried out against the corruptions of the Church of Rome, and complained that neither its doctrines nor morals retained any traces of their former purity. They reproached the clergy with an universal depravation of sentiments and manners, and an entire forgetfulness of the dignity of their character, and the duties of their vocation; they censured the licentiousness of the monastic orders, and insisted upon the necessity of reforming their discipline according to the rules of sanctity, abstinence, and self-denial, that were originally prescribed by their respective founders. They maintained, also, that the people ought to be carefully instructed in all the doctrines and precepts of Christianity, and that for this purpose the Holy Scriptures and public liturgies should be offered to their perusal in their mother tongue; and, finally, they looked upon it as a matter of the highest moment to persuade all Christians that true piety did not consist in the observance of pompous rites, or in the performance of external acts of devotion, but in inward holiness and divine love."

JAPHETH, one of the three sons of Noah, and, as we learn from Gen. x. 21, the eldest. His name signifies enlargement; and this is strictly applicable to the widely-extended wanderings of his descendants, who first settled in the islands of the Mediterranean Sea, and on the neighbouring coasts of Asia Minor, and of Europe, whence they spread into the north and west. Japheth is mentioned by profane authors under the name of Japetus, whom the Greeks reckoned the father of their race.

JAPHIA, a town in the territory of the tribe of Zebulun. Josh. xix. 12.

JAPHO, a name of Joppa mentioned in Josh. xix. 46. See JOPPA.

JAR. A Hebrew month answering to our April.

JAREB (Hos. v. 13, x. 6), the name of a king, or, as Calmet thinks, of an idol, for it was common among the heathen to call their idols kings. Gesenius says that it was used as a title of the Assyrian kings.

JARHA, the name of an Egyptian slave belonging to an Israelite named Sheshan, who, according to 1 Chron. ii. 34, 35, gave him his daughter in marriage.

JARMUTH, the name of a city in the tribe of Judah. Josh. xv. 35. Its king was slain by Joshua. Josh. xii. 11. Jarmuth was also the name of a Levitical city belonging to the tribe of Issachar. Josh. xxi. 29.

JASHER, BOOK OF, a modern apocryphal work, intended to impose on the credulous and ignorant, to sap the credit of the books of Moses, and to blacken the character of Moses himself. It pretends to be a translation of the ancient record mentioned Josh. x. 13, and 2 Sam. i. 18, but is one of the most clumsy and impudent forgeries that ever were attempted to be palmed on the public. It was first published by Jacob Ilive, a printer, in 1751, in quarto, who worked it off secretly by night, at a private press. Some have supposed the Book of Jasher, referred to in Joshua, to be the same with the Book of Judges, because it mentions the miracle of the sun standing still. Josephus, with greater probability, conjectures that it has been composed of certain Jewish records. Bishop Lowth, on the other hand, views it as a collection of sacred songs, composed at different times and on different occasions.

JASON, a high priest of the Jews, and brother of Onias III. He was a man of unbounded ambition, who scrupled not to divest his brother of the high priesthood, in order to seize that dignity himself, sacrilegiously purchasing it from Antiochus Epiphanes. Jason did all he could to abolish the worship of God in Jerusalem, and to prevail with the very priests to adopt the religion of the Greeks. He is to be considered as the cause of all the calamities which befell the Jews under Antiochus. He died at Lacedæmon, a city in alliance with the Jews, to which he had fled from Aretas, or Menelaus; and his body remained without burial—the greatest indignity that could be offered to him.

JASON, Paul's kinsman, and his host at Thessalonica (Rom. xvi. 21), who hazarded his life to preserve him during a sedition in that city. Acts xvii. 7.

JASPER. (Heb. jaspeh; Exod. xxviii. 20, xxxix. 13; Ezek. xxviii. 13. Gr. iaspis; Rev. iv. 3, xxi. 11, 18, 19.) The Greek and Latin name, jaspis, as well as the English jasper, is plainly derived from the Hebrew, and leaves little room to doubt what species of gem is meant by the original word. The jasper is usually defined, a hard stone, of a bright, beautiful green colour; sometimes clouded with white, and spotted with red or yellow.

JATTIR, a Levitical city in the tribe of Dan. Josh. xv. 48.

JAVAN, or ION (for the Hebrew word, differently pointed, forms both names), was the fourth son of Japheth, and the father of all those nations which were included under the name of Grecians, or Ionians, as they were invariably called in the East. See DIVISION OF THE EARTH—GREECE.

JAVELIN. See ARMS, MILITARY.

JEALOUSY, is that particular feeling of uneasiness which arises from the fear that some rival may rob us of the affection of one whom we greatly love, or suspicion that he has already done it. The first sort of jealousy is inseparable from love before it is in possession of its object; the latter is unjust, generally mischievous, and always troublesome.

God's tender love towards his Church is sometimes called jealousy. Paul says to the Corinthians, that he is jealous over them with a godly jealousy, that he might present them as a chaste virgin to Christ. The word, however, is frequently used to express the vindictive acts of dishonoured love. Thus the Psalmist (Ps. lxxix. 5), representing the Church as smarting under divine judgments, occasioned by her infidelity to God, says, "How long, Lord? shall thy jealousy burn like fire?" See also 1 Cor. x. 22.

JEARIM (mount—Josh. xv. 10), a boundary of the inheritance of Judah. It was a woody mountain, on which the city of Balah, or Kirjath-jearim, was situated.

JEBUS, the son of Canaan (Gen. x. 16), and father of the people of Palestine called Jebusites. Their dwelling was in Jerusalem and round about, in the mountains. This people were very warlike, and held Jerusalem till David's time. Josh. xv. 63; 2 Sam. v. 6–9.

JEDUTHUN, a Levite of Merari's family, and one of the four great masters of music belonging to the temple. 1 Chron. xvi. 41. He is the same as Ethan; and some of the psalms are said to have been composed by him, as Ps. lxxxix., entitled, "Of Ethan the Ezrahite;" also xxxix., lxxii., and lxxvii., under the name of Jeduthun. There are some psalms with the name of Jeduthun affixed to them, which seem to have been composed during, or after, the captivity. These were probably composed, or sung, by his descendants, or class.

JEGAR-SAHADUTHA (the heap of witness). Gen. xxxi. 47, &c. The term is Chaldee, and it is usually thought to prove that the Chaldee language was different from the Hebrew. It might be so; but we should remember that Jacob gave two names to this place, "Galeed and Mizpah." Might not Laban do the same? varying the term, as Mizpah differs from Galeed: for it does not appear that Laban when speaking afterwards uses the Chaldee words, Jegar-shadutha; but the Hebrew words which Jacob used, "This (gall) heap be witness, and this (mispah) pillar be witness." So that in these instances he certainly retained his Hebrew. See STONES.

JEHOAHAZ, otherwise SHALLUM, the son of Josiah, king of Judah. Jer. xxii. 11. Jehoahaz was made king in his room, though he was not Josiah's eldest son. 2 Kings xxiii. 30. He was in all probability thought fitter than any of his brethren to make head against the King of Egypt. He reigned, however, only three months in Jerusalem. B.C. 609.—being taken captive, and carried into Egypt by Pharaoh-necho. 2 Kings xxiii. 31–34. Jehoahaz was also the name of the son and successor of Jehu, king of Israel. He reigned seventeen years; in the course of which his kingdom was attacked first by Hazael, and afterwards by Benhadad, kings of Syria. 2 Kings xiii. 1–9.

JEHOASH. See JOASH.

JEHOIACHIN, king of Judah, who is also called Coniah (Jer. xxii. 24) and Jeconiah (1 Chron. iii. 17). His reign was of very short duration, extending only to three months. His father, Jehoiakim, or Ehakim, was carried to Babylon at the time of the first Babylonish captivity. In 2 Kings xxiv. 8, Jehoiachin is said to have been eighteen years of age when he began to reign; and in 2 Chron. xxxvi. 9, he is said to have been only eight when he ascended the throne. This apparent discrepancy is explained when we bear in mind that he was only eight when he began to reign with his father, and eighteen when he began to reign alone. There is a peculiar prophecy in reference to this monarch in Jer. xxii. 30: "Write ye this man childless," which cannot be understood in its literal sense, as he was the father of Salathiel and others, but as implying that he should have no heir to the throne, which proved to be actually the case.

JEHOIADA, a high priest among the Jews, who succeeded Azariah in that sacred office. Josephus, the Jewish historian, calls him Joadus. It was Jehoiada by whom, along with his wife Jehoshaba, Joash, the son of Joram, king of Judah, was rescued when a very young child, from the hand of the murderous Athaliah. It would appear from 2 Kings xi. 12, 2 Chron. xxiii. 24, that Joram was also indebted for his elevation to the throne to Jehoiada, by whose advice he was persuaded to adopt wise designs for the government of the nation. Among the plans proposed by this excellent high priest, was one for repairing the temple. Jehoiada lived to a very advanced age, having died at one hundred and thirty, B.C. 834.

JEHOIAKIM. This prince, who also bore the name of Eliakim, was the brother of Jehoahaz, king of Judah. He was raised to the throne at the death of his brother by Necho, king of Egypt. 2 Kings xxiii. 34–36. By orders of Nebuchadnezzar, Jehoiakim was bound in fetters with the view of being carried captive into Babylon. He does not appear to have been carried thither; for although the first year of Nebuchadnezzar corresponds to the fourth year of Jehoiakim, the latter is said in the books of Kings and Chronicles, to have reigned eleven years; so that the probability is, Jehoiakim was never carried into Babylon, but kept in chains for a time in Jerusalem. The prediction of Jeremiah concerning the end of this king is a melancholy one: "Therefore thus saith the Lord concerning Jehoiakim the son of Josiah king of Judah, They shall not lament for him, saying, Ah my brother! or, Ah sister! they shall not lament for him, saying, Ah lord! or, Ah his glory! He shall be buried with the burial of an ass, drawn and cast forth beyond the gates of Jerusalem." Jer. xxii. 18, 19. This prophecy was remarkably fulfilled, for, after being slain, his dead body was thrown into the common sewer. This happened B.C. 599.

JEHOIARIB, the head of the first of the twenty-four classes of priests established by David. 1 Chron. xxiv. 7. The family of the Maccabees appear to have been descended from him.

JEHORAM, son of Jehoshaphat, king of Judah. He began to reign along with his father, in the fifth year of Joram, son of Ahab, king of Israel, A.M. 3112. He married Athaliah, daughter of Omri, by whom he was ensnared into the practice and encouragement of idolatry, which brought many evils upon his kingdom. He commenced his reign as sole king after the death of his father, by putting to death all his brothers. His wickedness brought upon him the signal judgments of God, who permitted the Edomites, after having been long tributary to Judah, to revolt in his reign and assert their independence. 2 Kings viii. 20, 21. Jehoram died in Jerusalem, and was buried there, but not in the sepulchres of the kings. The name of Jehoram or Joram also belonged to the son of Ahab, king of Israel, whom he succeeded in the kingdom. He reigned for twelve years, at the end of which he was put to death by Jehu.

JEHOSHAPHAT, son of Asa, king of Judah, whom he succeeded at the mature age of thirty-five. In his wars with Israel, he conquered Baasha, and fortified the cities of Judah and Ephraim. He discouraged idolatry, and to prevent its progress, he cut down the groves and destroyed the high places. He made provision, at an early period of his reign, for the people being instructed in the law, and with this view, he employed priests and Levites to go through the country teaching his subjects. These efforts God remarkably blessed; so that under the reign of Jehoshaphat, the kingdom of Judah flourished, having become a powerful nation, with many fortified cities, and a very large army extending to a million of men. Into one sin, however, did Jehoshaphat, in his royal capacity, fall, having formed an alliance with the wicked and idolatrous Ahab. But in all the arrangements of the internal government of his kingdom, he was a model of a pious and good king, wisely administering the laws, regulating the ecclesiastical observances, and maintaining good order and regularity among the people. In his external wars, this good prince was no less successful. He reduced the Moabites and Ammonites to complete subjection. A second time did Jehoshaphat err in forming a mercantile alliance with Ahaziah, the idolatrous king of Israel, which God punished by the loss of his fleet. After a reign of twenty-five years, he died, and was buried in the royal sepulchre, B.C. 889.

JEHOSHAPHAT, VALLEY OF. This valley is a deep and narrow ravine, which runs from north to south, between the mount of Olives and mount Moriah; the brook Kidron flowing through the middle of it, which is dry the greatest part of the year, but has a current of a red colour, after storms, or in rainy seasons.

The declivities in the middle of the valley are almost literally paved with tombstones; some of which are of the most ancient date; for here the Jew has been accustomed to bury his dead during the past three thousand years. These graves are of the simplest kind, no ornaments being employed to decorate them. The site is marked by a slab of unpolished stone, on which is written, in the Hebrew character, the name and age of the deceased, with the day of his death. The ground is rocky, and no little labour is required to excavate a grave. In this valley, among others, is the tomb of Jehoshaphat, consisting simply of an excavation in the rock, its entrance forming its only ornament. "The interior," says Stephens, "was damp, the water trickling from the walls, and nearly filled with sand and crumbling stone."

The Prophet Joel (iii. 2, 12) says, "The Lord will gather all nations in the valley of Jehoshaphat, and will plead with them there." Some maintain that the ancient Hebrews had named no particular place the valley of Jehoshaphat; but that Joel intended generally the place where God would judge the nations, and will appear at the last judgment in the brightness of his majesty. Jehoshaphat, in Hebrew, signifies "the judgment of God." It is very probable that the valley of Jehoshaphat—that is, of God's judgment—is symbolical, as well as the valley of slaughter, in the same chapter. From this passage, however, the Jews and many Christians have been of opinion that the last judgment will be solemnized in the valley of Jehoshaphat.

JEHOSHEBA, the daughter of Joram and sister of Ahaziah, king of Judah. She married Jehoiada, the high priest, and saved Joash, then only a year old, from the fury of Athaliah, who murdered all the other princes of the royal family. 2 Kings xi. 1-3.

JEHOVAH (self-existent), the awful and incommunicable name of the Divine Essence. It seems to be a compound of JAH, the essence, and HAVAH, existing; that is, always existing; whence the word ETERNAL appears best to express its import. It is well rendered, "He who is, and who was, and who is to come" (Rev. i. 4, xi. 17); that is, as the schoolmen speak, ETERNAL, both a parte ante and a parte post. Compare John viii. 58. That this name was known to the heathens, as the God of the Hebrews, there can be no doubt. Sanchoniathon writes it Jebo; Diodorus the Sicilian, Macrobius, Clemens Alexandrinus, Jerome, and Origen, write it Jao, Epiphanius, Theodoret, and the Samaritans, Jabe, Jave. The Latins hence took their Jovis Pater. The Egyptians also seem to have had some acquaintance with its sublime meaning; for on the temple of Isis was the following inscription, evidently borrowed from it: "I am whatever is, was, and will be, and no mortal has ever raised my veil."

According to Exod. vi. 2, 3, God never revealed himself by this peculiar and glorious name before the time of Moses; though Moses himself employs it in narrating the history of the patriarchs.

The Jews after their captivity in Babylon, out of an excessive and superstitious respect for this name, left off to pronounce it, and thus lost the true pronunciation. The Septuagint generally renders it Kurios, "the Lord." Origen, Jerome, and Eusebius, testify that in their time the Jews left the name of Jehovah written in their copies in Samaritan characters, instead of writing it in the common Chaldee or Hebrew characters; which shows their veneration for this holy name, and the fear they were under lest strangers, who were not unacquainted with the Chaldee letters and language, should discover and misapply it. Josephus calls this Tetragrammaton, or four-lettered name (Heb. JHWH), the shuddering name of God.

The Jewish cabalists have refined much on the name of Jehovah. The letters which compose it, they affirm to abound with mysteries. He who pronounces it, shakes heaven and earth, and inspires the very angels with terror. A sovereign authority resides in it; it governs the world—is the fountain of graces and blessings—the channel through which God's mercies are conveyed to men.

It would be waste of time and patience to repeat all that has been said on this INCOMMUNICABLE NAME. It may not be amiss, however, to remind the reader, 1. That although it signifies the state of being, yet it forms no verb. 2. It never assumes a plural form. 3. It does not admit an article, or take an affix. 4. Neither is it placed in a state of construction with other words, though other words may be in construction with it.

It is usually marked in Jewish books, where it must be alluded to, by an abbreviation. (Jod.) It is also abbreviated in the term JAH, which, the reader will observe, enters into the formation of many Hebrew appellations. (See JAH.) In our version it is printed LORD, in large capitals. As applied to Christ, it becomes a decisive testimony to his divine nature. Ps. xcvi. ciii.; Jer. xxiii. 5, 6, xxxiii. 15, 16; Mal. iii. 1; Isa. xl. 3-11.

JEHOVAH-JIREH, Jehovah will see or provide. The name was doubtless given in allusion to the expression mentioned in Gen. xxii. 8: "God will provide himself a lamb for a burnt-offering." The name became a proverb in Israel, to express the Lord's remarkable goodness, not only to Abraham, but to all who like Abraham put their trust in him.

JEHOVAH-NISSI. This name implies "Jehovah my banner," and is found in Exod. xvii. 15: "And Moses built an altar, and called the name of it Jehovah-nissi." The use of such a term by Moses was probably designed as a grateful acknowledgment to God, who had given Israel the victory over Amalek.

JEHOVAH-SHALOM. This name, which signifies "Jehovah, Peace," was given by Gideon to an altar which he built in a place where the Angel of the Covenant, or the angel Jehovah, had appeared to him and said, "Peace be unto thee; fear not; thou shalt not die." Judges vi. 23, 24. The purpose for which the altar was erected is explained in the verses immediately following (verses 25, 26); and Gideon probably denominated the altar Jehovah-Shalom, in reference to the assurance of peace and blessing given him on that memorable spot.

JEHOVAH-SHAMMAH, a name applied by Ezekiel (xlvi. 35) to a future holy city described by him in the close of his prophecy. It is translated on the margin, "The Lord is there."

JEHOVAH-TZIDKENU. This appellation occurs in the margin of Jer. xxiii. 6, and xxxiii. 16, and is translated "The Lord our Righteousness." In the first passage the name is given to the Messiah, and in the second passage to Jerusalem or his people. Bishop Pearson, however, prefers interpreting the latter "He that shall call her;" in which case, both passages apply the name to Christ Jesus. He is his people's righteousness, inasmuch as he hath brought in an everlasting righteousness, through the imputation of which, on the part of God, and their reception of which, by faith, all his people are justified or accepted in the sight of God.

JEHOZADAK, the son of Seraiah, a high priest of the Jews. 1 Chron. iv. 14, 15; Ezra iii. 2.

JEHU, son of Jehoshaphat and grandson of Nimshi, who conspired against and slew Jehoram, king of Israel, succeeding him in the government. Elijah the prophet was commanded by God to anoint him as king, that he might avenge the sins of the house of Ahab. He did not, however, forsake the sins of Jeroboam, for in 2 Kings x. 29, 31, he is accused of worshipping the golden calves. He reigned twenty-eight years over Israel, when he was succeeded in his throne by his son Jehoahaz.

JEHU, a prophet, son of Hanani, who was commissioned by God to predict the vengeance of heaven against Baasha, king of Israel. "Then the word of the Lord came to Jehu the son of Hanani against Baasha, saying, Forasmuch as I exalted thee out of the dust, and made thee prince over my people Israel, and thou hast walked in the way of Jeroboam, and hast made my people Israel to sin, to provoke me to anger with their sins; behold I will take away the posterity of Baasha, and the posterity of his house; and will make thy house like the house of Jeroboam the son of Nebat. Him that dieth of Baasha in the city shall the dogs eat; and him that dieth of his in the field shall the fowls of the air eat." 1 Kings xvi. 1-4. Many years after we find Jehu, son of Hanani, sent by God to Jehoshaphat, king of Judah. 2 Chron. xix. 1. In 2 Chron. xx. 34, mention is made of a book which appears to have been written by Jehu: "Now the rest of the acts of Jehoshaphat, first and last, behold, they are written in the book of Jehu the son of Hanani, who is mentioned in the book of the kings of Israel." No trace of this book remains, but it must have existed at the time when the Chronicles were written.

JEPHTHAH, one of those remarkable men whom God raised up to judge Israel. He was the son of Gilead by a concubine (Judg. xi. 1, 2), and was invited by the people to lead them forth against the Ammonites. On that occasion he made the much contested vow contained in Judg. xi. 30, 31. Jephthah was successful in battle, having conquered the Ammonites and laid waste their country. On returning home, his daughter, an only child, came forth to meet him and congratulate him on his victory. The result was, that he did with her according to his vow. In reference to the nature of the vow which Jephthah made, we may quote the following judicious remarks of Dr Hales: "When Jephthah went forth to battle against the Ammonites, 'he vowed a vow unto the Lord, and said, If thou wilt surely give the children of Ammon into my hand, then it shall be, that whatsoever cometh out of the doors of my house to meet me, when I return in peace from the children of Ammon, shall either be the Lord's, or I will offer it up for a burnt-offering.' Judg. xi. 30, 31. According to this rendering of the conjunctions (taus) in the last clause, either, or (which is justified by the Hebrew idiom, the paucity of connecting particles in that language making it necessary that this conjunction should often be understood disjunctively), the vow consisted of two parts—1. That what person soever met him should be the Lord's, or be dedicated to his service. 2. That what beast soever met him, if clean, should be offered up for a burnt-offering unto the Lord. This rendering, and this interpretation, is warranted by the Levitical law about vows. The neder, or vow, in general, included either persons, beasts, or things, dedicated to the Lord for pious uses; which, if it was a simple vow, was redeemable at certain prices, if the person repented of his vow, and wished to commute it for money, according to the age and sex of the person. Lev. xxvii. 1-28. This was a wise regulation to remedy rash vows. But if the vow was accompanied with cherem, devotement, it was irredeemable, as in the following cases: 'Notwithstanding, no devotement which a man shall devote unto the Lord, [either] of man, or of beast, or of land of his own property, shall be sold or redeemed. Everything devoted is most holy unto the Lord.' Lev. xxvii. 28. Here the three taus in the original should necessarily be rendered disjunctively, or; as the last actually is in our public translation, because there are three distinct subjects of devotement, to be applied to distinct uses; the man, to be dedicated to the service of the Lord, as Samuel by his mother, Hannah (1 Sam. i. 11); the cattle, if clean, such as oxen, sheep, goats, turtle-doves, or pigeons, to be sacrificed; and if unclean, as camels, horses, asses, to be employed for carrying burdens in the service of the tabernacle or temple; and the lands, to be sacred property. This law, therefore, expressly applied, in its first branch, to Jephthah's case, who had devoted his daughter to the Lord, or opened his mouth unto the Lord, and therefore could not go back; as he declared in his grief at seeing his daughter, and his only child, coming to meet him with timbrels and dances. She was, therefore, necessarily devoted, but with her own consent, to perpetual virginity, in the service of the tabernacle. Judg. xi. 36, 37. And such service was customary; for in the division of the spoils taken in the first Midianite war, of the whole number of captive virgins, 'the Lord's tribute was thirty-two persons.' Num. xxxi. 35-40. This instance appears to be decisive of the nature of her devotement. Her father's extreme grief on this occasion, and her requisition of a respite of two months to bewail her virginity, are both perfectly natural: having no other issue, he could only look forward to the extinction of his name and family; and a state of celibacy, which is reproachful among women everywhere, was peculiarly so among the Israelites, and was therefore no ordinary sacrifice on her part, who, though she generously gave up, could not but regret the loss of becoming 'a mother in Israel.' 'And he did with her according to his vow which he had vowed, and she knew no man,' or remained a virgin all her life. Judg. xi. 34-40."

Dr. Hales adds, "The other case of devotement (Lev. xxvii. 29) is utterly irrelative to Jephthah's vow, which did not regard a foreign enemy or a domestic transgressor devoted to destruction, but, on the contrary, was a vow of thanksgiving, and therefore properly came under the former case. And that Jephthah could not possibly have sacrificed his daughter, according to the vulgar opinion, founded on incorrect translation, may appear from the following considerations:—1. The sacrifice of children to Molech was an abomination to the Lord, of which, in numberless passages, he expresses his detestation; and it was prohibited by an express law, under pain of death, as 'a defilement of God's sanctuary, and a profanation of his holy name.' Lev. xx. 2, 3. Such a sacrifice, therefore, unto the Lord himself must be a still higher abomination. And there is no precedent of any such under the law in the Old Testament. 2. The case of Isaac, before the law, is irrelevant, for Isaac was not sacrificed; and it was only proposed for a trial of Abraham's faith. 3. No father, merely by his own authority, could put an offending, much less an innocent, child to death, upon any account, without the sentence of the magistrates (Deut. xxi. 18-21), and the consent of the people, as in Jonathan's case. 4. The Mishna, or traditional law of the Jews, is pointedly against it:—'If a Jew should devote his son or daughter, his man or maid servant, who are Hebrews, the devotion would be void; because no man can devote what is not his own, or of whose life he has not the absolute disposal.'

It was the general opinion both of the Jews and early Christians, that Jephthah actually offered up his daughter in sacrifice. This, however, is far from certain. The language of the sacred writer does not amount to an assertion that such a sacrifice took place; and besides, human sacrifices were forbidden among the Jews. We quite coincide, therefore, in opinion with Dr Hales in the remarks above quoted, that Jephthah did not sacrifice his daughter, at all events, whatever may have been the precise nature of the vow.

JERAH, one of the sons of Joktan, mentioned in Gen. x. 26. He is said to have given his name to a district of Arabia.

JERAHMEEL, a district in the south of Judah, occupied by the descendants of Jerahmeel, the son of Hezron. 1 Sam. xxvii. 10, xxx. 29.

JEREMIAH, an eminent prophet of the Lord. He was a native of Anathoth, a village three miles north of Jerusalem. He was exposed to much trouble and persecution in the discharge of his prophetic office. Bishop Lowth thus speaks of him:—

"Jeremiah survived to behold the sad accomplishment of all his darkest predictions. He witnessed all the horrors of the famine, and, when that had done its work, the triumph of the enemy. He saw the strongholds of the city cast down, the palace of Solomon, the temple of God, with all its courts, its roofs of cedar and of gold, levelled to the earth, or committed to the flames; the sacred vessels, the ark of the covenant itself, with the cherubim, pillaged by profane hands. What were the feelings of a patriotic and religious Jew at this tremendous crisis, he has left on record in his unrivalled elegies. Never did city suffer a more miserable fate—never was ruined city lamented in language so exquisitely pathetic. Jerusalem is, as it were, personified, and bewailed with the passionate sorrow of private and domestic attachment; while the more general pictures of the famine—the common misery of every rank, and age, and sex, all the desolation, the carnage, the violation, the dragging away into captivity, the remembrance of former glories, of the gorgeous ceremonies and the glad festivals, the awful sense of the divine wrath heightening the present calamities—are successively drawn with all the life and reality of an eye-witness. They combine the truth of history with the deepest pathos of poetry." See LAMENTATIONS.

JERICOH was a city of Benjamin, about twenty miles north-east from Jerusalem, and six from the Jordan. Josh. xviii. 21. Moses calls it the city of palm-trees. Deut. xxxiv. 3. Josephus says, that in the territory of this city were not only many palm trees, but also the balsam tree. (See BALSAM TREE.) This was the first city which Joshua took possession of after he led the Israelites across the Jordan into Canaan. On effecting its conquest by means of the miraculous interference of their covenant God, they set fire to the city, and utterly destroyed all that was in it. "And Joshua," we are told (vi. 26), "adjured them at that time, saying, Cursed be the man before the Lord, that riseth up and buildeth this city Jericho: he shall lay the foundation thereof in his first-born, and in his youngest son shall he set up the gates of it." This prediction was remarkably fulfilled five hundred and thirty years after, in the case of Hiel the Bethelite, who attempted to rebuild Jericho, but he lost his eldest son Abiram on laying the foundations of the city, and his youngest son Segub in setting up the gates. In the time of our Lord, Jericho was the second city in Judea. Its present appearance is thus described by Dr Wilson: "We encamped for the night outside Rihá, or Eríhá, the modern Jericho. It is merely a congeries of wretched stone huts, covered with thorn bushes, surrounded by a fence of the same material, and occupied by a set of poor and, I am sorry to add, profligate Arabs, whose character has been brought to its present debasement, particularly so far as the female portion of the community is concerned, by the proximity of a small detachment of Turkish soldiers. The officer commanding the guard occupies a ruinous square tower, with a dirty court, somewhat resembling the stables of Augeas, and which, though evidently of no great antiquity, in the want of a better, is set forth as the house of Zaccheus!" The situation of which Dr Wilson here speaks, is considered by most travellers to be that of ancient Jericho, but Buckingham thinks that the extensive field of ruins which is seen about six miles from Jordan, at the foot of the western hills, has a better claim to be regarded as the remains of Jericho. "These ruins occupy a space of about a mile square. They consist of long and regular mounds, overgrown with grass, indicating the foundations of walls and other buildings. Broken shafts of columns lie scattered about. There is not a single dwelling or inhabitant on the spot. The place is a dreary solitude, overhung by a lofty and barren mountain, and rarely visited, unless by the Arab, who wanders over it unconscious of the splendour on which he is treading. How clearly here has the prophecy been fulfilled, as it has also been on most of the once fortified cities of this land, "The defenced city shall be desolate, and the habitation forsaken, and left like a wilderness!"

JEROBOAM, the son of Nebat, whose inglorious distinction it was that "he made Israel to sin." He was born at Zereda, in the tribe of Ephraim. 1 Kings xi. 26. He was the leader of the revolt which led to the separation of the ten tribes, and the division of the kingdom into two parts. Jeroboam was the first king of Israel, and signalised his wicked reign by instituting the idolatrous worship of the golden calves at Dan and Bethel. He also caused idolatrous temples to be built, and priests to be ordained of the lowest of the people, who were neither of the family of Aaron nor of the tribe of Levi. After reigning twenty-two years he died, leaving Nadab, his son, to succeed him on the throne of Israel.

JEROBOAM, the second king of that name, was the thirteenth king of Israel, and the son of Jehoahash. During his reign the kingdom of the ten tribes prospered greatly, notwithstanding his encouragement of idolatry. He occupied the throne for forty-one years, in the course of which appeared Amos, Jonah, and Hosea.

JERUBBAAL. See GIDEON.

JERUEL, a wilderness situated to the west of the Dead Sea, and south of Judah, between Engedi and Tekoah. It was the scene of a great victory obtained by Jehoshaphat over the Ammonites and Moabites, and was called also the Valley of Berachah, or Blessing. 2 Chron. xx. 26.

JERUSALEM, the capital city of Palestine, and situated on the borders of Judah and Benjamin. In very early times, under the name of Salem, it was the residence of Melchizedee, who was both a king and a priest. Afterwards it was occupied by the Jebusites, who maintained possession of the citadel even in the time of David. Ultimately it became the capital city of the Jews, and now it has so fallen in importance that it is nothing more than the chief town of a petty Turkish district, subject to the authority of the Pacha of Egypt. Pliny Fisk, the American missionary, has given a very succinct account of the holy city, which may enable our readers to form a vivid conception of its present appearance:—

“Jerusalem appears, in a general view, to be situated on the side of a mountain, descending toward the east, where it is divided from Mount Olivet by the Valley of Cedron. The summit of the mountain is considerably higher than the city, so that in coming from Jaffa you arrive near Jerusalem before you see it.

“On a nearer view of the city, you perceive that it is built on several hills, viz., Zion at the south-west part, Calvary at the north-west, Moriah at the south-east, and Bezetha at the north-east. According to the ancient descriptions of the city, it included another hill called Acra. This hill it is not now easy to distinguish; at least, we see nothing which corresponds entirely to the description of it given by Josephus. There is a hill between Zion and Moriah, which corresponds well to the east part of Acra. Josephus says the Valley of the Cheesemongers, which divided Acra from Zion, went out to Siloam. This applies precisely to the hill in question; but Josephus adds that Acra was in the form of a crescent. This does not apply to the hill of which we speak. Possibly this hill may have been anciently connected with what is now the west part of Zion, and separated by a small valley from the city of David. Before Titus besieged Jerusalem it had been captured five times, and once demolished entirely by the Babylonians. Titus spared the west wall and three towers; ‘but for all the rest of the wall, it was so thoroughly laid even with the ground, by those that dug it up to the foundation, that there was left nothing to make those that came thither believe that it had ever been inhabited.’ And since the time of Titus, Jerusalem has been often plundered, and at least partially destroyed. In the space of so many ages it is to be expected that some valleys should be filled up, and some hills levelled. It is also extremely difficult to trace little ascents and descents in an area covered with buildings of various heights. Whether the west part of what seems now to be Zion was formerly a part of Acra or not, it is difficult to decide. The Jews, at present, call the whole hill Zion. We shall therefore speak of it as such, and give the name Acra to the hill which lies between Zion and Moriah.

“The south wall passes over Mount Zion near its summit, so that a great part of the hill is without the city. South of the hill is the deep valley of the Son of Hinnom; the same valley, turning north, bounds Zion likewise on the west. The valleys which separate it in the city from Calvary on the north, and Acra on the north-east, are not deep. Moriah has on the east the deep valley of Cedron. On the south of it, without the city, is a little elevation which is marked on D’Anville’s map as Ophel, thence the descent is steep, till you come to the fountain of Siloah. The valleys north and west of Moriah at present are not very deep. Calvary was perhaps only a small elevation on a greater hill, which is now the north-west part of the city; but the name is now given to the whole hill. Bezetha is separated from Calvary by a wide valley; and east of Calvary is the dividing valley between Moriah and Bezetha, in which is the Pool of Bethesda.

“We have viewed Jerusalem from different stations, have walked around it and within it, and have stood on the Mount of Olives, with Josephus’ description of it in our hands, trying to discover the hills and valleys as laid down by him near 1800 years ago; and, after all our research, we compare Jerusalem to a beautiful person whom we have not seen for many years, and who has passed through a great variety of changes and misfortunes, which have caused the rose on her cheeks to fade, her flesh to consume away, and her skin to become dry and withered, and have covered her face with the wrinkles of age, but who still retains some general features by which we recognise her as the person who used to be the delight of the circle in which she moved. Such is the present appearance of this holy city, which was once ‘the perfection of beauty, the joy of the whole earth.’

“Jerusalem, as to general form, may be called a square, or rather a rhomboid, for the north-east and south-west angles are acute, and the north-west and south-east are obtuse. The east wall is nearly straight the whole length. On the north and south sides the wall makes a bend outwardly; and on the west side it makes an inward bend, so that it would not be very inaccurate to call the city a heptagon. There are, likewise, many little irregularities in the wall.

“We measured the city by paces, and the following is the result:—West side, 768 paces; south side, 1149; east side, 943; north side, 1419: total, 4279 paces.

“Allowing five paces to a rood, this gives 856 roods, or about two miles and two-thirds for the circumference of the city. Maundrel measured the city, and judged it to be two miles and a-half in circumference.

“According to Josephus, it was 33 furlongs in circumference before Titus destroyed it. Mount Zion was then included, and the city seems, from his description, to have extended farther north than it does now. The wall of the city is high, but not thick. From counting the rows of stones, we suppose the height in different places to be 40, 50, and perhaps 60 feet. There is a castle, with two towers, on the west side, a little south of Jaffa gate, to which travellers have given the name of Pisan’s Tower. For a little distance, near the north-east corner, there is a trench without the wall, but now nearly filled up.

JERUSALEM. THE MOSQUE OF OMAR.

On Mount Moriah where the Temple of Solomon stood

JERUSALEM
View of the platform of the Mosque of Omar

A. F. & C. 1 in 4 in Edinburgh

"In regard to the population of Jerusalem, the following estimate seems to us as correct probably as any one we have heard, viz.:—Mussulmans, 10,000; Jews, 6,000; Greeks, 2,000; Catholics, 1,500; Armenians, 500; total, 20,000."

The following is a very spirited sketch of modern Jerusalem, from the pen of Mr. Buckingham:—

"Reposing beneath the shade of an olive tree upon the brow of this hill (the Mount of Olives), we enjoyed from hence a fine prospect of Jerusalem on the opposite one. This city occupies an irregular square, of about two miles and a half in circumference. Its shortest apparent side is that which faces the east, and in this is the supposed gate of the ancient temple, now closed up, and the small projecting stone on which Mohammed is to sit when the world is to be assembled to judgment in the vale below. The southern side is exceedingly irregular, taking quite a zigzag direction, the south-west extreme being terminated by the mosque built over the supposed sepulchre of David on the summit of Mount Zion. The form and exact direction of the western and southern walls are not distinctly seen from hence; but every part of this appears to be a modern work, and executed at the same time. The walls are flanked at irregular distances by square towers, and have battlements running all around on their summits, with loop-holes for arrows or musketry close to the top. The walls appear to be about fifty feet in height, but are not surrounded by a ditch. The northern wall runs over slightly declining ground; the eastern wall runs straight along the brow of Mount Moriah, with the deep valley of Jehoshaphat below; the southern wall runs over the summit of the hill assumed as Mount Zion, with the vale of Hinnom at its feet; and the western wall runs along on more level ground, near the summit of the high and stony mountains over which we had first approached the town. As the city is thus seated on the brow of one large hill, divided by name into several smaller hills, and the whole of these slope gently down towards the east, this view, from the Mount of Olives, a position of greater height than that on which the highest part of the city stands, commands nearly the whole of it at once.

"On the north, it is bounded by a level and apparently fertile space, now covered with olive trees, particularly near the north-east angle. On the south, the steep side of Mount Zion and the valley of Hinnom both show patches of cultivation and little garden enclosures. On the west, the sterile summits of the hills there barely lift their outlines above the dwellings. And on the east, the deep valley of Jehoshaphat, now at our feet, has some partial spots relieved by trees, though as forbidding in its general aspect as the vale of death could ever be desired to be by those who have chosen it for the place of their interment.

"Within the walls of the city are seen crowded dwellings, remarkable in no respect, except being terraced by flat roofs, and generally built of stone. On the south are some gardens and vineyards, with the long red mosque of Al Sakhara, having two tiers of windows, a sloping roof, and a dark dome at one end; and the mosque of Zion and the sepulchre of David are in the same quarter. On the west is seen the high square castle and palace of the same monarch, near the Bethlehem gate. In the centre rise the two cupolas, of unequal form and size, the one blue, and the other white, covering the church of the Holy Sepulchre. Around, in different directions, are seen the minarets of eight or ten mosques, amid an assemblage of about two thousand dwellings; and on the east is seated the great mosque of Al Harrem, or, as called by Christians, the mosque of Solomon, from being supposed, with that of Al Sakhara near it, to occupy the site of the ancient temple of that splendid and luxurious king."

The Jerusalem of sacred history is, in fact, no more. Not a vestige remains of the capital of David and Solomon; not a monument of Jewish times is standing. The very course of the walls is changed, and the boundaries of the ancient city are become doubtful. (See CALVARY.) "A few gardens," says Dr. Richardson, "still remain on the sloping base of Mount Zion, watered from the pool of Siloam; the gardens of Gethsemane are still in a sort of ruined cultivation; the fences are broken down, and the olive trees decaying, as if the hand that dressed and fed them were withdrawn; the Mount of Olives still retains a languishing verdure, and nourishes a few of those trees from which it derives its name; but all round about Jerusalem the general aspect is blighted and barren. The grass is withered; the bare rock looks through the scanty sward; and the grain itself, like the staring progeny of famine, seems in doubt whether to come to maturity, or die in the ear. The vine that was brought from Egypt is cut off from the midst of the land; the vineyards are wasted; the hedges are taken away; and the graves of the ancient dead are open and tenantless."

Jerusalem is used on several occasions in the New Testament as a type of the heavenly state, as well as of the Church of Christ on the earth. Thus, Gal. iv. 24-26, "Which things are an allegory: for these are the two covenants; the one from the Mount Sinai, which gendereth to bondage, which is Agar. For this Agar is Mount Sinai in Arabia, and answereth to Jerusalem which now is, and is in bondage with her children. But Jerusalem which is above is free, which is the mother of us all."

The metaphor is resumed and enlarged by the writer of the Revelation, who describes a new Jerusalem after the destruction of the former city by Titus: "The city of my God, the new Jerusalem, which cometh down out of heaven from my God." Rev. iii. 12. Also: "And I saw a new heaven and a new earth: for the first heaven and the first earth were passed away; and I saw the holy city, new Jerusalem." Rev. xxi. 1, 2. This he describes at large (verse 10, et seq.), in a strain of Oriental metaphor that can only agree to the celestial state. Similar allusions to certain parts of its decorations are found in Isa. liv. 11.

This celestial city, called the Holy City, and the Great City, had no temple, nor other peculiarities of the Jewish service; and the whole description of it, the dimensions, the parts, and the whole properties of it, are magnificent in the highest degree. The new Jerusalem on earth should be carefully distinguished from the new Jerusalem in heaven, in explaining the Apocalypse.

JESHANAH, a town in the tribe of Ephraim, taken from Jeroboam by Abijah. 2 Chron. xiii. 19. It is supposed to have been situated near Ai, a few miles to the north of Jericho.

JESHIMON, probably the same as Hesmona, Asemona, Esem, Esemon, and Esemona, a city in the wilderness of Maon, belonging to Simeon, in the south of Palestine, or Arabia Petrea. 1 Sam. xxiii. 24.

JESHUA, the first high priest of the Jews after their return from the Babylonish captivity. He is called in Haggai, Joshua the son of Josedeck. He is often mentioned by the prophets Haggai and Zechariah. On his arrival at Jerusalem, he restored the sacrifices, and regulated the offices and orders of the priests and Levites. Zechariah relates that the Lord showed him "Joshua the high priest standing before the angel of the Lord, and Satan standing at his right hand to resist him." Zech. iii. 1.

JESHURUN, a name given to the collective political body of Israelites. Some derive the word from jeshar, just or righteous, and so make it to signify that they were a righteous people. Being in covenant with God, they were recognised as legally righteous and accepted before him. It seems, however, to be simply a poetic expression applied to Israel, and indicating the warm affection which their heavenly Father entertained for them as his own special covenanted people, united to him by the closest bonds, and endeared by the tenderest relations. This word is to be found in Deut. xxxii. 15, xxxiii. 5, 26; Isa. xlv. 2.

JESSE. See DAVID—RUTH.

JESUITS, or the Society of Jesus, one of the most celebrated monastic orders of the Romish Church, was founded in the year 1540, by Ignatius Loyola, of Guipuzcoa. He produced a plan of its constitution and laws, which he affirmed to have been suggested by the immediate inspiration of Heaven, and applied to the Roman pontiff, Paul III., for the sanction of his authority to confirm the institution. At a time when the Papal authority had received so severe a shock from the progress of the Reformation, and was still exposed to the most powerful attacks in every quarter, this was an offer too tempting to be resisted. The reigning pontiff, though naturally cautious, and though scarcely capable, without the spirit of prophecy, of foreseeing all the advantages to be derived from the services of this nascent order, yet clearly perceiving the benefit of multiplying the number of his devoted servants, instantly confirmed by his bull the institution of the Jesuits, granted the most ample privileges to the members of the Society, and appointed Loyola to be the first general of the order.

The following brief but comprehensive view of this order is extracted from the historical introduction to a recent translation of "Pascal's Provincial Letters," by the Rev. Dr T. McCreie:—"Never was the name of the blessed Jesus more grossly prostituted than when applied to a Society which is certainly the very counterpart, in spirit and character, to Him who was 'meek and lowly,' 'holy, harmless, undefiled, and separate from sinners.' The Jesuits may be said to have invented, for their own peculiar use, an entirely new system of ethics. In place of the divine law, they prescribed, as the rule of their conduct, a 'blind obedience' to the will of their superiors, whom they are bound to recognise as 'standing in the place of God,' and in fulfilling whose orders they are to have no more will of their own 'than a corpse, or an old man's staff.' The glory of God they identify with the aggrandizement of their Society; and holding that 'the end sanctifies the means,' they scruple at no means, foul or fair, which they conceive may advance such an end. The supreme power is vested in the general, who is not responsible to any other authority, civil or ecclesiastical. A system of mutual espionage, and a secret correspondence with head-quarters at Rome, in which everything that can, in the remotest degree, affect the interests of the Society is made known, and by means of which the whole machinery of Jesuitism can be set in motion at once, or its minutest feelers directed to any object at pleasure, presents the most complete system of organization in the world. Every member is sworn, by secret oath, to obey the orders, and all are confederated in a solemn league to advance the cause of the Society. It has been defined to be 'a naked sword, the hilt of which is at Rome.' Such a monstrous combination could not fail to render itself obnoxious. Constantly aiming at ascendancy in the Church, in which it is an imperium in imperio, the Society has not only been embroiled in perpetual feuds with the other orders, but has repeatedly provoked the thunders of the Vatican. Ever intermeddling with the affairs of civil governments, with allegiance to which, under any form, its principles are utterly at variance, it has been expelled in turn from almost every European State, as a political nuisance. But Jesuitism is the very soul of Popery; both have revived or declined together; and accordingly, though the order was abolished by Clement XIV. in 1775, it was found necessary to resuscitate it under Pius VII. in 1814; and the Society was never in greater power, nor more active operation, than it is at the present moment. It boasts of immortality, and, in all probability, it will last as long as the Church of Rome. It has been termed 'a militia called out to combat the Reformation,' and exhibiting, as it does to this day, the same features of ambition, treachery, and intolerance, it seems destined to fall only in the ruins of that Church of whose unchanging spirit it is the genuine type and representative.

"In prosecuting the ends of their institution, the Jesuits have adhered with singular fidelity to its distinguishing spirit. As the instructors of youth, their solicitude has ever been less to enlarge the sphere of human knowledge than to bar out what might prove dangerous to clerical domination; they have confined their pupils to mere literary studies, which might amuse without awakening their minds, and make them subtile dialecticians without disturbing a single prejudice of the dark ages. As missionaries, they have been much more industrious and successful in the manual labour of baptizing all nations than in teaching them the Gospel. As theologians, they have uniformly preferred the views of Molina; regarding these, if not as more agreeable to Scripture and right reason, at least (to use the language of a late writer) as 'more consonant with the common sense and natural feelings of mankind.' As controversialists, they were the decided foes of all reform and all reformers, from within or without the Church. As moralists, they cultivated, as might be expected, the loosest system of casuistry, to qualify themselves for directing the consciences of high and low, and becoming, through the confessional, the virtual governors of mankind. In all these departments they have, doubtless, produced men of abilities; but the very means which they employed to aggrandize the Society have tended to dwarf the intellectual growth of its individual members; and hence, while it is true that 'the Jesuits had to boast of the most vigorous controversialists, the most polite scholars, the most refined courtiers, and the most flexible casuists of their age,' it has been commonly remarked, that they have never produced a single great man."

JESUS CHRIST, the Son of God, the Messiah, and Saviour of the world; the first and principal object of the prophecies; prefigured and promised in the Old Testament; expected and desired by the patriarchs; the hope of the Gentiles; the glory, salvation, and consolation of Christians. The name Jesus, or, as the Hebrews pronounce it, Jehoshua, or Joshua, signifies the Saviour, or the Lord the Saviour. The name applies, in the full force of its signification, to Jesus Christ, who saves his people from sin, and death, and hell. He is called Christ, or anointed, because he is anointed or consecrated by God to his mediatorial office. It is unnecessary to dwell upon the atonement, the offices and work of Christ, which are all minutely noticed under the various articles; but we shall here more particularly consider his divinity, humanity, and character.

The divinity of Jesus Christ seems evident, if we consider—1. The language of the New Testament, and compare it with the state of the Pagan world at the time of its publication. If Jesus Christ were not God, the writers of the New Testament discovered great injudiciousness in the choice of their words, and adopted a very incautious and dangerous style. The whole world, except the small kingdom of Judea, worshipped idols at the time of Jesus Christ's appearance. Jesus Christ, the evangelists who wrote his history, and the apostles who wrote epistles to various classes of men, proposed to destroy idolatry, and to establish the worship of one only living and true God. To effect this purpose, it was absolutely necessary for these founders of Christianity to avoid confusion and obscurity of language, and to express their ideas in a cool and cautious style. The least expression that would tend to deify a creature, or countenance idolatry, would have been a source of the greatest error. Hence Paul and Barnabas rent their clothes at the very idea of the multitude's confounding the creature with the Creator. Acts xiv. 14. The writers of the New Testament knew that in speaking of Jesus Christ, extraordinary caution was necessary; yet, when we take up the New Testament, we find such expressions as these: "The Word was God" (John i. 1); "God was manifest in the flesh" (1 Tim. iii. 16); "God with us" (Matt. i. 23); the Jews "crucified the Lord of glory" (1 Cor. ii. 8); "Jesus Christ is Lord of all" (Acts x. 36); "Christ is over all, God blessed for ever." (Rom. ix. 5.) These are a few of many propositions which the New Testament writers lay down relative to Jesus Christ. If the writers intended to affirm the divinity of Jesus Christ, these are words of truth and soberness; if not, the language is incautious and unwarrantable; and to address it to men prone to idolatry, for the purpose of destroying idolatry, is a strong presumption against their inspiration. It is remarkable, also, that the richest words in the Greek language are made use of to describe Jesus Christ. This language, which is very copious, would have afforded lower terms to express an inferior nature; but it could have afforded none higher to express the nature of the supreme God. It is worthy of observation, too, that these writers addressed their writings, not to philosophers and scholars, but to the common people, and consequently used words in their plain, popular signification. The common people, it seems, understood the words in our sense of them; for in the Diocletian persecution, when the Roman soldiers burnt a Phrygian city inhabited by Christians, men, women, and children, submitted to their fate, "calling upon Christ, the God over all."

2. Compare the style of the New Testament with the state of the Jews at the time of its publication. In the time of Jesus Christ, the Jews were zealous defenders of the unity of God, and of that idea of his perfections which the Scriptures excited. Jesus Christ and his apostles professed the highest regard for the Jewish Scriptures; yet the writers of the New Testament described Jesus Christ by the very names and titles by which the writers of the Old Testament had described the Supreme God. Compare Exod. iii. 14, with John viii. 58; Isa. xlv. 6, with Rev. i. 11, 17; Deut. x. 17, with Rev. xvii. 14; Ps. xxiv. 10, with 1 Cor. ii. 8; Hos. i. 7, with Luke ii. 11; Dan. v. 23, with 1 Cor. xv. 47; 1 Chron. xxix. 11, with Col. ii. 10. If they who described Jesus Christ to the Jews by these sacred names and titles intended to convey an idea of his deity, the description is just and the application safe; but if they intended to describe a mere man, they were surely of all men the most preposterous. They chose a method of recommending Jesus to the Jews the most likely to alarm and enrage them. Whatever they meant, the Jews understood them in our sense, and took Jesus for a blasphemer. John x. 33.

3. Compare the perfections which are ascribed to Jesus Christ in the Scriptures with those which are ascribed to God. Jesus Christ declares, "All things that the Father hath are mine" (John xvi. 15); a very dangerous proposition, if he were not God. The writers of revelation ascribe to him the same perfections which they ascribe to God. Compare Jer. x. 10, with Isa. ix. 6; Exod. xv. 18, with Heb. i. 8; Jer. xxxii. 18, with Isa. ix. 6; Ps. cii. 24-27, with Heb. xiii. 8; Jer. xxiii. 24, with Eph. i. 20, 23; 1 Sam. ii. 3, with John xvi. 30. If Jesus Christ be God, the ascription of the perfections of God to him is proper; if he be not, the apostles are chargeable with weakness or wickedness; and either would destroy their claim to inspiration.

4. Consider the works that are ascribed to Jesus Christ, and compare them with the claims of Jehovah. Is creation a work of God? "By Jesus Christ were all things created," Col. i. 16. Is preservation a work of God? "Jesus Christ upholds all things by the word of his power." Heb. i. 3. Is the mission of the prophets a work of God? Jesus Christ is the Lord God of the holy prophets; and it was the Spirit of Christ which testified to them beforehand the sufferings of Christ, and the glory that should follow. Neh. ix. 30; Rev. xxii. 6, 16; 1 Pet. i. 11. Is the salvation of sinners a work of God? Christ is the Saviour of all that believe. John iv. 42; Heb. v. 9. Is the forgiveness of sin a work of God? The Son of Man hath power to forgive sins. Matt. ix. 6. The same might be said of the illumination of the mind, the sanctification of the heart, the resurrection of the dead, the judging of the world, the glorification of the righteous, the eternal punishment of the wicked; all which works, in one part of Scripture, are ascribed to God, and all which in another part of Scripture, are ascribed to Jesus Christ. Now, if Jesus Christ be not God, into what contradictions these writers must fall! They contradict one another: they contradict themselves. Either Jesus Christ is God, or their conduct is unaccountable.

5. Consider that divine worship which the Scriptures claim for Jesus Christ. It is a command of God, "Thou shalt worship the Lord thy God, and him only shalt thou serve." Matt. iv. 10. Yet the Scriptures command "all the angels of God to worship Christ." Heb. i. 6. Twenty times, in the New Testament, grace, mercy, and peace, are implored of Christ, together with the Father. Baptism is an act of worship performed in his name. Matt. xxviii. 19. Swearing is an act of worship—a solemn appeal in important cases to the omniscient God; and this appeal is made to Christ. Rom. ix. 1. The committing of the soul to God at death is a sacred act of worship: in the performance of this act, Stephen died, saying, "Lord Jesus, receive my spirit." Acts vii. 59. "The whole host of heaven worship Him that sitteth upon the throne, and the Lamb, for ever and ever." Rev. v. 13, 14.

6. Observe the application of Old Testament passages which belong to Jehovah, to Jesus in the New Testament, and try whether you can acquit the writers of the New Testament of misrepresentation, on supposition that Jesus is not God. Paul says, "We shall all stand before the judgment-seat of Christ." That we shall all be judged, we allow; but how do you prove that Christ shall be our judge? Because, adds the apostle, it is written, "As I live, saith the Lord, every knee shall bow to me, and every tongue shall confess to God." Rom. xiv. 10, 11, with Isa. xlv. 23. What sort of reasoning is this? How does this apply to Christ, if Christ be not God? And how dare a man quote one of the most guarded passages in the Old Testament for such a purpose? John the Baptist is he who was spoken of by the Prophet Isaiah, saying, "Prepare ye the way of the Lord; make straight a highway for our God." Isa. xl. 3-8. But what has John the Baptist to do with all this description, if Jesus Christ be only a messenger of Jehovah, and not Jehovah himself? for Isaiah saith, "Prepare ye the way of Jehovah." Compare also Zech. xii. 10, with John xix. 34, 37; Isa. vi., with John xii. 39-41; Isa. viii. 13, 14, with 1 Pet. ii. 8. Allow Jesus Christ to be God, and all these applications are proper. If we deny it, the New Testament, we must own, is one of the most unaccountable compositions in the world, calculated to make easy things hard to be understood.

7. Examine whether events have justified that notion of Christianity which the prophets gave their countrymen of it, if Jesus Christ be not God. The calling of the Gentiles from the worship of idols to the worship of the one living and true God is one event which, the prophets said, the coming of the Messiah should bring to pass. If Jesus Christ be God, the event answers the prophecy; if not, the event is not come to pass, for Christians in general worship Jesus, which is idolatry, if he be not God. Isa. ii. 3, 4; Zeph. ii. 11; Zech. xiv. 9. The primitive Christians certainly worshipped him as God. Pliny, who was appointed governor of the province of Bithynia by the Emperor Trajan, in the year 103, examined and punished several Christians for their nonconformity to the established religion of the empire. In a letter to the emperor, giving an account of his conduct, he declares, "They affirmed the whole of their guilt, or their error, was, that they met on a certain stated day, before it was light, and addressed themselves in a form of prayer to Christ as to some god." Thus Pliny meant to inform the emperor that Christians worshipped Christ. Justin Martyr, who lived about one hundred and fifty years after Christ, asserts, that the Christians worshipped the Father, the Son, and the Spirit. Besides his testimony, there are numberless passages in the fathers that attest the truth in question; especially in Tertullian, Hippolytus, Felix, &c. Mohammed, who lived in the sixth century, considers Christians in the light of infidels and idolaters throughout the Koran; and, indeed, had not Christians worshipped Christ, he could have had no shadow of a pretence to reform their religion, and to bring them back to the worship of one God. That the far greater part of Christians have continued to worship Jesus will not be doubted; now if Christ be not God, then the Christians have been guilty of idolatry; and if they have been guilty of idolatry, then it must appear remarkable that the apostles, who foretold the corruptions of Christianity (2 Tim. iii. 1-5), should never have foreseen nor warned us against worshipping Christ. In no part of the Scriptures is there the least intimation of Christians falling into idolatry in this respect. Surely if this had been an error which was to be so universally prevalent, those Scriptures which are able to make us wise unto salvation would have left us warning on so important a topic. Lastly, consider what numberless passages of Scripture have no sense, or a very absurd one, if Jesus Christ be a mere man. See Rom. i. 3; 1 Tim. iii. 16; John xiv. 9, xvii. 5; Phil. ii. 6; Ps. cx. 1, 4; 1 Tim. i. 2; Acts xxii. 10, ix. 17.

But though Jesus Christ in his original nature be divine, yet for our sakes, and for our salvation, he took upon him human nature; this is, therefore, called his humanity. Marcion, Apelles, Valentinus, and many other heretics, denied Christ's humanity, as some have done since. But that Christ had a true human body, and not a mere human shape, or a body that was not real flesh, is very evident from the Sacred Scriptures. Isa. vii. 14; Luke xxiv. 39; Heb. ii. 14; Luke i. 42; Phil. ii. 7, 8; John i. 14. Besides, he ate, drank, slept, walked, worked, and was weary. He groaned, bled, and died upon the cross. It was necessary that he should thus be human, in order to fulfil the divine designs and prophecies respecting the shedding of his blood for our salvation, which could not have been done had he not possessed a real body. It is also as evident that he assumed our whole nature, soul as well as body. If he had not, he could not have been capable of that sore amazement and sorrow unto death, and all those other acts of grieving, feeling, rejoicing, &c., ascribed to him. It was not, however, our sinful nature he assumed, but the likeness of it (Rom. viii. 3), for he was without sin, and did no iniquity. His human nature must not be confounded with his divine; for though there be an union of natures in Christ, yet there is not a mixture or confusion of them or their properties. His humanity is not changed into his deity, nor his deity into humanity; but the two natures are distinct in one person. How this union exists is above our comprehension; and, indeed, if we cannot explain how our own bodies and souls are united, it is not to be supposed we can explain this astonishing mystery of God manifest in the flesh. (See MEDIATOR.)

The doctrine of the union of the divine and human natures in the person of Christ, derives further confirmation from the consideration, that in no sound sense, without admitting it, can the Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments be interpreted, so as to make their very different and often apparently contradictory statements respecting him harmonize. How, for instance, is it that he is arrayed in the attributes of divinity, and yet is capable of being raised to a kingdom and glory?—that he is addressed, “Thy throne, O God, is for ever and ever,” and yet, that it should follow, “God, even thy God, hath anointed thee with the oil of gladness above thy fellows?”—that he should be God, and yet, by a human birth, “God with us?”—that he should say, “I and my Father are one,” and, “My Father is greater than I?”—that he is supreme, and yet a servant?—that he is equal, and yet subordinate?—that he, a man, should require and receive worship and trust?—that he should be greater than angels, and yet “made lower than the angels?”—that he should be “made flesh,” and yet be the Creator of all things?—that he should raise himself from the dead, and yet be raised by the power of the Father? These, and many other declarations respecting him, all accord with the orthodox view of his person; and are intelligible so far as they state the facts respecting him; but are wholly beyond the power of interpretation into any rational meaning on any theory which denies to him a real humanity on the one hand, or a real and personal divinity on the other. So powerfully, in fact, has this been felt, that, in order to evade the force of the testimony of Scripture, the most licentious criticisms have been resorted to by the deniers of his divinity; such as would not certainly have been tolerated by scholars in the case of an attempt to interpret any other ancient writing.

We now proceed to the character of Jesus Christ, which, while it affords us the most pleasing subject for meditation, exhibits to us an example not only of the most binding authority, but of the most perfect and delightful kind.

1. “Here,” as an elegant writer observes, “every grace that can recommend religion, and every virtue that can adorn humanity, are so blended as to excite our admiration and engage our love. In abstaining from licentious pleasures, he was equally free from ostentatious singularity and churlish sullenness. When he complied with the established ceremonies of his countrymen, that compliance was not accompanied by any marks of bigotry or superstition; when he opposed their rooted prepossessions, his opposition was perfectly exempt from the captious petulance of a controversialist, and the undistinguishing zeal of an innovator. His courage was active in encountering the dangers to which he was exposed, and passive under the aggravated calamities which the malice of his foes heaped upon him; his fortitude was remote from every appearance of rashness, and his patience was equally exempt from abject pusillanimity; he was firm without obstinacy, and humble without meanness. Though possessed of the most unbounded power, we behold him living continually in a state of voluntary humiliation and poverty: we see him daily exposed to almost every species of want and distress; afflicted without a comforter, persecuted without a protector, and wandering about, according to his own pathetic complaint, because ‘he had not where to lay his head.’ Though regardless of the pleasures, and sometimes destitute of the comforts, of life, he never provokes our disgust by the sourness of the misanthrope, or our contempt by the inactivity of the recluse. His attention to the welfare of mankind was evidenced not only by his salutary injunctions, but by his readiness to embrace every opportunity of relieving their distress and administering to their wants. In every period and circumstance of his life, we behold dignity and elevation blended with love and pity; something which, though it awakens our admiration, yet attracts our confidence. We see power; but it is power which is rather our security than our dread—a power softened with tenderness, and soothing while it awes. With all the gentleness of a meek and lowly mind, we behold an heroic firmness which no terrors could restrain. In the private scenes of life, and in the public occupations of his ministry, whether the object of admiration or ridicule, of love or of persecution, whether welcomed with hosannas, or insulted with anathemas, we still see him pursuing, with unwearied constancy, the same end, and preserving the same integrity of life and manners.”

2. Considering him as our great MORAL TEACHER, we must be struck with the greatest admiration. As Dr. Paley observes, “he preferred solid to popular virtues: a character which is commonly despised to a character universally extolled; he placed, on our licentious vices, the check in the right place, viz., upon the thoughts; he collected human duty into two well-devised rules; he repeated these rules, and laid great stress upon them, and thereby fixed the sentiments of his followers; he excluded all regard to reputation in our devotion and alms; and, by parity of reason, in our other virtues: his instructions were delivered in a form calculated for impression; they were illustrated by parables, the choice and structure of which would have been admired in any composition whatever: he was free from the usual symptoms of enthusiasm, heat and vehemence in devotion, austerity in institutions, and a wild particularity in the description of a future state: he was free also from the depravities of his age and country—without superstition among the most superstitious of men; yet not decrying positive distinctions or external observances, but soberly recalling them to the principle of their establishment, and to their place in the scale of human duties: there was nothing of sophistry or trifling, though amidst teachers remarkable for nothing so much as frivolous subtleties and quibbling expositions: he was candid and liberal in his judgment of the rest of mankind, although belonging to a people who affected a separate claim to divine favour, and, in consequence of that opinion, prone to uncharitableness, partiality, and restriction: in his religion there was no scheme of building up a hierarchy, or of ministering to the views of human governments: in a word, there was everything so grand in doctrine, and so delightful in manner, that the people might well exclaim: ‘Surely never man spake like this man!’”

3. “As our exalted FRIEND and PATTERN,” says Archbishop Newcome, “he sets an example of the most perfect piety to God, and of the most extensive benevolence and the most tender compassion to men. He does not merely exhibit a life of strict justice, but of overflowing benignity. His temperance has not the dark shades of austerity; his meekness does not degenerate into apathy; his humility is signal, amidst a splendour of qualities more than human; his fortitude is eminent and exemplary in enduring the most formidable external evils, and the sharpest actual sufferings. His patience is invincible; his resignation entire and absolute. Truth and sincerity shine throughout his whole conduct. Though of heavenly descent, he shows obedience and affection to his earthly parents; he approves, loves, and attaches himself to amiable qualities in the human race; he respects authority, religious and civil; and he evidences regard for his country by promoting its most essential good in a painful ministry dedicated to its service, by deploring its calamities, and by laying down his life for its benefit. Every one of his eminent virtues is regulated by consummate prudence; and he both wins the love of his friends, and extorts the approbation and wonder of his enemies. Never was a character at the same time so commanding and natural, so resplendent and pleasing, so amiable and venerable. There is a peculiar contrast in it between an awful greatness, dignity, and majesty, and the most conciliating loveliness, tenderness, and softness. He now converses with prophets, lawgivers, and angels; and the next instant he meekly endures the dulness of his disciples, and the blasphemies and rage of the multitude. He now calls himself greater than Solomon—one who can command legions of angels—and giver of life to whomsoever he pleaseth—the Son of God, and who shall sit on his glorious throne to judge the world; at other times we find him embracing young children—not lifting up his voice in the streets, nor quenching the smoking flax—calling his disciples, not servants, but friends and brethren, and comforting them with an exuberant and parental affection. Let us pause an instant, and fill our minds with the idea of one who knew all things, heavenly and earthly; searched and laid open the inmost recesses of the heart; rectified every prejudice, and removed every mistake of a moral and religious kind; by a word exercised a sovereignty over all nature, penetrated the hidden events of futurity, gave promises of admission into a happy immortality, had the keys of life and death, claimed an union with the Father; and yet was pious, mild, gentle, humble, affable, social, benevolent, friendly, and affectionate. Such a character is fairer than the morning star. Each separate virtue is made stronger by opposition and contrast; and the union of so many virtues forms a brightness which fitly represents the glory of that God ‘who inhabiteth light inaccessible.’ Such a character must have been a real one. There is something so extraordinary, so perfect, and so godlike in it, that it could not have been thus supported throughout by the utmost stretch of human art, much less by men confessedly unlearned and obscure.”

JESUS, the son of Sirach, and author of the Apocryphal book of Ecclesiasticus, is supposed to have been descended from Jeshua, the son of Josedech. The words Joshua and Jesus, which in Hebrew are the same, meaning Saviour, are sometimes interchanged in Sacred Scripture. Thus, in Acts vii. 45, and Heb. iv. 8, Joshua is called Jesus. In the Epistle to the Colossians (iv. 11), Paul mentions in the salutation “Jesus which is called Justus.” The same person is spoken of in Acts xviii. 7.

JETHRO, priest or prince of Midian (for the Hebrew cohen signifies a prince as well as a priest), the father-in-law of Moses. It is believed that he was a priest of the true God, and maintained the true religion, being descended from Midian, son of Abraham and Keturah. Moses does not conceal his alliance with Jethro’s family, but invites him to offer sacrifices to the Lord, on his arrival in the camp of Israel, as one who adored the same God. Exod. xviii. 11, 12. Some assert that he had four names—Jethro, Raguel, Hobab, and Ceni. Others, that Jethro and Raguel were the same person; that Hobab was son of Jethro, and brother of Zipporah; and that Ceni is a common name, signifying the country of the Ke-nites, inhabited by the posterity of Hobab, south of the promised land. The Hebrew chothen, which Jerome translates kinsman, is used in Numb. x. 29, and Exod. xviii. 1, 27, to denote the relation between Moses and Hobab; in Numbers, however, Hobab is called son of Raguel, whence others are of opinion that Raguel was the father of Jethro, and Jethro the father of Hobab. On the other side, Raguel gives Zipporah to Moses. Exod. ii. 18, 21. The signification of the Hebrew chothen not being fixed, it is impossible to determine this question with certainty. The Mohammedans term Jethro, from the advice which he gave to Moses, “The preacher of the prophets.”

JETUR, the name of one of Ishmael’s sons. Gen. xxv. 15. His descendants are supposed to have inhabited ITUREA (which see), a mountainous tract of land which separates Syria from the bordering desert of Arabia.

JEWELS, valuables, whether for store or for apparel. This word does not mean jewellery works, gems, &c., but treasures of any kind, whatever is stored up in consequence of its superior estimation. God calls his people jewels (Mal. iii. 17); the lips of knowledge are a jewel. Prov. xx. 15.

JEWRY. See PALESTINE.

JEWS, a name derived from the patriarch Judah, and given to the descendants of Abraham by his eldest son, Isaac. We shall here present as comprehensive a view of this singular people as we can:—

1. JEWS, HISTORY OF THE.—As the reader of this article may be supposed familiar with their history as recorded in Scripture, we shall pass over here all that preceded the Babylonish captivity, under Nebuchadnezzar. It was then the kingdom of Judah, as well as Israel, was ruined, A.M. 3416, about three hundred and eighty-eight years after its division from that of the ten tribes. In the seventieth year of the begun captivity, the Jews, according to the edict of Cyrus, king of Persia, who had overturned the empire of Chaldea, returned to their own country. (See NEHEMIAH—EZRA.) After their return they rebuilt the temple and city of Jerusalem, put away their strange wives, and renewed their covenant with God. Vast numbers of them, who had agreeable settlements, remained in Babylon.

About A.M. 3490, or 3546, they escaped the ruin designed them by Haman. About 3653, Darius Ochus, king of Persia, ravaged part of Judea, and carried off a great many prisoners. When Alexander was in Canaan, about 3670, he confirmed to them all their privileges; and, having built Alexandria, he settled vast numbers of them there. About fourteen years after, Ptolemy Lagus, the Greek king of Egypt, ravaged Judea, and carried one hundred thousand prisoners to Egypt, but used them kindly, and assigned them many places of trust. About eight years after, he transported another multitude of Jews to Egypt, and gave them considerable privileges. About the same time, Seleucus Nicator, having built about thirty new cities in Asia, settled in them as many Jews as he could; and Ptolemy Philadelphus, of Egypt, about 3720, bought the freedom of all the Jewish slaves in Egypt. Antiochus Epiphanes, about 3834, enraged with them for rejoicing at the report of his death, and for the peculiar form of their worship, in his return from Egypt, forced his way into Jerusalem, and murdered forty thousand of them; and about two years after he ordered his troops to pillage the cities of Judea, and murder the men, and sell the women and children for slaves. Multitudes were killed, and ten thousand prisoners carried off; the temple was dedicated to Olympius, an idol of Greece, and the Jews exposed to the basest treatment. Mattathias, the priest, with his sons, chiefly Judas, Jonathan, and Simon, who were called Maccabees, bravely fought for their religion and liberties. Judas, who succeeded his father about 3840, gave Nicanor and the king's troops a terrible defeat, regained the temple, and dedicated it anew, restored the daily worship, and repaired Jerusalem, which was almost in a ruinous heap. After his death, Jonathan and Simon, his brethren, successively succeeded him, and both wisely and bravely promoted the welfare of the Church and State. Simon was succeeded by his son Hyrcanus, who subdued Idumea, and reduced the Samaritans. In 3899 he was succeeded by his son Jannæus, who reduced the Philistines, the country of Moab, Ammon, Gilead, and part of Arabia. Under these three reigns alone the Jewish nation was independent after the captivity. After the death of the widow of Jannæus, who governed nine years, the nation was almost ruined with civil broils. In 3939, Aristobulus invited the Romans to assist him against Hyrcanus, his elder brother. The country was quickly reduced, and Jerusalem taken by force; and Pompey, and a number of his officers, pushed their way into the sanctuary, if not into the holy of holies, to view the furniture thereof. Nine years after, Crassus, the Roman general, pillaged the temple of its valuables. After Judea had for more than thirty years been a scene of ravage and blood, and twenty-four of which it had been oppressed by Herod the Great, Herod got himself installed in the kingdom. Twenty years before our Saviour's birth, he, with the Jews' consent, began to build the temple. About this time the Jews had hopes of the Messiah; and about A.M. 4000, Christ actually came, whom Herod (instigated by the fear of losing his throne) sought to murder. The Jews, however, a few excepted, rejected the Messiah, and put him to death. The sceptre was now wholly departed from Judah, and Judea, about twenty-seven years before, reduced to a province. At the destruction of Jerusalem about eleven hundred thousand Jews perished; and since that disastrous event they have been scattered, contemned, persecuted, and enslaved among all nations, not mixed with any in the common manner, but have remained as a body distinct by themselves.

2. JEWS, CALAMITIES OF.—All history cannot furnish us with a parallel to the calamities and miseries of the Jews—rapine and murder, famine and pestilence, within; fire and sword, and all the terrors of war, without. Our Saviour wept at the foresight of these calamities; and it is almost impossible for persons of any humanity to read the account without being affected. The predictions concerning them were remarkable, and the calamities that came upon them were the greatest the world ever saw. Deut. xxviii. 29; Matt. xxiv. Now, what heinous sin was it that could be the cause of such heavy judgments? Can any other be assigned than what the Scripture assigns? "They both killed the Lord Jesus and their own prophets, and persecuted the apostles, and so filled up their sins, and wrath came upon them to the uttermost." 1 Thess. ii. 15, 16. It is hardly possible to consider the nature and extent of their sufferings, and not conclude the Jews' own imprecation to be singularly fulfilled upon them: "His blood be on us and on our children." Matt. xxvii. 25.

3. JEWS, PRESERVATION OF.—"The preservation of the Jews," says Basnage, "in the midst of the miseries which they have undergone during seventeen hundred years, is the greatest prodigy that can be imagined. Religions depend on temporal prosperity; they triumph under the protection of a conqueror; they languish and sink with sinking monarchies. Paganism, which once covered the earth, is extinct. The Christian Church glories in its martyrs, yet was considerably diminished by the persecutions to which it was exposed; nor was it easy to repair the breaches in it made by those acts of violence. But here we behold a Church hated and persecuted for seventeen hundred years, and yet sustaining itself, and widely extended. Kings have often employed the severity of edicts and the hand of executioners to ruin it. The seditious multitudes, by murders and massacres, have committed outrages against it still more violent and tragical. Princes and people, Pagans, Mohammedans, Christians, disagreeing in so many things, have united in the design of exterminating it, and have not been able to succeed. The bush of Moses, surrounded with flames, ever burns, and is never consumed. The Jews have been expelled, at different times, from every part of the world; which hath only served to spread them in all regions. From age to age they have been exposed to misery and persecution; yet still they subsist, in spite of the ignominy and the hatred which hath pursued them in all places, whilst the greatest monarchies are fallen, and nothing remains of them besides the name.

"The judgments which God has exercised upon this people are terrible, extending to the men, the religion, and the very land in which they dwelt. The ceremonies essential to their religion can no more be observed; the ritual law, which cast a splendour on the national worship, and struck the Pagans so much that they sent their presents and their victims to Jerusalem, is absolutely fallen, for they have no temple, no altar, no sacrifices. Their land itself seems to lie under a never-ceasing curse. Pagans, Christians, Mohammedans—in a word, almost all nations, have, by turns, seized and held Jerusalem. To the Jew only hath God refused the possession of this small tract of ground, so supremely necessary for him, since he ought to worship on this mountain. A Jewish writer hath affirmed, that it is long since any Jew has been settled near Jerusalem; scarcely can they purchase there six feet of land for a burying-place.

"In all this there is no exaggeration—I am only pointing out known facts; and, far from having the least design to raise an odium against the nation from its miseries, I conclude that it ought to be looked upon as one of those prodigies which we admire without comprehending; since, in spite of evils so durable, and a patience so long exercised, it is preserved by a particular providence. The Jew ought to be weary of expecting a Messiah who so unkindly disappoints his vain hopes; and the Christian ought to have his attention and his regard excited towards men whom God preserves for so great a length of time, under calamities which would have been the total ruin of any other people."

4. JEWS, MODERN, NUMBER AND DISPERSION OF.—They are considered to be as numerous at present as they were formerly in the land of Canaan. Some have rated them at three millions, and others more than double that number. Their dispersion is a remarkable particular in this people. They swarm all over the East, and are settled, it is said, in the re-most parts of China. The Turkish Empire abounds with them. There are more of them in Constantinople and Salonichi than in any other place; they are spread through most of the nations of Europe and Africa, and many families of them are established in the West Indies; not to mention whole nations in Middle Asia, and some discovered in the inner parts of America, if we may give any credit to their own writers. Their being always in rebellions (as Addison observes) while they had the holy temple in view, has excited most nations to banish them. Besides, the whole people are now a race of such merchants as are wanderers by profession; and at the same time are in most, if not in all places, incapable of either lands or offices that might engage them to make any part of the world their home. In addition to this, we may consider what providential reasons may be assigned for their numbers and dispersion. Their firm adherence to their religion, and being dispersed all over the earth, has furnished every age and every nation with the strongest arguments for the Christian faith; not only as these very particulars are foretold of them, but as they themselves are the depositaries of these and all other prophecies which tend to their own confusion, and the establishment of Christianity. Their number furnishes us with a sufficient cloud of witnesses that attest the truth of the Bible, and their dispersion spreads these witnesses through all parts of the world.

5. JEWS, MODERN, SENTIMENTS OF.—A summary of the Jewish creed was drawn up by Moses Maimonides, otherwise called the Great Rambam (i.e., Rabbi Moses Ben Maimon), an Egyptian rabbi of the eleventh century, which is still acknowledged as their confession of faith. It consists of thirteen articles, and reads as follows:—

(1.) I believe, with a perfect faith, that the Creator, blessed be his name! is the governor and creator of all the creatures; and that it is he who made, maketh, and will make, all things.

(2.) I believe, with a perfect faith, that the Creator, blessed be his name! is one, and that no unity is like his; and he alone, our God, was, is, and shall be.

(3.) I believe, with a perfect faith, that the Creator, blessed be his name! is incorporeal; that he is not to be comprehended by those faculties which comprehend corporeal objects; and that there is no resemblance to him whatever.

(4.) I believe, with a perfect faith, that the Creator, blessed be his name! is the first and the last.

(5.) I believe, with a perfect faith, that the Creator, blessed be his name! is alone worthy of adoration; and that none besides him is worthy of adoration.

(6.) I believe, with a perfect faith, that all the oracles of the prophets are true.

(7.) I believe, with a perfect faith, that the prophecies of Moses, our master, on whom be peace, are true; and that he is the father of all the wise men who were before him, and who came after him.

(8.) I believe, with a perfect faith, that the whole law of commandments which we now have in our hands, was given to Moses, our master, on whom be peace.

(9.) I believe, with a perfect faith, that this law will not be changed, and that there will not be any other law from the Creator, blessed be his name!

(10.) I believe, with a perfect faith, that the Creator, blessed be his name! knows all the actions of the children of men, and all their thoughts; as it is said:

“Who frameth all their hearts; who understandeth all their actions.”

(11.) I believe, with a perfect faith, that the Creator, blessed be his name! will recompense good to him who observeth his commandments, and that he will punish him that transgresseth them.

(12.) I believe, with a perfect faith, in the advent of the Messiah; and though he should tarry, yet I will patiently wait for him every day till he come.

(13.) I believe, with a perfect faith, that there will be a revivification of the dead, at the period when it shall please the Creator, blessed be his name! and let his remembrance be exalted for ever and ever!

The modern Jews still adhere as closely to the Mosaic dispensation as their dispersed and despised condition will permit them. Their service consists chiefly in reading the law in their synagogues, together with a variety of prayers. They use no sacrifices since the destruction of the temple. They repeat blessings and particular praises to God, not only in their prayers, but on all accidental occasions, and in almost all their actions. They go to prayers three times a day in their synagogues. Their sermons are not made in Hebrew, which few of them now perfectly understand, but in the language of the country where they reside. They are forbidden all vain swearing, and pronouncing any of the names of God without necessity. They abstain from meats prohibited by the Levitical law; for which reason, whatever they eat must be dressed by Jews, and after a manner peculiar to themselves. As soon as a child can speak, they teach him to read the Bible in the original Hebrew, but without understanding the meaning of the words. In general, they observe the same ceremonies which were practised by their ancestors in the celebration of the passover. They acknowledge a twofold law of God—a written and an unwritten one—the former is contained in the Pentateuch, or five books of Moses; the latter, they pretend, was delivered by God to Moses, and handed down from him by oral tradition, and now to be received as of equal authority with the former. They assert the perpetuity of their law, together with its perfection. They deny the accomplishment of the prophecies in the person of Christ; alleging that the Messiah is not yet come, and that he will make his appearance with the greatest worldly pomp and grandeur, subduing all nations before him, and subjecting them to the house of Judah. Since the prophets have predicted his mean condition and sufferings, they confidently talk of two Messiahs—one Ben-Ephraim, whom they grant to be a person of a mean and afflicted condition in this world; and the other, Ben-David, who shall be a victorious and powerful prince.

The Jews pray for the souls of the dead, because they suppose there is a paradise for the souls of good men, where they enjoy glory in the presence of God. They believe that the souls of the wicked are tormented in hell with fire and other punishments; that some are condemned to be punished in this manner for ever, while others continue only for a limited time; and this they call purgatory, which is not different from hell in respect of the place, but of the duration. They suppose no Jew, unless guilty of heresy, or certain crimes specified by the rabbins, shall continue in purgatory above a twelvemonth; and that there are but few who suffer eternal punishment.

Almost all the modern Jews are Pharisees, and are as much attached to tradition as their ancestors were; and assert that whoever rejects the oral law deserves death.

Hence they entertain an implacable hatred to the Karaites, who adhere to the text of Moses, rejecting the rabbinistical interpretation. (See KARAITES.)

There are still some of the Sadducees in Africa, and in several other places; but they are few in number—at least there are but very few who declare openly for these opinions.

There are to this day some remains of the ancient sect of the Samaritans, who are zealous for the law of Moses, but are despised by the Jews, because they receive only the Pentateuch, and observe different ceremonies from theirs. They declare they are no Sadducees, but acknowledge the spirituality and immortality of the soul. There are numbers of this sect at Gaza, Damascus, Grand Cairo, and in some other places of the East; but especially at Sichem, now called Naplons, which is risen out of the ruins of the ancient Samaria, where they sacrificed not many years ago, having a place for this purpose on Mount Gerizim.

David Levi, a learned Jew, who, in 1796, published "Dissertations on the Prophecies of the Old Testament," observes in that work, that deism and infidelity have made such large strides in the world, that they have at length reached even to the Jewish nation; many of whom are at this time so greatly infected with scepticism by reading Bolingbroke, Hume, Voltaire, &c., that they scarcely believe in a revelation, much less have they any hope in their future restoration.

6. JEWS, RESTORATION OF.—From the declarations of Scripture we have reason to suppose the Jews shall be called to a participation of the blessings of the gospel (Rom. xi.; 2 Cor. iii. 16; Hos. i. 11); and some suppose they shall return to their own land. Hos. iii. 5; Isa. lxxv. 17–25; Ezek. xxxvi. As to the time, some think about 1866 or 2016; but this, perhaps, is not so easy to determine altogether, though it is probable it will not be before the fall of Antichrist and the Ottoman Empire. Let us, however, avoid putting stumbling-blocks in their way. If we attempt anything for their conversion, let it be with peace and love. Let us, says one, propose Christianity to them as Christ proposed it to them. Let us lay before them their own prophecies. Let us show them their accomplishment in Jesus. Let us applaud their hatred of idolatry. Let us show them the morality of Jesus in our lives and tempers. Let us never abridge their civil liberty, nor ever try to force their consciences.

JEZEBEL, the daughter of Ethbaal, king of the Zidonians, and wife of Ahab, king of Israel. 1 Kings xvi. 31. This wicked queen introduced and patronised idolatry, having established in Samaria the worship of Baal, Astarte, and other deities of Phœnicia. So mad was she upon idols, that she fed at her table four hundred prophets of Baal. The name of Jezebel is used proverbially to indicate an idolatrous and infamous woman. Accordingly, in Rev. ii. 20, this name is applied to a woman of Thyatira, who made pretensions to the spirit of prophecy; and who, under this pretence, had uttered diverse and strange opinions, by which some of the members of the church had been seduced from the faith and worship of the gospel. Interpreters, however, are not agreed whether the name Jezebel be the real or only a figurative and allegorical name imposed upon this woman. The greater part seem to think that the word is mystically used, and that it is given to this deceiver at Thyatira, in allusion to Jezebel, the wife of Ahab, and the great patroness of idolatry in the time of his reign.

JEZREEL, a royal city, situated on the borders of the tribe of Issachar and the half tribe of Manasseh. In the time of Eusebius and Jerome, Jezreel was a town of considerable note under the name of Esdraela. Hence the valley in the neighbourhood, between the mountains of Hermon and Gilboa, is termed the Plain of Esdraelon. Dr Robinson supposes that the town called Djinin, the frontier town of Samaria, is the Jezreel of Scripture. Another town bearing the same name is mentioned in Josh. xv. 56, as being in the tribe of Judah.

JEZREEL, PLAIN OF. (See ESDRAELON.)

JOAB, the nephew of David, being the son of his sister Zeruah, and the brother of Abishai and Asahel. He was distinguished for his talents as a general, but his personal character was cruel and revengeful. He was raised to the office of commander-in-chief of David's army, and was remarkably firm in his adherence to the interests of his sovereign. An account of Joab's history is to be found in the Second Book of Samuel, and First Book of Kings. Another person bearing the same name is mentioned in 1 Chron. iv. 13, 14. He formed a colony of craftsmen at On, in the tribe of Benjamin; and accordingly the valley in which he planted his settlement was called the Valley of Craftsmen, a name which it seems to have borne in the time of Nehemiah. xi. 35.

JOACHIMITES, the disciples of Joachim, abbot of Flora, in Calabria. Joachim was a Cistercian monk, and a great pretender to inspiration. He relates of himself, that, being very young, he went to Jerusalem in the dress of a hermit to visit the holy places; and that, while he was in prayer to God in the church of that city, God communicated to him, by infusion, the knowledge of divine mysteries, and of the Holy Scriptures. He wrote against Lombard, the master of the sentences, who had maintained that there was but one essence in God, though there were three persons; and he pretended that, since there were three persons, there must be three essences. This dispute was in the year 1196. Joachim's writings were condemned by the fourth Lateran Council.

JOANNA, wife of Chuza, Herod's steward (Luke viii. 3), was one of those women who followed our Saviour, and assisted him with their property. Luke observes, that these women had been delivered by Christ from evil spirits, or cured of diseases. Perhaps Joanna was not a widow. It was customary among the Jews, for men who dedicated themselves to preaching, to accept services from women of piety, who attended them, without any scandal.

JOASH, son of Ahaziah, king of Judah. 2 Kings xi. See JEHOIADA—JEHOSHEBA.

JOASH, or JEHOASH, king of Israel, was the son and successor of Jehoahaz. He reigned sixteen years during which he "did evil in the sight of the Lord."

JOB, a patriarch celebrated for his patience, and the constancy of his piety and virtue.

1. HIS REALITY.—That Job was a real, and not a fictitious character, may be inferred from the manner in which he is mentioned in the Scriptures. Ezek.

xiv. 14; James v. 11. But, besides the authority of the inspired writers, we have the strongest internal evidence, from the book itself, that Job was a real person; for it expressly specifies the names of persons, places, facts, and other circumstances usually related in true histories. Further: no reasonable doubt can be entertained respecting the real existence of Job, when we consider that it is proved by the concurrent testimony of all Eastern tradition: he is mentioned by the author of the book of Tobit, who lived during the Assyrian captivity; he is also repeatedly mentioned by Arabian writers as a real character. The whole of his history, with many fabulous additions, was known among the Syrians and Chaldeans; and many of the noblest families among the Arabs are distinguished by his name, and boast of being descended from him.

2. DATE OF THE HISTORY.—The Usserian or Bible chronology dates the trial of Job about the year 1520 before the Christian era, twenty-nine years before the departure of the Israelites from Egypt; and that the book was composed before that event is evident from its total silence respecting the miracles which accompanied the exode. The length of Job's life places him in the patriarchal times. He survived his trial one hundred and forty years (Job xlii. 16), and was probably not younger at that time. The general air of antiquity which pervades the manners recorded in the poem is a further evidence of its remote date. The manners and customs, indeed, critically correspond with that early period. Thus Job speaks of the most ancient kind of writing, by sculpture (Job xix. 24); his riches also are reckoned by his cattle. Job xlii. 12. Further: Job acted as high priest in his family, according to the patriarchal usage (Gen. viii. 20); for the institution of an established priesthood does not appear to have taken place anywhere until the time of Abraham. Melchizedek, king of Salem, was a priest of the primitive order (Gen. xiv. 18); such also was Jethro, the father-in-law of Moses, in the vicinity of Idumea. Exod. xviii. 12. The first regular priesthood was probably instituted in Egypt, where Joseph was married to the daughter of the priest of On. Gen. xli. 45. The slavish homage of prostration to princes and great men, which prevailed in Egypt, Persia, and the East in general, and which still subsists there, was unknown in Arabia at that time. Though Job was one of the greatest men of all the East, we do not find any such adoration paid to him by his contemporaries, in the zenith of his prosperity, among the marks of respect so minutely described in the 29th chapter. With this description correspond the manners and conduct of the genuine Arabs of the present day, a majestic race, who were never conquered, and who have retained their primitive customs, features, and character, with scarcely any alteration. The allusion made by Job to that species of idolatry alone, which, by general consent, is admitted to have been the most ancient, namely, Zabianism, or the worship of the sun and moon, and also to the exertion of the judicial authority against it (Job xxxi. 26–28), is an additional and most complete proof of the high antiquity of the poem, as well as a decisive mark of the patriarchal age. A further evidence of the remote antiquity of this book is the language of Job and his friends; who, being all Idumeans, or at least Arabians of the adjacent country, yet conversed in Hebrew. This carries us up to an age so early as that in which all the posterity of Abraham, Israelites, Idumeans, and Arabians, yet continued to speak one common language, and had not branched into different dialects.

3. ITS LOCALITY.—The country in which the scene of this poem is laid is stated (Job i. 1) to be the land of Uz, which by some geographers has been placed in Sandy, and by others in Stony Arabia. Bochart strenuously advocated the former opinion, in which he has been powerfully supported by Spanheim, Calmet, Carpzov, Heidegger, and some later writers; Michaëlis and Ilgen place the scene in the valley of Damascus; but Bishops Lowth and Magee, Dr. Hales, Dr. Good, and some later critics and philologists, have shown that the scene is laid in Edom, or Idumea. In effect, nothing is clearer than that the history of an inhabitant of Idumea is the subject of the poem which bears the name of Job, and that all the persons introduced into it were Idumeans, dwelling in Idumea—in other words, Edomite Arabs.

4. ITS AUTHOR.—The different parts of the book of Job are so closely connected together, that they cannot be detached from each other. Hence it is evident that the poem is the composition of a single author; but who that was is a question concerning which the learned are very much divided in their sentiments. Bishop Lowth favours the opinion of Schultens, Peters, and others, which is adopted by Bishop Tomline and Dr. Hales, who suppose Job himself, or some contemporary, to have been the author of this poem; and there seems to be no good reason for supposing that it was not written by Job himself. It seems, indeed, highly probable that Job, who, it appears, was also an inspired prophet, was the writer of his own story.

5. ITS CONTENTS, STYLE, &c.—The book of Job contains the history of a man equally distinguished for purity and uprightness of character, and for honours, wealth, and domestic felicity, whom God permitted, for the trial of his faith, to be suddenly deprived of all his numerous blessings, and to be at once plunged into the deepest affliction, and most accumulated distress. His trial is unspeakably aggravated by the false judgments of his three friends. It gives an account of his eminent piety, patience, and resignation under the pressure of these severe calamities, of their humbling and purifying effects upon him, and of his subsequent elevation to a degree of prosperity and happiness still greater than that which he had before enjoyed. How long the sufferings of Job continued we are not informed; but it is said, that after God turned his captivity, and blessed him a second time, he lived one hundred and forty years. Job xlii. 16. Through the whole work we discover religious instruction shining forth amidst the venerable simplicity of ancient manners. It everywhere abounds with the noblest sentiments of piety, uttered with the spirit of inspired conviction.

It is a work unrivalled for the magnificence of its language, and for the beautiful and sublime images which it presents. In the wonderful speech of the Deity (Job xxxviii. xxxix.), every line delineates his attributes, every sentence opens a picture of some grand object in creation, characterized by its most striking features. Add to this, that its prophetic parts reflect much light on the economy of God's moral government, revealing the consoling truth, that in this transitory state of discipline, it is whom the Lord loveth he chasteneth; and every admirer of sacred antiquity, every inquirer after religious instruction, will seriously rejoice that the sublime wish of Job (xix. 23) is realized to a more effectual and unforeseen accomplishment; that while the memorable records of antiquity have mouldered from the rock, the prophetic assurance and sentiments of Job are graven in scriptures that no time shall alter, no changes shall efface. The best translation of this book is that of Mr. Noyes. The best analysis by far, of its arguments, is that of Dr. Good.

JOEL, the second of the twelve minor prophets. We learn from the commencement of his prophecy, that he was the son of Pethuel, but no further information is given concerning his personal history. His predictions are limited to the kingdom of Judah, and the style of his prophetic writings is in the highest degree poetical and elegant. The figurative representation of locusts, which is generally supposed to refer to the Chaldean invasion, is remarkably animated and graphic. In the two first chapters of his book he displays the full force of the prophetic poetry; and his descriptions of the plague of locusts, of the deep national repentance, and of the happy state of the Christian church in the last times of the gospel, are wrought up with the most admirable force and beauty.

JOHANAN, a Jewish high priest, and son of Azariah. 1 Chron. vi. 9, 10. From the passage now referred to, it would appear that the name of Johanan's son was also Azariah, and that he, like his father, executed the priest's office. By some, Johanan is confounded with Jehoiada, who was a high priest in the reign of Joash, king of Judah. This, however, is entirely conjectural.

JOHN HYRCANUS, a powerful prince and high priest among the Jews. He was the son of Simon Maccabæus, and, from the authority and influence which he had acquired, he was peculiarly obnoxious to the Pharisees, who could not conceal the hatred which they bore him. This hatred was not a little increased by the orders which Hyrcanus issued, that no observance was to be practised, under heavy penalties, which rested on no other authority than that of tradition. Josephus holds this high priest in high estimation, and represents him as endowed with prophetic gifts. The castle of Baris, which afterwards became the temple of the Asmonean princes, is said to have been built by Hyrcanus, who, having filled the office of the high priesthood for twenty-nine years, died B.C. 107.

JOHN MARK. See MARK.

JOHN, ST., CHRISTIANS OF. See CHRISTIANS OF ST. JOHN.

JOHN THE BAPTIST, the greatest of prophets, and the forerunner of the Messiah, was the son of Zacharias and Elisabeth, and born about six months before the Saviour. Luke i. 5-25.

Of the early part of his life we have but little information. It is only observed, "that he grew and waxed strong in the Spirit, and was in the deserts till the day of his showing unto Israel." Though consecrated from the womb to the ministerial office, John did not enter upon it in the heat of youth, but after several years spent in solitude and a course of self-denial. He had gained the conquest of his own passions, and was mortified to the temptations of the world, before he went forth to preach repentance to others.

The prophetic descriptions of the Baptist in the Old Testament are various and striking. That by Isaiah (xl. 3) is direct and unequivocal. The voice which was thus sounded in the prophet's ears before it was heard upon earth, was the voice of the Baptist, who was sent to prepare the hearts of men for the coming of the Messiah. Malachi also predicts the coming of John in very plain language (iv. 5): "Behold, I will send you Elijah the prophet before the coming of the great and dreadful day of the Lord." That this prophecy referred to the Baptist our Lord himself declares (Matt. xi. 14): "And if ye will receive it, this is Elias, which was for to come." The actual time of John's appearance as a public teacher was singularly appropriate to the nature of his work. The period at length arrives which has been appointed of the Father, that important period when he must enter upon the great and momentous work which he had come to accomplish. His wondrous birth, thirty years before, had now been almost if not altogether forgotten. The star which shone over Bethlehem had long ago disappeared from the heavens. The wise men of the East were in all probability sleeping in the dust. The men of Jerusalem no longer talked with interest of the birth of Israel's King. But amid the moral stillness and death which reigned throughout all Palestine, a voice, a solitary voice, was heard crying in the wilderness, "Repent ye; for the kingdom of heaven is at hand." This was a preacher of righteousness attracting crowds to hear him, not less from the novelty of his doctrines than the singularity of his dress, and the self-denial of his habits. It was John the Baptist, the harbinger of the Son of God. By the terrors of the Lord he sought to persuade men. He preached the law to awaken the conscience, and convicting the Jews of sin, to prepare them for the announcement of a Saviour. The Jewish people were at that period sunk to the lowest state of moral degradation. Their very religion was a strange mixture of formalism, hypocrisy, and infidelity. In such an age John appeared in the spirit and power of Elijah. With bold and unsparing hand the lion-hearted prophet exposed the vices of the age. Neither dreading the frowns, nor seduced by the flatteries of men, he denounced the prevailing ungodliness and irreligion of the times, and called upon all men gladly to welcome that Saviour whose coming he had been sent to announce. Multitudes crowded from all quarters to wait upon the ministry of John. Many were deeply impressed by the character and preaching of this man of God. The Spirit carried home the truth to their consciences, and they gladly submitted to be immersed in the waters of John's baptism, confessing their sins, and rejoicing in the prospect of a Saviour about to be revealed.

But while many, we doubt not, were savingly converted under the ministry of John the Baptist, multitudes crowded to the wilderness with no other view than to gratify their curiosity, or to mock the faithful forerunner of the Lord. Pharisees were there—the formalists of their time, whose whole lives had been spent in a mere profession of religion without the slightest feeling of its power; and Sadducees were there—the infidels and Socinians of their time, who denied the resurrection and the world to come. Looking around, therefore, upon the motley crowds that listened to his preaching, John breaks forth into the most sarcastic and withering rebuke: "O generation of vipers, who hath warned you to flee from the wrath to come?" Nor does he conceal from the Jews that the time of solemn reckoning is at hand. The axe, he warns them, is even now laid at the root of the tree, too sure a token that it must speedily fall. The husbandman has come to survey his vineyard. He expects, he requires, he demands fruit. A rich luxuriant foliage, a profusion of lovely blossoms, cannot avail now. The axe is laid at the root, and if there be no fruits of holiness, no evidence of a change of heart and of life, its doom must be pronounced—"Cut it down, why cumbereth it the ground?"

The preparations for the entrance of Christ upon his public ministry were now complete. For six months or more had the Baptist been warning the Jews of his approach. At length, after many had been baptized by John, there appeared on the banks of the Jordan a stranger, in humble garb, from Nazareth of Galilee. There is no evidence that John had personally known Jesus until he came seeking baptism at his hands. We are inclined to agree with some of the early Fathers that an express revelation of Christ was made to John at that moment; the hitherto fearless prophet now standing in awe. One has approached, before whom John bows in conscious inferiority. "I have need to be baptized of thee, and comest thou to me?" He could not comprehend how the Master should apply for baptism to the servant, the King to the humble subject. But it became Christ to fulfil all righteousness. He had submitted to circumcision, and now he submits to John's baptism. Nor was it an ordinary baptism with water. As he came up out of the water "the Holy Ghost descended in a bodily shape like a dove upon him." Many of the Jews expected, from the closing words of Malachi, that Elijah was to appear personally and literally before the coming of Christ. Accordingly we find the priests and Levites sending a deputation from Jerusalem to John to inquire, "Who art thou?" some supposing that he was the Messiah, others that he was the literal Elijah, and others still that he was one of the old prophets who had risen from the dead. Every one of these false representations of his person and office, John plainly and honestly disclaims; and with that striking humility which was a beautiful characteristic of his sanctified nature—sanctified from the very womb—he takes up the language of Isaiah above referred to, and applies it to himself. And the same spirit of deep humility and earnest desire to magnify his Lord was displayed throughout the whole ministry of John. "Behold the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sins of the world," was his urgent exhortation to his disciples. John is content to be accounted the meanest servant, if only he can exalt his Lord. Jesus testified concerning John, "He is a burning and a shining light." Yet with the utmost lowliness of mind, John declares, "He that cometh after me is mightier than I, whose shoe's latchet I am not worthy to unloose." In Eastern countries, when visiting a man of rank, it is customary to leave the shoes or sandals at the door, when they are taken in charge by the humblest domestic. John feels that he is less worthy than that servant. He counts himself unworthy to occupy the lowest place in the household of Christ. And, as to his ministry, he points out to his hearers that it is merely a defective and imperfect introduction to the perfect ministry of the Lord Jesus: "I indeed baptize with water, but he shall baptize with the Holy Ghost and with fire."

The testimony which our Lord gave to the disciples concerning John is very striking. Matt. xi. 11. He proclaims John to be the most distinguished among all the prophets. He was the first that was honoured to preach plainly, and without a figure, forgiveness through the blood of the Lamb. Abraham saw Christ's day afar off;—John was privileged to pour upon his head the waters of baptism. Jacob saw the heavens opened, and saw the angels of God ascending and descending in his vision at Bethel;—John with his bodily eyes beheld the heavens opened, and the Holy Ghost come down in bodily shape like a dove. It was predicted of the Baptist by the angels at his birth, "He shall be great in the sight of the Lord." And how remarkably was that prophecy fulfilled! At the very time when John was bound with fetters in a gloomy prison, was Jesus testifying him to be the greatest of all the prophets that the Church had ever known. Jesus remarkably owned the ministry of his servant. His ministry was of an awakening, searching nature; and such was its success, under the blessing of God, that many who had been hitherto careless and indifferent, were pressing into the kingdom of heaven. Hence the strong language which Christ uses when speaking of this subject: "The kingdom of heaven suffereth violence, and the violent take it by force."

At an early period of his ministry, John appears to have been held in high esteem by Herod the governor or tetrarch of Galilee. We are told by the evangelist Mark, that Herod "feared John," that is, respected and revered him as a singularly devout and holy man. He was wont frequently to converse with John, and narrowly "observed him," or marked the purity and consistency of his character. Nay, such was the effect of John's faithful preaching, that Herod "did many things" which John exhorted him to do, and "heard him gladly." But the reformation which took place in Herod's character was partial and temporary. There was one sin, one lust, which held him in bondage, and which no consideration could lead him to part with. He had sent away his own wife, and entered into an incestuous and adulterous marriage with Herodias, his brother Philip's wife, his brother being still alive. It was impossible for John to remain silent while he knew that Herod was living in sin. It required no slight courage to rebuke the monarch to his face; but the man of God shrunk not from his duty. In all probability he foresaw the consequences of his intrepid faithfulness, but even in the face of these he fearlessly performed his duty. "It is not lawful for thee to have her." No sooner had the reproof been uttered, than the countenance of the monarch fell. From that moment his respect and veneration for John gave place to the bitterest hatred, and, bursting into a transport of rage, he commanded his attendants to lay hold of the presumptuous reprover, and to cast him into prison. This closed the public ministry of John. For three years had he called upon the Jewish nation to repent. He had been privileged to prepare the way for the coming of Emmanuel, God with us. But now he was consigned to a dark and cheerless prison. None rejoiced in the imprisonment of John more than the abandoned Herodias. She dreaded the influence of John over the mind of Herod, lest, perhaps, the king should be led to repent of his sin, and to banish her from his palace. Eagerly, therefore, did she long for an opportunity of cutting short the life of the hated preacher of the truth. Such an opportunity at length occurred. On a festival which was held as usual on Herod's birthday, Herodias, in prosecution of her secret plans, sent in Salome, her daughter by her former husband, to dance before the king. The scheme was successful. Struck with the remarkable beauty of Salome, and with the elegance of her accomplishments as a dancer, we are told that "she pleased Herod." In the enthusiasm of the moment, he rashly vowed with an oath that he would give the beautiful Salome whatever she would ask. Intoxicated with wine, the unhappy monarch knew not the full meaning of his promise. Little did he think that he himself was the victim of a cunning and deeply-laid plot. Herodias was resolved to be revenged on John, and, foreseeing the effect which was likely to be produced by the dancing of her daughter in the midst of mirth and revelry, when the king and his courtiers were flushed with wine, she had prepared Salome to demand the life of her hated reprover. The wicked daughter, eagerly embracing the opportunity of accomplishing the long cherished purposes of her wicked mother, lost no time in naming her demand: "Give me here John Baptist's head in a charger." The king and his guests were in utter amazement at the unreasonable request, but having made a promise with an oath, the fear of man's upbraidings stifled the voice of conscience, and the proud monarch consents to the prophet's death. To the Baptist death came suddenly, but it found him fully prepared: his work was finished, and he was ready to enter into the joy of his Lord. The work of the executioner is done in a moment. The spirit of John wings its way to the realms of eternal bliss, and having been faithful unto death, he receives a crown of life.

JOHN THE EVANGELIST, a native of Bethsaida in Galilee, and son of Zebedee and Salome. He was one of the disciples to whom our Lord delivered his predictions of the destruction of Jerusalem and the calamities of the Jewish nation. He, along with Peter and James, were the three whom our Lord selected to be present with him on very special occasions, as on the raising of Jairus' daughter, at the transfiguration on the Mount, and at his agony in the garden. Perhaps the youth of John may have attracted the peculiar regard of Christ, for there evidently dwells in the bosom of Jesus a special tenderness to young disciples. "I love them that love me, and they that seek me early shall find me." It showed the special favour of Christ for this young apostle that he was privileged to lean on the bosom of Jesus at the paschal supper; and the question was put by John which none of the other apostles dared to put to Christ, as to who should betray him. He loved the Saviour with an ardent and devoted attachment; and although he, in common with the other disciples, forsook Jesus when he was apprehended by the chief priests and elders, John appears to have returned, and to have been the only apostle present at the crucifixion. He is supposed to have been the disciple alluded to as having gone in with Jesus into the palace of the high priest, and to have witnessed the cruel mockings and indignities to which Jesus was there exposed. But whether this be the case or not, we find him, at all events, standing beside the cross, and receiving the strongest proof of the confidence and regard of the expiring Redeemer; for when Jesus saw his mother and the disciple standing by, whom he loved, he said to his mother, "Woman, behold thy son," and to John he said, "Behold thy mother," thus bequeathing his beloved parent to the affection and the care of his attached disciple. And from that hour, her husband being probably dead, John took her to his own home. As John witnessed the crucifixion of Jesus he was also one of the first who was made acquainted with the resurrection. When he outran Peter and came to the sepulchre, on entering and finding it empty he saw and believed, though at that time, as he himself expressly informs us, "He knew not the Scripture that Christ was to rise from the dead." John was one of those to whom the Saviour appeared at the Sea of Galilee, and he was afterwards, along with the other ten apostles, a witness of his ascension into heaven.

The apostolical labours of John were for some time confined to Jerusalem, and there he was imprisoned by the Jewish Sanhedrim, first along with Peter only, and afterwards along with the other apostles. After his second release from prison he and Peter were sent on a mission to the Samaritans. John appears to have been the only one of the apostles who lived and wrote after the destruction of Jerusalem, and accordingly he is the only one of them who gives no particular account of our Lord's prediction of that calamity; his silence on this subject being evidently occasioned by an impression that any description which he might give, as coming from an eye-witness, might be regarded, not as a prophecy, but as a history. The early historians tell us that after leaving Jerusalem John went into Asia Minor, where he spent the latter part of his life chiefly at Ephesus. It is said that during the persecution of the Christians under the reign of the Roman emperor Domitian, this apostle was sent for to Rome, where his life was miraculously preserved when he was cast into a cauldron of boiling oil. But whether that statement is to be credited or not, we learn from himself that he was banished into Patmos, an island in the Archipelago. After an imprisonment of nearly two years he was released by order of the emperor Nerva, and returned to Ephesus, where he lived to a very advanced age, and was the only one of the apostles that died a natural death. It is related of John that when, from the infirmities of old age, he was too feeble to walk, he used to be carried into the house of God, where, though unable to address the people, he was accustomed to repeat again and again his favourite exhortation, "Little children, love one another."

The writings of this eminent apostle were five in number. His Gospel has been held in the highest estimation by the pious and devout in all ages. Ernesti terms it "the Bosom of Christ," as being the book in which Jesus is exhibited as most frequently and most completely laying open his very heart. By the ancient fathers it was called "the Spiritual Volume," as breathing the very soul of Christ, and as unfolding the deeper truths of the Spirit for the edification of the advanced Christian. This precious Gospel is considered to have been written long after the other three, and to have been designed to supply what was wanting in the others. The other evangelists treat chiefly of the events which marked our Lord's history from his birth to his ascension; but John records principally the discourses of Christ, and whatever was fitted to illustrate his glory as the Son of God. His precise object in writing the Gospel is given by himself: "But these are written, that ye might believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God; and that believing ye might have life through his name." xx. 31.

The Epistles of John are three in number, all of them supposed to have been written in the Isle of Patmos. All of them bear the marks of that affectionate and loving spirit by which this apostle was so remarkably characterised. The First Epistle is what is called a general Epistle, that is, addressed to no particular person, but to all the children of God, and its object he thus expressly states: "These things have I written unto you that believe on the name of the Son of God; that ye may know that ye have eternal life, and that ye may believe on the name of the Son of God." v. 13. The Second Epistle is addressed to a matron whom John designates "the elect lady," and the Third Epistle is addressed to Gaius.

The Book of Revelation, though placed last among the books of the Bible, is supposed to have been the first of John's writings in point of time. Besides the epistles addressed to the Seven Churches of Asia-Minor, it contains a prophecy of the history of the church and the world, from the date at which it was written till the consummation of all things.

John was an eminently holy and consistent man, a faithful and devoted apostle, and a distinguished prophet of the Lord. For nearly a hundred years did he shine as a light in the world; and he hath passed to the realms of immortal glory, where he is destined to shine as the brightness of the firmament, and as a star, for ever and ever.

JOIN. To be joined to the Lord is to be spiritually espoused to his Son, and solemnly devoted to his service. 1 Cor. vi. 17; Jer. i. 5. To be joined to idols is to be firmly intent on worshipping them. Hos. iv. 17.

JOINTS are—(1.) The uniting of bones in an animal body. Dan. v. 6. (2.) The uniting parts of a harness. 2 Chron. xviii. 33. The joints and bands which unite Christ's mystical body are his Spirit, ordinances, and influences, and their mutual relation to him and to one another, and their graces of faith and love fixed on him, and in him loving one another. Col. ii. 19; Eph. iv. 16. The joints and marrow of men's hearts are their secret dispositions, which the searching Word of God, with no small pain to them, shows and affects them with. Heb. iv. 12.

JOKSHAN, second son of Abraham and Keturah (Gen. xxv. 2), is thought to have peopled part of Arabia, and to be the person whom the Arabians call Cahtan, and acknowledge as the head of their nation. He dwelt in part of Arabia Felix and part of Arabia Deserta. This Moses expressly mentions. Gen. xxv. 6. Jokshan's sons were Sheba and Dedan, who dwelt in the same country. Gen. xxv. 3. See DIVISION OF THE EARTH.

JOKTAN, the eldest son of Eber, who had for his portion all the land which lies "from Mesha as thou goest unto Sephar, a mount of the east," or Kedem. Gen. x. 30. Mesha, Calnet takes to be the place where Masias was situated, in Mesopotamia, and Sephar the country of the Sepharvaim, or Sepharrenians, or Sapiores, or Serapares; for these all denote the same—that is, a people, which according to Herodotus, were placed between the Colchians and the Medes. Now this was in the provinces which Moses commonly describes by the name of Kedem, or the East. We find traces in this country of the names of Joktan's thirteen sons; which is a further confirmation of this opinion. The Arabs, however, say that he had but one son, named Jaarab.

JOKTHEEL (obedience to the Lord), a place previously called Selah, which Amaziah, king of Judah, took from the Edomites, and which is supposed to have been the city of Petra, the celebrated capital of the Nabathæi, in Arabia Petraea, by the Syrians called Rekem. 2 Kings xiv. 7.

There are two places, however, which dispute this honour—Kerek, a town two days' journey south of Syant, the see of a Greek bishop, who resides at Jernsalem; and Wady-Monsa, a city which is situated in a deep valley at the foot of Mount Hor, and where Burckhardt and more recent travellers describe the remains of a magnificent and extensive city. The latter is no doubt the Petra described by Strabo and Pliny. See EDOM.

JONADAB, son of Rechab, and head of the Rechabites, lived in the time of Jehu, king of Israel. He is thought to have added to the ancient austerity of the Rechabites that of abstinence from wine; and to have introduced the non-cultivation of their lands. 2 Kings x. 15, 16.

JONAH, the son of Amittai, and supposed to have been the earliest of the ancient prophets. About 800 B.C. he was commissioned by God to proclaim judgments upon Nineveh, the capital of Assyria. Shrinking from the performance of such a difficult and dangerous duty, he set out in a ship for Tarshish, thinking to flee from the presence and the command of the Lord. But how vain to try to escape from the all-seeing Jehovah! A storm arose by the arrangement of God, which threatened a speedy destruction to the ship and all that it contained. So severe and long-continued was the tempest, that the idea occurred to the sailors that surely some great sinner was among them, whom the vengeance of God was pursuing. No sooner was the thought suggested than they took steps to follow it out. "They said every man to his fellow, Come and let us cast lots, that we may know for whose cause this evil is upon us." So they cast lots, and the lot fell upon Jonah. The guilty prophet was cast into the sea, and instantly there was a great calm. But the Lord would not forsake his servant even in the midst of the raging billows. He had prepared a great fish, probably of the shark species, to swallow up Jonah. And Jonah was three days and three nights, or, according to the Hebrew idiom, a part of three natural days, in the whale's belly. Jesus represents Jonah (Matt. xii. 41), in this remarkable incident of his life, as an eminent type of himself in his resurrection. Jonah was cast into the sea for the deliverance of many from the raging storm, and Jesus lay in the tomb for the salvation of his people. On the third day Jonah arose from the belly of hell or of the grave; neither was the soul of Christ left in the grave, nor did Jehovah suffer his Holy One to see corruption.

JONATHAN, the son of Saul, and, throughout all his varieties of fortune, the steady friend of David. He was a brave warrior, as was evinced by his heroic conduct in the wars of the Philistines. He fell in Mount Gilboa, and the pathetic ode which David composed on the occasion of his death is universally admired as one of the finest specimens of the elegiac ode anywhere to be found.

JONATHAN MACCABEUS. See MACCABEUS.

JOPPA, now called Yafa. "It stands on a rocky hill," Dr Wilson says, "of an oblong shape, the houses and streets regularly rising above one another in tiers, according to the elevation of the different strata forming the site of the buildings. Neither the houses nor the walls of the place are by any means so despicable as they are often represented to be." Joppa is one of the most ancient of towns. It is first mentioned in Josh. xix. 46, as, with its adjoining towns, part of the lot of Dan. It next appears as the place at which floats of wood from Lebanon for the building of the temple were landed. 2 Chron. ii. 16. The "Sea of Joppa" was that to which the cedars of Lebanon, destined for the repair of the temple, were also brought. Ezra iii. 7. Joppa is mentioned in the Book of Maccabees, and it is referred to by Josephus. It is mentioned in the New Testament, particularly in connection with Peter's tarrying many days with Simon the tanner. It is generally thought to be about thirty-two miles from Jerusalem.

JORAM. See JEHOAM.

JORDAN, the largest and most celebrated river in Palestine. It is much larger, according to Dr. Shaw, than all the brooks and streams of the Holy Land united together; and, excepting the Nile, is by far the most considerable river either of the coast of Syria or of Barbary. He computed it to be about thirty yards broad, and found it nine feet deep at the brink.

Professor Robinson visited the river on the 10th of May. "It was now the time of wheat harvest in the valley," says he, "and we found the river, as of old, overflowing the banks of its ordinary channel." Lord Lindsay, who was here in July, after the period of overflow, found that the waters had retired within their usual limits; but "the upper bed," he tells us, "was still moist from the floods." Maundrell's disappointment, then, may be easily accounted for by the fact that the month of March is too early for the melting of the snows on Lebanon and Anti-Lebanon.

The following accurate and succinct account of the course of the Jordan is given by Mr Wylie:—

"Issuing from the foot of Hermon, it pursues its course to the south along the great valley of Syria, passing through the lakes Merom and Gennesareth, and emptying itself at last into the Dead Sea, whence it finds no outlet. As it proceeds onwards, sometimes with a rapid motion and a murmuring noise, at other times with a smooth and silent flow, its stream, which is considerable at first, is greatly augmented by numerous rivulets which descend from the hills of Galilee and Judea on the one side, and from those of Gilead and Abarim on the other, so that the volume of water which it daily rolls into the bitter ocean at its bottom is very great. Shaw computed its breadth, where it enters the Dead Sea, at thirty yards, and its depth at three; and estimating the average rate of its flow at two miles an hour, he concluded that its daily discharge of water would amount to upwards of six millions of tons. As it nears the lake its windings become more numerous, 'as it were,' says Sandys, 'to delay his ill destinie.'

"In January, when the river is at the lowest, its waters are found generally from ten to fifteen feet below their banks; but in May, when the snows begin to melt on Hermon, the stream overflows, and covers the whole of the lower valley, but never rises so high as to enroach upon the upper plain. On these occasions the panthers, tigers, and other beasts of prey which haunt its jungles, are dislodged by the stream; and the figure of the prophet may be seen verified, 'a lion from the swellings of Jordan.' The earlier travellers, who did not visit it at the proper season, were surprised at what they conceived its shrunk dimensions, and doubted whether the Jordan now overflows his banks as he did of old time; but later visitors, having gone at the proper season for seeing the river in its ancient grandeur, have ascertained that the Jordan still observes its periodical overflowings."

"There is only one river," says Dr Nevins, "in Palestine that deserves the name; this is the Jordan. The other streams that are sometimes called rivers become important only when they are swollen by floods of rain or melting snow and ice from the mountains. Then they dash and roll along with a great deal of noise and force; but when the drought of summer comes, they sink down into mere brooks, and often are dried up altogether. Hence Job, because his friends had disappointed his expectation, and brought him only reproach instead of comfort, compares them to such streams: 'My brethren have dealt deceitfully as a brook, and as the stream of brooks they pass away; which are blackish by reason of the ice, and wherein the snow is hid; what time they wax warm, they vanish: when it is hot, they are consumed out of their place. The paths of their way are turned aside: they go to nothing and perish.' Job vi. 15-18.

"The Jordan runs from Mount Lebanon to the Dead Sea, passing through the Lake of Gennesareth in its way. In the spring, when the snows of Lebanon melt, it rises above its common banks: from this circumstance, it has two channels; one far wider than the other, with banks of its own, to hold the water in the time of this flood. It was in the spring, the harvest-time of Palestine, during this swelling of the river, that the Israelites, in the time of Joshua, passed over, at the command of God, into the land of Canaan; when 'the waters above stood and rose up upon an heap very far,' till the whole nation had gone over the dry channel. Josh. iii. 15, 16. The space between the outer and inner bank, on each side, which (except in the spring) remains dry, is grown over with thick bushes and reeds, where wild beasts find a safe hiding-place, until the yearly rise of the river compels them to fly: whence the expression, to 'come up as a lion from the swellings of Jordan.' Jer. xlix. 19.

The rapidity and depth of the river, which are admitted by every traveller, although the volume of water seems now to be much diminished, illustrate those parts of Scripture which mention the fords and passages of Jordan. It no longer, indeed, rolls down into the Salt Sea so majestic a stream as in the days of Joshua; yet its ordinary depth is still about ten or twelve feet, so that it cannot even at present be passed but at certain places. Judg. iii. 28, xii. 6.

The regular passages over the Jordan were, (1.) Jacob's bridge, between the Lakes Semechon and Gennesareth, said to be the place where Jacob met his brother Esau, and where he wrestled with an angel. (2.) A bridge at Chammath, at the issue of the river from the Lake of Gennesareth. (3.) A ferry at Beth-abara. 2. Sam. xix. 18; John i. 28. (4.) It is probable that there was another at Beth-shan, or Scythopolis.

The phrase "beyond Jordan," in the early books of Moses, and in Joshua, means the west of the river; but subsequently—that is, when the Hebrews had taken possession of the country—the term had the opposite meaning, denoting the country east of the river.

The Talmudists say, that "the waters of the Jordan are not fit to sprinkle the unclean, because they are mixed waters;" meaning, mixed with the waters of other rivers and brooks, which empty themselves into it. The reader will compare with this the opinion of Naaman the Syrian (2 Kings v. 11, 12), who probably had received the same notion. Perhaps, too, this their inferiority was well understood, and not forgotten by the prophet of Israel.

JOSEPH, son of Jacob and Rachel, and brother to Benjamin. Gen. xxx. 22, 24. The history of Joseph is one of the most beautiful and pathetic narratives which is any where to be found. It is unnecessary, of course, to detail events which are so well-known and so highly appreciated by every reader of the sacred volume. The following interesting remarks on the subject by Mr Blunt may be profitable:—

“I have already found an argument for the veracity of Moses in the identity of Jacob’s character; I now find another in the identity of that of Joseph. There is one quality, as it has been often observed, though with a different view from mine, which runs like a thread through his whole history—his affection for his father. Israel loved him, we read, more than all his children; he was the child of his age; his mother died whilst he was yet young, and a double care of him consequently devolved upon his surviving parent. He made him a coat of many colours; he kept him at home when his other sons were sent to feed the flocks. When the bloody garment was brought in, Jacob, in his affection for him—that same affection which, on a subsequent occasion, when it was told him that after all Joseph was alive, made him as slow to believe the good tidings as he was now quick to apprehend the sad; in this his affection for him, I say, Jacob at once concluded the worst, and ‘he rent his clothes and put sackcloth upon his loins, and mourned for his son many days, and all his daughters rose up to comfort him; but he refused to be comforted, and he said, For I will go down into the grave unto my son mourning.’

“Now, what were the feelings in Joseph which responded to these? When the sons of Jacob went down to Egypt, and Joseph knew them, though they knew not him; for they, it may be remarked, were of an age not to be greatly changed by the lapse of years, and were still sustaining the character in which Joseph had always seen them; whilst he himself had meanwhile grown out of the stripling into the man, and from a shepherd-boy was become the ruler of a kingdom;—when his brethren thus came before him, his question was, ‘Is your father yet alive?’ Gen. xliii. 7. They went down a second time, and again the question was, ‘Is your father well, the old man of whom ye spake, is he yet alive?’ More he could not venture to ask, whilst he was yet in his disguise. By a stratagem he now detains Benjamin, leaving the others, if they would, to go their way. But Judah came near unto him, and entreated him for his brother, telling him how that he had been surety to his father to bring him back; how that his father was an old man, and that this was the child of his old age, and that he loved him; how it would come to pass that if he should not see the lad with him he would die, and his grey hairs be brought with sorrow to the grave; for ‘how shall I go to my father, and the lad be not with me, lest, peradventure, I see the evil that shall come on my father?’ Here, without knowing it, he had struck the string that was the tenderest of all. Joseph’s firmness forsook him at this repeated mention of his father, and in terms so touching: he could not refrain himself any longer, and, causing every man to go out, he made himself known to his brethren. Then, even in the paroxysm which came on him (for he wept aloud, so that the Egyptians heard), still his first words, uttered from the fulness of his heart, were, ‘Doth my father yet live?’ He now bids them hasten and bring the old man down, bearing to him tokens of his love and tidings of his glory. He goes to meet him; he presents himself unto him, and falls on his neck, and weeps on his neck a good while; he provides for him and his household out of the fat of the land; he sets him before Pharaoh. By-and-by he hears that he is sick, and hastens to visit him; he receives his blessing; watches his death-bed; embalms his body; mourns for him three score and ten days; and then carries him, as he had desired, into Canaan to bury him, taking with him, as an escort to do him honour, ‘all the elders of Israel, and all the servants of Pharaoh, and all his house, and the house of his brethren, chariots and horsemen, a very great company.’ How natural was it now for his brethren to think that the tie by which alone they could imagine Joseph to be held to them was dissolved; that any respect he might have felt or feigned for them must have been buried in the cave of Machpelah, and that he would now requite to them the evil they had done! ‘And they sent a messenger unto Joseph, saying, Thy father did command before he died, saying, So shall ye say unto Joseph, Forgive, I pray thee now, the trespass of thy brethren, and their sin; for they did unto thee evil.’ And then they add of themselves, as if well aware of the surest road to their brother’s heart, ‘Forgive, we pray thee, the trespass of the servants of the God of thy father.’ In everything the father’s name is still put foremost: it is his memory which they count upon as their shield and buckler.

“It is not the singular beauty of these scenes, or the moral lesson they teach, excellent as it is, with which I am now concerned, but simply the perfect artless consistency which prevails through them all. It is not the constancy with which the son’s strong affection for his father had lived through an interval of twenty years’ absence, and, what is more, through the temptation of sudden promotion to the highest estate; it is not the noble-minded frankness with which he still acknowledges his kindred, and makes way for them, ‘shepherds’ as they were, to the throne of Pharaoh himself; it is not the simplicity and singleness of heart which allow him to give all the first-born of Egypt, men over whom he bore absolute rule, an opportunity of observing his own comparatively humble origin, by leading them in attendance upon his father’s corpse to the valleys of Canaan and the modest cradle of his race; it is not, in a word, the grace, but the identity, of Joseph’s character, the light in which it is exhibited by himself, and the light in which it is regarded by his brethren, to which I now point as stamping it with marks of reality not to be gainsaid.”

Some writers have considered Joseph as a type of Christ; and it requires not much ingenuity to find out some resemblances—as his being hated by his brethren, sold for money, plunged into deep affliction, and then raised to power and honour, &c.; but as we have no intimation in any part of Scripture that Joseph was constituted a figure of our Lord, and that this was one design of recording his history at length, all such applications want authority, and cannot safely be indulged. The account seems rather to have been left for its moral uses, and that it should afford, by its inimitable simplicity and truth to nature, a point of irresistible internal evidence of the truth of the Mosaic narrative.

JOSEPH, the pious husband of Mary, and reputed father of Jesus, was the son of Jacob and grandson of Matthan. Matt. i. 15, 16, 19, xiii. 55.

It is probable that Joseph died before Christ entered upon his public ministry; for upon any other supposition we are at a loss to account for the reason why Mary, the mother of Jesus, is frequently mentioned in the evangelic narrative, while no allusion is made to Joseph; and, above all, why the dying Saviour should commend his mother to the care of the beloved disciple John, if her husband had been then living. John xix. 25-27.

JOSEPH was the name of one of the seventy disciples of Jesus, also called Barsabas and Justus. He was nominated as one of the two candidates for the apostleship in place of the traitor Judas. Acts i. 23. See BARSABAS.

JOSEPH OF ARIMATHEA, a Jewish senator, and a believer in the divine mission of Jesus Christ. John xix. 38. Luke calls him a counsellor, and also informs us that he was a good and just man, who did not give his consent to the crucifixion of Christ. Luke xxiii. 50, 51. And though unable to restrain the sanhedrim from their wicked purposes, he went to Pilate by night, and solicited from him the body of Jesus, and laid it in his own new and unoccupied tomb. Matt. xxvii. 57-60; John xix. 38-42.

JOSEPHUS, FLAVIUS, an eminent Jewish historian, born in Jerusalem about thirty-seven years after Christ. He was, by religious profession, a Pharisee, and distinguished himself as a general in the Jewish wars, and was present at the siege of Jerusalem by Vespasian. After the destruction of Jerusalem he accompanied Titus to Rome, where he wrote his well-known "History of the Jewish Wars" both in Greek and Hebrew. He wrote, besides his "Jewish Antiquities," an excellent work in twenty books. Many editions of his work have been published; but the latest and most carefully edited is that which was begun by the Rev. Dr Traill, and has been continued since his death by Isaac Taylor, with great ability.

Josephus is frequently referred to as a contemporary witness of the facts recorded in the New Testament. On this subject Dr John Cook remarks, in his able "Inquiry into the Books of the New Testament":—"The testimonies of Josephus may be divided into two classes—the one consisting of passages in his antiquities, referring severally to John the Baptist, to Jesus Christ, and to James, called the brother of Jesus; the other comprehending all the history in his works contemporaneous with the narrative in the New Testament, and his minute account of the destruction of Jerusalem. Of the passages in the first class the second and third are now generally allowed to have been interpolated; against the authenticity of the first there is not the same decisive evidence; yet must it appear far more consistent with the prevailing omission, in the works of Josephus, of all the important facts in the Gospel history, as well as with the silence concerning them observed by his countrymen, that these few insulated allusions should have been also suppressed. There is, beyond reasonable doubt, a studied evitiation in his writings of all allusion not only to the great event in the Gospel history, laid within the very times of which he wrote, but to the records in which these events had been then openly given to the world, and to the remarkable change in the religious sentiments of many in his own and other communities with which the belief of these events had been followed. Such is evidently the exclusive plan of the Jewish historian; and it is against the authenticity of any passage in his works that it is a deviation from a plan to which there has been in general so strict an adherence. Yet, should the first of the three passages mentioned be considered genuine (for that the other two are spurious appears indisputable), it will form but a solitary exception to a silence, which, in the circumstances of Josephus, a man of inquiry and of letters, forms no slight addition to this kind of testimony to the truth of events, thus left in the undisturbed possession of the belief of mankind."

JOSES, a brother of James the Less, and a kinsman of Jesus. He is the only one of the sons of Cleophas and Mary who did not become an apostle. Joses was the original name also of the disciple afterwards called Barnabas. See BARNABAS.

JOSHUA, the son of Nun, the distinguished servant and successor of Moses, who was privileged to succeed him in the leadership of the Israelites, and in this capacity to conduct them into the promised land. His original name was Hoshea, the Saviour, but when, along with Caleb, he visited Palestine as a spy, he received the name of Jehoshua or Joshua, Jehovah the Saviour. Joshua was the companion and attendant of Moses during the forty years' pilgrimage in the wilderness. He it was who fought with and conquered Amalek, while the hands of Moses were held up in importunate supplications for him. Exod. xvii. 9-13. To him was the peculiar honour granted of going up with Moses to the Mount of God, where he remained forty days, though he does not appear to have been admitted into the cloud. Exod. xxiv. 13. Because of his faithfulness and courage when sent along with Caleb upon a deputation to take a survey of the land of Canaan, it was promised that he and his associate alone should enter into Canaan. He was appointed by a divine commission to succeed Moses, and he was solemnly set apart to the office in the presence of the whole congregation of Israel. He accordingly led them over Jordan, and having vanquished the various heathen nations which inhabited Canaan, he divided the whole country, by lot, among the various tribes of Israel. At the advanced age of one hundred and ten years, we find this distinguished warrior and prophet assembling the people twice, that he might encourage them in the knowledge, love, and worship of God. It is recorded to his praise that "Israel served the Lord all the days of Joshua, and all the days of the elders that overlived Joshua."

This remarkable man was an eminent type of our blessed Lord, whom he describes as the Captain of the Lord's hosts. He was called by the same name, Joshua and Jesus being identical in meaning. Like him, he was sent by a divine commission, qualified for his office, was the guide of the people, subdued their enemies, destroyed all who opposed him, made his followers to triumph, and put them in possession of the promised inheritance.

The Book of Joshua is so named, because it contains the narrative of the achievements of Joshua, but the question as to the authorship of the book has been much disputed among the learned, many, both among the ancients as well as moderns, ascribing it to Joshua himself, while others ascribe it to Jeremiah, Eleazer, and even to Samuel.

Upon the miracle wrought at the word of Joshua, recorded in Josh. x. 12-14, much has been written. Objectors have urged that the language of Joshua, in correspondence with which the miracle is said to have occurred, is not in accordance with the ascertained economy of the universe; and that if even this objection could be disposed of, an unanswerable one against the fact would remain, because such an occurrence must have involved the whole system in a common ruin. To these objections it has been replied—(1.) That the Hebrew general expressed himself in popular language; as, indeed, he was compelled to do, unless he would have incurred the charge of insanity; and, (2.) That the miracle consisted in an extraordinary refraction of the solar and lunar rays, and did not imply any cessation of the motion of the heavenly bodies. All such attempts, however, to explain miracles on natural principles are unnecessary, as, were they thus to be explained, they would cease to be miracles. And as to the manner in which Joshua expresses himself in reference to the sun and moon standing still, he speaks in the only way which could be understood by mankind generally. Scripture does not state physical phenomena of any kind in a scientific but in a popular form of language.

JOSIAH, one of the most pious and devoted kings of Judah. He was the son of Amon, whom he succeeded on the throne at the early age of eight years, B.C. 624. When this young prince received the government, idolatry and wickedness prevailed to a remarkable extent among the Jews. Deeply affected with the woful degeneracy of his subjects, he began, in his sixteenth year, to devise measures for accomplishing a complete reformation in the kingdom. In his twentieth year he decreed the abolition of idolatry, destroying both the altars and the idols. In his twenty-sixth year he restored the worship of the true God, and the regular temple service. While engaged in repairing the temple, the book of the law was unexpectedly discovered in a concealed place; and thus he was enabled to regulate all his arrangements by the express statements of the Word of God. The portion of the sacred books which was brought to light at this time was probably a copy of the Pentateuch, which may have been hidden for security in the temple by some pious Jewish priest, under the reign of one of the persecuting predecessors of Josiah. The strenuous endeavours of the good king to promote the best interests of the Jewish nation met with the most violent opposition from the people, and his benevolent efforts were almost completely frustrated. At length the wrath of Jehovah was poured forth upon the degenerate nations, and the calamities predicted by Zephaniah were suffered by the Jews. Good King Josiah was slain at Megiddo, in the thirty-ninth year of his age, B.C. 609. His death was the subject of deep lamentation in the country, and the prophet Jeremiah wrote an elegy on the occasion which has not come down to us.

JOT, a shortened form of the Greek letter Iota, and the Hebrew Yod or Jod. It is the smallest letter in each of these alphabets, and is therefore used emphatically to denote the smallest part, or least particle. This is also its meaning in English. Matt. v. 18.

JOTBATHAH, an encampment of Israel, in the wilderness, between Gidgad and Ebronah (Numb. xxxiii. 34), which Mr. Taylor takes to be the same as the graves of lust; Ie-taabatha signifying a heap of lust.

JOTHAM, the youngest son of Gideon, and the only one who escaped the fury of Abimelech. Judg. ix. 5. The parable of Jotham (verse 8–15) is considered one of the oldest and most beautiful forms of apologue extant. 2. Jotham was also the name of the son and successor of Uzziah, king of Judah, who died of leprosy. After a reign of sixteen years, he died, much regretted by his people, and was buried in the sepulchres of the kings, B.C. 742.

JOURNEY. A day's journey is reckoned about sixteen or twenty miles. To this distance around the Hebrew camp were the quails scattered for food for the people. Numb. xi. 31. Shaw computes the eleven days' journey from Sinai to Kadesh-barnea to be about one hundred and ten miles. Deut. i. 2. A Sabbath-day's journey is reckoned by the Hebrews at about seven furlongs, or one mile and three quarters (Matt. xxiv. 20); and it is said that if any Jew travelled above this from the city on the Sabbath he was beaten; but it is probable they were allowed to travel as far to the synagogue as was necessary. Acts i. 12; 2 Kings iv. 23. The Hebrews seem to have had fifty-two journeys or marches from Rameses to Gilgal. Numb. xxxiii.

JOY, a delight of the mind, arising from the consideration of a present or assured approaching possession of a future good. When it is moderate, it is called gladness; when raised on a sudden to the highest degree, it is then exultation or transport; when we limit our desires by our possessions, it is contentment; when our desires are raised high, and yet accomplished, this is called satisfaction; when our joy is derived from some comical occasion or amusement, it is mirth; if it arise from considerable opposition that is vanquished in the pursuit of the good we desire, it is then called triumph; when joy has so long possessed the mind that it is settled into a temper, we call it cheerfulness: when we rejoice upon the account of any good which others obtain, it may be called sympathy, or congratulation.

This is natural joy; but there is a moral joy, which is a self-approbation, or that which arises from the performance of any good actions; this is called peace, or serenity of conscience; if the action be honourable, and the joy rise high, it may be called glory.

There is also a spiritual joy, which the Scripture calls a "fruit of the Spirit" (Gal. v. 22), "the joy of faith" (Phil. i. 25), and "the rejoicing of hope" (Heb. iii. 6.) The objects of it are—(1.) God himself. Ps. xliii. 4; Isa. lxi. 10. (2.) Christ. Phil. iii. 3; 1 Pet. i. 8. (3.) The promises. Ps. cxix. 162. (4.) The administration of the gospel, and gospel ordinances. Ps. lxxxix. 15. (5.) The prosperity of the interest of Christ. Acts xv. 3; Rev. xi. 15, 17. (6.) The happiness of a future state. Rom. v. 2; Matt. xxv. 21. The nature and properties of this joy. (1.) It is, or should be, constant. Phil. iv. 4. (2.) It is unknown to the men of the world. 1 Cor. ii. 14. (3.) It is unspeakable. 1 Pet. i. 8. (4.) It is permanent. John xvi. 22.

JUBAL, the son of Lamech and Adah, and described (Gen. iv. 21) as "the father of all such as handle the harp and organ." He appears, accordingly, to have been the inventor of musical instruments.

JUBILEE. Every fiftieth year among the Jews was reckoned a sacred year. "This year of Jubilee, as it was called, was to be in all respects as much as the common sabbatical years, a year of rest to the land, in which there might be neither seed-time, harvest, nor vintage. It enjoyed, however, additional distinctions, exclusively its own. It was a year of restitution, when the whole state of society was to be, in some measure, re-organized and brought back, as far as possible, to its original posture. It was ordained that, on every return of the jubilee, all servants of Hebrew origin should obtain their freedom; and that inheritances which had been sold or given up in the way of mortgage or pledge for debts, and not previously redeemed, should return, all over the land, to the families to which they at first belonged. A particular account of these regulations, and of the manner in which they were to be understood and regarded, as well as of the institution of the year of jubilee in general, is found in the twenty-fifth chapter of Leviticus. We may well conceive that the return of the jubilee would be hailed through the land, not merely with the sound of trumpets, but with much gladness of heart and general manifestation of joy. It commenced, we may suppose, on the evening of the day of atonement, after its great solemnities were over; and so brought with it, as it were, a proclamation of peace and forgiveness, in answer to the deep humiliation, and the expiation so awful, with which the season had been distinguished."

"From the time of the captivity the more prominent and public provisions of the jubilee were discontinued. And some of these had, perhaps, ceased to be complied with even before that period. This conclusion, however, does not follow from the silence of the Scriptures so necessarily as has often been asserted; for, in all such cases, it would seem to be more in accordance with the course of things to assume, that institutions once solemnly established by divine authority continued to be regularly observed, if no mention is made of their neglect or suppression, than to infer their extinction solely from the absence of information respecting them. After the return from Babylon circumstances were much changed, and the law of inheritance was placed on a new footing. But though possessions could then be no longer restored as formerly, would not the expectation, which the Hebrews still cherished with unabated ardour, that their ancient polity and independence were yet to be revived, powerfully tend to keep up many of the observances connected with the fiftieth year? And would not these, as well as the predictions of a happier era under the Messiah, become dearer to the fallen Israelites in direct proportion to the depression they suffered in the scale of nations, and the bereavement they sustained of almost all their high, peculiar privileges?"

"It is the opinion of some eminent chronologists and critics that the jubilee was recognised, and most probably observed by the Jews, as far as their outward circumstances and national corruption allowed, down to the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans. The chief proof, however, adduced in support of this view, is the obvious application to himself by our Lord of the passage which he read in the synagogue of Nazareth: 'The Spirit of the Lord is upon me, because he hath anointed me to preach the gospel to the poor; he hath sent me to heal the broken-hearted, to preach deliverance to the captives, and recovering of the sight to the blind, to set at liberty them that are bruised; to preach the acceptable year of the Lord.' These words, which Luke states were found in the prophecies of Esaias, and which have been already adverted to as there contained, do not exactly correspond either to the original Hebrew, or to the Greek of the Septuagint. But the variations are not such as materially to affect the scope of the quotation. And the declaration of our Lord in reference to the tenor of what he had read, 'This day is this scripture fulfilled in your ears,' as it certainly affixes to the passage a typical import, is thought also to warrant the conclusion, that he began his ministry on the very year of the jubilee, and that the audience he addressed was fully aware of the fact, and readily acquiesced in his statement of it.

"The jubilee began in the first month of the civil year of the Hebrews, and the seventh of the ecclesiastical, which would correspond to the end of September according to our reckoning. It commenced with festive rejoicings; and these alone engrossed attention for nine days. The tenth was spent in solemn fasting, being the great day of atonement. And the peculiar provisions of the institution were after that carried into effect. 'From the beginning of the year,' says Maimonides, 'down to the day of expiation, the bondmen were not liberated, neither did they serve their masters, nor yet were the inheritances restored. What, then, was done during that interval? The bondmen ate and drank, and were merry, and every one of them put a crown upon his head. At length when the day of expiation was come, the elders of the Sanhedrim blew with the trumpets; and instantly the bondmen became free, and inheritances were restored to their proper owners.'"

The word jubilee, in a more modern sense, denotes a grand Church solemnity or ceremony celebrated at Rome, in which the pope grants a plenary indulgence to all sinners; at least, to as many as visit the churches of St. Peter and St. Paul at Rome.

JUDÆA. See CANAAN.

JUDAH, the son of Jacob and Leah. The occasion of his name is stated in Gen. xxix. 35. When Joseph's brethren proposed to slay him, Judah appears to have been seized with relents of spirit; and when the merchants of Midian passed by, he suggested the plan of selling him, which was instantly adopted. "And Judah said unto his brethren, What profit is it if we slay our brother, and conceal his blood? Come, and let us sell him to the Ishmeelites, and let not our hand be upon him; for he is our brother, and our flesh; and his brethren were content. Then there passed by Midianites, merchantmen; and they drew and lifted up Joseph out of the pit, and sold Joseph to the Ishmeelites for twenty pieces of silver: and they brought Joseph into Egypt." Gen. xxxvii. 26-28. In the last prophetic blessing pronounced by Jacob upon his sons, he declares that Judah shall be a king, and the government shall not cease from his family until the Messiah come. Gen. xlix. 8, 9. Accordingly from David onwards, in uninterrupted succession, the regal power was in the tribe of Judah.

JUDAISM, the religious doctrines and rites of the Jews, the descendants of Abraham. The religion of the ancestors of the Jews, before the time of Moses, from Abraham downward, consisted in the worship of the one living and true God, under whose immediate direction they were; in the hope of a Redeemer; in a firm reliance on his promises under all difficulties and dangers; and in a thankful acknowledgment for all his blessings and deliverances. In that early age, we read of altars, pillars, and monuments raised, and sacrifices offered to God. They used circumcision as a seal of the covenant which God had made with Abraham. As to the mode and circumstances of divine worship, they were much at liberty till the time of Moses; but that legislator, by the direction and appointment of God himself, prescribed an instituted form of religion, and regulated ceremonies, feasts, days, priests, and sacrifices, with the utmost exactness. Ancient Judaism, compared with all religions except the Christian, was distinguished for its superior purity and spirituality; and the whole Mosaic ritual was of a typical nature. (See HEBREWS.) Judaism was but a temporary dispensation, and was to give way, at least the ceremonial part of it, at the coming of the Messiah.

The principal sects among the Jews were the Pharisees, who placed religion in external ceremony; the Sadducees, who were remarkable for their incredulity; and the Essenes, who were distinguished for their austere sanctity.

At present, the Jews have two sects—the KARAITES (which see), who admit no rule of religion but the law of Moses; and the RABBINISTS (which see), who add to the law the traditions of the Talmud.

JUDAIZING CHRISTIANS, those who attempted to mingle Judaism and Christianity together. This was done to some extent in the apostles' days, which gave occasion to the council recorded in the 15th of the Acts. But the origin of the sect of this name is placed under the reign of Adrian.

JUDAS, or JUDE, surnamed Barsabas, was sent from Jerusalem, with Paul and Barnabas, to the Church at Antioch, to report the resolution of the apostles at Jerusalem, concerning the non-observance of the law by the Gentiles (Acts xv. 22, 23), A.D. 54. Some think that this Judas was the brother of Joseph, surnamed also Barsabas, who was proposed, with Matthias, to fill up the place of the traitor Judas. Acts i. 23. Luke says that Judas Barsabas was a prophet, and one of the chief among the brethren; and it is also believed that he was one of the seventy disciples.

JUDAS GAULANITIS, or the Gaulanite, opposed the enrolment of the people made by Cyrenius in Judea (see CYRENIUS), and raised a very great rebellion, pretending that the Jews, being free, ought to acknowledge no dominion besides that of God. His followers chose rather to suffer extreme torments than to call any power on earth lord or master. The same Judas is named Judas the Galilean (Acts v. 37), because he was a native of the city of Gamala, in the Gaulanitis, which was comprised in Galilee. Calmet believes that the Herodians were the followers of Judas.

JUDAS ISCARIOT, or, as he is usually called, the traitor, and betrayer of our Lord. He was one of the twelve apostles, and seems to have possessed the confidence of his fellow-apostles to such an extent, that he was intrusted with the presents that were made to them, and with all their means of subsistence. He was both a dishonest man and a traitor; and, having sealed his infamy by betraying his Lord, he was driven by remorse to put an end to his own existence.

It has been disputed whether Judas was present at the Lord's supper; but there is really no ground to suppose it. He went out during the paschal supper, but the Lord's supper was not instituted till after the paschal supper had been concluded; and the last action of that supper was what gave opportunity to the institution of the new rite. To suppose that Jesus would give to Judas the sacramental cup in token of his blood "shed for the remission of sins"—of sins which Judas had traitorously committed, or which he designed traitorously to commit, is to trifle with this most solemn of subjects.

Some of the fathers seem to speak favourably of Judas' repentance; others justly think it defective and unprofitable, since it only led him to despair. Origen and Theophylact, writing on Matthew, say that Judas, seeing his Master was condemned, and that he could not obtain pardon from him in this life, made haste to get the start of him, and wait for him in the other world, in order to beg mercy of him there! Some in our day seem to adopt this Origenian fancy, in the very face of the Scriptures, which affirm that he was "the son of perdition," and "went to his own place," and that "it had been good for him that he had not been born." The original term employed is not the one used to designate true evangelical repentance.

JUDE, or JUDAS, who was surnamed Thaddeus and Lebbeus, was the son of Alpheus and Mary, and brother of James the Less. He was one of the twelve apostles. Little is recorded concerning him in the New Testament. He is supposed to have preached the gospel for some time in several parts of the land of Israel. Some affirm that he preached in Arabia, Syria, Mesopotamia, and also in Persia, where he is said to have suffered martyrdom. He was the author of the epistle which bears his name.

JUDE, EPISTLE OF. A canonical Epistle of the New Testament, addressed to all who "are sanctified by God the Father, and preserved in Christ Jesus, and called." The chief design of this Epistle appears to have been to warn the faithful against the false doctrines which had already crept into the church, and were agitating the minds of its members. In the early ages this Epistle was regarded by some as spurious, more especially because it was supposed that quotations were to be found in it from the apocryphal book of Enoch and the Ascension of Moses. Among the moderns, Michaëlis has rejected it. The objections to the authenticity of the Epistle are thus ably refuted by Mr Horne:—

"With regard to the objection against the genuineness of this Epistle, which is derived from the quotation by Jude of an apocryphal book of Enoch (which has already been noticed), it is to be observed that the apostle, by quoting such book, gives it no authority. It was no canonical book of the Jews; and though such a book existed among them, and was apocryphal, yet it might contain some things that were true. Jude's quoting from it the prophecy under consideration would not lessen the authority of his Epistle any more than Paul's quotations from the heathen poets Aratus (Acts xvii. 28), Menander (1 Cor. xv. 33), and Epimenides (Tit. i. 12), have lessened the authority of the history of the Acts, and of that apostle's letters, where these quotations are found. The reason is (as Macknight most forcibly observes), if the things contained in these quotations were true in themselves, they might be mentioned by an inspired writer without giving authority to the poems from which they were cited. In like manner, if the prophecy ascribed to Enoch, concerning the future judgment and punishment of the wicked, was agreeable to the other declarations of God respecting that event, Jude might cite it, because Enoch (who, like Noah, was a preacher of righteousness), might actually have delivered such a prophecy, though it is not recorded in the Old Testament; and because his quoting it did not establish the authority of the book whence he took it, if he took it from any book extant in his time.

"The preceding observations apply with equal force to verse 9, in which the apostle is supposed to cite an apocryphal relation or tradition concerning the archangel Michael's disputing with Satan for the body of Moses. This is by some writers referred to a book called the "Assumption or Ascension of Christ," which in all probability was a forgery much later than the time of Jude; but Dr Lardner thinks it much more credible that the apostle alludes to the vision in Zech. iii. 1-3, and this opinion is adopted and elucidated by Dr Macknight in his note on the verse in question. In further illustration of this verse, we may remark that it was a Jewish maxim 'that it is not lawful for man to prefer ignominious reproaches even against wicked spirits.' Might not the apostle then have used it merely as a popular illustration, without vouching for the fact, of that sober and wholesome doctrine, not to speak evil of dignities, from the example of the archangel, who did not venture to rail even at Satan, but meekly said, 'The Lord rebuke thee?' The hypothesis that Jude copied the prophecy of Enoch from the writings of Zoroaster, which some continental critics have imagined, is too absurd to deserve a serious refutation."

JUDEA, a name usually given to the province of Asia which is also called Canaan, the Holy Land, the Land of Promise. It was called Judea after the Babylonish captivity, because then the tribe of Judah was the chief, and the name, which at first was limited to the portion allotted to them, was extended during the second temple, and under the Romans, to the whole country, which lies between 31° and 33° N. latitude. In very ancient times, it was possessed by Canaan, who divided it among his seven sons, each of whom was the head of a numerous tribe. Gen. x. 15-19. They continued more than seven hundred years. In the days of Abraham it was occupied by ten nations. Gen. xv. 18-21. In the days of Moses there was a slight change. Deut. vii. 1; Josh. iii. 10, xxiv. 11. Moses conquered two kingdoms on the east, and Joshua thirty-one smaller kingdoms on the west of Jordan. Joshua divided the land by lot into twelve parts, according to the number of the tribes. The next great division was made by Solomon, who arranged it into twelve provinces or districts. 1 Kings iv. 17-19. This division continued until the Revolt of the Ten Tribes, when Judah included all the southern parts of the land, consisting of Judah and Benjamin together, with so much of the territories of Dan and Simeon as were intermixed with Judah. Its metropolis was Jerusalem, in the tribe of Benjamin. The kingdom of Israel included all the northern and middle parts of the land. Its capital was Samaria in Ephraim, situated about thirty miles north-east of Jerusalem. This division ceased on the subversion of the kingdom of Israel by Shalmaneser, king of Assyria, after it had subsisted two hundred and fifty-four years. The land of Judea, fell successively into the hands of the Greeks and Romans, to the latter of whom it belonged at the time of our Lord, being divided into five separate provinces, Galilee, Samaria, Judea, Perœa, and Idumœa.

It was predicted in ancient prophecy, Jer. iv. 27: "For thus hath the Lord said, The whole land shall be desolate; yet will I not make a full end." How remarkably this prediction was fulfilled, may be seen from the following remarks of Mr Wylie:—

"There is not, in all Palestine, a single district under regular cultivation. Here and there we meet fields covered with wheat, or vales mantled with vineyards; but these are solitary instances, scarcely enlivening the surrounding sterility more than the beauty of a single flower the terrors of the wilderness. Even in districts which enjoy some sort of cultivation, the produce is far below what the excellence of the soil and climate might lead us to expect. The whole country is subject to the oppressions of the Turks and the robberies of the Arabs, and these have fulfilled the prophecy, 'The whole land is spoiled.' Jer. iv. 20. The central portion of Palestine is a chain of naked hills. It is long since their terraces were destroyed, and the soil which covered them washed away; and, though the olive-woods of Samaria beautify somewhat the middle portion of the line, they are scarcely able to relieve the barrenness of the long dreary range which extends from Lebanon south to Edom. The lateral plains are covered in winter and the early part of summer with a rich spontaneous herbage, which is burnt up as the season advances, and then the plain presents to the eye a more desolate picture than the mountain. Among the hills the springs which reach the valleys nourish only thistles, reeds, oleanders, and other plants unserviceable to man. In fact, the most beautiful vales are overgrown with noxious weeds. 'Travelling amongst the hills south of Nazareth,' Richardson says, 'we passed a long and tedious hill, at the bottom of which we entered a beautiful valley, which, from appearances, we expected to have found in a cultivated state; but it was without a house, and overgrown with weeds and brambles. Part of it had been ploughed the year before, but suffered to remain uncultivated. Despotism and death alike intercept the labours of the husbandman.' The present condition of the fertile plains on the coast, including the valley of Sharon, was brought fully under our notice in our journey from Carmel to the southern desert. Few spots on that plain are sown; still fewer are reaped by the proper husbandman. Sand, crops of thistles, and withered grass cover the soil, where, in other days, corn waved and the vine flourished. 'In short,' says Paxton, 'the plain—the noble and celebrated plain of Sharon, appears to be almost deserted; and while it has a fertility and extent, were it occupied and properly cultivated, sufficient to sustain a nation, it is now roamed over by a few flocks—has small patches of it cultivated, and here and there a small poor village to sustain.' 'The earth mourneth and languisheth.' Isa. xxiii. 9. 'Therefore hath the curse devoured the earth, and they that dwell therein are desolate.' Isa. xxiv. 6. North of Carmel, the same scene of neglect and desolation is exhibited on the great plain of Acre as on that of Sharon. Thousands, shut up in the town of Acre, are enduring the extreme of poverty, while the plain around—'a magnificent expanse of the richest land'—is quite neglected, and covered with a wild vegetation intolerably rank. 'The soil,' says Buckingham, 'which resembled the dark loam of Egypt, was now chiefly covered with thistles of a larger kind, and in greater abundance than I had ever seen before.'"

JUDGE, to try and determine a cause. Exod. xviii. 13. Christ does not judge according to the seeing of the eye, or hearing of the ear; that is, does not esteem persons or things, or give sentence merely according to outward appearances. Isa. xi. 3. Saints judge the world—judge angels; they now condemn the wickedness of the world, by their holy profession and practice; at the last day, they shall assent to the sentences of damnation pronounced against wicked angels and men. 1 Cor. vi. 2, 3. The saints are judged according to men in the flesh, and live according to God in the spirit, when they are outwardly corrected for their sins, or persecuted by wicked men, and yet inwardly live a life of fellowship with God. 1 Pet. vi. 6. Men become judges of evil thoughts, when, in a partial manner, they prefer one person to another. James ii. 4.

JUDGES, a name given to rulers in Israel, from Joshua to Saul. The office was more of a warlike than civil nature. It was not hereditary, but elective. Their chief duty seemed to be to conduct the wars under the guidance of Jehovah. They had no power to make laws, but only to observe the laws laid down by Moses. The sacred book which contains the history of these remarkable men, is called the book of Judges, which is thus analyzed by Mr Horne:—

“The book of Judges comprises the history of about three hundred years: it consists of three parts; the first embraces the history of the elders, who ruled the Israelites after the death of Joshua, and the subsequent transactions, to the commencement of their troubles. Chap. i., iii. 4. The second part contains the history of the judges from Othniel to Eli (chap. iii. 5–xvii.); and the third, which narrates several memorable actions performed not long after the death of Joshua (chap. xvii. 21), is thrown to the end of the book, that it might not interrupt the thread of the narrative. ‘This history,’ observes Dr Priestley, ‘abundantly verifies the frequent warnings and predictions of Moses; according to which, the people, being under the immediate government of God, were in the most exemplary manner to be rewarded for their obedience, and punished for their disobedience, and especially for their conformity to the religions of their neighbours, whom God had devoted to destruction on account of their polytheism and idolatry.’ There is considerable difficulty in settling the chronology of this book, several of the facts related in it being reckoned from different eras, which cannot now be exactly ascertained: many of the judges also are generally supposed to have been successive, who in all probability were contemporaries, and ruled over different districts at the same time.”

JUDGING, RASH. See EVIL SPEAKING.

JUDGMENT, the perception of relations, or, as it has been sometimes explained by logicians, that act of the mind whereby one thing is affirmed or denied of another. It is judgment, then, which forms a proposition of any kind. In adult age, we seldom form a conception of an object singly and without reference to something else; and it is by this process of comparison or judgment that we acquire an immense accession to our stock both of information and enjoyment. We conceive objects separately, and the thoughts or conceptions of them recur separately; but we are so constituted as to perceive between them relations or points of connection. Among logical writers, judgment is considered as having reference to two classes of objects—the necessary and the contingent. The former, however, cannot, strictly speaking, be brought under the influence of judgment, as being neither true nor false, logically speaking, but beyond all dispute indisputably certain. To the class of contingent truths, therefore, judgment is exclusively limited, as admitting of affirmation or negation. The whole mental powers have been resolved by Destutt Tracy, and Dr. Young, into sensation, memory, and judgment.

JUDGMENT, DAY OF. That all-important period which shall close the present dispensation, and usher in an eternity of happiness to the righteous, and of misery to the wicked.

I. The proofs of a general judgment are these:—
(1.) The justice of God requires it; for it is evident that this attribute is not clearly displayed in the dispensation of things in the present state. 2 Thess. i. 6, 7; Luke xiv. 14. (2.) The accusations of natural conscience are testimonies in favour of this belief. Rom. ii. 1–16; Dan. v. 5, 6; Acts xxiv. 25. (3.) It may be concluded, from the relation men stand in to God, as creatures to a Creator. He has a right to give them a law, and to make them accountable for the breach of it. Rom. xiv. 12. (4.) The resurrection of Christ is a certain proof of it. See Acts xvii. 31; Rom. xiv. 9. (5.) The Scripture, in a variety of places, sets it beyond all doubt. Jude 14, 15; 2 Cor. v. 10; Matt. xxv.; Rom. xiv. 10, 11; 2 Thess. i. 7, 10; 1 Thess. iv. 16, 17; Rom. ii. 1–16, iii. 6; Acts xxiv. 25.

II. As to the Judge. The Bible declares that God will judge the world by Jesus Christ. Acts xvii. 31. The triune God will be the judge, as to original authority, power, and right of judgment; but, according to the economy settled between the three divine persons, the work is assigned to the Son (Rom. xiv. 9, 10), who will appear in his human nature (John v. 27; Acts xvii. 31); with great power and glory (1 Thess. iv. 16, 17); visible to every eye (Rev. i. 7); penetrating every heart (1 Cor. iv. 5; Rom. ii. 16); with full authority over all (Matt. xxviii. 18); and acting with strict justice. 2 Tim. iv. 8. As for the concern of others in the judgment, angels will be no otherwise concerned than as attendants, gathering the elect, raising the dead, &c., but not as advising or judging. Saints are said to judge the world, not as co-judges with Christ, but as approvers of his sentence, and as their holy lives and conversations will rise up in judgment against their wicked neighbours.

III. As to the beings that will be judged. These will be men and devils. The righteous, probably, will be tried first, as represented in Matt. xxv. They will be raised first, though not a thousand years before the rest, as Dr. Gill supposes; since the resurrection of all the bodies of the saints is spoken of as in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, at the last trump, in order to their meeting the Lord in the air, and being with him, not on earth, but for ever in heaven. 1 Cor. xv. 52; 1 Thess. iv. 16, 17.

Here we may take notice of a question which is proposed by some, viz., Whether the sins of God's people shall be published in the great day, though it is certain they shall not be alleged against them to their condemnation? The objections urged against this are of little weight. 1. It seems indispensable that the sins of believers, though forgiven, should be made manifest, that so the glory of that grace which has pardoned them may appear more illustrious, and their obligation to God for this further enhanced. 2. The justice of the proceedings of that day requires it, since it is presumed and known by the whole world that they were prone to sin, as well as others; and, before conversion, as great sinners as any, and after it their sins had a peculiar aggravation. Therefore, why should they not be made public, as a glory due to the justice and holiness of God, whose nature is opposite to all sin? And, 3. This is necessary, because their sins are often connected with those of others. Moreover, 4. Since God, by recording the sins of his saints in Scripture, has perpetuated the knowledge thereof; and if it is to their honour that the sins there mentioned were repented of, as well as forgiven, why may it not be supposed that the sins of believers shall be made known in the great day? And, lastly, this alone seems agreeable to those expressions of every word, every work, and every secret thing, being brought into judgment, whether it be good or whether it be bad. 2 Cor. v. 10; 1 Cor. iv. 1-5.

As to the wicked, they also shall be judged, and all their thoughts, words, and deeds be brought into judgment. Eccles. xii. 14. The fallen angels, also, are said to be reserved unto the judgment of the great day. Jude 6. They shall then receive their final sentence, and be shut up in the prison of hell. Rev. xx. 10; Matt. viii. 29.

IV. As to the rule of judgment. We are informed the books will be opened. Rev. xx. 12. (1.) The book of divine omniscience (Mal. iii. 5), or remembrance. Mal. iii. 16. (2.) The book of conscience. Rom. ii. 15. (3.) The book of providence. Rom. ii. 4, 5. (4.) The book of revelation, law, and gospel. John xii. 48; Rom. ii. 16. (5.) The book of life, in which the names of the justified are enrolled. Luke x. 20; Rev. iii. 5, xx. 12, 15.

V. As to the time of judgment. The soul will be either happy or miserable immediately after death, but the general judgment will not be till after the resurrection. Heb. vi. 2, ix. 27; 2 Tim. iv. 1. There is a day appointed (Acts xvii. 31), but it is unknown to men. 2 Thess. ii. 1-14.

VI. As to the place. This is of no consequence, when compared with the state in which we shall appear. And as the Scriptures represent it as certain (Eccles. xi. 9); universal (2 Cor. v. 10); righteous (Rom. ii. 5); decisive (1 Cor. xv. 52); and eternal as to its consequences (Heb. vi. 2); let us all be concerned for the welfare of our immortal interests, flee to the refuge set before us, improve our precious time, depend on the merits of the Redeemer, and adhere to the dictates of the divine word, that we may be found of him in peace. 2 Pet. iii. 14.

To every man the day of his death may be considered as the day of judgment; for as death leaves him the judgment will find him. It is well, therefore, often to realise the solemn period when we must all appear at the judgment-seat of Christ, to give an account of the deeds done in the body, whether they have been good or whether they have been evil.

JUDGMENTS OF GOD, are the punishments inflicted by him for particular crimes. The Scriptures give us many awful instances of the display of divine justice in the punishment of nations, families, and individuals for their iniquities. See Gen. vii. xix. 25; Exod. xiv.; Judg. i. 6, 7; Acts xii. 23; Esther v. 14, vii. 10; 2 Kings xi.; Lev. x. 1, 2; Acts v. 1-10; Isa. xxx. 1-5; 1 Sam. xv. 9, 32, 33; 1 Kings xii. 26-33. It becomes us, however, to be exceedingly cautious how we interpret the severe and afflictive dispensations of Providence, in the present world.

JUDITH, a woman of the tribe of Reuben, of whom we find an account in the apocryphal book which bears her name, as having delivered her country by killing Holofernes, the Assyrian general, at the siege of Bethulia. The Book of Judith was originally written in Chaldee, and translated into Latin. There is also a Greek version attributed to Theodotion, and a Syriac version made from the Greek. Dr. Prideaux refers the book to the time of Manasseh; Jahn assigns it to the age of the Maccabees; Grotius regards it as a parabolic fiction written in the time of Antiochus Epiphanes.

JUGGERNATH, or JAGATNATH (that is, The Lord of the world), the most celebrated and sacred temple in Hindostan, in the district of Cuttack, on the coast of Orissa. It stands near the shore, not far from the Chilka Lake, in a waste, sandy tract, and appears like a huge, shapeless mass of stone. The idol is a carved block of wood, with a hideous face, painted black, and a distended, blood-red mouth. On festival days the throne of the idol is placed on a tower sixty feet high, moving on wheels, accompanied by two other idols, that likewise sit on their separate thrones. Six long ropes are attached to the tower, by which the people draw it along. The priests and their attendants stand round the throne on the tower, and occasionally turn to the worshippers with indecent and disgusting songs and gestures. The walls of the temple and the sides of the car are also covered with obscene images, in large, durable sculpture. While the tower moves along, numbers of devout worshippers throw themselves on the ground in order to be crushed by the wheels; and the multitude shout in approbation of the act, as a pleasing sacrifice to the idol.

Dr. Duff, in his valuable work entitled "India, and India Missions," gives a very graphic account of this monstrous idol, and the homage paid to it. "The temple of Juggernath," says he, "or rather Jagatnath, 'the lord of the world!'" A glorious title impossibly attributed to the senseless object which bears it, as if in daring insult to the Majesty of heaven—yet well befitting, as expressive of that despotic 'lordship' which has, from generation to generation, been exercised over the myriads of 'a world lying in wickedness,' who have fallen victims to its destructive sway. Ah! if you possess the spirit of Christian zeal and love, how must your classic musings be cruelly broken in upon and dispersed at the utterance of that tragic name! And, when at length your own eyes are fastened on the huge red granite pile, how must the gay visions of fancy evaporate before the rush of other recollections, and widely differing associations? While actually gazing at it, can you help recalling to remembrance all that you had ever read or heard of the scene before you? Impossible. All must come crowding into the mental perspective with a peculiar vividness never felt before. And when you think of the monster-block of the idol, with its frightfully grim and distorted visage, so justly styled the 'Moloch of the East;' sitting enthroned amid thousands of massive sculptures, the representative emblems of that cruelty and vice which constitute the very essence of his worship:—when you think of the countless multitudes that annually congregate there from all parts of India, many of them measuring the whole distance of their weary pilgrimage with their own bodies:—when you think of the merit-earning austerities constantly practised by crowds of devotees and religious mendicants, around the precincts of the 'holy city'—some remaining all day 'with their head on the ground and their feet in the air; others with their bodies entirely covered with earth—some cramming their eyes with mud and their mouths with straw; while others lie extended in a puddle of water—here, one man lying with his foot tied to his neck, or with a pot of fire on his breast; and there, a third, enveloped in a network of ropes:—when, besides these self-inflicted torments, you think of the frightful amount of involuntary suffering and wretchedness, arising from the exhaustion of toilsome pilgrimages, the cravings of famine, and the scourgings of pestilence:—when you think of the day of high festival—how the 'horrid kiug' is dragged forth from his temple, and mounted on his lofty car in the presence of hundreds of thousands that cause the very earth to shake with shouts of 'Victory to Juggernath our lord!'—how the officiating high priest, stationed in front of the elevated idol, commences the public service by a loathsome pantomimic exhibition, accompanied with the utterance of filthy blasphemous songs, to which the vast multitude at intervals respond, not in strains of tuneful melody, but in loud 'yells of approbation united with a kind of hissing applause:'—when you think of the carnage that ensues in the name of sacred offering—how as the ponderous machine rolls on, 'grating harsh thunder,' one and another of the more enthusiastic votaries throw themselves beneath the wheels, and are instantly crushed to pieces, the infatuated victims of hellish superstition:—when you think of the numerous Golgothas that bestud the neighbouring plain, where 'the dogs, jackals, and vultures seem to live on human prey;' and of those bleak and barren sands that are for ever whitened with the skulls and bones of deluded pilgrims which lie bleaching in the sun:—when you think of all this, and much more, which Buchanan and others have committed to immortal record, and have the whole pictured to the mind's eye more vividly than it had ever been, in consequence of the immediate presence of the temple itself as an object to the eye of sense—oh, in the midst of such heart-rending scenes, how must your glowing classical reveries appear as incongruous as would the songs of boisterous merriment amid requiems for the dead!

"Still, you may have an adequate conception of the extent of Juggernath's dominion. You had heard before of the celebrated temple in Orissa, at which you are now supposed to be gazing. And, perhaps, your only consolation may be founded on the belief, that, in beholding it, you have not only seen the worst, but have seen all. What, then, must be your feelings when assured of the contrary? As there are numbers of sacred rivers in India—but the Ganges, from being the most sacred, has acquired a monopoly of fame—so there are many shrines of Juggernath in India, though the one at Puri, from being the largest and most venerated, has, in like manner, acquired exclusive celebrity. In hundreds, or rather thousands of places, where there are no temples, properly so called, there are still images and cars of Juggernath—fashioned after the model of the great prototypes at Orissa. There is scarcely a large village in all Bengal without its car of Juggernath. In Calcutta and its neighbourhood there are scores of them—varying in size from a few feet up to thirty or forty in height. What a view must open up to you of the fearful extent and magnitude of this destructive superstition, when you try to realize the fact, that, on the anniversary occasion of the car-festival, all the millions of Bengal are in motion;—that, when the great car at Puri is dragged forth amid the shouts and acclamations of hundreds of thousands assembled from all parts of India, on the very same day, and at the very same hour, there are hundreds of cars rolled along throughout the widely scattered districts and cities and villages of the land:—so that there are not merely hundreds of thousands, but literally millions, simultaneously engaged in the celebration of orgies, so stained with licentiousness and blood, that, in the comparison, we might almost pronounce the Bacchanalia of Greece and Rome innocent and pure!"

JULIAN THE APOSTATE, a Roman emperor, born at Constantinople, A.D. 331. He was brought up in the knowledge of the Christian religion, being educated under the care of Eusebius of Nicomedia; but having gone to Athens at the age of twenty-four, he was so captivated with the instructions of the heathen philosophers, that he renounced Christianity and openly embraced Paganism. Accordingly, no sooner had he succeeded to the throne, than he directed his whole efforts to the restoration of the Pagan worship and the persecution of the Christians, precluding them from all official situations connected with the state, and even preventing them from pleading before a court of justice. Such was the bitter hatred which he bore to Christianity, that to falsify the prophecy of Christ in regard to Jerusalem, he encouraged the Jews to attempt the rebuilding of the city. While the workmen, however, were engaged in digging the foundations, flames of fire burst forth, which put an end to the undertaking. He died in A.D. 365, in the thirty-fourth year of his age. It is said that on his deathbed his mind was tormented with the most excruciating pangs of remorse, and his last words were, "O Galilean, thou hast conquered!"

JULIAS, the name given by Philip the tetrarch to Bethsaida, in honour of Julia, the daughter of Augustus the emperor. See BETHSAIDA.

JULIUS, a centurion of the cohort of Augustus, to whom Festus, governor of Judea, committed Paul, to be conveyed to Rome. Julius had great regard for Paul. Acts xxvii. 1, &c. He suffered him to land at Sidon, and to visit his friends there; and in a subsequent part of the voyage he opposed the violence of the soldiers directed against the prisoners generally, in order to save the apostle. When he delivered his charge to the custody of the chief captain of the guard, there can be no doubt but that his favourable report of the apostle contributed essentially to the indulgence he afterwards met with, and by which his imprisonment was greatly moderated.

JUMPERS, persons so called from the practice of jumping during the time allotted for religious worship. This singular practice began, it is said, in the western part of Wales, about the year 1760.

JUNIPER. (Heb. retem.) It is very questionable whether this shrub is mentioned in Scripture, though it is found in our translation. 1 Kings xix. 4; Job xxx. 3, 4. The Syriac translators prefer interpreting the word, turpentine tree, and the Chaldee paraphrasts, broom—a translation acquiesced in by Schultens, Montanus, and Le Clerc, and still further confirmed by the circumstance that in the Arabic language the Hebrew word is preserved and applied to a species of broom. Calmet supposes that the word refers to any wild shrub. The Genista Hispanica, or Spanish broom, which is the Spartium Junceum of Linnæus, grows abundantly in the desert regions of Arabia. Our translators obviously refer to a variety of the Juniperus communis.

JUPITER, the supreme god of the Roman and Greek mythology, whom the people of Lystra supposed to have descended from heaven in the form of Barnabas. Acts xiv. 11–13. See Gods.

JUST, conformed to the principles of right and equity; acquitted of the charge of guilt, and, according to the divine law, entitled to the rewards of righteousness. This may take place either on legal or evangelical principles. See JUSTICE OF GOD—JUSTIFICATION.

JUSTICE is that virtue which consists in a strict regard to the rights of others. It is a principle of great extent, and may not improperly be said to form a part of every virtue, as in every vice there is something of injustice towards God, our fellow-men, or ourselves. As far as our fellow-men are concerned, the great rule of justice is, "Whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them,"—a precept which, in this its complete form, we owe to the Gospel, and which for its clearness and reasonableness, for being easily remembered, and on all occasions easily applied to practice, can never be too much admired.

JUSTICE OF GOD, is that perfection whereby he is infinitely righteous and just, in his principles and in all his proceedings with his creatures. Mr. Ryland defines it thus: "The ardent inclination of his will to prescribe equal laws as the supreme governor, and to dispense equal rewards and punishments as the supreme judge." Rev. xvi. 5; Ps. cxlv. 7, xcvii. 1, 2. It is distinguished into remunerative and punitive justice. Remunerative justice is a distribution of rewards, the rule of which is not the merit of the creature, but his own gracious promise. James i. 12; 2 Tim. iv. 8. Punitive or vindictive justice, is the infliction of punishment for any sin committed by men. 2 Thess. i. 6. That God will not let sin go unpunished is evident, (1.) From the word of God. Exod. xxxiv. 6, 7; Numb. xiv. 18; Neh. i. 8. (2.) From the character of God. Isa. i. 13, 14; Ps. v. 5, 6; Heb. xii. 29. (3.) From sin being punished in Christ, the surety of his people. 1 Pet. iii. 18. (4.) From all the various natural evils which men feel in the present state. The use we should make of this doctrine is this: (1.) We should learn the dreadful nature of sin, and the inevitable ruin of impenitent sinners. Ps. ix. 17. (2.) We should highly appreciate the Lord Jesus Christ, in whom justice is satisfied. 1 Pet. iii. 18. (3.) We should imitate the justice of God, by cherishing an ardent regard to the rights of God, and to the rights of mankind. (4.) We should abhor all sin, as it strikes directly at the justice of God. (5.) We should derive comfort from the consideration that the Judge of all the earth will do right, as it regards ourselves, the Church, and the world at large. Ps. xcvii. 1, 2.

JUSTIFICATION, a forensic term, which signifies the declaring or the pronouncing a person righteous according to law. It stands opposed to condemnation; and this is the idea of the word whenever it is used in an evangelical sense. Rom. v. 18; Deut. xxv. 1; Prov. xvii. 15; Matt. xii. 37. It does not signify to make men holy, but the holding and declaring them to be free from punishment. It has been defined, "An act of God's free grace, in which he pardoneth all our sins, and accepteth us as righteous in his sight only for the righteousness of Christ imputed to us, and received by faith alone."

The doctrine of justification was styled by Luther the article of a standing or falling Church. It is a capital article of that faith which was once delivered to the saints. Far from being a merely speculative point, it spreads its vital influence through the whole body of theology, runs through all Christian experience, and operates in every part of practical godliness. Such is its grand importance, that a mistake about it has a malignant efficacy, and is attended with a long train of dangerous consequences. Nor can this appear strange, when it is considered that the doctrine of justification is no other than the way of a sinner's acceptance with God. Being of such peculiar moment, it is inseparably connected with many other evangelical truths, the harmony and beauty of which we cannot behold while this is misunderstood. It is, if anything may be so called, an essential and fundamental truth of Christianity; and as our very salvation depends on it through eternity, it deserves and demands our most serious consideration. (See ACCEPTANCE WITH GOD.)

Justification, in a theological sense, is either legal or evangelical. If any person could be found that had never broken the divine law, he might be justified by it in a manner strictly legal. But in this way none of the human race can be justified, or stand acquitted before God. "For all have sinned; there is none righteous, no, not one." Rom. iii. As sinners, they are under the sentence of death by his righteous law, and excluded from all hope of mercy. That justification, therefore, about which the Scriptures principally treat, and which reaches the case of a sinner, is not by a personal, but an imputed righteousness; a righteousness without the law (Rom. iii. 21), provided by grace and revealed in the Gospel; for which reason, that obedience by which a sinner is justified, and his justification itself, are called evangelical. In this affair there is the most wonderful display of divine justice and boundless grace. Of divine justice, if we regard the meritorious cause and ground on which the Justifier proceeds in absolving the condemned sinner, and in pronouncing him righteous. Of boundless grace, if we consider the state and character of those persons to whom the blessing is granted. Justification may be further distinguished as being either at the bar of God and in the court of conscience, or in the sight of the world and before our fellow-creatures. The former is by mere grace through faith; and the latter is by works.

To justify is evidently a divine prerogative. "It is God that justifieth." Rom. viii. 33. That sovereign Being, against whom we have so greatly offended, whose law we have broken by ten thousand acts of rebellion against him, has, in the way of his own appointment, the sole right of acquitting the guilty, and of pronouncing them righteous. He appoints the way, provides the means, and imputes the righteousness, and all in perfect agreement with the demands of his offended law, and the rights of his violated justice. But although this act is in some places of the infallible Word more particularly appropriated personally to the Father, yet it is manifest that all the three persons are concerned in this grand affair, and each performs a distinct part in this particular, as also in the whole economy of salvation. The eternal Father is represented as appointing the way, and as giving his own Son to perform the conditions, of our acceptance before him (Rom. viii. 32); the divine Son as engaged to sustain the curse and make the atonement—to fulfil the terms and provide the righteousness by which we are justified (Tit. ii. 14); and the Holy Spirit as revealing to sinners the perfection, suitableness, and freeness, of the Saviour's work, enabling them to receive it as exhibited in the gospel of sovereign grace, and testifying to their consciences complete justification by it in the court of heaven. John xvi. 8, 14.

As to the objects of justification, the Scripture says they are sinners, and ungodly. For thus runs the divine declaration: To him that worketh is the reward (of justification, and of eternal life as connected with it) not reckoned of grace, but of debt. But to him that worketh not, but believeth on him that justifieth (whom? the righteous? the holy? the eminently pious? nay, verily, but) the ungodly, his faith, (or that in which he believes) is counted unto him for righteousness. Rom. iv. 4, 5; Gal. ii. 17. Here, then, we learn that the subjects of justification, considered in themselves, are not only destitute of a perfect righteousness, but have performed no good works at all. They are denominated and considered as the ungodly, when the blessing is bestowed upon them. Not that we are to understand that such remain ungodly. "All," says Dr Owen, "that are justified were before ungodly; but all that are justified are at the same instant made godly." That the mere sinner, however, is the subject of justification appears from hence: The Spirit of God, speaking in the Scripture, repeatedly declares that we are justified by grace. But grace stands in direct opposition to works. Whoever, therefore, is justified by grace, is considered as absolutely unworthy in that very instant when the blessing is vouchsafed to him. Rom. iii. 24. The person, therefore, that is justified, is accepted without any cause in himself. Hence it appears, that if we regard the persons who are justified, and their state prior to the enjoyment of the immensely glorious privilege, divine grace appears, and reigns in all its glory.

As to the way and manner in which sinners are justified, it may be observed that the Divine Being can acquit none without a complete righteousness. Justification, as before observed, is evidently a forensic term, and the thing intended by it a judicial act. So that were a person to be justified without a righteousness, the judgment would not be according to truth; it would be a false and unrighteous sentence. That righteousness by which we are justified must be equal to the demands of that law according to which the Sovereign Judge proceeds in our justification (see CONDITION); but the only condition is that of perfect righteousness; this the law requires, nor does the gospel substitute another. But where shall we find, or how shall we obtain, a justifying righteousness? Shall we flee to the law for relief? Shall we apply with diligence and zeal to the performance of duty, in order to attain the desired end? The apostle positively affirms that there is no acceptance with God by the works of the law; and the reasons are evident. Our righteousness is imperfect, and consequently cannot justify. If justification were by the works of men, it could not be by grace; it would not be a righteousness without works; there would be no need of the righteousness of Christ. And, lastly, if justification were by the law, then boasting would be encouraged; whereas God's design, in the whole scheme of salvation, is to exclude it. Rom. iii. 27; Eph. ii. 8, 9. Nor is faith itself our righteousness, or that for the sake of which we are justified; for, though believers are said to be justified by faith, yet not for faith; faith can only be considered as the instrument, and not the cause. That faith is not our righteousness, is evident from the following consideration: No man's faith is perfect; and, if it were, it would not be equal to the demands of the divine law. It could not, therefore, without an error in judgment, be accounted a complete righteousness. But the judgment of God, as before proved, is according to truth, and according to the rights of the law. That obedience by which a sinner is justified is called the righteousness of faith, righteousness by faith, and is represented as revealed to faith; consequently, it cannot be faith itself. Faith, in the business of justification, stands opposed to all works. "To him that worketh not, but believeth." Now, if faith were our justifying righteousness, to consider it in such a light would be highly improper. For, in such a connection it falls under the consideration of a work—a condition, on the performance of which our acceptance with God is manifestly suspended. If faith itself be that on account of which we are accepted, then some believers are justified by a more, and some by a less perfect righteousness, in exact proportion to the strength or weakness of their faith. That which is the end of the law is righteousness, which certainly is not faith, but the obedience of our exalted Substitute. Rom. x. 4. Were faith itself our justifying righteousness, we might depend upon it before God, and rejoice in it. So that, according to this hypothesis, not Christ, but faith is the capital thing—the object to which we must look; which is absurd. When the apostle says, "Faith was imputed to him for righteousness," his main design is to prove that the eternal Sovereign justifies freely, without any meritorious cause in the believer.

Nor is man's obedience to the gospel, as to a new and milder law, the matter of his justification before God. The notion has been sometimes entertained that a relaxation of the law, and the severities of it, has been obtained by Christ; and a new law, a remedial law, a law of milder terms, has been introduced by him, which is the gospel; the terms of which are, faith, repentance, and obedience; and though these are imperfect, yet, being sincere, they are accepted of by God in the room of a perfect righteousness. But every part of this scheme is wrong; for the law is not relaxed, nor any of its severities abated; there is no alteration made in it, either with respect to its precepts or penalty: besides, the scheme is absurd, for it supposes that the law which a man is now under requires only an imperfect obedience; but an imperfect righteousness cannot answer its demands, for every law requires perfect obedience to its own precepts and prohibitions.

Nor is a profession of religion, nor sincerity, nor good works, at all the ground of our acceptance with God; for all our righteousness is imperfect, and must therefore be entirely excluded. "By grace," saith the apostle, "ye are saved; not of works, lest any man should boast." Eph. ii. 8, 9. Besides, the works of sanctification and justification are two distinct things; the one is a work of grace within men, the other an act of grace for or towards men; the one is imperfect, the other complete; the one carried on gradually, the other done at once. (See SANCTIFICATION.)

If, then, we cannot possibly be justified by any of our own performances, nor by faith itself, nor even by the graces of the Holy Spirit, where shall we find a righteousness by which we can be justified? The Scripture furnishes us with an answer: "By Jesus Christ all that believe are justified from all things from which they could not be justified by the law of Moses." Acts xiii. 38, 39. "He was delivered for our offences, and raised again for our justification." Rom. iv. 25. "Being justified by his blood, we shall be saved from wrath through him." Rom. v. 9. The spotless obedience, therefore, the bitter sufferings, and the accursed death, of our heavenly Surety, constitute that very righteousness by which sinners are justified before God. That this righteousness is imputed to us, and that we are not justified by a personal righteousness, appears from the Scriptures with superior evidence: "By the obedience of one shall many be made righteous." Rom. v. 19. "He hath made him to be sin for us, who knew no sin, that we might be made the righteousness of God in him." 2 Cor. v. 21. "And be found in him, not having mine own righteousness, which is of the law, but that which is through the faith of Christ; the righteousness which is of God by faith." Phil. iii. 9. See also Jer. xxiii. 6; Dan. ix. 24, and the whole of chapters ii. and iii. of Galatians. (See RECONCILIATION—RIGHTEOUSNESS.)

As to the properties of justification—(1.) It is an act of God's free grace, without any merit whatever in the creature. Rom. iii. 24. (2.) It is an act of justice as well as grace—the law being perfectly fulfilled in Christ, and divine justice satisfied. Rom. iii. 26; Ps. lxxxv. 10. (3.) It is an individual and instantaneous act, done at once, admitting of no degrees. John xix. 30. (4.) It is an irreversible and unalterable act. Mal. iii. 6; Rom. v. 17, viii. 30.

The effects or blessings of justification, are—(1.) An entire freedom from all penal evils in this life, and that which is to come. 1 Cor. iii. 22. (2.) Peace with God. Rom. v. 1. (3.) Access to God, through Christ. Eph. iii. 12. (4.) Acceptance with God. Eph. v. 27. (5.) Holy confidence and security under all the difficulties and troubles of the present state. 2 Tim. i. 1, 12. (6.) Finally, eternal salvation. Rom. viii. 30, v. 18.

JUSTUS, the surname of Joseph Barsabas. (See BARSABAS.) Justus was also the name of a friend and fellow-labourer in the gospel of the Apostle Paul. Col. iv. 11.

JYAR or ZIF, the eighth month of the civil year of the Jews, and the second of the ecclesiastical. It has only twenty-nine days, and corresponds to part of our April and May.

KADESH, or KADESH-BARNEA, was the name of a wilderness (Gen. xx. 1) where Miriam the sister of Moses and Aaron died (Numb. xx. 1), and where the Israelites murmured for want of water, (2-6.) It was from Kadesh, in the wilderness of Paran, that Moses sent out spies to examine the land of Canaan. Dr Robinson thinks that the site of Kadesh is identical with the modern Ain el-Weibah, on the banks of the Arabah. In this theory, however, Dr Wilson, after a minute examination, declines to acquiesce. Dr Wells starts the idea that Kadesh in the wilderness of Zin, is a different place from Kadesh-Barnea in the wilderness of Paran. The general opinion is that they are the same.

KADMONITES, one of the ancient heathen tribes which inhabited Canaan before it was conquered by the Israelites. They are supposed to have been situated near Mount Hermon, in the north-east of Palestine. Cadmus, the founder of Thebes in Bœotia, was originally a Kadmonite, and his wife Hermione is alleged to have derived her name from Mount Hermon. Bochart refers to this story. Their name is supposed to be derived from the Hebrew word kedem, signifying the east, probably from the situation of their country, as being east of the Jordan in the neighbourhood of Mount Lebanon. Calmet supposes them to have been identical with the Hivites. This, however, is a mere fanciful conjecture, on which no reliance can be placed.

KANAH, a brook on the borders of Ephraim and Manasseh (Josh. xvi. 8, xvii. 9), which falls into the Mediterranean a few miles south of Cesarea. The present name of it is Nahr el Kasab. Kanah was also the name of a city in the tribe of Asher. Josh. xix. 28.

KARAITES, the name of a modern Jewish sect. The following interesting account of them is extracted from Elliot's "Travels in the Three Great Empires of Austria, Russia, and Turkey:"—

"The Karaites take their name from the Hebrew word Kara, signifying Scripture, because they adhere exclusively to the letter of the Bible, rejecting the Talmud and the interpretation of the rabbis, on which the other Jews, called, by way of distinction, Talmudists, Rabbinites, Pharisaical Jews, and sons of the text, lay so much stress. This is the fundamental point of difference. They are said to hold some of the doctrines of the Sadducees, with whom they were probably identified, till these fell into gross errors, when such as retained the pure faith gave them the name of their chief, Sadok, and separated from them. Others, again, maintain that they have handed down the heterodoxies of the Samaritans, and that they deny all Scripture except the Pentateuch. The assertion, however, is incorrect; and the charge probably originated in their keeping the rest of the Sacred Scriptures apart from the books of Moses, which are much used in their schools, in order that none may suffer unnecessarily from the carelessness of the boys. As they have no printed copies, each manuscript is of great value, and this precaution is indispensable; while, in order to secure a further supply, every member of the synagogue is expected to transcribe the whole, or the greater part, of the Law at least once in his life; a work which the Karaites perform with much precision and beauty of penmanship. They possess Tartar Targums, or versions of the Old Testament in that language, which are regarded as objects of interest equally by themselves, and by those versed in Biblical lore. The rabbis kindly showed us all their manuscripts, and complained that, as the society has been from time to time reduced by the departure of its members, several have been taken away, and their collection has accordingly suffered. Afterwards, they conducted us into their school, and exhibited the various books in which the youth are instructed in the Hebrew and Tartar languages.

"From all we could ascertain, in personal conference with these sons of Israel, and with their neighbours, as well as from what is recorded concerning them, it appears that they hold the Jewish faith in much purity and simplicity; adhering so strictly to the letter of the law, that, as their rabbi informed us they allow no fire to be seen in their town on the Sabbath, neither for light, warmth, culinary purposes, nor even for smoking; though it is well known the Talmudists find little difficulty in evading the Levitical prohibition. Their morals are unusually blameless. At Odessa, where several hundreds of them are established as merchants, they enjoy a high character for honesty and general probity—forming a striking contrast to the Jews of other denominations. In Poland, the records of the police prove that no Karaite has been punished for an offence against the laws for four centuries; and in Galicia, the Government has exempted them, on account of their good conduct, from the imposts levied on other Hebrews, conferring on them, at the same time, all the privileges enjoyed by their Christian fellow-subjects.

“Among the minor points of difference between the two Israelitish parties, are the liturgy, the regulation of food, and the degrees of affinity that oppose marriage. Their civil laws also present some distinctive characters. The Karaites suffer polygamy; which, however, is not much practised; and by them, as by the Rabbinites, affiance is considered as sacred as marriage; so that the means requisite to annul the one are equally necessary to set aside the other, except in the event of the death of the father of a girl betrothed when a minor, who is then allowed a voice in the matter, and may refuse to ratify her father's contract. The members of this tribe are not permitted to dispose of their estates, either by gift or testament, to the prejudice of the lawful heirs; nor to leave more to one child than to another. The following is the order in which succession to property is regulated:—1st, Sons; 2d, Male descendants through the male line; 3d, Daughters; 4th, Daughters' children indiscriminately; 5th, Father; 6th, Paternal uncles; 7th, Brother; 8th, Mother. Illegitimate children are not excluded, provided the mother be a Karaite. A husband can never inherit from his wife; but it is lawful for her to resign to him a share of her dower.

“The Rabbinites pretend that the schism (as they term it) of the Karaites cannot be traced beyond the year 750 of our era. These, on the contrary, maintain that, before the destruction of the first temple, they existed as a distinct sect, under the name of “The Company of the Son of Judah;” that it was only in later days that they were called Karaites, to distinguish them from the Rabbinites; and that their princes reigned over Egypt. According to some, their history is marked by three great epochs. 1st, The year 106 B.C., in which Simeon Ben Chetak, driven to Alexandria, to avoid the persecution directed by Alexander Jannæus against the wise men of his country, returned to Jerusalem after the danger was past, and began to disseminate his doctrines. 2d, 750, A.D., when Anan was their chief at Babylon. 3d, The year (in the fifteenth century) in which Heleliah Ben Don Davis went from Lisbon to Constantinople in order to effect a coalition between the Karaites and Rabbinites; but, failing in his project, gave them a code of laws, which, with the Adareth (a moral work much esteemed among them), formed the basis of their institutions.”

KATTATH, the limit of the tribe of Zebulun (Josh. xix. 15); in Judg. i. 30, called Kitron, which is the same in sense.

KEDAR, (1.) a region in Arabia Deserta. Gen. xxv. 13; 1 Chron. i. 29. (2.) A city, as some think, called by Josephus, Camala. Isa. xlii. 11, lx. 7;

Ezek. xxvii. 21; Ps. cxx. 5; Jer. ii. 10, xlix. 28. (3.) A son of Ishmael (Gen. xxv. 13), the father of the Kedarensians, mentioned by Pliny, who dwelt in the neighbourhood of the Nabathæans, in Arabia Deserta. These people living in tents, it is not possible to show the place of their habitation, because they often changed it. Arabia Deserta is sometimes called Kedar; but the Kedarensians dwelt principally in the south of Arabia Deserta, or in the north of Arabia Petraea; there were some as far as the Red Sea. Cant. i. 5; Isa. xlii. 11.

KEDEMOTH, a city of the tribe of Reuben. Josh. xiii. 18.

KEDESH, a city of the tribe of Naphtali. Josh. xix. 37. It was one of the cities of refuge. Josh. xx. 7.

KEDRON, a brook which flows through the valley of Jehoshaphat, eastward of Jerusalem, between that city and the Mount of Olives. Its bed, which is generally dry, is very narrow, and rather deep, and is now crossed by a bridge of one arch. It was this brook which David crossed barefoot and weeping, when he fled from Absalom (2 Sam. xv. 23, 30); and over it our Lord passed to enter the garden of Gethsemane, the night before his sufferings and death.

KEEP. To keep God's word, statutes, or laws, is to believe them firmly as indeed the word of God; to love, esteem, and delight in them; and diligently endeavour to have our whole life exactly conformed thereto. Ps. cxix. 17, 34. God keeps covenant and mercy: according to the tenor of his covenant, he is ever ready to forgive his people's sins, and to grant free favours to them. 1 Kings viii. 23. He keeps the door of men's lips, in preserving them from vain, imprudent, and sinful words. Ps. cxli. 3. Ministers are keepers of the vineyard; they watch over and labour in the Church, and preserve the truths, ordinances, and members thereof from spiritual injuries. Cant. viii. 11. The saints are made slavish keepers of the vineyard to the neglect of their own, when, by administering public offices, intermeddling too much with carnal business, or by oppression from the impositions of men, they are made to neglect the due management of their own hearts and lives. Cant. i. 6. To keep the heart with all diligence, is watchfully to observe its inclinations and motions, that it comply with no temptation, no appearance of evil; and earnestly to study that its whole temper, thoughts, and the words and works proceeding therefrom, correspond with the unerring law of God. Prov. iv. 23.

KEHELATHAH, an encampment of Israel in the wilderness. Numb. xxxiii. 22. As it appears to denote “the place of assembly,” some have thought the gathering and revolt of Korah, Dathan, and Abiram happened here. It is probably the same as Keilah, a town in the south of Judah.

KEILAH, a town of Judah (Josh. xv. 44), which Eusebius places seventeen miles from Eleutheropolis, on the side of Hebron; and Jerome ten miles from the latter city. It is said that the prophet Habakkuk's tomb was shown there.

KEMUEL, the third son of Nahor, and father of Aram. Kemuel may have given name to the Kamilites, a people of Syria, lying west of the Euphrates. This is the supposition of Calmet.

KENATH, a city of Gilead, in the half tribe of Manasseh, noted as the place where Zebah and Zalmunna, the princes of Moab, fell into the hand of Gideon. It was also called Nobah, after the gallant Manassite, who wrested it from the aboriginal inhabitants. On the site of this city now stands the ruined village of Kannat.

KENI, a region of the Philistine country. 1 Sam. xxvii. 10; Judg. i. 16. "The children of the Kenite," should be, according to the Septuagint, "of Jethro the Keuite."

KENITES, a people who dwelt west of the Dead Sea, and extended themselves far into Arabia Petrea. Jethro, the father-in-law of Moses, was a Kenite, and out of regard to him all of this tribe who submitted to the Hebrews, were suffered to live in their own country. The rest fled, in all probability, to the Edomites and Amalekites. See 1 Sam. xv. 6. The lands of the Kenites were in Judah's lot. Numb. xxiv. 21. They were carried into captivity by Nebuchadnezzar.

KENIZZITES, an ancient people of Canaan, whose land God promised to the descendants of Abraham (Gen. xv. 19), and who dwelt, it is thought, in Idumea. Kenaz, son of Eliphaz, probably took his name from the Kenizzites, among whom he settled.

KERIATHAIM, a city of Moab, the ruins of which now bear the Arabic name of El Teym. It is ranked by Ezekiel among the cities whose magnificence formed the glory of the country; its splendour is now buried in the earth, and its former renown can procure it no respect from the Arab, by whom it is trodden down "as straw is trodden down for the dunghill." "Keriathaim is confounded and taken."

KERIOTH, a town of Moab, the destruction of which is predicted by the prophets Jeremiah (xlviii. 24, 41) and Amos (ii. 2). Keriath was also the name of a town belonging to the tribe of Judah. Josh. xv. 25.

KETTLE, a word which occurs in 1 Sam. ii. 14, and which evidently denotes a large pot or caldron used for the purpose of preparing the peace-offerings. They are supposed to have been made of copper. On the Egyptian monuments such vessels are usually bronze.

KETURAH, the second wife of the patriarch Abraham. (See ABRAHAM). He married her at the advanced age of one hundred and forty years, believing firmly in the divine promise that he should be "a father of many nations." It is generally supposed that Keturah had been his concubine, taken probably from among the servants of his family. By her he had six sons, whom he sent away to the East country, that they might not interfere with Isaac. "It seems to us," says the editor of the Pictorial Bible, "that the current usages of the East give great probability to this conjecture, which is strengthened by considering the great age of Abraham when Sarah died, and that his sons by Keturah were old enough to be sent away to form independent clans before his death."

KEY, the grand instrument and symbol of complete authority: "And the key of the house of David will I lay upon his shoulder: so he shall open, and none shall shut; and he shall shut, and none shall open." Isa. xxii. 22. The keys of the ancients were very different from ours; because their doors and trunks were closed generally with bands, and the key served only to loosen or fasten these bands in a certain manner. They were usually composed of wood.

Messrs. Bouar and M'Cheyne thus describe an Oriental key: "One man kindly invited us to enter his cottage, and sit down on his carpet. He showed us the key commonly used for the door, which is nothing more than a piece of wood with pegs fastened in it, corresponding to small holes in a wooden bolt within. It is put through a hole in the door, and draws the bolt in a very simple manner. It is generally carried in the girdle; though sometimes, we were told, it is tied to something else, and worn over the shoulder, in the way spoken of by the prophet: 'The key of the house of David will I lay upon his shoulder; so he shall open, and none shall shut; and he shall shut, and none shall open.' Isa. xxii. 22. The large opening through which the key is introduced illustrates these words in the Song (v. 4): 'My beloved put in his hand by the hole of the door, and my bowels were moved for him.'" Roberts tells us, that the way in which the key is carried is "to have the corner of a kerchief tied to the ring; the key is then placed on the shoulder, and the kerchief hangs down in front. At other times they have a bunch of large keys, and then they have half on one side of the shoulder, and half on the other. For a man thus to march along with a large key on his shoulder, shows at once that he is a person of consequence." Christ reproaches the scribes and Pharisees with having taken away the key of knowledge (Luke xi. 52); that is, with putting such false glosses on the Scriptures, that they read them without advantage to themselves, and without discovering to others the truth; which in this way they suppressed in unrighteousness. Rom. i. 18. Christ promised to Peter that he should first open the gate of his kingdom, both to Jew and Gentile, in making the first converts among them. Matt. xvi. 19. It is observable that no supremacy is here given to Peter; as the power of binding and loosing belonged equally to all the apostles. Matt. xviii. 18. The term binding and loosing was customarily applied by the Jews to a decision respecting doctrines or rites, establishing which were lawful and which unlawful. (See BIND.) And it may also denote, to bind with sickness, and to loose by restoring to health. Jesus Christ says that he has the key of David, and also, the keys of death and hades (See HADES), (Rev. i. 18); that is, it is in his power to bring to the grave, or to deliver from it; to appoint to life or to death; to summon to the state of departed spirits, or to release from that state at the resurrection of the last day. Rev. xx. 13-15.

KIBROTH-HATTA AVAH (the graves of lust) was one of the encampments of Israel in the wilderness, where they desired of God flesh for their sustenance, declaring they were tired with manna. Numb. xi. 34, 35. Quails were sent in great quantities; but while the meat was in their mouths (Ps. lxxviii. 30, 31), God smote so great a number of them, that the place was called "The graves of those who lusted." 1 Cor. x. 6.

KICK, a metaphor taken from a fed horse, or like animal, kicking with his heels at his owner when he gives him provision, pricks him forward, or the like. To kick against God, is wantonly and stubbornly to rebel against him, and make his benefits an occasion of rebelling against him. Deut. xxxii. 15; 1 Sam. ii. 29; Acts ix. 5.

KID (gedi), the young of the goat. Among the Hebrews the kid was reckoned a great delicacy; and appears to have been served for food in preference to the lamb. (See GOAT.) It continues to be a choice dish in the neighbouring countries. The Hebrews were forbidden to eat a kid boiled in the milk of its mother (Exod. xxxiv. 26; Deut. xiv. 21); and this remarkable prohibition, which is repeated three several times, has been differently accounted for by different commentators, but we think it was chiefly intended to encourage the exercise of tender and humane dispositions.

KIDNEYS, two glandular bodies situated in the posterior part of the abdominal region of the human body, and enveloped in a thick mass of fatty matter. The kidneys and their fat (see FAT) were commanded to be offered up as burnt sacrifices under the Mosaic dispensation. Grotius, adopting the opinion of the Rabbis, represents the mystical sense of this ceremony to be, that the honour of God requires the mortification of the sensual appetites, the instruments of which are the fat, the kidneys, &c. This word is sometimes used metaphorically to denote the inmost powers, thoughts, and desires, of the soul, and which are sometimes termed in Scripture, reins. Ps. xvi. 7.

KILL. The desire of the slothful kills them; their delight in ease hurts their constitution, and exposes them to great straits and poverty; or their desire after things, for which they care not to labour, leads them to methods that bring them to an unhappy end. Prov. xxi. 25. The letter, or covenant of works, killeth; it is the strength of sin, and condemns men to death, spiritual, temporal, and eternal. The letter, or external part of ceremonies, without regard to the gospel signification, killed men and hindered them from Christ and salvation, and cleaving thereto hastened ruin on the Jewish nation. The letter, or unsanctified head knowledge of divine truth, kills; it encourages pride, and makes men esteem themselves, and condemn Christ, and to their own ruin refuse the offers of the gospel. 2 Cor. iii. 6.

KILN. See BRICK.

KINDNESS, the spirit of love, favourable treatment, or a constant and habitual practice of friendly offices and benevolent actions. See BENEFICENCE—CHARITY—GENTLENESS.

KINDRED, a number of people related to one another by blood or marriage. The kindreds of the earth that shall mourn at Christ's second appearing, are the vast multitudes of wicked and worldly men. Rev. i. 7. The kindreds over which Antichrist rules, are vast multitudes of different nations, sexes, and conditions. Rev. xiii. 7, xi. 9.

KINE. See CATTLE.

KINGS, BOOKS OF. In the most correct and ancient editions of the Hebrew Bible these two books constitute but one, with a short space or break between them. The Books of Kings describe the history of the united kingdom of Israel in the height of its glory under Solomon, its division into two kingdoms under his son and successor Rehoboam, the causes of that division, and the consequent decline of the two kingdoms of Israel and Judah until their final subversion; the ten tribes being carried captive into Assyria by Shalmaneser, and Judah and Benjamin to Babylon by Nebuchadnezzar. They were most probably compiled by Ezra from the records which were regularly kept, both in Jerusalem and Samaria, of all public transactions. They are cited both by our Lord and his apostles, and they have held a place in the sacred canon both of the Jewish and Christian Churches in every age.

KINGDOM OF GOD, a term of frequent occurrence in Sacred Scripture, and variously applied to the providential, moral, and evangelical government of Jehovah. The last application of the word, is its most frequent signification, in the New Testament especially. Its real subjects are those who are born from above. John iii. 3–5. Its visible subjects are those who make a credible profession of faith in Christ and obedience to him. Luke xvi. 16. Its privileges and immunities are not of this world, but such as are spiritual and heavenly; they are all spiritual blessings in heavenly things in Christ Jesus. Eph. i. 3. Over this glorious kingdom death has no power; it extends as well to the future as the present world; and though entered here by renewing grace (Col. i. 13), it is inherited in its perfection in the world of glory. Matt. xxv. 14–30; 1 Cor. xv. 50–57; 2 Pet. i. 11. Hypocrites and false brethren may indeed insinuate themselves into it here; but they will have no possible place in it hereafter. Matt. xiii. 41, 47–50, xxii. 11–14; Luke xiii. 28, 29; 1 Cor. vi. 9–11; Gal. v. 21; Rev. xxi. 27.

KINGDOM OF HEAVEN, is an expression used in the New Testament to signify the reign or administration of Jesus Christ on earth and in heaven. Matt. iv. 17, v. 3, 10, 12, 20, vi. 10, 33, vii. 21. See KINGDOM OF GOD.

KIR, a city of Moab, the same as Kir-hareseth, Kir-hareseth, and Kirheres, the city with walls of burnt brick. It was sometimes called AR (which see), and ARIEL (which see), and also Rabbath-moab, to distinguish it from Rabbath of the Ammonites. The Greeks called it Arcopolis. Its destruction by the Chaldeans is thus predicted: "Kir of Moab is laid waste, and brought to silence." Isa. xv. 1. "Therefore shall Moab howl for Moab, every one shall howl: for the foundations of Kir-hareseth shall ye mourn; surely they are stricken." Isa. xvi. 7. Kir is also the name of a region and people under the dominion of the Assyrians, whither the conquered Syrians were carried captive (2 Kings xvi. 9; Amos i. 5), and whence the Arameans had emigrated. Amos ix. 7. Professor Jahn thinks that the Uzbecks may be the descendants of the Syrian captives.

KIRJATH, the name of a city in the tribe of Benjamin. Josh. xviii. 28.

KIRJATHAIM, or the double city, belonging to the tribe of Reuben. Josh. xiii. 19.

KIRJATH-ARBA. See HEBRON.

KIRJATH-HUZOTH (the city of streets) was the royal seat of Balak, king of Moab; and, therefore, may well be supposed to have had handsome streets. Numb. xxii. 39.

KIRJATH-JEARIM, or the city of forests, a town situated on the confines of the allotments to the tribes of Benjamin and Judah. Hence it is reckoned among the cities of both tribes; but in Judges xviii. 12, it is called Kirjath-jearim in Judah. In this place the ark of the covenant remained twenty years after its removal from Beth-shemesh, until David fixed the sanctuary in Jerusalem. Professor Robinson thinks that the site of it corresponds to the modern village called by the Arabs Kariéh or Kuriah. This place is thus described by Messrs. Bonar and M'Cheyne: "The houses are solidly built of stone, and there are ruins of ancient buildings, especially a large church or abbey in the Gothic style, which Ibraim told us was now turned into a mosque. The village is literally embosomed among olives, pomegranates, and very large fig trees, and a solitary palm rises above the cluster. The pomegranates were in full bloom, the scarlet flowers shining brilliantly from among their deep green leaves. A flock of goats was browsing beneath the trees. Many of the terraces around were finely cultivated, showing what these mountains might soon become." Such is the present aspect of this town.

KIRJATH-SEPIER (the city of books), otherwise Debir, Kirjath-debir (the city of words); a city in the tribe of Judah, afterwards given to Caleb. It was taken by Othniel, to whom Caleb, for his reward, gave his daughter Achsah in marriage. Josh. xv. 15; Judg. i. 11.

KIRK-SESSION, a judicial ecclesiastical court, consisting of the body of elders of a Church, with the pastor at their head and presiding at their meetings. It is called in some Presbyterian denominations a classis or consistory. Its general duty is to watch over, regulate, and authoritatively determine, all matters that regard the spiritual interests of the congregation. More particularly, the kirk-session is charged with maintaining the spiritual government of the congregation—for which purpose they have power to inquire into the knowledge and Christian conduct of the members of the Church; to call before them offenders and witnesses, being members of their own congregation, and to introduce other witnesses where it may be necessary, to bring the process to issue, and when they can be procured to attend; to receive members into the Church; to admonish, to rebuke, to suspend, or exclude from the sacraments those who are found to deserve censure; to concert the best measures for promoting the spiritual interests of the congregation; and to appoint delegates to the higher judicatories of the Church. In the kirk-session every member has an equal voice. The vote of the most humble and retiring ruling elder is of the same avail as that of the minister; so that no pastor can carry any measure unless he can obtain the concurrence of a majority of the eldership. If any measure be carried to which a member of session has a serious objection, he has it in his power to appeal to the presbytery of the bounds and other superior judicatories.

KISH, the son of Abiel, and father of Saul. He was of the tribe of Benjamin, a shepherd, and a warrior; and his valour is much praised in the Scriptures. 1 Sam. xiv. 51; 1 Chron. viii. 30, ix. 39.

KISHON, a river now called Shakatham, which flows at the foot of Mount Carmel, and falls into the Bay of Acre. It is called in Judg. v. 21, "That ancient river, the river Kishon." It is generally a small stream, but in the rainy season, it is greatly swollen. On the banks of the Kishon, the prophets of Baal were slain by the prophet Elijah, 1 Kings xviii. 4; and Deborah speaks of it in her song, Judg. v. 19-21. Dr Robinson says that it takes its source in the hills of the plain of Esdraelon. Dr Wilson says that he was informed that its source is near the village of Iksal, but that he was not able to discern it. Buckingham and other travellers in Palestine trace its source to Mount Tabor.

KISS, a usual mode of salutation among all nations. We find it frequently mentioned in the sacred writings. Judas proposed this as the signal by which the enemies of Christ would know him. "Whomsoever I shall kiss, that same is he." It seems to have been used anciently, also, as a mode of expressing homage or submission. Hence in Ps. ii. 12: "Kiss the Son lest he be angry, and ye perish from the way."

Paul often speaks of the kiss of charity or peace in the early Christian Church. Rom. xvi. 16; 1 Cor. xvi. 20; 2 Cor. xiii. 12; 1 Thess. v. 26; 1 Pet. v. 14; Acts xx. 37. Kissing the feet is, in Eastern countries, expressive of exuberant gratitude or reverence. Luke vii. 45. When they salute a person of rank, they bow almost to the ground, and kiss the hem of his garment. They frequently kiss the hand also; but this is not regarded as a token of equal submission with kissing the feet or the knees. When the letter or decree of a governor or ruler is received, it is kissed, and applied to the forehead, in token of reverence. An Eastern conqueror requires the most abject submission from those whom he has vanquished. They fall prostrate and kiss the very ground; thus fulfilling the statement of Scripture in reference to the Messiah: "They that dwell in the wilderness shall bow before him, and his enemies shall lick the dust." An Oriental pays his respects to a person of superior station by kissing his hand, and putting it to his forehead; but if the superior be of a condescending temper, he will snatch away his hand as soon as the other has touched it; then the inferior puts his own fingers to his lips, and afterwards to his forehead. Sometimes they express their love and veneration by taking hold of the beard and kissing it. Intimate acquaintances sometimes kissed the shoulder of each other. It was a custom also in the East, on the death of any person, that the nearest relative or the dearest friend gave the lifeless body a parting kiss. Thus we find that when the patriarch Jacob died, Joseph claimed the right of the first-born, and "fell on his face and kissed him."

KITE (ajah). Lev. xi. 14; Deut. xiv. 13; Job xxviii. 7. Bochart supposes this to be the bird which the Arabians call the ja-jao, from its note; and which the ancients named æsalon, "the merlin," a bird celebrated for its sharp-sightedness. This faculty is referred to in Job xxviii. 7, where the word is rendered "vulture;" and it is supposed that the vultur fulvus or griffin vulture is intended. As a noun masculine plural, ajim, in Isa. xiii. 22, xxxiv. 14, and Jer. l. 39, Bochart says that jackals are intended; but, by the several contexts, particularly the last, it may well mean a kind of unclean bird, and so be the same with that mentioned above.

KITRON, a city mentioned in Judg. i. 30. It was situated in Zebulun. It is the same with Sepphoris or Diocæsarea, now called Sephourieh. The town is situated on an eminence, and surrounded with ruins. Rabbi Judah the holy, who completed the Mishna, was born in this town.

KNEADING-TROUGH. This word occurs in Exod. xii. 34, and is supposed by Gesenius to be the vessel which contained the dough, whereas the Septuagint renders it "lumps of dough." On this word Professor Bush remarks: "The Hebrew term is supposed to signify both the dough and the vessel in which it was contained; and it is probable that the dough was wrapped in some kind of covering cloth, or thrown into some kind of sack, as the word rendered 'clothes' denotes any thing that covers a substance, or wherein it is wrapped. Arab. 'Their cold mass of dough being bound up in towels, and put on their shoulders.' We learn, indeed, from the reports of modern travellers, that the vessels which some of the oriental tribes make use of for kneading the unleavened cakes while travelling in the desert, are small wooden bowls, in which they both knead their bread, and afterward serve up their provisions when cooked, yet Dr Pocock informs us that the Arabs not unfrequently carry their dough in something else, and gives a description of a round leather coverlid, which they lay on the ground, and from off which they eat, having a number of rings round it by which it is drawn together with a chain, terminating in a hook to hang it by. This is drawn together, and they sometimes carry in it their meal made into dough; and in this manner they bring it full of bread; and when the repast is over, carry it all away at once. Which of these two kinds of vessels is meant in this place cannot easily be ascertained, but there is no question that some other term than 'kneading-troughs' ought to be adopted. The habit is very natural of identifying oriental utensils with our own, when the same name is given to both, although the ideas thus acquired are often extremely incorrect."

KNEE, not only signifies that part of the body so called, but the whole body, a part being put for the whole. Ps. cix. 24. Also for persons; so weak and feeble knees denote weak and disconsolate persons. Job iv. 4; Heb. xii. 12; Isa. xxxv. 3. The Hebrew word signifies to bend the knee, to bless, or to pronounce a blessing. The modern Arabs fall down at the knees of a superior; and hence the word signifies also to do homage, to worship.

KNIFE. To put a knife to our throat at the table of the great, is carefully to restrain our appetite, as if we were in the utmost hazard of eating too much. Prov. xxiii. 2. The reference here is to the knife used in eating; but knives were used for various purposes. Flint knives were used among the Egyptians.

KNOCK. Jesus knocks at the door of our heart; by his Word, Spirit, and providence, he awakens, invites, and urges us to receive himself as the free gift of God, and Saviour come to seek and save that which was lost. Rev. iii. 20; Cant. v. 2. Our knocking at his door of mercy, is fervent and frequent prayers for his distinguished presence and favour. Matt. vii. 7, 8; Luke xi. 9, 10.

KNOP, an ornament of the golden candlestick used in the tabernacle service, and referred to in Exod. xxv. 31, 33, 34. It was probably of a globular form, resembling fruit; hence it is rendered by Josephus "pomegranates."

KNOWLEDGE is defined by Mr. Locke to be the perception of the connection and agreement, or disagreement and repugnancy of our ideas. It also denotes learning, or the improvement of our faculties by reading; experience, or the acquiring new ideas or truths, by seeing a variety of objects, and making observations upon them in our own minds.

KNOWLEDGE OF GOD is often taken for the fear of God, and the whole of religion. There is, indeed, a speculative knowledge, which consists only in the belief of his existence, and the acknowledgment of his perfections, but has no influence on the heart and conduct. A spiritual, saving knowledge is attended with veneration for the Divine Being (Ps. lxxxix. 7), love to him as an object of beauty and goodness (Zech. ix. 17), humble confidence in his mercy and promise (Ps. ix. 10), and sincere, uniform, and persevering obedience to his Word (1 John ii. 3). It may further be considered as a knowledge of God the Father; of his love, faithfulness, power, &c. Of the Son, as it relates to the dignity of his nature (1 John v. 20), the suitability of his offices (Heb. ix.), the perfection of his work (Ps. lxxviii. 18), the brightness of his example (Acts x. 38), and the prevalency of his intercession (Heb. vii. 25). Of the Holy Ghost, as equal with the Father and the Son; of his agency as an enlightener and comforter; as also in his work of witnessing, sanctifying, and directing his people. John xv. 26; 2 Cor. iii. 17, 18; John iii. 5, 6; Rom. viii. 16.

This knowledge may be considered as experimental (2 Tim. i. 12), confiding (Job xiii. 15, 16), affectionate (1 John iii. 16), influential (Ps. ix. 14; Matt. v. 16), self-abasing (Isa. vi. 1-8; Job xlii. 5, 6), satisfying (Ps. xxxvi. 7; Prov. iii. 17), and superior to all other knowledge (Phil. iii. 8).

In order to increase in the knowledge of God, there must be dependence on him from whom all light proceeds (James i. 6), attention to his revealed will (John v. 39), a watchful spirit against corrupt affections (Luke xxi. 34), a humble frame of mind (Ps. xxv. 9), frequent meditation (Ps. civ. 34), a persevering design of conformity to the divine image (Hos. vi. 3).

KNOX, JOHN, the great and distinguished Reformer of Scotland, was born in the year 1505, at the village of Gifford, in East Lothian, if not in Haddington, the county town, to which some authorities incline, though not on very conclusive grounds. He was descended from an ancient family in Renfrewshire, and his parents, who were respectable, gave him a liberal education—an advantage which at that time was far from being common. Having received the rudiments of his knowledge at Haddington, he was sent to the University of Glasgow, where, it is believed, he soon made considerable progress, under the tuition of John Major, a celebrated professor of philosophy and theology, who entertained opinions opposed to the lofty pretensions of the Papacy. Knox subsequently commenced teaching philosophy himself—most probably as a regent in one of the colleges of the university of St. Andrews—and having been advanced to clerical orders, he was, through his own merit, ordained as a priest in the Romish Church before he had reached the usual age of twenty-five.

An important change, however, soon took place in his religious sentiments. From reading the fathers of the Christian Church, particularly Jerome and Augustine, he not only became acquainted with tenets very different from those taught in the Romish Church, but was led to the study of the blessed Scriptures of truth themselves. This occurred when he was about thirty years of age; and though, from that period, his mind was gradually preparing for the reception of evangelical religion, it does not appear that he professed himself a Protestant till nearly seven years afterwards.

The change in his views first discovered itself in his philosophical lectures, in which he began to forsake the scholastic path, and to recommend to his pupils a more rational and useful method of study. As from this he proceeded to reprehend the corruptions that prevailed in the Church, he became an object of suspicion to the bigoted Romanists; and soon perceiving it dangerous to remain longer at St. Andrews, which was wholly under the power of Cardinal Beaton, a determined enemy to all reform, he retired to the south of Scotland, where in a short time he avowed his belief of the Protestant doctrine. Sentence was thereupon passed against him as an heretic. He was degraded from the priesthood; and assassins, according to the authority of Beza, were employed by the cardinal to waylay him; by whose hands he must have fallen, had not Providence placed him under the protection of Douglas of Langniddrie.

Having relinquished all thoughts of officiating in the Church which had invested him with clerical orders, Knox became tutor to the sons of the Lairds of Ormiston and Langniddrie, in East Lothian. He was very attentive to the religious instruction of the youths committed to his charge, and catechised them publicly at a small chapel in the neighbourhood of Langniddrie, in which, at stated times, he also expounded the Scriptures. This proceeding was not without danger, as the influence of the cardinal led the existing authorities to persecute, even unto death, all who presumed to depart from the regulations of the Romish Church.

Knox was, in consequence, obliged to conceal himself, and remove from place to place, for safety. Wearied with this mode of living, he at length, in the year 1547, after giving up an intention he had formed of leaving Scotland, entered the Castle of St. Andrews, for the purpose of prosecuting the education of his young charge. This stronghold, which was in the hands of the conspirators, afforded at the time an asylum to a great number of Protestants; and in its chapel Knox continued a lecture on St. John's Gospel, which he had begun to read to his pupils at Langniddrie, and catechised them publicly in the parish church belonging to the city.

He was shortly afterwards invited to become colleague to John Rough, who at this time officiated as preacher to the garrison, and was afterwards condemned to the flames. Knox having declined this invitation, on the ground that he had no call to the employment, and disliked being guilty of intrusion, it was arranged, without his knowledge, that an invitation should be given to him publicly.

After much serious deliberation, on the importance, responsibility, and solemnity, of the ministerial office, he composed his mind to engage in the work to which he was thus called, relying on Him who had engaged to make his strength perfect in the weakness of his servants; and resolved, with the apostle, "not to count his life dear, that he might finish with joy the ministry which he received of the Lord, to testify the gospel of the grace of God."

Knox's labours at St. Andrews were not, however, permitted to continue longer than a few months. In the end of June, 1547, a French fleet, with a land force, arriving to the assistance of the governor, the castle was invested by land and sea, and, after a brave and vigorous resistance, the besieged surrendered, on the last day of July, on condition that their lives should be spared, and that they should be conveyed to France, and from thence to any other country which they might prefer, except Scotland. They accordingly embarked, but were shortly afterwards captured by the French, before Rouen, as prisoners of war. Knox was confined, with others, on board the galleys, loaded with fetters, and exposed to many hardships and indignities.

The prisoners were afterwards confined at Rouen, Mont St. Michel, and other places; and in the year 1549, after an imprisonment of nineteen months, Knox obtained his liberty, but in what manner is not well ascertained. He afterwards repaired to England, on account of the favour there shown to Protestant doctrine, during the minority of Edward VI., and was, from his reputation and talents, subsequently sent by the Privy Council to preach stately at Berwick. Here his labours were very successful, and great numbers were converted by his ministry. During his residence at this place Knox had paid his addresses to a grand-daughter of Sir Ralph Bowes of Streatham, but the marriage was not solemnized for some time afterwards; probably on account of the presumed aversion of her father.

In 1550, a charge being exhibited against Knox, before Tonstal, bishop of Durham, he delivered at Newcastle an able defence of his doctrine in the presence of that diocesan, the clergy of the cathedral, and some lay authorities; which seems to have had the effect of preventing further prosecution. He continued at Berwick during the remainder of this year, and in 1551 removed to Newcastle. The Privy Council appointed him, that year, one of the six chaplains in ordinary to King Edward, two of whom required to be present with the Court, while the other four itinerated by turns.

The lamented death of Edward VI. took place in the month of July 1553, to the great grief of Knox, and all the friends of the Protestant religion, and for the five succeeding years their cause was often surrounded with many difficulties, and great danger. Queen Mary, on her accession to the throne of England, promised to do no violence to the consciences of the Protestants, and Knox, though well aware of her bigotry, and of the precariousness of such an assurance, discountenanced any rebellious proceedings, and prayed for her majesty by name. It was not long, however, before the Parliament repealed all the laws made in favour of the Reformation, and restored the Roman Catholic religion; but such Protestants as pleased were permitted to observe their own form of worship until the 20th of December 1553; after that period they were exposed to the penalties denounced against heretics, and many ministers were committed to prison, while others escaped beyond sea. Knox could neither prevail on himself to flee, nor yet could he desist from preaching; and his enemies, who had now access to rulers sufficiently disposed to proceed against him, were not slow in improving their opportunity. In the end of December, or beginning of January, his servant was seized, and letters written by his master were taken from him; but as they contained merely religious advices and exhortations to constancy in the Protestant faith, which he was prepared to avow before any court in the kingdom, he was not alarmed at their interception. His friends, however, forced him, contrary to his own wish, to retire for a time to a place of safety; and seeing that he could not otherwise hope to elude the pursuit of his enemies, he at length set sail for Dieppe, where he landed on the 28th of January 1554.

Knox remained absent from his native country for above eighteen months, during which time he laboured with great activity and zeal at Dieppe, Geneva, Frankfort, and other places. It seems to have been at this time that he made himself master of the Hebrew language, which he had no opportunity of acquiring in early life; he also had the happiness of meeting with the celebrated Reformer Calvin, betwixt whom and himself there existed a strong similarity in sentiment and in the more prominent features of character. The Genevan Reformer was highly pleased with the piety and talents of Knox; who, in his turn, entertained a greater esteem and deference for Calvin than for any other of the Reformers. The friendship thus commenced was interrupted only by the death of the latter.

Knox landed on the English border in the autumn of 1555, and repaired to Berwick, where he had the satisfaction of finding his wife and her mother in comfortable circumstances, and living in strict adherence to the Protestant faith. He shortly afterwards secretly visited the Protestants in Edinburgh, where he employed himself, both by day and night, in preaching to successive assemblies, which met in the house where he lodged. The Earl of Arran had by this time resigned the regency into the hands of Mary of Guise, the Queen Dowager; which event had the effect, very unexpectedly, of reviving in some measure the Protestant cause.

The celebrated John Erskine of Dun, who was one of Knox's hearers, prevailed on him to accompany him to his family seat in the shire of Angus, where he continued a month preaching every day, his ministry being attended by the principal persons in the neighbourhood. In the beginning of the year 1556, he proceeded to Kyle, where he preached in various houses and also in the town of Ayr. He afterwards paid a second visit to Dun, during which he preached more openly than before. A majority of the gentlemen of Mearns at this time made profession of the Reformed religion, by sitting down at the Lord's table, and entered into a solemn bond, in which they renounced the Popish communion, and engaged to maintain and promote the pure preaching of the gospel. This seems to have been the first of those religious bonds, or covenants, by which the confederation of the Protestants in Scotland was so frequently ratified.

About this time our Reformer received an invitation from the English congregation at Geneva, to become their pastor. Of this invitation he considered it his duty to accept; and his wife and her mother having joined him at Dieppe, they proceeded together to Geneva. But no sooner did the Papists hear of his departure, than they in the most dastardly manner renewed in his absence the summons against him, which they had previously deserted, and as he did not of course appear at the appointed time, they proceeded to pass sentence against him, adjudging his body to the flames and his soul to damnation. As his person was not, however, within their reach, they had to content themselves with burning his effigy at the cross of Edinburgh.

Knox laboured among the congregation at Geneva for more than two years, during which he experienced a tranquillity and domestic comfort to which he had previously been a stranger. With his colleague, Christopher Goodman, he lived as a brother; his little flock were united among themselves, and attached to their minister, and he was happy in the friendship of Calvin, and the other pastors of Geneva. Two sons were also born to him in this place.

No personal considerations, however, could unfix our Reformer's determination to revisit Scotland, as soon as a favourable opportunity should offer for advancing the Reformation among his countrymen. In a letter written to some of his friends in Edinburgh, dated 16th March 1557, he thus expresses himself: "My own motion and daily prayer is, not only that I may visit you, but also that with joy I may end my battle among you; and assure yourself of that, that whenever a greater number among you shall call upon me, than now hath bound me to serve them by His grace, it shall not be the fear of punishment, neither yet of the death temporal, that shall impede my coming to you."

Within a month after this letter was written, two burgesses of Edinburgh arrived with a communication and credence from the Earl of Glencairn and others, informing him that the professors of the Reformed doctrine remained steadfast; that those in power had refrained from persecution; and inviting him to return to Scotland, where he would find them ready to spend their lives and fortunes in advancing the cause they had espoused.

In consequence of this invitation he proceeded on his way homewards the length of Dieppe, where he was disappointed at receiving intelligence of some changes in the Protestant measures, and of irresolution and faint-heartedness among those who had invited him. He instantly wrote to the nobility who had sent for him, and upbraided them for their timidity and inconstancy. Being thus prevented from returning to his native land, he resolved in the meantime to remain in France, where he was for some time usefully employed in furthering the Protestant cause. It seems to have been at this period that he preached in the city of Rochelle, when he expressed his conviction, that, within a few years, he would preach in the Church of St. Giles, in Edinburgh. Some Papists heard, with bitterness, this expression of his sentiments; but it happened, some time afterwards, that these very people, on their way to Scotland, were, through stress of weather, likely to perish; on which, with feelings of compunction, they vowed that, if God would preserve their lives, they would forsake Popery; which they accordingly did, and saw and heard the Reformer preach openly in the kirk of Edinburgh, according to his own presentiment.

At Dieppe Knox had the satisfaction of officiating in a Reformed church, although it does not appear that there were any Protestants there when he first visited it. The accounts from his own country being still unfavourable, he returned to Geneva in the beginning of the year 1558, and engaged along with several learned men of his congregation, in a new translation of the Bible into English; which is now known by the name of The Geneva Bible. It was at this time, also, that he published his Letter to the Queen Regent, and his Appellation and Exhortation; both of which were transmitted to Scotland, and contributed not a little, along with his other writings and epistolary correspondence, to the spread of the Reformed opinions.

A letter which the Reformer had also addressed to the Protestant Lords, produced its intended effect, in re-animating their drooping courage; and in December, 1557, after entering into a solemn bond of mutual assurance, whereby they promised before God, with all diligence, continually to apply their whole power, substance, and lives, to maintain, set forward, and establish, the most blessed Word of God and his Congregation, they again invited Knox to return to his native country. The document just mentioned was signed by the Earls of Argyle, Glencairn, Morton, Erskine of Dun, and other celebrated individuals of the day.

The renewed invitation to return to his native country did not reach Knox till November, 1558. The letters which he subsequently received confirmed the intelligence respecting the progress which the reformed cause had made, and in January, 1559, he finally quitted Geneva, leaving his wife and family behind, till he could ascertain that they might safely enter Scotland. He went to Dieppe, where he was detained some time, and on the 2d of May landed safely at Leith.

Information of the Reformer's arrival reached the council, which was sitting at that time in the monastery of the Greyfriars. The clergy were panic-struck with the intelligence, and the council, foreboding the ruin of all the plans they had formed, was dismissed in haste and confusion. In a few days afterwards Knox was proclaimed an outlaw and a rebel, in virtue of the sentence formerly pronounced against him by the clergy.

Soon after his arrival in Scotland he had written for his wife and family, whom he had left behind him at Geneva; and they, having obtained a passport to England, were, on their arriving there, conveyed to the borders by direction of the Court, and our Reformer had the satisfaction of meeting them in safety towards the latter end of September.

His great zeal and activity in the cause of the Congregation continued unabated; and he was busily employed, about this period, in applying to England for assistance to the Protestant cause, in which he was partly successful. His conduct, however, exposed him to the deadly resentment of the Queen Regent and the Papists. "A reward," says his biographer, "was publicly offered to any one who should apprehend or kill him; and not a few, actuated by hatred or avarice, lay in wait to seize his person. But this did not deter him from appearing in public, nor from travelling through the country, in the discharge of his duty. His exertions, at this period, were incredibly great. By day, he was employed in preaching; by night, in writing letters on public business. He was the soul of the Congregation; was always found at the post of danger; and, by his presence, his public discourses, and private advices, animated the whole body, and defeated the schemes employed to corrupt and disunite them."

On the 19th of August, 1561, the young Queen arrived in Scotland, and took the reins of government into her own hands. She received a very cordial reception in Edinburgh; but gave great offence by directing preparations to be made for the celebration of a solemn mass in the chapel of Holyrood House, on the first Sabbath after her arrival. This service had not been observed in Scotland since the conclusion of the civil war, and was, indeed, prohibited by an act of the late Parliament. So great was the horror with which the Protestants viewed its restoration, that there would have been an open tumult among the populace, had not some leading men among the Reformers interfered. Knox, though not less alarmed at this proceeding than his brethren, used his utmost influence to allay the fervour of the more zealous Protestants.

The Queen's first Parliament was held in May, 1563, and it was natural to expect that the establishment of the Protestant religion would then have been duly ratified, along with the treaty of peace made in July, 1560. So well, however, had she laid her plans, and so powerful was the temptation of self-interest on the minds of the Protestants leaders, that the only favourable opportunity which presented itself during her whole reign, for giving a legal security to the Reformed religion, was allowed to pass away unimproved. Our Reformer now perceived the full extent of the Queen's dissimulation, and was deeply grieved at the selfishness and servility of the Protestant leaders, whom he endeavoured in vain to rouse to a sense of duty; and so hot was the altercation between him and the Earl of Murray, on this subject, that an open rupture ensued.

After the Queen's marriage with Darnley, she directed her whole policy to the re-establishment of Popery in Scotland. She signed, in 1566, the French Catholic league for extirpating the Protestants—restored the Popish ecclesiasties to their place in Parliament, and altars were even prepared to be erected in St. Giles' Church, for the celebration of the Roman Catholic worship. But these measures were thwarted in consequence of a secret engagement which Darnley had entered into with some of the Protestant nobles; the first effect produced by which was the assassination of Rizzio, an unworthy favourite of the Queen, who appears to have been the principal instigator of the measures against the Protestant religion and the banished lords, and who had incurred the jealousy of the king, the contempt of the nobility, and the hatred of the people.

A complete change on the state of the Court succeeded this event, the Popish counsellors fled, and the exiled nobles returned from England. Mary retired to Dunbar, and mustering some regiments, returned to Edinburgh to wreak her vengeance upon the disaffected. Knox deemed it prudent at this crisis to leave the capital and go to Kyle, whence, by permission of the General Assembly, he went to England to visit his two sons, who were residing with their mother's relations. At what period he returned to his charge is uncertain, but he was present in the General Assembly of 1567, and in the month of July he preached a sermon in the parish church of Stirling, at the coronation of James VI. The Queen's husband had some time previously to this been cruelly murdered in Edinburgh, and Mary had again been married with indecent haste to Bothwell, a ferocious character, who is supposed to have been his destroyer. These events were quickly followed by the flight of Bothwell, Mary's abdication, and the appointment of the Earl of Murray to the regency, during the minority of the young king. Knox preached at the opening of the Parliament, on the 15th of December, exhorting them to begin with the affairs of religion; and they accordingly at last ratified, not only the ecclesiastical jurisdiction exercised by the Assemblies of the Church, but all the acts which had been passed in 1560 in favour of the Reformation, and against Popery.

The work to which our Reformer had so long devoted his attention, was thus at length crowned with triumphant success—Papal superstition was suppressed by law, and the Protestant religion established in its place. In the hope of matters continuing in such a happy state, he looked forward to the prospect of being relieved from the pressure of public affairs, and of spending the remainder of his days in retirement, and preparation for that solemn event which his increasing infirmities proclaimed to be fast approaching. But there were other duties of a public nature which, in the providence of God, he was still to be called on to discharge. The bright prospect which had dawned for a little on the Protestant cause, was destined ere long to undergo another change, and the country in his lifetime was unfortunately again involved in a civil war, all the more distressing that the principal parties on both sides were professed Protestants.

The Queen having escaped from her confinement in Lochleven Castle, on the 2d of May 1568, the Popish party, among which there were a number of discontented nobles, immediately joined her standard, and avowed their determination to restore her to the exercise of her former authority, all hopes of accomplishing the restoration of their ancient religion under the government of the young king, and the good Regent Murray, being apparently at an end. The regent, however, succeeded in defeating the insurgents, the party was dispersed, and Mary, after the battle of Langside, was driven into England. Her partisans being thus disappointed, were determined to be revenged on the regent, and during the year 1568, two persons were actually employed to put him to death. The design was fortunately discovered; but new machinations were not thereby prevented, and Hamilton of Bothwellhaugh, a nephew of the Archbishop of St. Andrews, and who but a short time before had his life spared by the regent, after being brought out for execution, undertook the perpetration of this foul and horrible deed. Having, in the month of January 1570, dogged his unsuspecting victim in his progress to Glasgow, Stirling, and Linlithgow, and finding an opportunity at the last of these places, he deliberately shot the regent through the body with a musket-ball. The loss of this great and good man was felt deeply over the whole kingdom, and filled Knox especially with the deepest sorrow. Not only had he reduced the country to obedience and tranquillity, but he was no less distinguished by his exemplary piety than by his public virtues. His funeral took place in the south aisle of St. Giles', on which occasion Knox preached to a congregation of three thousand deeply affected spectators.

The grief with which the Reformer was filled by this distressing event, together with the confusion which followed it, preyed upon his spirits and injured his health, and in the month of October he had a stroke of apoplexy, which affected his speech to a considerable degree. His enemies exulted at the condition to which he was thus brought, and reports of his death were even circulated. He was, however, soon restored so far as to be enabled to resume preaching, at least on the Sabbath-days.

On Sabbath the 9th of November, Knox preached for the last time, at the installation of Lawson as his colleague and successor. The sermon was delivered in the Tolbooth Church; and, at its conclusion he removed with the congregation to the large church, where he went through the accustomed service, and concluded with a very able and solemn exhortation to both minister and people. After pronouncing the blessing, with a cheerful but exhausted voice, he descended from the pulpit, and, leaning upon his staff, and the arm of an attendant, crept down the street, which was lined with the audience, who, as if anxious to take a last look of their beloved pastor, followed him to his own house (near the bottom of the High Street), from which he never again came out alive.

He died in the sixty-seventh year of his age, not so much oppressed with years, as worn out and exhausted by his extraordinary labours of body and anxieties of mind. Few men were ever exposed to more dangers, or underwent greater hardships. From the time that he embraced the Reformed religion, till he breathed his last, seldom did he enjoy a respite from trouble; and he emerged from one scene of difficulty only to be involved in another, and a more distressing one.

On Wednesday, the 26th of November, he was interred in the Churchyard of St Giles. His funeral was attended by the newly-elected regent, Morton, by all the nobility who were in the city, and a great concourse of people. When his body was laid in the grave, the regent emphatically pronounced his eulogium, in the well-known words:—"There lies he, who never feared the face of man."

KOHATH, the son of Levi, and the father of the Kohathites, Gen. xlv. 11. The family of the Kohathites were appointed to carry the ark and sacred vessels during the marches of the Israelites. Numb. iv. 1-15.

KORAH, the son of Izhar, and grandson of Levi. Exod. vi. 21. He was one of the conspirators along with Dathan and Abiram, who rose in rebellion against Moses and Aaron. Numb. xvi. 1-3. As a punishment for his sin in this matter, the earth opened and swallowed up Korah. From him probably were descended the sons of Korah, who were employed by David to guard the doors of the temple. 1 Chron. ix. 19. They were engaged also in conducting its praises. Indeed, they occupied a distinguished place in the musical part of the service; and Heman, the Master of Song under David, was of this family. To the "sons of Korah" we find ten psalms dedicated; but in consequence of the doubt which attaches to the true meaning of the Hebrew preposition, critics have been at a loss whether these Psalms were composed by or for the "sons of Korah;" that is, whether they were the authors of them, or only the musicians by whom they were to be sung in the temple.

KORAN, or, with the article, Al-koran, the Scripture or Bible of the Mohammedans, containing the revelations and doctrines of their pretended prophet. It is held in the highest veneration among the followers of Mohammed. We shall confine ourselves to a few particulars concerning this remarkable book, drawn from Buck's Theological Dictionary:—

KORAN, HISTORY OF THE. It is the common opinion, that Mohammed, assisted by one Sergius, a monk, composed this book. The Koran, while Mohammed lived, was only kept in loose sheets; his successor, Abubeker, first collected them into a volume, and committed the keeping of it to Haphsa, the widow of Mohammed, in order to be consulted as an original; and there being a good deal of diversity between the several copies already dispersed throughout the provinces, Ottoman, successor of Abubeker, procured a great number of copies to be taken from that of Haphsa, at the same time suppressing all the others not conformable to the original. There are seven principal editions of the Koran; two at Medina, one at Mecca, one at Cufa, one at Bassora, one in Syria, and the common or vulgar edition. The first contains six thousand verses, the others surpassing this number by two hundred, or two hundred and thirty-six verses; but the number of words and letters is the same in all, viz., seventy-seven thousand six hundred and thirty-nine words, and three hundred and twenty-three thousand and fifteen letters. The number of commentaries on the Koran is so large, that the bare titles would make a huge volume. Ben Oschair has written the history of them, entitled Tarikh Ben Oschair. The principal among them are, Reidhari, Thaalebi, Zamalchschari, and Bacai. The Mohammedans have a positive theology built on the Koran and tradition, as well as a scholastic one built on reason. They have likewise their casuists, and a kind of canon law, wherein they distinguish what is of divine and what of positive right. They have their beneficiaries too, chaplains, almoners, and canons, who read a chapter every day out of the Koran in their mosques, and have prebends annexed to their office. The hatib of the mosque is what we call the parson of the parish; and the scheiks are the preachers, who take their texts out of the Koran.

KORAN, MOHAMMEDAN FAITH CONCERNING. It is the general belief among the Mohammedans that the Koran is of divine origin; nay, that it is eternal and uncreated; remaining, as some express it, in the very essence of God; and the first transcript has been from everlasting by God's throne, written on a table of vast bigness, called the preserved table, in which are also recorded the divine decrees, past and future; that a copy from this table, in one volume, upon paper, was, by the ministry of the angel Gabriel, sent down to the lowest heaven, in the month of Ramadan, on the night of power; whence Gabriel revealed it to Mohammed in parcels, some at Mecca, and some at Medina, at different times, during the space of twenty-three years, as the exigency of affairs required; giving him, however, the consolation to show him the whole (which they tell us was bound in silk, and adorned with gold and precious stones of paradise) once a-year; but in the last year of his life he had the favour to see it twice. In fine, the book of the Koran is held in the highest esteem and reverence among the Mussulmans. They dare not so much as touch the Koran without being first washed or legally purified; to prevent which an inscription or label is put on the cover: "Let none touch but they who are clean." It is read with great care and respect, being never held below the girdle. They swear by it; take omens from it on all weighty occasions; carry it with them to war; write sentences of it on their banners; adorn it with gold and precious stones; and knowingly suffer it not to be in the possession of any of a different religion. Some say that it is punishable with death in a Christian even to touch it; others, that the veneration of the Mussulmans leads them to condemn the translating it into any other language as a profanation: but these seem to be exaggerations. The Mohammedans have taken care to have their Scripture translated into the Persian, the Javan, the Malayan, and other languages; though, out of respect to the original, these versions are generally, if not always, interlineated.

KORAN, THE STYLE AND MERITS OF THE, EXAMINED. The praise of all the productions of genius is invention; that quality of the mind which, by the extent and quickness of its views, is capable of the largest conceptions, and of forming new combinations of objects the most distant and unusual. But the Koran bears little impression of this transcendent character. Its materials are wholly borrowed from the Jewish and Christian Scriptures, from the Talmudical legends and apocryphal Gospels then current in the East, and from the traditions and fables which abounded in Arabia. The materials collected from these several sources are here heaped together with perpetual and heedless repetitions, without any settled principle or visible connection. When a great part of the life of Mohammed had been spent in preparatory meditation on the system he was about to establish, its chapters were dealt out slowly and separately during the long period of twenty-three years. Yet thus defective in its structure, and no less objectionable in its doctrines, was the work which Mohammed delivered to his followers as the oracles of God. The most prominent feature of the Koran, that point of excellency in which the partiality of its admirers has ever delighted to view it, is the sublime notion it generally impresses of the nature and attributes of God. If its author had really derived these just conceptions from the inspiration of that Being whom they attempt to describe, they would not have been surrounded, as they now are, on every side, with error and absurdity. But it might be easily proved, that whatever it justly defines of the divine attributes was borrowed from our Holy Scripture; which, even from its first promulgation, but especially from the completion of the New Testament, has extended the views and enlightened the understandings of mankind; and thus furnished them with arms which have too often been effectually turned against itself by its ungenerous enemies. In this instance, particularly, the copy is far below the great original, both in the propriety of its images and the force of its descriptions.

It is, therefore, abundantly apparent, that no miracle was either externally performed for the support, or is internally involved in the composition, of the Mohammedan revelation.

L.

LABAN, the son of Bethuel, and grandson of Nahor, was brother to Rebekah, and father of Rachel and Leah. The few facts of his history recorded in the Book of Genesis, far from representing him in an amiable point of view, exhibit him as a selfish, avaricious, worldly man. The deception practised upon Jacob in the matter of Rachel and Leah, was more especially deeply reprehensible; and although it has been sometimes defended, on the plea that it was the invariable custom of that country that the elder sister should be given in marriage before the younger, this is in reality no palliation of Laban's guilt; for, admitting such a custom to have existed, it was plainly Laban's duty to have made Jacob, who was a stranger in the country, aware of it. Laban appears to have been an idolater; and, accordingly, we find Rachel carrying away from her father's house the teraphim, or small images of household gods, which were worshipped by Laban. Laban is mentioned also in Dent. i. 1, as the name of a place beyond the Jordan, in the plains of Moab.

LACE. In the description of the high priest's dress, we find this word occurring in Exod. xxviii. 28: "And they shall bind the breast-plate by the rings thereof unto the rings of the ephod with a lace of blue." It is also translated "thread" in Judg. xvi. 9.

LACHISH, a city of the tribe of Judah, about twenty miles south-west of Jerusalem. The king of this city assisted Adonizedek against the Gibeonites. Lachish was fortified by Rehoboam, and was the scene of Amaziah's death; it was attacked successively by Sennacherib and Nebuchadnezzar, and is supposed to have been destroyed by the latter. It is marked out by the prophet Micah as a city remarkable for wickedness. Mic. i. 13. The precise situation of Lachish is now unknown.

LADDER. This word, which occurs in Gen. xxviii. 12, in the account of Jacob's vision at Bethel, is derived from a verb signifying "to raise up in a pile, to exalt by casting or heaping up as in the construction of a mound or highway." In accordance with this derivation, Professor Bush regards the word rendered in our version "ladder," as properly meaning "a towering elevation, as of several mountains leaped together in one, with broken irregular sides, composed of ledges of rocks serving as steps or stairs by which it might be ascended to the top." See JACOB.

LAISH, a Sidonian city near Lebanon, which was taken by the Danites when they emigrated to the north of Palestine, and on that occasion its name was changed to DAN (which see)

LAITY. This is a term sometimes applied to the people as distinguished from the clergy. Such a distinction is unwarranted by Scripture, and inconsistent with the views of Presbyterians. The doctrine of the Church of Scotland is, that "ministers as such do not form a separate order in the State." The Second Book of Discipline declares that "the eldership is a spiritual function as is the ministrie." "The distinction of clergy and laity," says George Gillespie, "is Popish and Antichristian; and they who have narrowly considered the records of ancient times have noted this distinction as one of the grounds whence the mystery of iniquity had the beginning of it. The name of clergy appropriate to ministers, is full of pride and vain-glory, and hath made the people of God to be despised, as if they were profane and unclean in comparison of their ministers." The word "laity" seems to have been early introduced, for the purpose of distinguishing the mass of private Christians from those who bore office in the Church; and if confined simply to this view of the matter, no great injury can accrue from the use of the term; but if employment of it should give countenance to any such idea as that the ministers of Christ are alone entitled to be called "God's heritage," as the word "clergy" imports, then it were far better to allow the terms clergy and laity to be superseded by the simpler and less doubtful expressions, ministers and people.

LAKE, a confluence of waters. The principal lakes in Judaea, were the Lake Asphaltites, the Lake of Tiberias, and the Lake Merom. See the respective articles.

LAMB OF GOD. By this name John the Baptist called our Saviour (John i. 29, 36), to signify his innocence, and his quality as a victim to be offered for the sins of the world. Or he might allude to these words of the prophet: "He is brought as a lamb to the slaughter, and as a sheep before her shearers is dumb, so he openeth not his mouth." Isa. liii. 7. If it were a little before the pass-over, then the sight of a number of lambs going to Jerusalem to be slain on that occasion, might suggest the idea; as if he had said, "Behold the true, the most excellent Lamb of God." Nay, it is most probable that the reference is to the paschal lamb, which was obviously intended to be a type of the Redeemer.

LAME. Persons weak in body, or in intellect and grace, and halting between different opinions, are called lame. Isa. xxxiii. 23; Heb. xii. 13.

LAMECH, a descendant of Cain, and the son of Methusael. He is said (Gen. iv. 19), to have taken two wives, which is the first recorded instance of polygamy—a practice which directly contravenes the ordinance of Heaven that two only should constitute one flesh; and for introducing which Lamech is here condemned to infamous notoriety. In his address to his two wives (Gen. iv. 23, 24), Lamech gives the first specimen on record of primeval poetry, or the art of versification, in measured couplets, or parallel lines, redoubling and repeating the sense.

LAMENTATIONS OF JEREMIAH. This is a mournful or elegiac poem in the Old Testament, bearing evident marks of its authorship, from its similarity to the style of the prophecies which bear the name of Jeremiah. The Lamentations are generally supposed to have been composed on the occasion of the destruction of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar. They form a most beautiful specimen of Hebrew poetry, though Bishop Lowth thinks that they were written originally not in the form of a complete regular poem, but in separate stanzas, which were afterwards collected and combined into one whole. Each elegy consists of twenty-two periods, according to the number of letters in the Hebrew alphabet. The first four chapters are written in the acrostic form, the several periods beginning with the letters of the Hebrew alphabet, in regular order. The style of the Lamentations is characterised by much pathos and tenderness, and approaches in appearance to a series of funeral dirges. See POETRY, HEBREW.

LAMP. From the frequent use of lamps in the East, both for useful and ornamental purposes, the word is often used in Scripture, both in a literal and figurative sense. In the houses of orientals, lamps have been employed from the most remote antiquity. They are spoken of both by Moses and Job. The Egyptians, if not the original inventors of lamps, as has been often maintained, are, at all events, in the constant habit of using them even at the present day, in preference to every other method of lighting their apartments. They burn lamps all the night long, and in every occupied room. Nor is this custom limited to the wealthy; it prevails also among the poorer classes. The Egyptians, also, were in the practice of burning lamps in the tombs of the dead. The universal use of lamps in the East accounts for the frequency with which this mode of lighting is referred to in Scripture. Thus, in the ancient Prophets, to extinguish the lamp was equivalent to total destruction. "I will take from them," says Jeremiah, "the light of a candle, and this whole land shall be a desolation and an astonishment." The lamps of Gideon's soldiers, and those of the wise and foolish virgins, were most probably the torches or flambeaux which are still used in many parts of the East, made of iron or earthenware, wrapped about with old linen, and moistened from time to time with oil. The lights that are burned in the chambers in Oriental countries are almost exclusively composed of vegetable oil; candles are seldom or never used, and the great quantities of sesamum, palma christi, and the other seeds from which oil is extracted, that are planted, may be easily conceived. A burning lamp or fire has, from early times down to the present day, been frequently used in confirmation of a covenant. On such occasions, they invoke the flame as a witness. And in cases of greater importance, they invoke the lamp of the temple. To this custom there is an obvious allusion in Gen. xv. 17.

LAND, in the Old Testament, often denotes the country of the Israelites, or the particular country or district spoken of; the land of Canaan, the land of Egypt, the land of Ashur, the land of Moab. In many places of our authorized version the phrase "all the earth" is used, where the meaning should be restricted to the land, or all the land.

LAND-MARK. To prevent mistakes and litigations, something has in all ages been used to mark out the limits of landed property. Among the Hebrews, stones were set up for this purpose, which could not be removed without incurring the wrath of Heaven. The divine command on this subject runs thus: "Thou shalt not remove thy neighbour's land-mark, which they of old time have set in thine inheritance, which thou shalt inherit in the land that the Lord thy God giveth thee to possess it." Deut. xix. 14. Such landmarks are still used in Eastern countries.

LAND OF CANAAN. See CANAAN.

LANGUAGE, in general, denotes those articulate sounds by which men express their thoughts. Much has been said respecting the invention of language. On the one side, it is observed, that it is altogether a human invention, and that the progress of the mind, in the invention and improvement of language, is, by certain natural gradations, plainly discernible in the composition of words. But on the other side it is alleged, that we are indebted to divine revelation for the origin of it. Without supposing this, we see not how our first parents could so early hold converse with God, or the man with his wife. Admitting, however, that it is of divine original, we cannot suppose that a perfect system of it was all at once given to man. It is much more natural to think that God taught our first parents only such language as suited their present occasion, leaving them, as he did in other things, to enlarge and improve it, as their future necessities should require.

What was the first language taught man, is matter of dispute among the learned, but most think it was the Hebrew. There are, however, other opinions on the oft-disputed subject as to the primitive language. All these are, however, useless speculations. The only point worth contending for is, that language was conveyed at once to the first pair in sufficient degree for intellectual intercourse with each other, and devotional intercourse with God; and that man was not left, as infidel writers have been pleased to say, to form it for himself out of rude and instinctive sounds.

It is true that many languages bear marks of being raised to their improved state from rude and imperfect elements, and that all are capable of being much improved, enlarged, and enriched. And some have even supposed that it would be possible, by the invention of a fixed and determinate language, to remove all ambiguity from the reasonings of men, upon any subject whatever. Such a thought, however, savours more of the romantic than of the practicable. The error lies not so much in the language as in the mind which employs it; and words are viewed under different meanings, and shades of meaning, according to the peculiar notions of those who employ them. On this subject we may quote some very apposite remarks from the pen of the Baron Messias:—"The workman," says he, "precedes the instrument; thought has preceded an artificial speech. This speech is the creation of our intelligent activity; to improve the art of thinking, then, thought must, above all things, be improved. The amelioration of the instrument suffers a previous amelioration of the ideas of the workman." "The word God to the Negro signifies a serpent; to the Parsi it means the sun; to the followers of Spinoza it means universal substance; to the Theist, the self-existent Being, the Creator, distinct from his works. Give sound ideas to the Negro. the Parsi, the Spinosist, they will understand the word God as the Theist does; you will have improved the language in improving the idea."

LANTERN (lampadôn.) The word occurs in John xviii. 3; but appears to denote a sort of military lamp. (See LAMP.) The soldiers came thus furnished to apprehend our Lord, lest he should escape through the darkness of the night. Lampe is of opinion that the word translated "lanterns," denotes a more ancient and rude kind of torches, formed of split laths bound into a bundle; but that afterwards torches of other materials, and of a more convenient manufacture, namely, tapers and lanterns, came into use, though the others still continued among the meaner sort of people.

LAODICEA. Pliny calls this a most celebrated city, situated upon the river Lycus, and formerly called Diospolis. In the year after the death of Paul, who speaks of Laodicea, Col. iv. 13, historians write that both Colosse and Laodicea were destroyed by an earthquake, and for many ages afterwards, the whole country of Asia Minor, in which these Churches were situated, was seized and subverted by Mohammedan superstition and Turkish tyranny. Though now in ruins it was formerly a splendid city, possessing a theatre so large as to be capable of containing upwards of thirty thousand spectators. The Church which was planted here in the times of early Christianity, was distinguished as being one of the seven Churches of Asia, but being lukewarm and indifferent, it was rejected of God, and now the place on which it stood is utterly desolate, without an inhabitant. "Laodicea," says Dr Smith, "is utterly desolated, and without any inhabitant, except wolves, and jackals, and foxes. It can boast of no human inhabitants, except occasionally when wandering Turcomans pitch their tents in its spacious amphitheatre." Colonel Leake observes: "There are few ancient cities more likely than Laodicea to preserve many curious remains of antiquity beneath the surface of the soil. Its opulence, and the earthquakes to which it was subject, render it probable that valuable works of art were often there buried beneath the ruins of the public and private edifices." The finest sculptured fragments are to be seen at a considerable depth, in excavations which have been made among the ruins.

In Col. iv. 16, the following injunction of the Apostle Paul has given rise to much controversy: "And when this epistle is read among you, cause that it be read likewise in the Church of the Laodiceans; and that ye also read the epistle from Laodicea." Some Popish writers allege that an epistle was written by the apostle to the Laodiceans, which the Church, notwithstanding, by its authority, would not admit into the canon; and by this argument they attempt to prove that the canonical authority of the Scriptures rests upon the authority of the Church, which could thus exclude the writings of the apostles themselves from the number of the sacred books. It is to be observed, however, that the apostle does not speak of an epistle to, but from the Laodiceans. No doubt, a forged epistle has been palmed upon the world as an Epistle of Paul to the Laodiceans, but the Fathers are unanimous in rejecting it. Theodoret calls it a fiction and forgery. Jerome, in reckoning up all Paul's Epistles, subjoins these words, "Some read, and to the Laodiceans, but it is exploded by all." The second Nicene Council, too, says, "Among the epistles of the divine apostles, a certain one is spoken of to the Laodiceans, which our Fathers have reprobated as another man's." It is plain, therefore, the alleged epistle is nothing else but an impudent forgery.

LAP. This word is intended, according to Eastern customs, to denote the clothes gathered up into a fold so as to serve instead of an apron, in which they carry herbs, loaves, corn, and other articles. Thus, "And one went out into the field to gather herbs, and found a wild vine, and gathered thereof wild gourds his lap full, and came and shred them into the pot of pottage; for they knew them not." 2 Kings iv. 39. And our Lord, alluding to this custom, exhorts his disciples: "Give, and it shall be given unto you; good measure, pressed down, and shaken together, and running over, shall men give into your bosom. For with the same measure that ye mete withal it shall be measured to you again." Luke vi. 38. It was also the fold of the outer robe which Nehemiah shook before his people as a significant emblem of the manner in which God should deal with the man who ventured to violate his oath and promise to restore the possessions of their impoverished brethren. Nch. v. 13. To shake the lap was one of the most significant expressions of strong disapprobation. When the Jews opposed the apostle Paul, and blasphemed, he shook his raiment and said unto them, "Your blood be upon your own heads; I am clean." This action is still a common mark of reprobation in Turkey.

LAPIDOTH, the husband of Deborah, a prophetess mentioned in Judg. iv. 4. The termination of the word is the Hebrew feminine plural, which very seldom occurs in the names of men. Some, therefore, render it "woman of Lapidoth," as if it were the name of a place. Others, as Lapidoth, taken appellatively, signifies "lamps," would read it a "woman of lamps;" that is, one who made wicks for the lamps of the tabernacle. Others, again, would translate it a "woman of illuminations or splendours," by which they would understand a woman supernaturally enlightened, endowed with extraordinary wisdom, and who had thus become very eminent and illustrious. After all, the present rendering, "wife of Lapidoth," is the most probable translation.

LAPPING. This word occurs in Judg. vii. 5, 6:

"So he brought down the people unto the water: and the Lord said unto Gideon, Every one that lappeth of the water with his tongue, as a dog lappeth, him shalt thou set by himself; likewise every one that boweth down upon his knees to drink. And the number of them that lapped, putting their hand to their mouth, were three hundred men: but all the rest of the people bowed down upon their knees to drink water." It is impossible for a man to lap literally as a dog laps. The true explanation seems to be, that they employed their hand as the dog employs his tongue; that is, forming it into a hollow spoon and throwing the water dexterously from the stream into their mouths. This mode of drinking is often practised in the East, and practice alone can give that peculiar tact to it which generally excites the wonder of travellers. They perform the act almost as quickly as the dog, and satisfy their thirst in half the time taken by another man.

LAPWING (dukiphath), Lev. xi. 19; Deut. xiv. 18. The bird intended by the Hebrew name in these places is undoubtedly the hoopoe; a very beautiful, but most unclean and filthy species of birds. The Septuagint renders it epopa; and the Vulgate, upupa; which is the same with the Arabian interpreters. The Egyptian name of the bird is kukuphah; and the Syrian, kikuphah; which approach the Hebrew dukiphath. It may have its name from the noise or cry it makes, which is very remarkable, and may be heard a great way.

LASEA, a maritime city of Crete, near which Paul sailed in his voyage to Rome. Acts xxvii. 8. No mention of any such city or even village as Lasea has any where been found. It happens, however, to have been one of the many places of the hundred-citied isle, not mentioned by Pliny and the other geographical and historical writers.

LATCHET. In the hot countries of the East, sandals were usually worn, which were fastened by very artificial straps; and since they could not be loosed without trouble, that operation was committed by the rich to slaves. Hence the allusion in Mark i. 7: "There cometh one mightier than I after me, the latchet of whose shoes I am not worthy to stoop down and unloose."

LATTICE. We are told, in 2 Kings i. 2, that Ahaziah fell down through a lattice in his upper chamber—probably referring to a latticed or net-work fence composed of wood. He had been leaning, perhaps, against this fence on the roof of the house, and as it gave way under him, he fell into the inner court or garden. In Judg. v. 28, the mother of Sisera is said to have "looked out at the window and cried through a lattice." The windows of Eastern houses generally open into interior private courts, with the exception sometimes of a latticed window or balcony towards the street. At such a one the mother of Sisera is in the passage now quoted represented as standing and looking out.

LAVER, BRAZEN. Moses was directed (Exod xxx. 18) to make, among other articles of furniture for the service of the tabernacle, a laver of brass. Exod. xxxviii. 8. This is not particularly described as to form; but the lavers made for the temple were borne by four cherubim, standing upon bases or pedestals mounted on brazen wheels, and having handles belonging to them, by means of which they might be drawn, and conveyed from one place to another, as they should be wanted. These lavers were double; that is to say, composed of a basin, which received the water that fell from another square vessel above it, from which they drew water with cocks. The whole work was of brass.

LAW, a rule of action, a precept or command. The word is used in Scripture in a variety of significations. Sometimes it denotes the whole of God's revealed will, which is its most general use in the Book of Psalms; sometimes it stands for the Mosaic as distinguished from the Christian dispensation; sometimes for the ceremonial observances of the Jews. Very often it denotes the Ten Commandments of the Moral Law; and in a few passages it implies the unwritten law on the heart or conscience of men.

LAWS OF NATIONS, are those rules which by a tacit consent are agreed upon among all communities, at least among those who are reckoned the polite and humanized part of mankind.

LAWS OF NATURE. Nature acts by general laws; that is, the occurrences of the world in which we live result from causes which operate according to fixed and constant rules. The whole course of the visible universe is but the collective result of such laws; its movements are only the aggregate of their working. All natural occurrences in the skies and on the earth, in the organic and in the inorganic world, are determined by the relations of the elements, and the actions of the forces of which the rules are thus prescribed. The relations and rules by which these occurrences are thus determined necessarily depend on measures of time and space, motion and force; on quantities which are subject to numerical measurement, and capable of being connected by mathematical properties. And thus all things are ordered by number, and weight, and measure. "God," as was said by the ancients, "works by geometry;" the legislation of the material universe is necessarily delivered in the language of mathematics; the stars in their courses are regulated by the properties of conic sections, and the winds depend on arithmetical and geometrical progressions of elasticity and pressure. "If our inquiry be," says Dr. Hetherington, "into the origin or reason of that simplest acceptation of the term, a law of nature, which means the mode of existence peculiar to any object in the material creation, there is no other answer can be given, than that any object exists as it is, and not otherwise, because the Creator has willed that such should be its peculiar and distinctive mode of existence. Everything is what it is, because God made it so; and man can no more change its peculiar character, than he could have called it into being. That law of nature, then, which may be seen in any individual object, is nothing but the will of God materially expressed in that object; and the constant permanency of that law, preserving to the object its own peculiar character, is nothing but a manifest proof of the unchangeableness of God's creative will. In like manner, those more complex laws of nature, which refer to the general modes of acting in the material creation, may be proved to be nothing but the modes of acting which God has prescribed to himself in his government of the material universe; and their unvarying constancy has its being in his unchanging character and will. The laws of nature, then, are but the laws, or rather the will of God; and what we term their steadfast uniformity of operation, is but a manifestation of his unchangeable character and attributes. If these views were clearly apprehended, and constantly borne in mind, when men use that common phrase, 'The laws of nature,' instead of their employing it as a sufficient explanation of the wonders of nature, and by its means endeavouring to avoid all reference to the Author of nature, shutting, so far as their mental perceptions are concerned, God out of his own universe, it would lead them to perceive God everywhere, in every thing; and in the minutest arrangements that contribute to form the beauty and the order of an insect's wing, or the petals of a flower, equally as in the harmonious movements of suns and systems, they would read the proofs of his unerring wisdom, his all-present and all-ruling power, his all-preserving goodness, and his all-embracing love."

LAWYERS. These functionaries, so often mentioned in the New Testament, were men who devoted themselves to the study and explanation of the law, particularly of the traditionary or oral law. They belonged to the sect of the Pharisees, and fell under the reproof of our Saviour for having taken from the people the key of knowledge. They were as the blind leading the blind. Dr. Macknight alleges that the scribes were the public expounders of the law, and that the lawyers studied it in private; or, as Dr. Lardner supposes, taught it in the schools.

LAZARUS, the brother of Martha and Mary, with whom he resided at the village of Bethany, near Jerusalem. Jesus seems to have been accustomed frequently to retire into the bosom of this happy and devout family, after spending the day at Jerusalem. Little is known of the life of Lazarus; but there is one remarkable event of his history which is fully recorded in John xi.—his resurrection from the grave at the command of Jesus. This naturally excited a great sensation in Jerusalem, and many flocked to see a man on whom such a striking miracle had been wrought. Lazarus was also the name of a beggar who is introduced by our blessed Lord into one of his beautiful parables, well known by the name of the rich man and Lazarus. Luke xvi. 19–23. Lazarus is supposed by many to be in this parable a feigned name, the same as Eleazar, signifying help in God, or one who has God only for his help. Doddridge agrees with the interpretation of Capellus, a helpless person. But, in fact, they amount to the same thing, for God is the only helper of a helpless person. Lightfoot thinks that something more is hinted at; and that Abraham, and Eliezer, his servant, may probably be referred to, Eliezer having been born at Damascus, a Gentile by birth, and for some time the presumptive heir of Abraham, but shut out of the inheritance by the birth of Isaac, yet restored here into Abraham's bosom. This may hint the calling of the Gentiles into the faith of Abraham.

LEAD, is a very heavy metal, sufficiently well known. The mode of purifying it from the dross which is mixed with it, by subjecting it to a fierce flame, and melting off its scoria or dross, furnishes several allusions in Scripture to God's punishing or purifying his people. The prophet Ezekiel (xxii. 18–20) compares the Jews to lead, because of their guilt and dross, from which they must be purged as by fire. Mention is made of a talent of lead in Zech. v. 7, 8, which probably was of a figure and size as well known as any of our weights in ordinary use; so that though weights are usually called in Hebrew stones, yet perhaps they had some of metal only; as this talent of lead, for instance. Lead was one of the substances used for writing upon by the ancients. (See Book.) Hence the exclamation in Job xix. 23, 24: "Oh that my words were now written! oh that they were printed in a book! that they were graven with an iron pen and lead in the rock for ever!" The word lead must here refer to the materials on which the writing was made; for lead is of too soft a substance to be used in the nature of a stylus or pen. The oldest writings were on stones, and lead must have come into use at a later period.

LEAF, LEAVES, those expansions which issue laterally from the stems and branches of plants. They take their origin from the bark, and are always to be observed either in a rudimentary or perfect state, immediately below the leaf-buds. Leaves are the organs of perspiration and inhalation in plants; Linnæus denominates leaves the organs of motion, or muscles of the plants. They form the subject of frequent allusions in the Sacred Writings. Thus as an emblem of fragility: "Wilt thou break a leaf driven to and fro? and wilt thou pursue the dry stubble?" Job xiii. 25. "But we are all as an unclean thing, and all our righteousnesses are as filthy rags; and we all do fade as a leaf; and our iniquities, like the wind, have taken us away." Isa. lxiv. 6. Leaves are an emblem of prosperity: "For he shall be as a tree planted by the waters, and that spreadeth out her roots by the river, and shall not see when heat cometh, but her leaf shall be green; and shall not be careful in the year of drought, neither shall cease from yielding fruit." Jer. xvii. 8. In describing the outward form of religion, without the spirit, we find it said: "And when he saw a fig tree in the way, he came to it, and found nothing thereon, but leaves only, and said unto it, Let no fruit grow on thee henceforward for ever, and presently the fig tree withered away." Matt. xxi. 19.

LEAGUE AND COVENANT, SOLEMN. See COVENANT.

LEAGUE, SMALCALDIC, a solemn alliance first formed at Smalcald, in 1530, and afterwards at Frankfort, by the Elector of Saxony, and those princes who were confederate with him, with a view to defend, with the utmost vigour, their religion and liberties against the dangers and encroachments with which they were menaced by the edict which had just been framed at the diet of Augsburg. Into this confederacy they invited the kings of England, France, and Denmark, with several other states and republics, and left no means unemployed that might tend to corroborate and cement it.

LEAH, the eldest daughter of Laban, whom he substituted for Rachel, his younger daughter, and thus deceived Jacob. Mr. Roberts says, of the marriage customs in India, that "when the eldest daughter is deformed or blind, or deaf or dumb, then the younger may be given first; but under other circumstances, it would be disgraceful in the extreme. Should any one wish to alter the order of things, the answer of Laban is given. Should a father, however, have a very advantageous offer for a younger daughter, he will exert all his power to get off the elder; but until this can be accomplished, the younger will not be married. Younger brothers are sometimes married first; but even this takes place very seldom." The same usage still exists in many parts of the East.

LEAN. Men lean to their own understanding, when, without serious consulting of God, they trust to their own wisdom and prudence to direct their management. Prov. iii. 5. Saints lean upon Christ when, trusting in his word, they cleave to his person, depend on his righteousness and strength, and delight themselves in his love. Cant. viii. 5. Hypocrites lean on the Lord when they profess a strong attachment to his truth, ordinances, and ways, and expect that he will show them singular favours and deliverances. Mic. iii. 11.

LEARN. (1.) To get the knowledge of things by hearing or observing. 1 Cor. xiv. 31; Ps. cxix. 71. (2.) To imitate, to follow as a pattern. Ps. evi. 35; Matt. xi. 29. (3.) To take heed. 1 Tim. i. 20. (4.) To know the sentiments of others. Gal. iii. 2. Christ learned obedience by the things which he suffered; by his sufferings he experimentally felt what it was to obey the divine law; and he improved them all to excite his holy manhood to fulfil the obedience required of him. Heb. v. 8. Some are ever learning, and yet never come to the knowledge of the truth; have long the means of instruction, and profess to use them, and yet never have any solid knowledge of divine things. 2 Tim. iii. 7.

LEARNING, skill in any science, or that improvement of the mind which we gain by study, instruction, observation, &c. An attentive examination of ecclesiastical history will lead us to see how greatly learning is indebted to Christianity, and that Christianity, in its turn, has been much served by learning. "All the useful learning," says Dr. Jortin, "which is now to be found in the world, is in a great measure owing to the Gospel. The Christians, who had a great veneration for the Old Testament, have contributed more than the Jews themselves to secure and explain those books. The Christians, in ancient times, collected and preserved the Greek versions of the Scriptures, particularly the Septuagint, and translated the originals into Latin. To Christians were due the old Hexapla; and in later times Christians have published the Polyglots and the Samaritan Pentateuch. It was the study of the Holy Scriptures which excited Christians from early times to study chronology, sacred and secular; and here much knowledge of history, and some skill in astronomy, were needful. The New Testament, being written in Greek, caused Christians to apply themselves also to the study of that language. As the Christians were opposed by the Pagans and the Jews, they were excited to the study of Pagan and Jewish literature, in order to expose the absurdities of the Jewish traditions, the weakness of Paganism, and the imperfections and insufficiency of philosophy. The first fathers, till the third century, were generally Greek writers. In the third century the Latin language was much upon the decline, but the Christians preserved it from sinking into absolute barbarism. Monks, indeed, produced many sad effects; but Providence here also brought good out of evil; for the monks were employed in the transcribing of books, and many valuable authors would have perished if it had not been for the monasteries. In the ninth century, the Saracens were very studious, and contributed much to the restoration of letters. But whatever was good in the Mohammedan religion, it is in no small measure indebted to Christianity for it, since Mohammedanism is made up for the most part of Judaism and Christianity. If Christianity had been suppressed at its first appearance, it is extremely probable that the Latin and Greek tongues would have been lost in the revolutions of empires, and the irruptions of barbarians in the East and in the West; for the old inhabitants would have had no conscientious and religious motives to keep up their language; and then, together with the Latin and Greek tongues, the knowledge of antiquities and the ancient writers would have been destroyed. To whom, then, are we indebted for the knowledge of antiquity, for every thing that is called philosophy, or the literæ humaniores?—To Christians. To whom for grammars and dictionaries of the learned languages?—To Christians. To whom for chronology, and the continuation of history through many centuries?—To Christians. To whom for rational systems of morality, and improvements in natural philosophy, and for the application of these discoveries to religious purposes?—To Christians. To whom for metaphysical researches carried as far as the subject will permit?—To Christians. To whom for the moral rules to be observed by nations in war and peace?—To Christians. To whom for jurisprudence, and for political knowledge, and for settling the rights of subjects, both civil and religious, upon a proper foundation?—To Christians. To whom for the Reformation?—To Christians.

“As religion hath been the chief preserver of erudition, so erudition hath not been ungrateful to her patroness, but hath contributed largely to the support of religion. The useful expositions of the Scriptures, the sober and sensible defences of revelation, the faithful representations of pure and undefiled Christianity—these have been the works of learned, judicious, and industrious men. Nothing, however, is more common than to hear the ignorant decry all human learning as entirely useless in religion; and, what is still more remarkable, even some, who call themselves preachers, entertain the same sentiments. But to such we can only say what a judicious preacher observed upon a public occasion, that if all men had been as unlearned as themselves, they never would have had a text on which to have displayed their ignorance.”

LEAST. The wilful breaker of the least of God's commandments shall be called least in the kingdom of heaven; that is, shall be of little use or esteem in the visible Church; and without repentance, shall never be admitted into the kingdom of glory. Matt. v. 19.

LEATHER, the skins of beasts prepared for manufacture. The Hebrews seem to have been early acquainted with the processes of tanning and working in leather. We find a girdle of leather mentioned in 2 Kings i. 8, and also in Matt. iii. 4. The girdle of John the Baptist was probably of untanned leather, like that of the modern dervishes, and thus displayed the little value which he set on personal decorations, the girdle being a part of dress on which the Orientals lavish much expense and useless ornament. See GIRDLE.

LEAVE. God may leave his people so as to withdraw his sensible presence and comfort for a time; but never leaves them nor forsakes them so as to break his covenant relation to them, as their God, Saviour, and Portion, or so as to withhold what continued supplies of gracious influence are necessary to maintain the existence of their new nature. Ps. cxli. 8; Heb. xiii. 5. Dying parents leave their fatherless children with God, when, by the effectual fervent prayer of faith, they commit them to his care, and trust in his promise that he will preserve, direct, and provide for them. Jer. xlix. 11.

LEAVEN, a piece of sour dough, used to ferment and render light a much larger quantity of dough or paste. It is well known for its rapidly diffusive power. Matt. xiii. 33, xvi. 11; 1 Cor. v. 6. It was forbidden to the Hebrews, during the seven days of the passover, in memory of what their ancestors did, when they went out of Egypt; they being then obliged to carry unleavened meal with them, and to make bread in haste, the Egyptians pressing them to be gone. Exod. xii. 15, 19; Lev. ii. 11. They were hence very careful in cleansing their houses from it before this feast began. God forbade either leaven or honey to be offered to him in his temple; that is, in cakes, or in any baked meats. But on other occasions, they might offer leavened bread or honey. See Numb. xv. 20, 21, where God requires them to give the first-fruits of the bread, which was kneaded in all the cities of Israel, to the priests and Levites. Paul (1 Cor. v. 7, 8) expresses his desire that Christians should celebrate their pass-over with unleavened bread; which figuratively signifies sincerity and truth.

LEBANON, a portion of the vast range of mountains running southward through Syria and Palestine. The range which bears the name of Lebanon is divided into two chains, of which the western was anciently called Libanus, and the eastern Anti-Libanus. This mountain has been distinguished in all ages for its cedars, which furnished the wood for Solomon's temple. Referring to these when Sennacherib would speak of his power, he says: “By thy servants hast thou reproached the Lord, and hast said, By the multitude of my chariots am I come up to the height of the mountains, to the sides of Lebanon; and I will cut down the tall cedars thereof, and the choice fir trees thereof: and I will enter into the height of his border, and the forest of his Carmel.” Isa. xxxvii. 24. Dr E. D. Clarke, in the month of July, saw some of the eastern summits of Lebanon, with that perfectly white, smooth, and velvet-like appearance which snow only exhibits when it is very deep—a striking spectacle in such a climate, where the beholder, seeking protection from a burning sun, almost considers the firmament to be on fire. At the time this observation was made, the thermometer, in an elevated situation near the Sea of Tiberias, stood at one hundred and two degrees in the shade. Sir Frederic Henniker passed over snow in July; and Ali Bey describes the same eastern ridge as covered with snow in September.

The following accurate and comprehensive description of the appearance of Lebanon is given by Mr. Wylie, in his “Modern Judea:” “Around its bottom is a girdle of terraced hills. Higher up is a zone of oak and cedar. Next comes a belt of green pastures and flowery herbs. Above all, are seen the barren, craggy, and snow-covered heights of the upper Lebanon. This is the general arrangement; but we are not to understand that it is followed in all parts of the mountain. In some places Lebanon is barren from its bottom to its summit. The ascent is difficult; but the view from the top amply rewards the traveller for all the fatigue and danger he has encountered. On the south, he beholds the land of promise spread out at his feet. On the west, the blue and level surface of the Mediterranean presents to the eye an almost boundless horizon. On the east, the view stretches across the valley of Baalbec to the chain of Anti-Libanus, the lofty summits of which prevent the eye from resting on the domes and gardens of Damascus. Immediately below him on the west, the spectator can command the whole line of coast adjoining Lebanon—its noble bays, formed by the bold projections of the mountain-ridges; and, if not obscured by clouds and tempests, which sometimes gather at his feet, he can contemplate the numerous glens and ravines formed by the lateral branches of the mountain, lying far beneath him in tranquil and secluded beauty, clothed with the olive and the fig tree, and watered by numerous cascades, which, falling from the rocks, unite and form a torrent in the bottom, filling the vale, as it flows through it, with its agreeable murmur." To this we may add the description of Messrs. Bonar and M'Cheyne, in their Travels in Palestine: "It is a noble range of mountains, well worthy of the fame it has so long maintained. It is cultivated in a wonderful manner by the help of terraces, and is still very fertile. We saw, on some of its eminences, more than two thousand feet high, villages and luxuriant vegetation; and on some of its peaks, six thousand feet high, we could discern tall pines against the clear sky beyond. At first the clouds were resting on the lofty summit of the range; but they cleared away, and we saw Sannin, which is generally regarded as the highest peak of Lebanon. There is a deep ravine that seems to run up the whole way, and Sannin rises at its highest extremity to the height of ten thousand feet. The rays of the setting sun gave a splendid tint to the lofty brow of the mountain; and we did not wonder how the Church of old saw in its features of calm and immovable majesty an emblem of the great Redeemer: 'His countenance is as Lebanon.' The snow was gleaming in many of its highest crevices, reminding us of the prophet's question, 'Will a man leave the snow of Lebanon?' In coming through the bazaar we had seen large masses of it exposed for sale. The merchants slice it off the lump, and sell it to customers, for cooling wine and other liquors; and it is often mixed with a sweet syrup, and drunk in passing as a refreshing beverage. Not far from Sannin the ancient cedars are found—a memorial of the glory of Lebanon. Cedars of smaller size are found also in other parts of the mountain. There are nearly two hundred thousand inhabitants in the villages of Lebanon—a population exceeding that of all the rest of Palestine. This may give us an idea of the former 'glory of Lebanon,' and may explain the ardent wish of Moses: 'I pray thee, let me go over and see the good land that is beyond Jordan, that goodly mountain, even Lebanon.'" Mr Elliot thus describes the general appearance of the mountain:—"Our route lay directly across Mount Lebanon, the chief part of which is nearly barren. Almost the only tree which it nourishes is the fir, and consequently the view is not of a character to interest a lover of scenery. From the sea and the plains the range forms a noble object for the eye to rest on; but when once the ascent is begun, few of the component elements of a beautiful prospect are discernible. Deep ravines, indeed, and rugged bristling precipices meet one at every turn, and render travelling both painful and hazardous; but there are neither glaciers nor waterfalls, neither lakes nor rivers, no verdant fields nor smiling valleys, no extensive forests, no floral richness, and no rural villages; even the cedars, once 'the glory of Lebanon' (Isa. lx. 13), have deserted it, and are replaced by the umbrella-topped fir. In one spot only, called Bisharri, nearly opposite Tripoli, eight gigantic cedars, and a few of inferior size, attest the splendour of their bygone race. The large trees measure about thirty-six feet round the trunk, and more than one hundred feet between the extreme points of the opposite branches; while at the base, or a little above, they send out five limbs, each measuring twelve or fifteen feet in circumference. At another spot, west of Bisharri, little known and seldom visited, this same interesting tree is found in much greater numbers, but of inferior growth. The mountaineers cut down the cedars for their charcoal and tar, which latter article is used medicinally to heal the wounds and diseases of the camel and the other animals."

LEBBÆUS, otherwise Judas or Thaddæus, brother of James the Less, son of Mary, sister of the Virgin, and of Cleophas, and brother of Joseph. He was married, and had children. Nicephorus calls his own wife Mary. The Muscovites believe that they received the faith from him.

LEBONAH. This place, which is referred to in Judg. xxi. 19, Maundrell supposes to correspond either to the modern Klian Leben, situated on the eastern side of a delicious vale, four leagues south from Shechem and two leagues north from Bethel, or to the village of Leban, which is on the opposite side. It is eight hours or about twenty-four miles from Jerusalem, according to Dr. Richardson. The valley of Lebonah is long, not less than eight miles, running off to the north. "It is bounded on the right and left by stony mountains. The path is shaded in many places by large olive trees; and the streams of pure water which are perpetually met with, often tempt the traveller to dismount. The region, though lovely compared with that through which we have passed, scarcely merits the character of a cultivated country. Still, here and there, on the sides of the mountains, are seen efforts at cultivation truly marvellous; and the result affords proofs altogether surprising of what may be accomplished by industry, when aided by an excellent climate and a soil naturally prolific. The aspect of the country greatly improves as we approach Shechem. 'The limestone rocks and stony valleys of Judea,' says Clarke, 'were entirely covered with plantations of figs, vines, and olive trees.' The near neighbourhood of the waste and cultivated grounds, of the naked mountain and the terraced hill, covered with all the luxuriance of Eastern vegetation, forms a singular picture of care and neglect, of mingled sterility and richness, which is often met with in this country, and nowhere more frequently than in this valley. Following the vale of Lebonah for about three hours, it expands into a magnificent plain, waving with corn. This is allowed on all hands to be the 'parcel of ground' which Jacob bought 'of the hands of the children of Hamor,' and which he 'gave to his son Joseph.' A stream, which flows from the city of Shechem, waters the plain, making it 'so exceeding verdant and fruitful,' says Maundrell, 'that it may be looked upon as a standing token of the tender affection of that good patriarch to the best of sons.'"

LEDGES. This word, which occurs in 1 Kings vii. 28, 29, denotes the border which covered the joinings of the sides of the vases of brass placed by Solomon in the temple. According to Josephus, they were so broad as to contain graven work.

LEECH. See HORSE-LEECH.

LEEK (chetsir), in Numb. xi. 5, translated "leek;" in 1 Kings xviii. 5; 2 Kings xix. 26; Job xl. 15; Ps xxxvii. 2, xc. 5, ciii. 15, civ. 14, cxxix. 6, cxlvii. 8; Isa. xxxv. 7, xxxvii. 27, xl. 6, it is rendered "grass;" in Job viii. 12, "herb;" in Prov. xxvii. 25; Isa. xv. 6 "hay;" and in Isa. xxxiv. 13, "a court."

The leek is much of the same nature with the onion. The kind called karrat by the Arabians, the allium porrum of Linnaeus, Hasselquist says, must certainly have been one of those desired by the children of Israel, as it has been cultivated and esteemed from the earliest times to the present in Egypt. The inhabitants are very fond of eating it raw, as sauce for their roasted meat; and the poor people eat it raw with their bread, especially for breakfast.

There is reason, however, to doubt whether this plant is intended in Numb. xi. 5, and so differently rendered everywhere else: it should rather intend such vegetables as grow promiscuously with grass. Ludolphus supposes that it may mean lettuce and salads in general; and Maillet observes that the sueory and endive are eaten with great relish by the people in Egypt. Bishop Lowth thinks it is the lotus, a sort of water lily, peculiar to Egypt, which forms one of the most common aliments of the Egyptians now, as we learn from history it did in ancient times. (See LILY.) The root of this plant is round, of the size of an apple, of an agreeable flavour and refreshing quality, especially in the heat of summer. Some or all of these may be meant.

LEES (dregs). To drink up the cup of God's wrath, "even to the lees," is to drink the whole up to the bottom. Ps. lxxv. 8; Isa. li. 17; Ezek. xxiii. 34. "The lees of the people," signifies the vilest part of them. God threatens, by Zephaniah, to visit those who are settled on their lees; that is, hardened in their sins. Zeph. i. 12.

LEGAL or MOSAIC DISPENSATION. See DISPENSATION.

LEGALIST, strictly speaking, is one who acts according to, or consistent with, the law; but in general the term is made use of to denote one who expects salvation by his own works. See LAW.

LEGATE, a cardinal or bishop whom the pope sends as his ambassador to sovereign princes.

LEGION. The Roman legions were composed each of ten cohorts, a cohort of fifty maniples, and a manipule of fifteen men; consequently, a full legion contained six thousand soldiers. Matt. xxvi. 53. The legion, however, varied in numbers at different times.

LEGS. Hebrew warriors were accustomed, as in the case of Goliath, to wear greaves of brass, for the purpose of defending their legs and feet in battle. In the account of our Lord's crucifixion, as given by John (xix. 31), it is said: "The Jews therefore, because it was the preparation, that the bodies should not remain upon the cross on the Sabbath-day, (for that Sabbath-day was an high day,) besought Pilate that their legs might be broken, and that they might be taken away." This breaking of the legs was probably done for the purpose of accelerating death. Some, however, as Grotius, Michælis, Mosehius, and Kuinoel, suppose that the design was to fill up the measure of their torments. The breaking of the legs would cause severe agony both in the fractured legs themselves and in the rest of the body; since its whole weight, which before was partly supported by the legs, would now solely hang by the hands. The legs, it is said, were broken at the in-step with an iron mallet. This barbarous custom also was practised by the Romans, to hasten death.

LEMUEL. It is generally supposed that this name, which occurs in Prov. xxxi. 1, is a designation of Solomon; and that the admonitions addressed to him were written by his mother Bathsheba.

LEND. The practice was common among the Israelites, in the time of Moses, of lending on pledge, and regulations are laid down in the Mosaic law on the subject. This practice prevails to a great extent still in the East.

LENT, a term used to denote, in ecclesiastical language, a time of fasting in the Church, observed as a period of humiliation before Easter. The Romish Church, and some of the Protestant communions, maintain, that it was always a fast of forty days, and, as such, of apostolical institution. Others think that it was of ecclesiastical institution, and that it was variously observed in different Churches, and grew by degrees from a fast of forty hours to a fast of forty days. This is the sentiment of Morton, Bishop Taylor, Du Moulin, Daille, and others.

Anciently, the manner of observing Lent among those who were piously disposed, was to abstain from food till evening: their only refreshment was a supper; and it was indifferent whether it was flesh or any other food, provided it was used with sobriety and moderation. Lent was thought the proper time for exercising more abundantly every species of charity: thus what they spared of their own bodies, by abridging them of a meal, was usually given to the poor: they employed their vacant hours in visiting the sick and those that were in prison; in entertaining strangers, and reconciling differences. The imperial laws forbade all prosecution of men in criminal actions, that might bring them to corporal punishment and torture during the whole season. This was a time of more than ordinary strictness and devotion; and, therefore, in many of the great churches they had religious assemblies for prayer and preaching every day. All public games and stage plays were prohibited at this season, and also the celebration of all festivals, birth-days, and marriages.

The Christians of the Greek Church observe four Lents. The first commences on the 15th of November; the second is the same with the English Lent; the third begins the week after Whitsuntide, and continues till the festival of St. Peter and St. Paul; and the fourth commences on the 1st of August, and lasts no longer than till the 15th. These Lents are observed with great strictness and austerity, but on Saturdays and Sundays they indulge themselves in drinking wine and using oil, which are prohibited on other days.

LENTIL (odeshim; Gen. xxv. 34; 2 Sam. xvii. 28, xxiii. 11; Ezek. iv. 9), a sort of pulse; in the Septuagint phakos, and Vulgate lens. The lentils of Egypt were very much esteemed among the ancients. St. Austin says they grow abundantly in Egypt, are much used as food there, and those of Alexandria are considered particularly valuable. Dr. Shaw says, beans, lentils, kidney-beans, and garvaneos are the chief of their pulse kind. Beans, when boiled, and stewed with oil and garlic, are the principal food of persons of all distinctions. Lentils are dressed in the same manner as beans, dissolving easily into a mass, and making a pottage of a chocolate colour. This, we find, was the "red pottage" which Esau, thence called Edom, exchanged for his birthright. It is highly probable that the ancient "lentil" is the Ervum lens of Linnaeus, named by the English the flat-seeded tare or lentile.

LEOPARD (nimr—Cant. iv. 8; Isa. xi. 6; Jer. v. 6, xiii. 23; Hosea xiii. 7; Hab. i. 8; Dan. vii. 6;—pardalis, Rev. xiii. 2). There can be no doubt that the pard or leopard is the animal mentioned. Bochart shows that the name is similar in the Chaldee, Syriac, Arabic, and Ethiopic. The Septuagint uniformly render it by pardalis, and Jerome, pardus. The leopard is a fierce animal, spotted with a diversity of colours; it has small white eyes, wide jaws, sharp teeth, round ears, a large tail; five claws on his fore feet, and four on those behind. It is said to be extremely cruel to man. Its name, leo-pard, implies that it has something of the lion and of the panther in its nature. Probably these animals were numerous in Palestine; as we find places with a name intimating their having been the haunts of leopards: Nimrah (Numb. xxxii. 3); Beth-nimrah (Numb. xxxii. 36; Josh. xiii. 27); "waters of Nimrim" (Isa. xv. 6; Jer. xlviii. 34); and "mountains of leopards" (Cant. iv. 8.) Brocard says that the mountain called by the name of Leopards is two leagues from Tripoli northwards, and one league from Libanus. Nimrod might have his name from this animal.

LEPER. See LEPROSY.

LEPROSY, a disease of the skin, appearing in dry white scales over either a part or the whole of the body. It was a very dreadful and loathsome disease; and although a distemper is mentioned by travellers in Eastern countries as still bearing the name of leprosy, yet from the peculiar prominence given to this disease in the Old Testament, two long chapters, the 13th and 14th of Leviticus, being wholly devoted to a minute description of its symptoms and treatment, we are inclined to think that it was supernatural in its origin, or, in other words, that it was a direct infliction of the Almighty. In various instances mentioned in the sacred writings we know this to have been the case. Thus, in the case of Miriam, when she joined Aaron in speaking against Moses, it is said: "And the cloud departed from off the tabernacle; and, behold, Miriam became leprous, white as snow: and Aaron looked upon Miriam, and, behold, she was leprous. And Aaron said unto Moses, Alas! my lord, I beseech thee, lay not the sin upon us, wherein we have done foolishly, and whercin we have sinned. Let her not be as one dead, of whom the flesh is half consumed when he cometh out of his mother's womb." Numb. xii. 10-12. And of Gehazi, the servant of Elisha, we are told: "The leprosy therefore of Naaman shall cleave unto thee, and to thy seed for ever. And he went out from his presence a leper as white as snow." 2 Kings v. 27. King Uzziah also is declared to have been a leper until the day of his death: "Then Uzziah was wroth, and had a censer in his hand to burn incense: and, while he was wroth with the priests, the leprosy even rose up in his forehead before the priests in the house of the Lord, from beside the incense altar. And Azariah the chief priest, and all the priests, looked upon him, and, behold, he was leprous in his forehead, and they thrust him out from thence; yea, himself hasted also to go out, because the Lord had smitten him." 2 Chron. xxvi. 19, 20. But, independently of these instances, in which leprosy is distinctly to be viewed as a Divine judgment, there was something in the disease itself which marked it out as different from all other diseases in the world, for it not only attacked the bodies of men, but their garments and their houses, nay, it affected the very stones of buildings, fretting and consuming them.

From all these considerations we are led to the conclusion that the disease of leprosy came directly from the hand of God; and, further, it is impossible to read the minute account given of this loathsome distemper in the Book of Leviticus without being impressed with the idea that it was an eminent and significant type of the spiritual defilement of sin, and the mode of legal purification from this defilement. We are accustomed to recognise a whole series of types representing the scheme of salvation, but we are in danger of forgetting that which was ever present to the mind of a Jew by means of the prevalence of leprosy—the guilt, and loathsomeness, and pollution of sin. For let a Jew read the striking language of Isaiah, in describing the sinful state of the Jews, and the leper would seem to stand before him, "For the whole head is sick, and the whole heart faint."

LESHEM, mentioned in Joshua xix. 47. It lay at the foot of Mount Lebanon, and near the sources of the river Jordan.

LETTERS. Marks used in writing for the purpose of expressing sounds. It has been a matter of much dispute by whom they were invented, if they were of human origin. It has been argued by many learned men, however, that they are of divine origin. The arguments which are brought in support of the divine revelation of the alphabet are chiefly these: 1st, The high antiquity of the use of letters—the Hebrew characters having existed in a perfect state when Moses composed the Pentateuch, the most ancient writing now known to be extant; 2d, The similarity between the various alphabets of different nations, which, for the most part, are the same, in the order, power, and even form, of their letters, with the Hebrew; 3d, The complete want of alphabetic characters among those nations which have been cut off from all communication with the ancient civilized world—as the aboriginal Americans; or that part of the human race which had no opportunity of borrowing the system of written characters revealed to the Hebrews—as China. See WRITING—Books.

LETTER, THE. Paul places the letter in opposition to the spirit—a way of speaking very common in the Scripture. Rom. ii. 27, 29, vii. 6; 2 Cor. iii. 6, 7. "God hath made us ministers of the new testament; not of the letter, but of the spirit; for the letter killeth, but the spirit quickeneth;" that is, the law of Moses is incapable of giving life to the soul, and justifying before God those who are most servilely addicted to the literal observance of it. These things can be effected only by means of the gospel of Christ, and of that Spirit of truth and holiness which attends it, and makes it effectual to the salvation of the soul.

LEVI, the third son of Jacob and Leah, was born in Mesopotamia, A.M. 2248. Gen. xxix. 34, xxxiv. 25-31, xlv. 11, xlix. 5-7. Levi was, according to his father's prediction, scattered over all Israel, having no share in the division of Canaan, but certain cities in the portions of other tribes. He was not the worse provided for, however, since God chose the tribe for the service of the temple and priesthood, and bestowed on it many privileges above the other tribes, in dignity, and in the advantages of life. (See LEVITES.) Levi was the name of one of the twelve apostles, also called Matthew. See MATTHEW.

LEVIATHAN. Job iii. 8, xli. 1; Ps. lxxiv. 14, civ. 26; Isa. xxvii. 1. The old commentators concurred in regarding the whale as the animal here intended. Beza and Diodati were among the first to interpret it the crocodile; and Bochart has since supported this last rendering with a train of argument which has nearly overwhelmed all opposition, and brought almost every commentator over to his opinion. It is very certain that it could not be the whale, which does not inhabit the Mediterranean, much less the rivers that empty themselves into it; nor will the characteristics at all apply to the whale. "The crocodile, on the contrary," says Dr. Mason Good, "is a natural inhabitant of the Nile, and other Asiatic and African rivers; of enormous voracity and strength, as well as fleetness in swimming; attacks mankind and the largest animals with most daring impetuosity; when taken by means of a powerful net, will often overturn the boats that surround it; has, proportionally, the largest mouth of all monsters whatever; moves both its jaws equally, the upper of which has not less than forty, and the lower than thirty-eight sharp, but strong and massive, teeth; and is furnished with a coat of mail, so scaly and callous as to resist the force of a musket-ball in every part, except under the belly. Indeed, to this animal the general character of the leviathan seems so well to apply, that it is unnecessary to seek farther."

LEVIRATE, a Hebrew law, in obedience to which, when a man died without issue, his brother was obliged to marry his widow, with the view of raising up a first-born son to succeed to the inheritance. The term is derived from the word Levir, which, though not of classical authority, is found in the Vulgate and the Pandects, and is explained by Festus to signify a husband's brother. When there was no brother alive, or when he declined the duty, the Levirate law, as we see from the Book of Ruth, extended to the next nearest relative of the deceased husband; as, for instance, even to his paternal uncle or nephew; so that, at last, pretty remote kinsmen, in default of nearer ones, might be obliged to undertake it. Among the Jews of the present day Levirate marriages have entirely ceased; so much so that, in the marriage contracts of the very poorest people among them, it is generally stipulated that the bridegroom's brother shall abandon all those rights to the bride to which he could lay claim by Deut. xxv. 5-10.

LEVITES, the descendants of Levi in general, but more especially those who were selected for the services of religion, instead of the first-born of the Hebrews. Those of the family of Kohath were priests, being descended from Aaron, and they alone were permitted to enter the Holy of Holies once a-year, on the great day of atonement. The High Priest occupied the highest place, and was regarded as the head of the priests and the Levites. The common Levites were in a manner the servants of the priests, performing the most menial offices, supplying them with wood and water, and other things necessary for the sacrifices. They acted as musicians in the temple-service; they studied the law, and officiated as ordinary judges. By the laws of Moses, a Levite was not allowed to engage in the service of the temple before he had reached his twenty-fifth year. "This is it that belongeth unto the Levites: from twenty and five years old and upward they shall go in to wait upon the service of the tabernacle of the congregation: and from the age of fifty years they shall cease waiting upon the service thereof, and shall serve no more: but shall minister with their brethren in the tabernacle of the congregation, to keep the charge, and shall do no service.

Thus shalt thou do unto the Levites touching their charge." Numb. viii. 24-26. David, however, permitted them to enter upon office at twenty years of age. They performed the temple-service weekly in rotation. For the support of the Levites, they were commanded to receive tithes of corn, and fruit, and cattle; but out of their tithes they paid a tenth to the priests. They were not allowed to possess any inheritance in the land, but forty-eight cities, with fields and gardens, were allotted to them. Numb. xxxv. Of these cities, the priests received thirteen, of which six were set apart as cities of refuge. When engaged in the ministrations of the temple, the Levites were supported by the daily offerings. The mode in which a Levite was consecrated to his office is thus described: "And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying, Take the Levites from among the children of Israel, and cleanse them. And thus shalt thou do unto them, to cleanse them: Sprinkle water of purifying upon them, and let them shave all their flesh, and let them wash their clothes, and so make themselves clean." Numb. viii. 5-7. They were not required to wear any particular dress. They were not only employed in the internal service of the tabernacle, but they also kept guard round about it. In the journeyings of the Israelites through the wilderness, the business of the Levites was to carry the various parts of the tabernacle and the sacred vessels. In after times their duties became less arduous. In the time of David, when the Levites numbered thirty-eight thousand, they were divided into four classes; thus, twenty-four thousand were assigned as assistants to the priests, four thousand were employed as porters, four thousand were musicians, and six thousand judges and genealogists. Such was the division of the Levites.

LEVITICUS, the third book of the Pentateuch, deriving its name from containing chiefly the regulations laid down in reference to the Levites, to sacred persons and things. See PENTATEUCH.

LEVY. See ARMY.

LIBATION, the act of pouring wine on the ground in divine worship. Sometimes other liquids have been used, as oil, milk, water, honey, but mostly wine. Amongst the Greeks and Romans it was an essential part of solemn sacrifices. Libations were also in use among the Hebrews, who poured a hin of wine on the victim after it was killed, and the several pieces of the sacrifice were laid on the altar ready to be consumed in the flames.

LIBERTINE, one who acts without restraint, and pays no regard to the precepts of religion. See LIBERTINES.

LIBERTINES. This word occurs in Acts vi. 9, but what precise meaning is to be attached to it, commentators are by no means agreed. The most probable opinion, and that which has been adopted by most commentators from the time of Chrysostom, is, that they were Jews whom the Romans had taken in war and conveyed to Rome, but afterwards freed; at whose expense this synagogue had been built, which might have been properly called the synagogue of the Romans. Libertines seems, therefore, to be a name of Roman origin, and to be explained by Roman customs. There appears to have been many Libertines of the Jewish religion at Rome. Others understand by the word, Jews who were inhabitants and citizens of Libertus, either a town or a district in the province in Africa about Carthage. That a city called Libertina did exist in that province is certain; and that it became the seat of a flourishing Christian Church.

LIBERTY, denotes a state of freedom, in contradistinction to slavery or restraint. 1. Liberty of conscience is freedom from restraint in our choice and judgment about matters of religion. 2. Internal liberty, or liberty of choice, is that in which our volitions are not determined by any foreign cause or consideration whatever offered to them, but by our own understanding or pleasure. 3. External liberty, or liberty of action, is opposed to a constraint laid on the executive powers; and consists in a power of rendering our volitions effectual. 4. Philosophical or moral liberty consists in a prevailing disposition to act according to the dictates of reason; that is, in such a manner as shall, all things considered, most effectually promote our happiness. 5. Spiritual liberty consists in freedom from the curse of the moral law; from the servitude of the Jewish ritual; from the love, power, and guilt of sin; from the dominion of Satan; from the corruptions of the world; from the fear of death, and the wrath to come. Rom. vi. 14, viii. 1; Gal. iii. 13; John viii. 36; Rom. viii. 21; Gal. v.; 1 Thess. i. 10. See MATERIALISTS—NECESSITY—WILL—PREDESTINATION.

LIBNAH, a Levitical city in the tribe of Judah, situated about twelve miles south-west of Jerusalem. It revolted from Jehoram on account of his murders and idolatry; and afterwards, in the days of Hezekiah, sustained a long siege from the army of Sennacherib. Although it succeeded in defying the attempts of the haughty Assyrian, and maintaining its independence, it seems never to have recovered its former prosperity. No traces of it are now to be seen.

LIBYA. This name, in its largest sense, was used by the Greeks to denote the whole of Africa. But Libya proper, or the Libya of the New Testament, the country of the Lubims of the Old, was a large country lying along the Mediterranean, on the west of Egypt. The Romans divided the country into Inner and Outer Libya; but the Libya of which Luke speaks in Acts ii. 10 is called by Pliny Regio Pentapolitana, and had Cyrene as its capital city. The original inhabitants of Libya are supposed to have been the Lehabim or Lubim, wandering tribes who were sometimes in alliance with Egypt, and at other times with the Ethiopians of Arabia. Since the conquest of the country by the Carthaginians, Libya has often changed masters, having passed successively into the hands of the Greeks, Romans, Saracens, and Turks. The capital city Cyrene seems to have been originally built by a Grecian colony, and in the time of Luke its inhabitants must have consisted in a great part of Jews; for in speaking of those who came up to Jerusalem to the feast of Pentecost he mentions "dwellers in the parts of Libya about Cyrene."

LICE. Swarms of lice was the third plague with which God punished the Egyptians. Exod. viii. 16. The Hebrew word kanim some translate "flies," and think them the same as gnats. The insect referred to is the Culex reptans of Linnæus, or the Culex molestus of Forskal. But Josephus, the Jewish rabbins, and most of the modern translators, render the Hebrew word at large, lice; and Bochart and Bryant support this interpretation. Others, again, suppose them to have been a new species of animals called by an old name; or if they were lice, that they must have differed widely from the insects known by this name, and most probably had sharp stings. The presumption that these lice were a new species is somewhat favoured by the fact that the Egyptian magicians, while they counterfeited all the other plagues, completely failed in counterfeiting this one. The best explanation, however, of the inability of the magicians to imitate the plague of lice was, that they were restrained by Divine power.

LID. This word, which occurs only in 2 Kings xii. 9, is used to express the covering of a chest. The Hebrew word properly denotes "the door of the chest."

LIE. See LYING.

LIEUTENANTS. The original word thus translated in Ezra viii. 36; Esther iii. 12, viii. 9, and ix. 3, is evidently of Persian origin, and probably corresponds to the pasha among the Turks. Gesenius renders it "grand satrap, chief governor."

LIFE, properly a state of active and happy existence. (1.) Mortal life, since the fall, is the continuance or duration of our present state, which the Scriptures represent as blended largely with death, and consequently short and vain. Gen. iii. 17, xlvii. 8, 9; Job xiv. 1, 2; James iv. 14. (2.) Spiritual life consists in our being in the favour of God, influenced by a principle of sanctifying grace, and living in dependence on him to his glory. It is considered as of divine origin (Col. iii. 4), hidden (Col. iii. 3), peaceful (Rom. viii. 6), secure (John x. 28). (3.) Eternal life is the consummation of spiritual (Rom. vi. 22), that never-ending state of existence which the saints shall enjoy in heaven; and is glorious (Col. iii. 4), holy (Rev. xxi. 27), and blissful (1 Pet. i. 4; 2 Cor. iv. 17.) (See HEAVEN.) It was very common among the Orientals to swear by the life of the king. Thus Joseph, yielding to the fashion of the country, swears by the life of Pharaoh; and this oath is still used in various regions of the East.

LIFE, BOOK OF. See BOOK.

LIFE, TREE OF. See TREE OF LIFE.

LIFTING UP THE HANDS, is, among the Orientals, a common part of the ceremony of taking an oath: "I have lift up mine hand unto the Lord," says Abraham. Gen. xiv. 22. And, "I will bring you into the land concerning which I lift up mine hand" (Exod. vi. 8)—which I promised with an oath.

To lift up one's hands, eyes, soul, or heart, unto the Lord, are also expressions describing the sentiments and emotion of one who prays earnestly, or desires a thing with ardour.

LIGHT (phōs) is used in a physical sense (Matt. xvii. 2; Acts ix. 3, xii. 7; 2 Cor. iv. 6); for a fire giving light (Mark xiv. 54; Luke xxii. 56); for a torch, candle, or lamp (Acts xvi. 29); and for the material light of heaven, as the sun, moon, or stars (Ps. cxxxvi. 7; James i. 17.) Figuratively taken, it signifies a manifest or open state of things (Matt. x. 27; Luke xii. 3); also, in a still higher sense, the eternal Source of truth, purity, and joy (1 John i. 5; James i. 17.)

The creation of light, at least in so far as our globe is concerned, is described in the sacred writings in language the most sublime: "And God said, Let there be light: and there was light." Gen. i. 3. On this subject Dr Candlish makes the following beautiful remarks: "The first step in this glorious process is the breaking in of light on the gloom in which the earth was shrouded (Gen. i. 3-5); and in this step, the Word came forth from the bosom of Deity. He 'whose goings forth have been from old, from everlasting' (Micah v. 2),—the Word 'who was in the beginning, and was with God, and was God'

(John i. 1-3).—He is that Word which went out from God, when God said, 'Let there be light.' For this is not the utterance of a dead sentence, but the coming forth of the living Word. In the Word was life, and this life in the Word,—this living Word,—was the 'light.' Immediately, without the intervention of those luminaries in which afterwards light was stored and centred, the living Word himself going forth was light,—the natural light of the earth, as afterwards, again coming forth, he became to men the light of their salvation. In this light God delighted as good; for this light is that very eternal Wisdom who says, 'the Lord possessed me in the beginning of his ways, and daily,' from day to day, as the marvellous work of these six days went on, 'I was his delight, rejoicing always before him.' Prov. viii. 22, 30."

LIGHT, DIVINE. See KNOWLEDGE—RELIGION.

LIGHTNING, a bright and vivid flash of fire suddenly appearing in the atmosphere, and commonly disappearing in an instant, sometimes attended with rain and thunder, and sometimes not. Travelers tell us that in Syria lightning is very often seen, especially in the autumn months. This striking natural appearance is thus referred to in Ps. cxxxv. 7: "He causeth the vapours to ascend from the ends of the earth; he maketh lightnings for the rain; he bringeth the wind out of his treasures."

LIGHT OF NATURE. See NATURE.

LIGN—ALOES. See ALOES.

LIGURE (lishim—Exod. xxviii. 19, xxxix. 12), a precious stone of deep red colour, with a considerable tinge of yellow. Theophrastus and Pliny describe it as resembling the carbuncle, of a brightness sparkling like fire. Castellus and others take it for the hyacinth.

LILY (shushan—1 Kings vii. 19, 22, 26; 2 Chron. iv. 5; Cant. ii. 2, 16, iv. 5, v. 13, vi. 2, 3, vii. 2; Hos. xiv. 5; krinon—Matt. vi. 28; Luke xii. 27), a well-known sweet and beautiful flower, which furnished Solomon with a variety of charming images in his Song, and with graceful ornaments in the fabric and furniture of the temple. The title of some of the Psalms "upon Shushan" or "Shoshannim" (Ps. xlv., lx., lxix., lxxx.), probably means no more than that the music of these sacred compositions was to be regulated by that of some odes which were known by those names or appellations.

By "the lily of the valley" (Cant. ii. 1), we are not to understand the humble flower, generally so called with us, the lilium convallium, but the noble flower which ornaments our gardens, and which in Palestine grows wild in the fields, and especially in the valleys. In the East, as with us, it is the emblem of purity and moral excellence: so the Persian poet, Sadi, compares an amiable youth to "the white lily in the bed of narcissuses," because he surpassed all the young shepherds in goodness.

As in Cant. v. 13, the lips are compared to the lily, Bishop Patrick supposes the lily here instanced to be the same which, on account of its deep red colour, is particularly called by Pliny rubens lilium, and which, he tells us, was much esteemed in Syria. Such may have been the lily mentioned in Matt. vi. 28-30; for the royal robes were purple. Sir James E. Smith observes: "It is natural to presume the divine Teacher, according to his usual custom, called the attention of his hearers to some object at hand; and as the fields of the Levant are overrun with the amaryllis lutea, whose golden lilaceous flowers in autumn afford one of the most brilliant and gorgeous objects in nature, the expression of 'Solomon in all his glory not being arrayed like one of these,' is peculiarly appropriate. I consider the feeling with which this was expressed as the highest honour ever done to the study of plants; and, if my botanical conjecture be right, we learn a chronological fact respecting the season of the year when the sermon on the mount was delivered." See GRASS.

LIME (shid—Deut. xxvii. 2-4; Isa. xxxiii. 12; Amos. ii. 1), a soft friable substance, obtained by calcining or burning stones, shells, or the like. From Isa. xxxiii. 12, it appears that it was made in a kiln lighted with thorn bushes; and from Amos ii. 1, that bones were sometimes calcined for lime. The use of it was for plaster or cement, the first mention of which is in Deut. xxvii. 2-4.

LINE. A measuring line is frequently spoken of in Scripture. It seems to have been the practice of Eastern kings to command their captives taken in war, especially those that had greatly provoked their indignation, to lie down on the ground, and then put to death a certain part of them, which they measured with the line. An instance of this practice is recorded in the life of David. 2 Sam. viii. 2. The art of measuring land seems to have been learned by the Hebrews from the Egyptians.

LINEAGE, paternal descent, a family, or, as in Luke ii. 4, a tribe, Christ having the same ancestor with David, whether we understand the posterity of Boaz or some one else of the ancient progenitors of David.

LINEN, the product of flax, a well-known plant, whose bark, being prepared, serves to make cloth. In Gen. xli. 42, it is said that Pharaoh arrayed Joseph "in vestures of fine linen." This the Hebrews call shesh, and the Septuagint byssos, which was a cloth made either of silk or of the most beautiful and delicate species of cotton, such as was employed in the finest fabrics of the loom. The garments to which the term byssos is applied were long robes of the most exquisite white, and worn by priests and kings, as a badge of the royal and sacerdotal office. The linen of Egypt appears to have been held in great estimation in Palestine. Thus Prov. vii. 16: "I have decked my bed with coverings of tapestry, with carved works, with fine linen of Egypt." The prophet Ezekiel also says, in his enumeration of the articles of traffic in Tyre (xxvii. 7): "Fine linen with brodered work from Egypt was that which thou spreadest forth to be thy sail; blue and purple from the isles of Elishah was that which covered thee." It has been much disputed whether the byssus of the New Testament (Luke xvi. 19; Rev. xviii. 12) be linen or cotton.

LINTEL, the head-piece of the door; that part of the frame that lies on the side-pieces. It is referred to on the occasion of the institution of the passover, in Exod. xii. 22, 23.

LINUS, a Christian mentioned by Paul (2 Tim. iv. 21), and whom Irenæus, Eusebius, Optatus, Epiphanius, Austin, Jerome, and Theodoret, affirm to have succeeded Peter as bishop of Rome. Dr. Burton alleges that he suffered martyrdom, under Nero; and others, that he lived till near the end of the first century.

LION. The name by which this noble animal is generally designated in the Hebrew Scriptures is translated, to pluck or tear off, and has been supposed to have originated in his remarkable habit of tearing his prey to pieces. Ps. vii. 2, xxii. 13; Mic. v. 8. But there are several other names given to him by the inspired writers, each of which is characteristic either of his age or some feature in his character.

It is usually supposed that the lion is not possessed of the sense of smelling in such perfection as many other animals. It is also observed, that too strong a light greatly incommodates him: this is apparent, indeed, from the formation of his eyes, which, like those of the cat, seem fitted for seeing best in the dark. For this reason, he seldom appears in open day, but ravages chiefly by night. With this fact corresponds the language of the royal prophet, Ps. civ. 20-22.

Accustomed to measure his strength with every animal he meets, the habit of conquering renders the lion intrepid and terrible. In those regions where he has not experienced the dangerous arts and combinations of man, he has no apprehensions from his power. He boldly faces him, and seems to brave the force of his arms. Wounds rather serve to provoke his rage than to repress his ardour. Nor is he daunted by the opposition of numbers; a single lion of the desert often attacks an entire caravan, and, after an obstinate combat, when he finds himself overpowered, instead of flying, he continues to combat, retreating, and still facing the enemy till he dies. To this trait in his character Job (x. 16) alludes, when, complaining of his trials, he hastily said to the Almighty: "Thou huntest me as a fierce lion." We see, also, the propriety with which Hushai describes the valiant among the troops of Absalom, as possessing "the heart of a lion." 2 Sam. xvii. 10.

LIP, is sometimes used for the bank of a river, for the border of a vessel or table. Exod. xxv. 24; 2 Chron. iv. 2. It also signifies language. Gen. xi. 1; Exod. vi. 12, &c. "We will render thee the calves of our lips," says Hosea (xiv. 2); that is, sacrifices of praise, instead of bloody victims. "I do not send thee," says the Lord to Ezekiel (iii. 5), "to a people deep of lip"—of an unknown language. To cover the lips was a very ancient sign of mourning, and it continues to be practised among the Jews of Barbary to this day. Hence, when the wife of the prophet Ezekiel died, he is charged to abstain from the customary forms of mourning, which are thus stated, Ezek. xxiv. 17: "Forbear to cry, make no mourning for the dead, bind the tire of thine head upon thee, and put on thy shoes upon thy feet, and cover not thy lips, and eat not the bread of men." The law of Moses required a leper to have his clothes rent, his head bare, and a covering upon his upper lip, because he was considered as a dead man "of whom the flesh is half consumed when he cometh out of his mother's womb."

LITANY, a general supplication used in public worship. The word comes from the Greek litaneia, "supplication." At first, the use of litanies was not fixed to any stated time, but they were only employed as exigencies required. They were observed, in imitation of the Ninevites, with ardent supplications and fastings, to avert the threatened judgments of fire, earthquakes, inundations, or hostile invasions. About A.D. 400 litanies began to be used in processions, the people walking barefoot, and repeating them with great devotion; and it is alleged that by this means several countries were delivered from great calamities. The days on which they were used were called Rogation days; these were appointed by the canons of different councils, till it was decreed by the Council of Toledo that they should be used every month throughout the year; and thus, by degrees, they came to be used weekly on Wednesdays and Fridays, the ancient stationary days for fasting. To these days the rubric of the Church of England has added Sundays, as being the greatest day for assembling at divine service.

Before the last review of the Book of Common Prayer, the litany was a distinct service by itself, and used sometimes after the morning prayer was over; at present it is made one office with the morning service, being ordered to be read after the third collect.

LITTER. This word, which occurs only in Isa. lxvi. 20, is rendered on the margin "coaches," and probably refers to the Oriental palanquin or litter, which is used very frequently throughout the East. It is borne on men's shoulders, and is considered as one of the luxuries belonging to the rich.

LITURGY denotes all the ceremonies in general belonging to divine service. The word comes from the Greek leitourgia, "service, public ministry;" formed of leitos, "public," and ergon, "work." In a more restrained signification, liturgy is used among the Romanists to signify the mass; and, among Protestants, the common prayer. All who have written on liturgies, agree that, in primitive days, divine service was exceedingly simple, clogged with very few ceremonies, and consisted of but a small number of prayers; but, by degrees, they increased the number of ceremonies, and added new prayers, to make the office look more awful and venerable to the people. At length, things were carried to such a pitch, that a regulation became necessary: and it was found necessary to put the service and the manner of performing it into writing; and this was what they called a liturgy.

Liturgies have been different at different times and in different countries. The Armenians, Copts, Ethiopians, Greeks, Syrians, Jacobites, Maronites, and Nestorians, have their several liturgies, and some of them from three to forty different ones.

The liturgy of the Roman Church consists of the Breviary, containing the matins, lauds, &c.; the Missal, or volume employed in saying mass, and containing the calendar, the general rubrics, or rites of that mass; the Ceremonial, containing the offices peculiar to the pope, such as consecration, benediction, canonization, &c.; the Pontifical, which describes the functions of bishops at ordinations, consecrations of churches, &c.; and the Ritual, containing the services as performed by the simple priests both in public worship and in private. The whole of this liturgy is performed in Latin.

The liturgy of the Church of England was composed in the year 1547, and established in the second year of King Edward VI. In the fifth year of this king it was revised, because some things were contained in that liturgy which showed a compliance with the superstition of those times, and some exceptions were taken against it by some learned men at home, and by Calvin abroad. Some alterations were made in it, which consisted in adding the general confession and absolution, and the communion to begin with the ten commandments. The use of oil in confirmation and extreme unction was left out, and also prayers for souls departed, and what related to a belief of Christ's real presence in the eucharist. This liturgy, so reformed, was established by the acts of the 5th and 6th Edward VI., cap. 1. However, it was abolished by Queen Mary, who enacted that the service should stand as it was most commonly used in the last year of the reign of King Henry VIII. That of Edward VI. was re-established, with some alterations, by Elizabeth. Some further alterations were introduced, in consequence of the revision of the common prayer-book, by order of King James, in the first year of his reign, particularly in the office of private baptism, in several rubrics, and other passages, with the addition of five or six new prayers and thanksgivings, and all that part of the catechism which contains the doctrine of the sacraments. The book of common prayer, so altered, remained in force from the first year of King James to the fourteenth of Charles II. The last revision of the liturgy was in the year 1661. Many petitions have been since made for a revision, but without success.

No liturgy is used in the Presbyterian churches either in England or Scotland; but while the order of service is laid down in the Directory of Public Worship, the prayers are uniformly extemporaneous. The strongest prejudice, indeed, is generally felt among Presbyterians in both ends of the island against set forms of prayer of any kind, whether in public or private services.

LIVE, (1.) To be inwardly quickened, nourished, and actuated by the influence of God. Gal. ii. 20. (2.) To be greatly refreshed and comforted. Ps. xxii. 26; 1 Thess. iii. 8. (3.) To have the continued possession of grace here, and glory hereafter. John xiv. 19. God lives in and of himself; he has incomprehensible and everlasting activity and happiness. Numb. xiv. 21. Christ now lives possessed of all happiness for himself. Rev. i. 18. He lives for his people, perpetually interceding for them, and conveying to them his purchased blessings (Heb. vii. 25); and he lives in them as a quickening Spirit; he dwells in their hearts by faith, and is the life-giving principle from which their spiritual activity and comforts proceed; and they live on him by faith, drawing virtue from his word, person, righteousness, and fulness, for their quickening, activity, and comfort. Gal. ii. 20. Men live not by bread alone, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God. Even when there are no apparent means of subsistence, we are to trust to the power and promise of God for our support in life. Matt. iv. 4. Men live not to themselves, but unto God, or Christ, when they make, not their carnal ease, profit, or honour, their great end, but his glory, and the edification of his Church. Rom. xiv. 7, 8; 2 Cor. v. 14, 15. To live in God's sight, is to be preserved by his favour, live under his special care, and in the exercise of loving and pleasing him. Hos. vi. 2; Gen. xvii. 18. The religious service of saints is called a living and reasonable sacrifice, to distinguish it from the ancient sacrifices of beasts; and because, proceeding from a soul spiritually quickened, it is performed in a lively and active manner. Rom. xii. 1. See LIFE.

LIVER, a large glandular organ, situated on the right side of the body. It is referred to in Exod. xxix. 13. The liver, as well as the heart, was supposed, by the ancients, to be the seat of the affections. Hence (Lam. ii. 11): "My liver is poured upon the earth," to express great sorrow; and (Ps. xvi. 9): "My heart is glad, and my glory rejoiceth;" literally "my liver rejoiceth." Among the different modes of divination spoken of in Ezek. xxi. 21, we find one thus described: "He looked into the liver." This was regarded as a favourable or unfavourable omen, according as the liver exhibited, on inspection, a healthy or unhealthy appearance. This method of divination was also practised among the Grecian soothsayers.

LIZARD. Several species of lizards are well known. There are some in Arabia a cubit in length; but in the Indies there are some much longer. In America they are eaten, as they probably were in Arabia and Judea, since Moses forbids them as food. We find several sorts of lizards mentioned in Scripture—letah, chomet, tinshemeth (Lev. xi. 30), and shemamith. The third is translated mole; but Bochart maintains that it is the chameleon. The lacerta stellio, or starry lizard, is the most common species in Palestine, and particularly in Judea.

LOAF. The loaves in Eastern countries are generally round; hence the word translated "loaf," in the Old Testament, signifies a circle. We are told, also, that the loaves were so small that three of them were required to satisfy a single person at a meal. Accordingly, it is said in Luke xi. 5, 6: "And he said unto them, Which of you shall have a friend, and shall go unto him at midnight, and say unto him, Friend, lend me three loaves; for a friend of mine in his journey is come to me, and I have nothing to set before him?" The loaves were generally new, and baked as they were needed. See BREAD—CAKES—CRACKNELS.

LO-AMMI. This was the name commanded by God to be given to the second son of the prophet Hosea; "for," says he, "ye are not my people, and I will not be your God." See AMMI.

LOCK. This word, which occurs in Cant. v. 5, means properly a bolt or bar. The locks in the East are of wood. They consist of a long hollow piece of wood fixed in the door, so as to slide backward and forward, which enters a hole made for it in the door-post, and is there fastened by small bolts of iron wire which fall from above into little orifices made for them in the top of the lock. The keys or bits of timber (see KEY) with little pieces of wire, lift up other pieces of wire that are in the lock, and enter into certain little holes out of which the ends of the wires that are in the key have just expelled the corresponding wires, upon which the gate is opened.

LOCUST, a voracious insect, belonging to the grasshopper or grylli genus, and a great scourge in Oriental countries. Moses describes four sorts of locusts, or, it may be, the same sort in different states—arbeh, salam, chargol, and chageb—which Jerome translates bruchus, attacus, ophiomacrus, and locusta.

On many occasions the locust has been employed by the Almighty for chastising his guilty creatures. A swarm of locusts were among the plagues of Egypt, when they covered the whole land, so that the earth was darkened; and they devoured every green herb of the earth, and the fruit of every tree which the hail had left. Exod. x. 15. But the most particular description of this insect, and of its destructive career, mentioned in the Sacred Writings, is to be found in Joel ii. 3–10. This is, perhaps, one of the most striking and animated descriptions to be met with in the whole compass of prophecy. The contexture of the passage is extremely curious; and the double destruction to be produced by locusts, and the enemies of which they were the harbingers, is painted with the most expressive force, and described with the most terrible accuracy. We may fancy the destroying army to be moving before us while we read, and imagine that we see the desolation spreading. The following extract may furnish a commentary upon this and other passages in the Holy Scriptures:—

"The locusts were no sooner hatched in June," says Dr. Shaw, "than each of the broods collected itself into a compact body of a furlong or more in square, and marching afterwards directly forward towards the sea, they let nothing escape them; eating up everything that was green and juicy—not only the lesser kinds of vegetables, but the vine likewise, the fig tree, the pomegranate, the palm, and the apple tree, even all the trees of the field (Joel i. 12); in doing which, they kept their ranks like men of war, climbing over, as they advanced, every tree or wall that was in their way; nay, they entered into our very houses and bed-chambers like thieves. The inhabitants, to stop their progress, made a variety of pits and trenches all over their fields and gardens, which they filled with water; or else they heaped up therein heath, stubble, and such like combustible matter, which were severally set on fire upon the approach of the locusts. But this was all to no purpose, for the trenches were quickly filled up, and the fires extinguished by infinite swarms succeeding one another, whilst the front was regardless of danger, and the rear pressed on so close, that a retreat was altogether impossible. A day or two after one of these broods was in motion, others were already hatched to march and glean after them, gnawing off the very bark, and the young branches of such trees as had before escaped with the loss only of their fruit and foliage. So justly have they been compared by the prophet to a great army, who further observes, that the land is as the garden of Eden before them, and behind them as a desolate wilderness."

As locusts are commonly eaten in Palestine, and in the neighbouring countries, there is no difficulty in supposing that the word acrides, used by Matthew (iii. 4), speaking of the food on which John subsisted, might signify these insects. The ancients affirm, that in Africa, Syria, Persia, and almost throughout Asia, the people did commonly eat these creatures. Some nations were called Acridophagi, or eaters of locusts, because these insects formed their principal food.

To explain Rev. ix. 1–11, Mr. Taylor has translated the following passage from Niebuhr:—"An Arab of the desert near Basra [Bassorah] informed me of a singular comparison of the locust with other animals. The terrible locust of chap. ix. of the Apocalypse not then occurring to me, I regarded this comparison as a jest of the Bedouin, and paid no attention to it, till it was repeated by another from Bagdad. It was thus: He compared the head of the locust to that of the horse; its breast to that of the lion; its feet to those of the camel; its body to that of the serpent; its tail to that of the scorpion; its horns [antennæ], if I mistake not, to the locks of hair of a virgin; and so of other parts."

It seems more natural to compare their teeth to those of lions, than their breasts to those of lions; but this is more especially proper to the Apocalyptic writer's purpose, as he had already informed us of their resemblance to "horses prepared for battle." As to the armour, &c., of horses prepared for battle in the East, Knolles informs us, that the Mamelukes' horses were commonly furnished with silver bridles, gilt trappings, and rich saddles; and that their necks and breasts were armed with plates of iron. It is not, therefore, unlikely that they had also ornaments resembling crowns of gold, to which the horns of the locust might be, with propriety, compared; we find they had really "breast-plates of iron;" and by their rushing on the enemy, and the use they made of their mouths, as described by Knolles, the comparison of them to locusts seems very applicable.

It is remarkable, that Solomon says (Prov. xxx. 27), "The locusts have no king;" but the locusts of the Apocalypse have a king, and a dreadful king too—Abaddon, the destroyer. See ABADDON.

LODGE. This word is to be found in Isa. i. 8: "And the daughter of Zion is left as a cottage in a vineyard, as a lodge in a garden of cucumbers, as a besieged city." It signifies a temporary shed or booth for the watchman set to protect a garden. See BOOTH.

LODGING-PLACE. See INN.

LOFT. We find this word in 1 Kings xvii. 19, where it seems to mean a small covered place on the flat roof of an Oriental house. In Acts xx. 9, it means storey or floor.

LOG, a Hebrew measure, which held five-sixths of a pint; it is called the fourth part of a cab. 2 Kings vi. 25; Lev. xiv. 10, xii. 24.

LOGOS. Many different opinions have been entertained among the learned as to the meaning of the Logos. "The Pythagoreans, Platonists, and Philo," says Wetstein, "adjoined to God the Father a second God, whom they called Logos, and also a third: and they spoke of these as of three persons; but in fact they understood the attributes, counsels, and decrees of one God. John, however, could hardly have used those mystic terms of the Platonists unless he had previously learned them either from the Gnostics, who had arisen in the church of Asia, or from the Alexandrian Jews, disciples of Philo, who were visiting Ephesus; as, for instance, Apollos, of whom we read in Acts xviii. 24. But although John used the same words as they did, yet that he took them in a different sense is manifest, as well because he has bestowed on Jesus only the whole assemblage of those titles which the Gnostics had, by many distinctions, attributed to the Æons, as also because he has by the Logos designated, not some attributes of God, as knowledge or will, nor the form of the world in the mind of the Creator, nor some counsel and decree of God the Father, but properly a person distinct from the Father. At least it is not probable that the origin or use of the word in the church was derived from the synagogue. We nowhere read that Christ called himself by this name, or was so called by any of the apostles except John; and to the Jews it was very unusual to call the Messiah by such an appellation." "I am of opinion," says Kuinoel, "that John, who wished to show that Jesus the Messiah was most closely and in a sublime manner conjoined with God, meant by the Logos an intelligent nature superior to all angels and created beings most intimately connected with God, yet to be distinguished from him, proceeding from God before the creation of the world, and which therefore may and ought to be accounted as God." The doctrine of John concerning the Logos is completely consonant with that of Paul concerning the person and character of Christ. To make the gospel clear to the Hellenist Jews, for whom it was intended, he uses a term which was familiar to them, namely, the Logos, and transfers it to Christ.

LOINS. In Scripture, the expression is often found to “gird the loins,” referring to the Eastern custom of fastening up their long flowing vestments, that they may not be incommoded in their work, or on a journey. Elijah followed this custom (1 Kings xviii. 46), when preparing to run before the chariot of the king. The Almighty thus speaks, as if calling upon Job to make earnest preparation for replying to his arguments: “Gird up now thy loins like a man; for I will demand of thee, and answer thou me.” Job xxxviii. 3.

LOIS, the name of the grandmother of Timothy, whom Paul speaks of in high terms of commendation. 2 Tim. i. 5.

LOLLARDS, a religious sect, differing in many points from the Church of Rome, which arose in Germany about the beginning of the fourteenth century; so called, as many writers have imagined, from Walter Lollard, their chief leader and champion, a native of Mentz, and equally famous for his eloquence and his writings, who was burnt at Cologne; though others think that Lollard was no surname, but merely a term of reproach applied to all heretics who concealed what was deemed error under the appearance of piety.

The monk of Canterbury derives the origin of the word Lollard from lolium, “a tare,” as if the Lollards were the tares sown in Christ’s vineyard. Abelley says, that the word signifies “praising God,” from the German loben, “to praise,” and Herr, “Lord;” because the Lollards employed themselves in travelling about from place to place, singing psalms and hymns. Others, much to the same purpose, derive lollhard, lullhard, or lollert, lullert, as it was written by the ancient Germans, from the old German word lullen, lollen, or lallen, and the termination hard, with which many of the high Dutch words end. Lollen signifies, “to sing with a low voice,” and, therefore, Lollard is a singer, or one who frequently sings; and in the vulgar tongue of the Germans, it denotes a person who is continually praising God with a song, or singing hymns to his honour.

Fuller, however, informs us, that in the reign of Edward III., about A.D. 1315, Walter Lollard, a German preacher, or (as Perrin, in his History of the Waldenses, calls him), one of their barbs (pastors), of great renown among them, came into England; and who was so eminent in England, that as in France they were called Berengarians, from Berengarins, and Petrobrusians, from Peter Bruis, and in Italy and Flanders, Arnoldists, from the famous Arnold of Brescia; so did the Waldensian Christians, for many generations after, bear the name of this worthy man, being called Lollards. Bishop Newton having mentioned the Lollards, says, “There was a man more worthy to have given name to the sect, the deservedly famous John Wickliffe, the honour of his own, and the admiration of succeeding times.” In England, the followers of Wickliffe were called, by way of reproach, Lollards, though the first English Lollards came from Germany.

Lollard and his followers rejected the sacrifice of the mass, extreme unction, and penance for sin; arguing that Christ’s sufferings were sufficient. He is likewise said to have set aside baptism, as a thing of no effect; but this appears to be a mistake, founded on their rejection of infant baptism, and their denial of its saving efficacy.

That this was the case, appears from the laws made against them in the reign of Henry IV.; for among the articles by which the inquisitors were to examine them, one was, “Whether an infant dying unbaptized can be saved?” This the Lollards constantly asserted, in opposition to the Church of Rome, which decreed that no infant could be saved without it. Fox says, that among the errors they were charged with were these: “That they spoke against the opinion of such as think children are damned who depart before baptism, and said that Christian people be sufficiently baptized in the blood of Christ, and need no water; and that infants be sufficiently baptized if their parents are baptized before them.” Fox thinks they were slandered in this matter; we think justly, so far as the denial of believers’ baptism is concerned, for the last of the three charges is itself a plain contradiction of it. Besides, Sir Lewis Clifford, who had been a friend of Wickliffe, expressly affirmed, that “the Lollards would not baptize their new-born children;” and Thomas Walden, who had access to the writings of Wickliffe, calls him “one of the seven heads that came out of the bottomless pit, for denying infant baptism, that heresy of the Lollards, of whom he was so great a ringleader.”

Fox says, that it was upon these charges, that, in the space of four years, one hundred and twenty Lollards, men and women, were apprehended, and suffered greatly; a number of them being burnt at the stake. William Sawtry, the parish priest of St. Osith, in London, was the first martyr in this English persecution. Rapin says, “In 1389, the Wickliffites, or Lollards, began to separate from the Church of Rome, and appoint priests from among themselves to perform divine service after their way.” From this period to the Reformation, their sufferings were very great. More than one hundred are recorded by name who were burnt to death.

The Lollards’ Tower still stands as a monument of their miseries, and of the cruelty of their implacable enemies. This tower is at Lambeth Palace, and was fitted up for this purpose by Chicheby, archbishop of Canterbury, who came to this see in 1414. It is said that he expended two hundred and eighty pounds to make this prison for the Lollards. The vast staples and rings to which they were fastened, before they were brought out to the stake, are still to be seen in a large lumber-room at the top of the palace; and ought to make Protestants look back with gratitude upon the hour which terminated so bloody a period. (See WICKLIFFE.)

LONG, to desire very earnestly, as one hungry or thirsty desires refreshment (Gen. xxxiv. 8; 2 Sam. xxiii. 15); so persons grievously afflicted long for death. Job iii. 21. David’s soul longed for his banished son Absalom. 2 Sam. xiii. 39. Exiles long to see their native country. Gen. xxxi. 30. Faithful ministers, sick or imprisoned, long to visit their people. Phil. ii. 26. Saints long for the experience of God’s presence or power in his ordinances, and for his salvation from the guilt, power, and pollution of sin, to perfect holiness and happiness. Ps. lxxxiv. 2, cxix. 40, 174.

LONG-SUFFERING OF GOD. See PATIENCE OF GOD.

LOOK. God’s looking on men, imports his perfect knowledge of their conduct; his care of and kindness to them (Ps. liii. 2; Lam. iii. 50); his delightful contemplation of their graces (Cant. vi. 13); or his apparent unconcern about them, as if he were a mere by-stander (Hab. i. 13; Ps. xxxv. 17); or his terrifying and punishing them. Exod. xiv. 24. Men’s look- ing to God or Christ, imports their viewing him by faith in his excellences and new covenant relations, desiring direction, support, and every blessing of salvation from him, and their viewing him as their pattern. Ps. xxxiv. 5; Isa. xlv. 22, xvii. 7; Heb. xii. 2.

LOOKING-GLASSES. Moses says, that the devout women who sat up all night at the door of the tabernacle in the wilderness, offered cheerfully their "looking-glasses," to be employed in making a brazen laver for the purifications of the priests. Exod. xxxviii. 8. These looking-glasses were, without doubt, of brass, since the laver was made out of them. Indeed, the mirrors of the ancients appear to have been composed of highly-polished metal, the art of making glass not having been discovered till a comparatively recent period. See GLASS—LAVAR.

LOOMS. Weaving, as at first practised, was a simple but very tedious affair, as the women did not make use of a shuttle, but conducted every thread of warp with their fingers. Looms, however, were known to the Hebrews, and appear, in form and construction, to have resembled those still much in use in Eastern countries, which are perpendicular, narrow, and worked by one person. "The web," says Professor Paxton, "was like that described by Wilde, which he saw lately in a loom in Jerusalem, where 'the worsted was not worked in, but actually wove into the piece, and the pattern of the weaving changed, so that the colour of the thread was completely thrown out, forming a triple fringe, through which the weft cannot be seen.' In order to prevent the cloth from rending lengthwise, or being unravelled on the loom, strong and thicker threads than the rest were inserted crosswise here and there to give solidity to the weft, and that precaution was particularly observed towards the fag-end of the piece. 'In two of our specimens,' says Mr. Wilde, 'we find twelve thick threads crossing the piece, and the tassels tied exactly as they are at the end of a piece of modern Irish linen. But the slipping of the weft is prevented by a curious process, performed by tying the threads of the warp together, so that each is secured to the thread at each side of it. This process forms a slight ridge at the end of the piece, and is rather ornamental. This fringe appears to be alluded to in that passage of Scripture where the Israelites were directed to make fringes in the borders of their garments, and that they put upon the fringe of the borders a ribband of blue. I have seen a species of mummy cloth in Egypt corresponding to this description precisely. Such was likely the 'hem of the Redeemer's garment.'"

LOOPS. The word is found in Exod. xxvi. 4, and implies knots of ribband, in which the hooks were inserted, in order to join the different curtains of the tabernacle together.

LORD, a term properly denoting one who has dominion, whether in a family or community, whether on earth or in heaven. Applied to God, it signifies the Supreme Governor and Disposer of all things. When printed with large capitals in the English Bible, it stands for the Hebrew Jehovah, and when in small, Adonai; names exclusively given to the Divine Being. See GOD—JEHOVAH.

LORDLY. In Judges v. 25, these words occur: "He asked water, and she gave him milk; she brought forth butter in a lordly dish." The expression, "a lordly dish," is in Hebrew "a bowl of the mighty, of the nobles." That is, such as nobles use; a rich, costly, or princely bowl; one with which a person would entertain the most honourable guests. Though it is scarcely to be supposed that articles of this costly description were common in the tents of nomad tribes, yet in the present case the family of Heber may have possessed from their ancestors a sumptuous article of the kind, which Jael would naturally bring forth on the occasion of a visit from so distinguished a personage.

LORD'S DAY. See SABBATH.

LORD'S NAME TAKEN IN VAIN, consists, (1.) In using it lightly or rashly, in exclamations, adjurations, and appeals in common conversation. (2.) Hypocritically in our prayers, thanksgivings, &c. (3.) Superstitiously, as when the Israelites carried the ark to the field of battle, to render them successful against the Philistines. 1 Sam. iv. 3, 4. (4.) Wantonly, in swearing by him, or creatures in his stead. Matt. v. 34-37. (5.) Angrily or sportfully cursing, and devoting ourselves and others to mischief and damnation. (6.) Perjuring ourselves, attesting that which is false. Mal. iii. 5. (7.) Blasphemously reviling God, or causing others to do so. Rom. ii. 24.

Perhaps there is no sin more common as to the practice, and less thought of as to the guilt of it, than this. Nor is it thus common with the vulgar only, but with those who call themselves wise, humane, and moral. They tremble at the idea of murder, theft, adultery, &c., while they forget that the same law which prohibits the commission of these crimes, does, with equal force, forbid that of profaning His name. No man, therefore, whatever his sense, abilities, or profession may be, can be held guiltless, or be exonerated from the charge of being a wicked man, while he lives in the habitual violation of this part of God's sacred law.

LORD'S PRAYER, is the first form of Christian prayer on record. According to what is said in the 6th chapter of Matthew, it was given as a directory; but from Luke xi. 1-4, some argue that it was given as a form. Some have thought that the second and fourth petitions of that prayer could be intended only for temporary use; but it is always our highest duty to pray that Christ's kingdom may be advanced in the world, and also to profess our daily dependence on God's providential care. Nevertheless, there is no reason to believe that Christ meant that his people should always use this as a set form; for, if that had been the case, it would not have been varied as it is by the two evangelists. Matt. vi., Luke xi. Besides, we do not find that the disciples ever used it as a form.

It is, however, a most exquisite summary of prayer, for its matter, brevity, and order; and Christians should study its meaning, and enter into its spirit, far more deeply than they do. Frequently as it is repeated in the course both of public and domestic devotion, it is far from being universally known, or if known, from being always recollected, what is the nature and extent of the petitions it involves. This may, in a great measure, be accounted for by the consideration that the prayer is often impressed upon the youthful memory, without any explanation of its meaning or its views; and recited mechanically in after life, with an habitual feeling that whatever the child could learn, the man must understand. What is familiar to the memory, is, by a very natural process of association, supposed to be also familiar to the mind.

LORD'S SUPPER, is an ordinance which our Saviour instituted as a commemoration of his death and sufferings. (1.) It is commonly called a sacrament; that is, a sign and an oath: an outward and visible sign of an inward and spiritual grace; an oath by which we bind our souls with a bond unto the Lord. Some, however, reject this term as not being scriptural; as likewise the idea of swearing or vowing to the Lord. (See Vow.) (2.) It is called the Lord's Supper, because it was first instituted in the evening, and at the close of the passover supper; and because we therein feed upon Christ, the bread of life. Rev. iii. 20; 1 Cor. xi. 23–30. (3.) It is called the communion, as herein we have communion with Christ, and with his people. 1 Cor. 16, 17, x. 17. (4.) It is called the eucharist, a thanksgiving, because Christ, in the institution of it, gave thanks (1 Cor. xi. 24); and because we, in the participation of it, must give thanks likewise. (5.) It is called a feast, and by some a feast upon a sacrifice (though not a sacrifice itself), in allusion to the custom of the Jews feasting upon their sacrifices. 1 Cor. x. 18.

As to the nature of this ordinance, we may observe, that, in participating of the bread and wine, we do not consider it as expiatory, but (1.) As a commemorating ordinance. We are here to remember the person, love, and death of Christ. 1 Cor. xi. 24. (2.) A professing ordinance. We hereby profess our esteem for Christ, and dependence upon him. (3.) A communicating ordinance; blessings of grace are here communicated to us. (4.) A covenanting ordinance. God, in and by this ordinance, declares that he is ours, and we by it declare ourselves to be his. Matt. xxvi. 28; Heb. viii. 8. (5.) A standing ordinance, for it is to be observed to the end of time. 1 Cor. xi. 26. It seems to be quite an indifferent thing what bread is used in this ordinance, or what coloured wine, for Christ took that which was readiest. The eating of the bread and drinking of the wine, being always connected in Christ's example, they ought never to be separated; whenever one is given, the other should not be withheld. This bread and wine are not changed into the real body and blood of Christ, but are only emblems thereof. (See TRANSUBSTANTIATION.)

The subjects of this ordinance should be such as make a credible profession of the gospel, in the mode appointed to his disciples by the Saviour. The ignorant, and those whose lives are immoral, have no right to it; nor should it be ever administered as a test of civil obedience, for this is sacrilegiously perverting the design of it. None but true believers can approach it with profit; yet we cannot exclude any who make a credible profession of faith in Christ; for God only is the judge of the heart, while we can only act according to outward appearances.

Much has been said respecting the time of administering it. Some plead for the morning, others the afternoon, and some for the evening; which latter, indeed, was the time of the first celebration of it, and is most suitable to a supper. How often it is to be observed has been disputed. Some have been for keeping it every day in the week; others four times a-week; some every Lord's-day, which some think is nearest the apostolic practice (Acts xx. 7); a practice which is alleged to have been long kept up in Christian antiquity, and only deviated from when the love of the Christians began to wax cold.

Others have kept it three times a-year, and some once a-year; others once a month. It evidently appears, however, both from Scripture (1 Cor. xi. 26) and from the nature of the ordinance, that it ought to be frequent.

As to the posture, Dr. Doddridge justly observes, that it is greatly to be lamented that Christians have perverted an ordinance, intended as a pledge and means of their mutual union, into an occasion of discord and contention, by laying such a stress on the manner in which it is to be administered, and the posture in which it is to be received. As to the latter, a table posture seems most eligible, as having been used by Christ and his apostles, and being peculiarly suitable to the notion of a sacred feast; and kneeling, which was never introduced into the Church till transubstantiation was received, may prove an occasion of superstition.

LO-RUHAMAH, not beloved. See AMMI.

LOT, the son of Haran, and nephew of Abraham, whom he accompanied on his journey from Ur to Canaan. He travelled also with the patriarch to Egypt, and returned along with him to Canaan; but he separated from Abraham, and chose the plain of Sodom for his residence. There he continued for twenty-three years, faithfully fulfilling the duties of a preacher of righteousness. When the Lord, because of the wickedness of the people, rained fire and brimstone from heaven upon the cities of the plain, Lot and his two daughters escaped from Sodom, but his wife, looking back, perished, being turned by the judgment of God into a pillar of salt. Travellers have endeavoured to discover the scene of this awful infliction, but without effect. The destruction of Sodom was a heavy calamity to Lot, who had selected it as his abode. The losses which he sustained on this melancholy occasion were very great; his wife, property, and all the prospects of the future settlement of his family. Some think it was in judgment for a worldly choice.

Lot left Zoar, and retired with his two daughters to a cave in an adjacent mountain. There, through the base suggestion and enticement of his daughters, he fell into the most horrid and unnatural sins, drunkenness and incest, the consequence of which was the birth of Moab and Ammon.

LOTS, are a mutual agreement to determine an uncertain event, no other ways determinable, by an appeal to the providence of God, on casting or throwing something. This is a decisory lot. Prov. xvi. 33, xviii. 18. The matter, therefore, to be determined, in order to avoid guilt, should be important, and no other possible way left to determine it, and the manner of making the appeal solemn and grave, if we would escape the guilt of taking the name of God in vain. Wantonly, without necessity and in a ludicrous manner, to make this appeal, must be, therefore, highly blamable. And if thus the decisory lot, when wantonly and unnecessarily employed, be criminal, equally, if not more so, must the divinatory lot be, which is employed for discovering the will of God; this, being no means of God's appointment, must be superstitious, and the height of presumption.

The manner of casting lots is not described in the Scriptures; but several methods appear to have been used. Solomon observes (Prov. xvi. 33), that "the lot," pebble, "is cast into the lap" (bechif), probably of an urn or vase. Literally, "In a lot-vase the lots are shaken in all directions; nevertheless from the Lord is their whole decision—judgment."

The wise man also acknowledges the usefulness of this custom: "The lot causeth contentions to cease, and parteth between the mighty." Prov. xviii. 18. It is sometimes forbidden, however; as when it is practised without necessity, or with superstition, or with a design of tempting God, or in things in which there are other natural means of discovering truth. Reason and religion furnish better ways to guide us. Haman (Esth. iii. 7, &c.) used lots, not only out of superstition, but likewise in an unjust and criminal matter, when he undertook to destroy the Jews. Nebuchadnezzar did so in a superstitious manner, when, being on his way to Jerusalem and Rabbath of the Ammonites, he cast lots to determine which of the two cities he should first attack. Ezek. xxi. 18-24.

The Moravian Brethren employ the appeal to lot in the case of marriage, and other appointments in their community.

LOTS, FEAST OF. See PURIM.

LOVE, an attachment to any object, accompanied with an ardent desire to promote their happiness. It is the excellence of the Christian system, that it ennobles, regulates, and directs this passion to proper objects, and moderates it within due bounds. Finding this principle in the human mind, it does not banish but encourage it; does not depress but exalt it; does not abate but promote it. It is conducted by piety to proper objects, is animated with the noblest expectations, and is trained up for perpetual exercise in a world where it shall be perfectly purified, perfectly extended, and perfectly rewarded.

Love is the greatest of all graces (1 Cor. xiii. 13); it fulfils the law (1 Tim. i. 5); makes us resemble the inhabitants of a better world; and without it every other attainment is of no avail. 1 Cor. xiii. See CHARITY.

LOVE, BROTHERLY, is that peculiar attachment among Christians arising from their common faith, interest, object, and hope. Its foundation is their common love of Christ, and truth, and virtue, or Christian holiness. Love to good men must be particularly cultivated, for it is the command of Christ (John xiii. 34); they belong to the same father and family (Gal. vi. 10); we hereby give proof of our discipleship (John xiii. 35); the example of Christ should allure us to it (1 John iii. 16); it is creative of a variety of pleasing sensations, and prevents a thousand evils.

This love should show itself by praying for our brethren (Eph. vi. 18); bearing one another's burdens, by assisting and relieving each other (Gal. vi. 2); by forbearing with one another (Col. iii. 13); by reproof and admonishing in the spirit of meekness (Prov. xxvii. 5, 6); by establishing each other in the truth, by conversation, exhortation, and stirring up one another to the several duties of religion, both public and private. Jude 20, 21; Heb. x. 24, 25. See CHARITY.

LOVE FEASTS. See AGAPE.

LOVE OF GOD, is either his natural delight in that which is good (Isa. lxi. 8), or his special benevolence to mankind (John iii. 16), or that gracious sovereign affection he bears to his people. Eph. ii. 4; 1 John iv. 19. Not that he possesses the passion of love as we do, but it implies his benevolent purpose and will to deliver, bless, and save his people. (1.) The love of God to his people appears in his all-wise designs and plans for their happiness.

Eph. iii. 10. (2.) In the choice of them, and determination to sanctify and glorify them. 2 Thess. ii. 13. (3.) In the gift of his Son to die for them, and redeem them from sin, death, and hell. Rom. v. 8-10; John iii. 16. (4.) In the revelation of his will, and the declaration of his promises to them. 2 Pet. i. 4. (5.) In the awful punishment of their enemies. Exod. xix. 4. (6.) In his actual conduct towards them, in supporting them in life, blessing them in death, and bringing them to glory. Rom. viii. 30-39 vi. 23.

The properties of this love may be considered as, (1.) Everlasting. Jer. xxxi. 3; Eph. i. 4. (2.) Immutability. Mal. iii. 6; Zeph. iii. 17. (3.) Free; neither the sufferings of Christ nor the merits of men are the cause, but his own good pleasure. John iii. 16. (4.) Great and unspeakable. Eph. ii. 4-6, iii. 19; Ps. xxxvi. 7.

LOVE TO GOD. This is the first and great commandment. Matt. xxii. 37, 38. We must love God as the Lord, the supreme Ruler and Governor of the universe, and yet we must love him as our God, related to us by the nearest, the tenderest, and the strongest ties. We must love him with all our heart, that is, with the warmest and sincerest affection; we must love him with all our soul, that is, with the most devout and cheerful submission of the will to all his arrangements; we must love him with all our mind, that is, he must occupy the highest place in our esteem and regard. In short, the first and grand duty, that which lies at the foundation of all true Scriptural morality, is love to God. This, however, is not a natural principle of the human heart. The natural heart, instead of breathing love to the loving Jehovah, is enmity to God. Unless an entire change be wrought by God himself in the heart, and soul, and mind of man, the love of God cannot possibly dwell in him. Hence the apostle teaches us that "the love of God is shed abroad in our hearts by the Holy Ghost given unto us." And the manner in which the Holy Ghost produces this love in the soul is by enabling us to recognise and believe the love of God in Christ Jesus. Thus we learn to love him because he first loved us.

It is not either from the visionary mystic, the sensual fanatic, or the frantic zealot, but from the plain Word of God, that we are to take our ideas of this divine sentiment. There we find it described in all its native purity and simplicity. The marks by which it is there distinguished contain nothing enthusiastic or extravagant. It may be considered, (1.) As sincere. Matt. xxii. 36-38. (2.) Constant. Rom. viii. 35. (3.) Universal of all his attributes, commandments, ordinances, &c. (4.) Progressive. 1 Thess. iii. 12; 2 Thess. i. 3; Eph. iii. 19. (5.) Superlative. Lam. iii. 24. (6.) Eternal. Rom. viii. 38, 39. This love manifests itself, (1.) In a desire to be like God. (2.) In making his glory the supreme end of our actions. 1 Cor. x. 31. (3.) In delighting in communion with him. 1 John i. 3. (4.) In grief under the hidings of his face. Job xxiii. 2. (5.) In relinquishing all that stands in opposition to his will. Phil. iii. 8. (6.) In regard to his house, worship, and ordinances. Ps. lxxxiv. (7.) In love for his truth and people. Ps. cxix.; John xiii. 35. (8.) By confidence in his promises. Ps. lxxi. 1. And lastly, by obedience to his word. John xiv. 15; 1 John ii. 3.

LOVE OF OUR NEIGHBOUR is that humane, tender, and benevolent regard for our fellow-men required by the divine law, which is to be exercised towards all without exception, according to their degree of proximity to us, in kindred, place, acquaintance, and opportunity. It is a settled disposition of the soul, in the view of time and eternity, prompting us to every act of kindness towards them. It does not consist merely in pity to and relief of others (1 Cor. xiii.), in love to our benefactors only, and those who are related to us (Matt. v. 46, 47); it must flow from love to God, and extend to all mankind; yea, we are required, by the highest authority, to love even our enemies (Matt. v. 44); not so as to countenance them in their evil actions, but to forgive the injuries they have done to us, and promote as well as pray for their happiness, conversion, and salvation. See CHARITY.

LOVE OF THE WORLD. See WORLD.

LOW. Let the rich Christian rejoice in that he is made low, humble in the temper of his mind, or even that he has his outward wealth and honour taken from him, as that tends to his real good. James i. 10. Christ was made for a little while, or in a little degree, lower than the angels, in his state of humiliation. Ps. viii. 5; Heb. ii. 7, 9.

LOWER PARTS OF THE EARTH are, (1.) Valleys, which diversify the face of the globe, and are evidently lower than hills, which also contribute to that diversity. Isa. xlv. 23. (2.) The grave, which is the lowest part of the earth usually opened to men. Ps. lxxiii. 9. (3.) Sheol or hades, sometimes called the deep, or abyss; and, indeed, it is secluded from our cognizance, till we are called to visit "that bourne from whence no traveller returns." Eph. iv. 9. (4.) As to the phrase, "lower parts of the earth," in Ps. cxxxix. 15, it is obscure. It does not appear necessary to take the Hebrew word, rendered "lower parts," as expressing the extremely deep, or central parts, in reference to the general globe of the earth (see Ps. lxxiii. 9; Eph. iv. 9; Isa. xlv. 23); so that the dust of the earth, of which man was originally made, being taken from the valley, not from high hills, may be understood by the phrase. "The formation of my body was not without thy knowledge, though as wonderful as the composition of the globe itself!" Job x. 9-12.

LUBIMS. See LIBYA.

LUCIANISTS, or LUCANISTS, a sect so called from Lucianus, or Lucanus, a heretic of the second century, being a disciple of Marcion, whose errors he followed, adding some new ones to them. Epiphanius says he abandoned Marcion, teaching that people ought not to marry, for fear of enriching the Creator; and yet other authors mention that he held this error in common with Marcion and other Gnostics. He denied the immortality of the soul, asserting it to be material.

There was another sect of the Lucianists, who appeared some time after the Arias. They taught that the Father had been a Father always, and that he had the name even before he begot the Son, as having in him the power and faculty of generation; and in this manner they accounted for the eternity of the Son.

LUCIFER, a word which occurs only once in the Bible, as applied to a person, viz., in Isa. xiv. 12: "How art thou fallen from heaven, O Lucifer, son of the morning! how art thou cut down to the ground, which didst weaken the nations!" This name, though very commonly understood as referring to Satan, obviously applies here to the king of Babylon.

LUCIUS OF CYRENE, one of those who are called (Acts xiii. 1) "prophets and teachers" in the Church of Antioch. Whether he was a native of Cyrene, or belonged to the synagogue of the Cyrenians, does not appear. There is a tradition that he was bishop of Cyrene; and some think that he was one of the seventy disciples whom our Lord sent out. And the person bearing the name of Lucius, if he be not the same person with that now referred to, is mentioned by Paul in Rom. xvi. 21, as his kinsman. By many he is supposed to be identical with Luke.

LUD, the fourth son of Shem (Gen. x. 22), from whom the Lydians, a people of Asia-Minor, are supposed to have descended.

LUDIM, the son of Mizraim, Gen. x. 13. It is also the name of a people who are frequently mentioned in the sacred writings. The Ludim are often supposed to be the Lydians, but in various passages they are mentioned along with nations who belong to Africa. Isa. lxvi. 19; Jer. xlv. 9; Ezek. xxvii. 10, xxx. 5.

LUKE, the evangelist, is the author of the gospel bearing his name, and also of the Acts of the Apostles. Little is known with certainty concerning the incidents of his life. Eusebius says that he was a native of Antioch, and by profession a physician. This last circumstance is confirmed by Paul in Col. iv. 14. He generally accompanied the Apostle Paul in his travels. Dr Lardner and others have concluded, from the testimony of some of the early fathers, that Luke was a Jew; and by Origen, Epiphanius, and others, he has been supposed to have been one of the seventy. It is the opinion of Michaelis, on the contrary, that he was a Gentile. Kuinoel holds the middle sentiment that his parents were Gentiles, but that he himself had in early life become a convert to Judaism, and at an after period had embraced Christianity. He appears to have enjoyed the privilege of a liberal education, and to have been possessed of more learning than any other of the evangelists. The purity of his Greek, and its comparative freedom from the Hellenisms which are to be found in the other gospels indicate his probably Gentile extraction, and that the society in which he moved was of a polished character. Luke has sometimes been said to be a painter, but such an idea was never started before the fourteenth century. He is supposed to have died a natural death.

LUKE, GOSPEL OF. In reference to this gospel, we make the following condensed extracts from the excellent lectures of Dr Foote:—

"1. As to the divine authority of this Gospel, including, of course, its genuineness. And here it may be observed, first of all, that the great care which the Church took to distinguish the genuine and divinely inspired Gospels from the spurious, and their unanimity of decision, clearly prove the authority of those Gospels which are now received. None of these spurious Gospels are mentioned till towards the end of the second century, and few of them till the third or fourth century; whereas, the earliest Christian writers, such as Justin Martyr, Irenæus, Clemens of Alexandria, then others in succession, all show that our four Gospels were received as canonical, and these four alone. They were constantly read in the public assemblies. Copies of them were transcribed, and dispersed into various quarters; and the very disputes which arose, preserved them, as well as the rest of the Scriptures, from alteration.

"Again, if, as is probable, Luke was one of the Seventy who were commissioned to preach and work miracles, then was he also miraculously qualified to compose this history; and we have as good reason to admit the divine authority of this evangelist, and also of Mark, as of the apostolic evangelists, Matthew and John. Nay, though we were to doubt as to Luke being one of the Seventy, yet, both his human and his divine qualifications for this work might be safely rested solely on his being called to preach the gospel, and to act and write under the eye and approval of the Apostle Paul.

"A third argument for the divine origin of the Gospel by Luke, and an argument which is independent on the other sacred books, is that various circumstantial particulars, respecting the destruction of Jerusalem, therein and nowhere else foretold, have been exactly fulfilled.

"A very satisfactory proof also arises from the mutual dependence and connection of this and the other sacred books, especially the other three Gospels. In the midst of a delightful and instructive variety, there is such a harmony of fact, of doctrine, and of spirit, as to demonstrate that all these holy men had one common guide, and wrote not only truly, but by inspiration, as they were moved by the Holy Ghost.

"Its very early reception and divine authority being clear, it is comparatively of small importance that we are not able to ascertain exactly, in the

"2d place, The time when this Gospel was written. Thus far is certain, that it was written before the Acts of the Apostles, in the commencement of which it is referred to as Luke's 'former treatise.' And it being probable from the conclusion of the Acts, that they were written at least before the ninth year of Nero, it seems to follow that this Gospel was composed at an earlier period than some suppose, and before the death of the Apostle Paul.

"3. The original language of this Gospel was unquestionably the Greek, which was the language in most general use in those days. Luke must have been a man of education, and of a polished mind. His style, though not altogether free of Hebrew idioms, approaches nearer to the pure Greek than that of the other New Testament writers. Good judges are of opinion that his writings, considered merely as compositions, are able to bear a comparison with those of the finest classical authors; and it must be obvious to the readers of our version, that his manner of writing is very accurate, engaging, copious, emphatical and sublime. Nor ought these characteristics to be considered as trivial or useless. They may, indeed, be thought so by some who are not capable of judging; but as the Word of God was intended for the wise as well as for the unwise, for the scholar as well as for the unlearned, these diversities of manner afford, in the estimation of those whose education and habits qualify them to judge of such matters, an interesting view of the genius, and a very gratifying confirmation of the truth of the whole.

"4. The person to whom this Gospel is addressed. The name 'Theophilus,' signifies a lover, or beloved of God; but it would be very unnatural to suppose, with some, that the word is here used as a feigned name, to signify any Christian. Though this method has been adopted by other writers, it is not agreeable to the practice of the inspired. Theophilus is plainly the same real individual to whom the book of the Acts of the Apostles also is addressed. He is here styled 'most excellent.' This was an honorary title, bestowed on persons high in office, and of nobility, somewhat similar to the title of Excellency with us. Thus it is given to Felix in Acts xxiii. 26: 'Claudius Lysias unto the most excellent governor Felix.' Exactly the same title, too, in the original, though differently rendered in our version, is given to Festus in Acts xxvi. 25, where Paul says, 'I am not mad, most noble Festus.' Theophilus, therefore was not only a Christian, but a nobleman, and probably high in office." In reference to Luke's Gospel, Olshausen makes the following judicious remarks:—"We know that that sect which carried the sentiments of Paul to an erroneous extreme, the Marcionites, used only the Gospel of Luke, although Marcion was very well acquainted with the other Gospels, and regarded them as genuine. They had, however, altered Luke in conformity with their opinions, and thus formed, as it were, a new Gospel out of it, which, notwithstanding, still retained much resemblance to the original. The reason why the Marcionites selected Luke was, that this Gospel was written under the direction of the apostle Paul, who alone, in their opinion, was a genuine apostle of our Lord. Luke, as we know from the Acts of the Apostles, had travelled about with the apostle Paul for a long time, and, in particular, had also accompanied him to Rome. This is clear from the final chapters of the Acts of the Apostles. Connecting this fact with the conclusion of the work, it is perfectly evident when the evangelist finished it. According to the last chapter, Paul was two years in confinement at Rome. Here Luke breaks off without mentioning the issue of his trial. Now, as the Acts of the Apostles are only the second part of Luke's work, the Gospel being the first (compare Luke i. 1 with Acts i. 1), the latter cannot have been written subsequently; and probably, when Paul's death was apprehended, Luke wrote down the accounts he had received from him or through him, in order to secure them to posterity. Then the apostle, who was still living, attested the purity and accuracy of the work, and from Rome, the great central point of the religious, as well as the political world, it speedily made its way into the churches, in every province of the vast Roman empire."

LUKEWARMNESS, applied to the affections, indifference, or want of ardour. In respect to religion, hardly anything can be more culpable than this spirit. If there be a God possessed of unspeakable rectitude in his own nature, and unbounded goodness towards his creatures, what can be more inconsistent and unbecoming than to be frigid and indifferent in our devotions to him? Atheism, in some respects, cannot be worse than lukewarmness. The Atheist disbelieves the existence of a God, and, therefore, cannot worship him at all; the lukewarm owns the existence, sovereignty, and goodness of the Supreme Being, but denies him that fervour of affection, that devotedness of heart, and activity of service, which the excellency of his nature demands, and the authority of his Word requires. Such a character, therefore, is represented as absolutely loathsome to God, and obnoxious to his wrath. Rev. iii. 15, 16.

LUMP. This word, which is to be met with in various passages of Scripture, has a reference to figs, which were dried and pressed into round lumps. Maimonides says they were prepared in the form of round cakes. See FIG.

LUST, the irregular love of pleasure, riches, or honours. Rom. vii. 7-25; 1 John ii. 16. As in both Testaments, evil desires, as well as evil actions, are equally proscribed, so the first care of every man who would please God should be to crucify his lusts. Gal. v. 24.

LUTHER, MARTIN. This eminent reformer was born at Eisleben, a small town in Saxony, on the 10th of November 1483. His parents, who appear to have been noted for their industry, and integrity, and unostentatious piety, paid peculiar attention, not merely to his education at school, but to his religious training at home; and, accordingly, we find, that, through life, Luther retained an affectionate remembrance of the home of his early days. The vigorous energy of Luther's mind was soon apparent. At the age of twenty, having finished his literary studies with marked success, he obtained the degree of Master of Arts; and, more in accordance with the wishes of his parents than his own inclination, he began to prosecute the study of the law. A remarkable providential occurrence, however, at length determined him to change his profession. The sudden death, whether by violence or accident is disputed, of an intimate friend and companion, made a deep impression upon his mind, and seems to have thrown him for a time into a state of melancholy. One day while labouring under this depression of spirits, he happened, during a walk in the fields, to be overtaken by a violent storm of thunder and lightning, which so alarmed him, that on the spot he formed the resolution to withdraw from the world and retire into a monastery for life. To this proposal his father, who was a man of strong practical good sense, was much opposed. "Take care," said he to the rash determined youth, "that you are not ensnared by a delusion of the devil." All remonstrances, however, were ineffectual; without delay Martin entered a monastery at Erfurt.

In vain did Luther attempt to fly from himself, and to dissipate amid the endless formalities of the Romish ritual, that feeling of restless inquiry which seems to have taken possession of his mind. Under the influence of those serious impressions which he had imbibed under his father's roof, he dwelt much in his seclusion on the truths of religion. As yet his views were vague and indistinct; but still he felt that there was something which was absolutely necessary to be obtained before he could expect deliverance from the gloomy fears and forebodings with which he was beset. A work of grace, in fact, appears to have begun in his soul. He was labouring under a deep-rooted conviction of his sin, and although he struggled to quiet his troubled conscience by the constant observance of the numerous ceremonies which the Church of Rome demanded, all was unavailing; his sadness and almost desponding melancholy continued to increase rather than diminish. At length, to seek relief in the sympathy, if not the advice of another, he resolved to unbosom his griefs to Staupitz, the vicar-general of that order of monks to which he himself belonged. Staupitz, besides being a man of considerable sagacity, had himself been subject to feelings similar to those which oppressed the mind of Luther. His reply, accordingly, is somewhat remarkable: "You do not know," said he, "how useful and necessary this trial may be to you; God does not thus exercise you for nothing: you will one day see that he will employ you as his servant for great purposes."

At this time Luther was ignorant of the Scriptures; but the early instructions of pious parents, aided by a natural tenderness of conscience, and strong reflective powers, led him to entertain more vivid impressions of divine things than the extent of his knowledge would seem to warrant. He knew enough to lead him to thirst after still farther acquaintance with the truth. And at length, in the wise providence of God, his wishes, in this respect, were most unexpectedly gratified. In the course of the second year after his admission into the monastery at Erfurt, he met with a Latin Bible in the library. This was to him like the opening of the eyes to the blind. He perused the Word of God for himself; and while poring, with earnest assiduity, over the sacred page, ever and anon did he lift up his soul in prayer to the Father of lights, that he might be enabled to understand the Scriptures. Nor was his prayer unanswered. The light of divine truth shone into his soul with a brightness such as he had never before beheld. His study of the Bible was incessant; and under the influence of its refreshing statements, his gloom gave place to a steady cheerfulness, founded on the possession of that "peace which the world cannot give, and which it cannot take away."

In the year 1507, he was ordained; and so highly was his learning, both secular and theological, appreciated, that in the following year he was invited by the vicar-general to the professorship of philosophy at Wittenberg. Here he became distinguished, both as a teacher of philosophy and a popular preacher. His fame spread far and wide. While resident in the monastery, he had learned from an old monk the doctrine of justification by free grace; and this vital, this fundamental truth, he proclaimed with a boldness which attracted peculiar attention. "This monk," exclaimed Martin Polichius, a doctor of law and medicine, "will confound all the doctors, will exhibit new doctrines, and reform the whole Roman Church; for he is intent on reading the writings of the prophets and apostles, and he depends on the Word of Jesus Christ; this, neither the philosophers nor the sophists can subvert." Such a declaration, more especially from the mouth of a man who was himself accounted a wonder of his age, clearly showed that Luther had made an open profession of his views in regard to the peculiar doctrines of the Gospel, and more especially in regard to that vitally important doctrine, which he himself afterwards termed the article of a standing or a falling Church—justification by free grace, through faith in the righteousness of the Redeemer.

This cardinal tenet seems, at an early period of his Scripture studies, to have assumed the pre-eminence in his mind which justly belongs to it as the fundamental truth of revelation. And the more strongly he himself felt its importance, so much the more zealously did he labour to make it known to others. Such was the fervour, in fact, and holy eloquence, which characterized the preaching of Luther, that he was regarded as one of the first orators of his time. The theme which chiefly occupied his attention at this period, both in his private meditations and in his pulpit labours, may be learned from the following extract of a letter which he wrote to a friend:—"I desire to know what your soul is doing; whether, wearied at length of its own righteousness, it learns to refresh itself and to rest in the righteousness of Christ. The temptation of presumption in our age is strong in many, and specially in those who labour to be just and good with all their might, and, at the same time, are ignorant of the righteousness of God, which, in Christ, is conferred upon us with a rich exuberance of gratuitous liberality. They seek in themselves to work that which is good, in order that they may have a confidence of standing before God adorned with virtues and merits; which is an impossible attempt. You, my friend, used to be of this opinion, or rather this mistake; so was I: but now I am fighting against the error, but have not yet prevailed."

Four years before writing this letter, Luther had been appointed professor of divinity at Wittemberg, an office which, of course, led him to a still more diligent perusal of the Sacred Volume. At first, he had access only to the Vulgate, or Latin version of the Bible, but, anxious to draw his knowledge of divine truth from the originals, he directed his attention, with the utmost perseverance and success, to the study of the Greek and Hebrew languages. This enabled him to understand still more clearly the precious Word of Inspiration—that Word which, as he advanced in the knowledge of it, proved spirit and life to his soul. His views became clearer and more deeply impressive. He had not yet attacked the errors of the Romish Church, but his knowledge of the fundamental doctrines of religious truth was such as to lead many to regard him as a heretic. There is an interesting incident which is recorded of Luther, and which places in a strong light the undeviating fidelity with which he preached the gospel in the face of all opposition. Having been requested to preach before the Duke of Saxony, he dwelt at great length upon the freeness of the gospel offer even to the chief of sinners. An honourable matron who had heard the sermon, was asked by the Duke, at dinner, how she liked the discourse. "I should die in peace," she said, "if I could hear such another sermon." Enraged at this reply, the Duke exclaimed, "I would give a large sum of money that a sermon of this sort, which encourages men in a licentious course of life, had never been preached." Within a month after this conversation, the lady was confined to bed with sickness, and died rejoicing in the belief of the glorious truths which Luther had preached.

The time had now arrived when, though reluctantly, Luther felt himself necessitated to enter the field against the gross errors of that Church to which he belonged. In the course of his residence at Rome, on a mission which he had undertaken in connection with the affairs of the Augustinian monks, he had been shocked at the unbecoming and even immoral conduct of the clergy. But still his attachment to the Romish Church was great; and while he himself stood aloof from those of his clerical brethren who disgraced their office, he made no attempt to expose them to the world. And it was not until he was forced to assume the decided position of a Reformer, that he took steps to vindicate himself from the charge of heresy which was not unfrequently brought against him in private.

At length a circumstance occurred which roused the indignation of Luther. One John Tetzel, a Dominican friar, had been employed to sell indulgences, with the view of recruiting the exhausted treasuries of Pope Leo X. This profligate friar, whose presumption and effrontery knew no bounds, gave absolution, not only for past, but also for future sins, and scattered his indulgences with a profusion which shocked even those who were disposed to pay respect to the demands of the Papal See. Luther was enraged at the conduct of Tetzel, and made no secret of his disapprobation. He wrote to the Archbishop of Mentz, calling upon him to put a stop to such shameless excesses. His remonstrances, however, were unheeded. Thus frustrated in his endeavours to interest his ecclesiastical superiors, he published to the world his opinions in regard to the whole subject, including indulgences, purgatory, and other kindred topics; at the same time inviting any one publicly to dispute with him. Tetzel, alarmed at the appearance of Luther's exposure, promptly replied, attempting to refute the arguments which had been urged against the doctrines of the Church of Rome. The Church was roused upon the subject; and it is said that, at the first public disputation, no fewer than three hundred monks were present. Fair argument, however, was not sufficient for the ghostly Dominican. He ventured even to wreak his vengeance upon the Augustinian heretic, as he termed the Reformer, by causing his publication to be burned—an act of pitiful spite, which was speedily retaliated upon the work of Tetzel by the disciples of Luther at Wittemberg. The Reformer himself was far from sanctioning this rash act on the part of his followers; but on the contrary, alluding to the report which was industriously circulated by his enemies, that he had been the instigator of the deed, he thus expresses himself: "I wonder you could believe that I was the author of the deed. Think you that I am so destitute of common sense, as to stigmatize, in such a manner, a person in so high an office? I know better the rules of ecclesiastical subordination, and have some regard to my own character, both as a monk and a theologian, than to act so."

The controversy, however, was not limited to Luther and Tetzel; it called forth the strenuous exertions of others also, and, among the rest, of Henry Duke of Brunswick, who afterwards distinguished himself in the cause of the Reformation. Luther continued for several years to propagate his tenets, by publishing theses, not only on the subject of indulgences, but also upon the cardinal doctrines of Christianity. Nor was the contest confined to Germany. From the very seat of the Papal power there issued severe attacks upon the new doctrines; which, accordingly, Luther was compelled to defend. In these answers to the Romanists, even his opponents admitted that a spirit of gentleness was obviously discernible. At this time, also, he wrote to his own diocesan and to his vicar-general. In his letter to the former he expresses himself with that undaunted confidence which might be expected to characterize a person who was conscious of being engaged in a righteous cause. "I fear not," says he, "bulls and menaces; it is the audaciousness and the ignorance of men that induce me to stand forth, though with much reluctance; were there not a weighty cause for it, no one out of my own little sphere should ever hear of me. If the cause I defend be not the work of God, I would have nothing to do with it; let it perish. Let Him alone have glory to whom alone glory belongs." The position which Luther now occupied was one which harassed and distressed his mind. It was with the utmost reluctance that he felt himself compelled to oppose the Church with which he was connected, and more especially as the ground of his opposition was of such vital importance. Unwilling, however, to be considered as disclaiming the authority of the pope, as his enemies alleged that he did, he requested his faithful friend and patron, Staupitz, to transmit his writings to Rome, that all misrepresentation of his doctrines might be prevented. "Not," says he, "that I would involve you in my dangers. I desire alone to stand the shock of it. Let Christ see to it, whether the cause be mine or His. To the kind admonitions of my friends, who would warn me of danger, my answer is, The poor man has no fears. I protest that property, reputation, and honours shall be of no estimation with me, compared with the defence of the truth. I have only a frail body to lose, and that weighed down with constant fatigue. If, in obedience to God, I lose it through violence or fraud, what is the loss of a few hours of life? sufficient for me is the lovely Redeemer and Advocate, my Lord Jesus Christ, to whose praise I will sing as long as I live." He even addressed a letter to the pope himself, explanatory of his conduct, and couched in such language as clearly shows that, at this period, he had no intention of separating from the Church.

It is interesting to observe how clear, even at this early period of his history, Luther's views of divine truth were. The Bible had been for years his constant study—prayer had been his unceasing exercise; and in the habitual use of these two means of grace, his knowledge of the Gospel had become at once extensive and accurate. In the doctrines of free grace, more particularly, Luther gloried. "A Christian," to use his own words, "may glory that in Christ he has all things; that all the righteousness and merits of Christ are his own, by virtue of that spiritual union with him which he has by faith: and, on the other hand, that all his sins are no longer his, but Christ, through the same union, bears the burden of them. And this is the confidence of Christians, this is the refreshment of their consciences, that by faith our sins cease to be ours judicially, because they are laid on him, 'the Lamb of God that taketh away the sin of the world.'" The righteousness of Christ the Reformer viewed as the sole foundation of the sinner's hope; and he accordingly urged it, with the utmost earnestness, upon all who came within the sphere of his influence.

Thus pure were the religious sentiments of Luther, at the outset of his career as a Reformer, and before his doctrines had assumed such a prominence as to attract the attention and call down upon him the wrath of the Papal See. The Almighty had been gradually training him for the important duties which were yet to devolve upon him, and which could only be discharged by one who was specially enlightened by the Spirit of God. His work was arduous, and therefore he was endowed with peculiar qualifications, both of an intellectual and moral kind.

On the accession of Charles V. to the empire, Luther found himself in a very dangerous situation. Charles, in order to secure the Pope's friendship, had determined to treat him with great severity. His eagerness to gain this point rendered him not averse to gratify the Papal legates in Germany, who insisted, that, without any delay or formal deliberation, the diet then sitting at Worms ought to condemn a man whom the Pope had already excommunicated as an incorrigible heretic. Such an abrupt manner of proceeding, however, being deemed unprecedented and unjust by the members of the diet, they made a point of Luther's appearing in person, and declaring whether he adhered or not to those opinions which had drawn upon him the censures of the Church. Not only the emperor, but all the princes through whose territories he had to pass, granted him a safe-conduct; and Charles wrote to him at the same time, requiring his immediate attendance on the diet, and renewing his promises of protection from any injury or violence. Luther did not hesitate for one moment about yielding obedience; and set out for Worms, attended by the herald who had brought the emperor's letter and safe-conduct.

The reception which he met with at Worms was such as might have been reckoned a full reward of all his labours, if vanity and the love of applause had been the principles by which he was influenced. Greater crowds assembled to behold him than had appeared at the emperor's public entry; his apartments were daily filled with princes and personages of the highest rank; and he was treated with an homage more sincere, as well as more flattering, than any which pre-eminence in birth or condition can command. At his appearance before the diet he behaved with great decency and with equal firmness. He readily acknowledged an excess of acrimony and vehemence in his controversial writings; but refused to retract his opinions, unless he were convinced of their falsehood, or to consent to their being tried by any other rule than the Word of God. When neither threats nor entreaties could prevail on him to depart from this resolution, some of the ecclesiastics proposed to imitate the example of the Council of Constance; and, by punishing the author of this pestilent heresy, who was now in their power, to deliver the Church at once from such an evil. But the members of the diet refusing to expose the German integrity to fresh reproach by a second violation of public faith, and Charles being no less unwilling to bring a stain upon the beginning of his administration by such an ignominious action, Luther was permitted to depart in safety. A few days after he left the city, a severe edict was published, depriving him, as an obstinate and excommunicated criminal, of all the privileges which he enjoyed as a subject of the empire; forbidding any prince to harbour or protect him; and requiring all to seize his person as soon as the term specified in his protection should be expired.

But this rigorous decree had no considerable effect; the execution of it being prevented partly by the multiplicity of occupations which the commotions in Spain, together with the wars in Italy and the Low Countries, created to the emperor; and partly by a prudent precaution employed by the elector of Saxony, Luther's faithful patron. As Luther, on his return from Worms, was passing near Altenstrain, in Thuringia, a number of horsemen, in masks, rushed suddenly out of a wood, where the elector had appointed them to lie in wait for him, and surrounding his company, carried him, after dismissing all his attendants, to Wartburg, a strong castle, not far distant. There the elector ordered him to be supplied with every thing necessary or agreeable; but the place of his retreat was carefully concealed until the fury of the present storm against him began to abate, upon a change in the political system of Europe. In this solitude, where he remained nine months, and which he frequently called his Patmos, after the name of that island to which the Apostle John was banished, he exerted his usual vigour and industry in defence of his doctrines, or in confutation of his adversaries; publishing several treatises, which revived the spirit of his followers, astonished to a great degree, and disheartened at the sudden disappearance of their leader.

Luther, weary at length of his retirement, appeared publicly again at Wittenberg, upon the 6th of March 1522. He appeared, indeed, without the elector's leave; but immediately wrote him a letter to prevent him taking it ill. The edict of Charles V., severe as it was, had given little or no check to Luther's doctrine; for the emperor was no sooner gone into Flanders, than his edict was neglected and despised, and the doctrine seemed to spread even faster than before.

The diet of the empire was held at Nuremberg, at the end of the year, to which Hadrian VI. sent his Brief, dated November the 25th; for Leo X. died upon the 2d of December 1521, and Hadrian had been elected Pope upon the 9th of January following. In his Brief, among other things, he observes to the diet how he had heard with grief that Martin Luther, after the sentence of Leo X., which was ordered to be executed by the edict of Worms, continued to teach the same errors, and daily to publish books full of heresies; that it appeared strange to him that so large and so religious a nation could be seduced by a wretched apostate friar; that nothing, however, could be more pernicious to Christendom; and that, therefore, he exhorts them to use their utmost endeavours to make Luther, and the authors of those tumults, return to their duty; or, if they refuse and continue obstinate, to proceed against them according to the laws of the empire, and the severity of the last edict.

The resolution of this diet was published in the form of an edict, upon the 6th of March 1523; but it had no effect in checking the Lutherans, who still went on in the same triumphant manner.

In the beginning of the year 1524, Clement VII. sent a legate into Germany to the diet which was to be held at Nuremberg. Hadrian VI. died in October 1523, and was succeeded by Clement upon the 19th of November. A little before his death, he canonized Benno, who was bishop of Meissen in the time of Gregory VII., and one of the most zealous defenders of the holy see. Luther, imagining that this was done directly to oppose him, drew up a piece with this title, Against the new idol and old devil set up at Meissen, in which he treats the memory of Gregory with great freedom, and does not spare even Hadrian. Clement VII.'s legate represented to the diet of Nuremberg the necessity of enforcing the execution of the edict of Worms, which had been strangely neglected by the princes of the empire; but, notwithstanding the legate's solicitations, which were very pressing, the decrees of that diet were thought so ineffectual, that they were condemned at Rome, and rejected by the emperor.

In October 1524, Luther flung off the monastic habit; which, though not premeditated and designed, was yet a very proper preparative to a step he took the year after; we mean his marriage with Catherine De Bore.

His marriage, however, did not retard his activity and diligence in the work of reformation. He revised the Augsburg Confession of Faith and Apology for the Protestants, when the Protestant religion was first established on a firm basis.

In the year 1534, the Bible, translated by him into German, was first printed, as the old privilege dated Bibliopolis, under the elector's hand, shows; and it was published the same year. He also published this year a book against masses and the consecration of priests, in which he relates a conference he had with the devil upon those points; for it is remarkable in Luther's whole history, that he never had any conflicts of any kind within, but the devil was always his antagonist. In February 1537, an assembly was held at Smalkald about matters of religion, to which Luther and Melancthon were called. At this meeting Luther was seized with so grievous an illness, that there were no hopes of his recovery. He was afflicted with the stone, and had a stoppage of urine for eleven days. In this terrible condition he would needs undertake to travel, notwithstanding all that his friends could say or do to prevent him: his resolution, however, was attended with a good effect; for the night after his departure he began to be better. As he was carried along he made his will, in which he bequeathed his detestation of Popery to his friends and brethren; agreeably to what he used to say: Pestis eram virus, moriens ero mors tua, papa; that is, 'I was the plague of Popery in my life, and shall continue to be so in my death.'

This year the Pope and the court of Rome, finding it impossible to deal with the Protestants by force, began to have recourse to stratagem. They affected, therefore, to think that, though Luther had, indeed, carried things on with a high hand and to a violent extreme, yet what he had pleaded in defence of these measures was not entirely without foundation. Luther published, about the same time, a confutation of the pretended grant of Constantine to Sylvester, bishop of Rome; and also some letters of John Huss, written from his prison at Constance to the Bohemians. In this manner was Luther employed till his death, which happened in the year 1546.

LUTHERANISM, the system of Protestantism adopted by the followers of Luther. It has undergone some alterations since the time of its founder.

Luther reduced the number of sacraments to two, viz., baptism and the eucharist; but he believed in impanation or consubstantiation; that is, that the matter of the bread and wine remain with the body and blood of Christ; and it is in this article that the main difference between the Lutheran and the English Churches consists.

Luther maintained the mass to be no sacrifice; exploded the adoration of the host, auricular confession, meritorious works, indulgences, purgatory, the worship of images, and other superstitious practices which had been introduced in the corrupt times of the Romish Church. He also opposed the doctrine of free will, maintained predestination, and asserted our justification to be solely by the imputation of the merits and satisfaction of Christ. He also opposed the fastings of the Romish Church, monastical vows, the celibacy of the clergy, &c.

The Lutherans, however, of all Protestants, are said to differ least from the Romish Church; as they affirm that the body and blood of Christ are materially present in the sacrament of the Lord's supper, though in an incomprehensible manner; and likewise represent some religious rites and institutions, as the use of images in churches, the distinguishing vestments of the clergy, the private confession of sins, the use of wafers in the administration of the Lord's supper, the form of exorcism in the celebration of baptism, and other ceremonies of the like nature, as tolerable, and some of them as useful. The Lutherans maintain, with regard to the divine decrees, that they respect the salvation or misery of men, in consequence of a previous knowledge of their sentiments and characters, and not as free and unconditional, or as founded on the gratuitous mercy and sovereign will of God.

Towards the close of the seventeenth century, the Lutherans began to entertain a greater laxity of sentiment than they had before adopted. Their public teachers now use an unbounded liberty of dissenting from the decisions of those symbols or creeds which were once deemed almost infallible rules of faith and practice, and of declaring their dissent in the manner they judge the most expedient. Moshcim attributes this change in their sentiments to the maxim which they generally adopted, that Christians were accountable to God alone for their religious opinions; and that no individual could be justly punished by the magistrate for his erroneous opinions, while he conducted himself like a virtuous and obedient subject, and made no attempts to disturb the peace and order of civil society. This just maxim has, however, been made a cover for the vilest hypocrisy of scepticism.

In Sweden, the Lutheran Church is Episcopal; in Norway the same. In Denmark, the Episcopal authority is retained, and the name of bishop re-adopted instead of that of superintendent, which still obtains in most part of Germany; though the superior power is vested in a consistory, over which there is a president, with a distinction of rank and privileges, and a subordination of inferior clergy to their superiors, different from the parity of Presbyterianism.

LUZ. See BETHEL.

LYCAONIA, a province of Asia Minor, and forming part of Cappadocia, having Galatia north, Pisidia south, Cappadocia east, and Phrygia west. In it were the cities of Iconium, Derbe, and Lystra. Acts xiv. 6, &c. The "speech of Lycaonia" is generally believed to have been a corrupt Greek; that is, Greek mingled with a great deal of Syriac.

LYCIA, a province of Asia Minor, having Phrygia on the north, the Mediterranean on the south, Pamphylia on the east, and Caria on the west. Acts xxvii. 5. Paul landed at the port of Myra in this province, when going to Rome, A.D. 60.

LYDDA, a town situated on the road between Joppa and Jerusalem, nine miles east of the former place. It bore the name also of Diospolis, and in the Hebrew it was called Lod. At this place Peter performed the miracle of healing Æneas. Acts ix. 32-34. Not long after, it was entirely destroyed by Cestrius Gallus; but Josephus speaks of it as rebuilt, and the Rabbins held it in high estimation as a seat of Jewish learning. The place became somewhat famous in the time of the crusades, there being a magnificent church erected in it which was dedicated to St George. At present it is simply a ruined village.

LYDIA, the name of a woman of Thyatira, a seller of purple, as we learn from Acts xvi. 14, 15. Some have supposed that this female was called Lydia, from the fact that Thyatira is situated in Asia Minor. She is described as one "who worshipped God," which is generally understood as implying that she was a proselyte. This woman was converted by the preaching of Paul, and entertained him and his companions in her house. The province of LYDIA was in Asia Minor, and was so called probably from the circumstance that it was peopled by the children of Lud, the son of Shem. Gen. x. 23. In the time of the apostles it was a Roman province, and in it were situated Sardis, Thyatira, and Philadelphia. Lydia was particularly famed in ancient times for particular kinds of dye, which renders it a natural coincidence that Lydia, who was converted by Paul, was a seller of purple, or of vests dyed purple.

LYING, speaking falsehoods wilfully, with an intent to deceive. Thus, by Grove: "A lie is an affirmation or denial by words, or any other signs to which a certain determinate meaning is affixed, of something contrary to our real thoughts and intentions." Thus, by Paley: "A lie is a breach of promise; for whoever seriously addresses his discourse to another, tacitly promises to speak the truth, because he knows that the truth is expected."

The evil and injustice of lying appear, (1.) From its being a breach of the natural and universal right of mankind to truth in the intercourse of speech. (2.) From its being a violation of God's sacred law. Phil. iv. 8; Lev. xix. 11; Col. iii. 9. (3.) The faculty of speech was bestowed as an instrument of knowledge, not of deceit; to communicate our thoughts, not to hide them. (4.) It is esteemed a reproach of so heinous and hateful a nature for a man to be called a liar, that sometimes the life and blood of the slanderer have paid for it. (5.) It has a tendency to dissolve all society, and to indispose the mind to religious impressions. (6.) The punishment of it is tremendous: the loss of credit, the hatred of those whom we have deceived, and an eternal separation from God in the world to come. Rev. xxi. 8, xxii. 15; Ps. ci. 7. See EQUIVOCATION.

LYRE. See HARP.

LYSANIAS, or LYSIAS, tetrarch of Abilene, a small province in Lebanon (Luke iii. 1), was probably son or grandson of another Lysanias known in history, and put to death by Mark Antony, who gave part of his kingdom to Cleopatra. See ABILA.

LYSIAS, a friend and relation of King Antiochus Epiphanes, to whom he left the regency of Syria. There is also an individual bearing the name of Claudius Lysias, who was commander of the Roman guard which protected Paul from the violence of the infuriated Jews (Acts xxiii. 26), and sent him under guard to Felix the procurator.

LYSTRA, a city of Lycaonia, to which Paul fled when he was persecuted at Iconium. In this place also the apostle was stoned by the Jews, and left for dead. Acts xiv. 8-21. Lystra was the birthplace of Timothy. The exact situation of this, as well as the other cities of Asia Minor which Paul visited, cannot now be with certainty ascertained. None of them, indeed, with the exception of Iconium, can at the present day be pointed out.

M.

MAACAH, MAACHAH, MAACHATI, or BETH-MAACHA, a small province of Syria, east and north of the sources of Jordan, toward Damascus. It was called Abel-beth-maacha, because Abel was situated in it. See ABEL, the plain.

MAACHAH, daughter of Abishalom, wife of Rehoboam, king of Judah, and mother of Abijam his successor. 1 Kings xv. 2. In 2 Chron. xiii. 2, she is called Michaiah, daughter of Uriel of Gibeah. Maachah was also the daughter of Abishalom, wife of Abijam, king of Judah, and mother of Asa his successor. 1 Kings xv. 10, 13, 14. Asa deprived her of the office of priestess of the groves. There are several other persons of this name, mentioned in the Old Testament, particularly the daughter of the king of Geshur, who was the wife of David, and the mother of Absalom. 2 Sam. iii. 3.

MAALEH-ACRABBIM, a mountain, so called from the multitude of scorpions that infested it, at the southern end of the Salt Sea. Numb. xxxiv. 4; Josh. xv. 3.

MAARATH, the name of a place mentioned in Josh. xv. 59. It was situated somewhere in the mountains of the tribe of Judah.

MACCABEES. There are five books which bear this name, all of them illustrating the history of the Jews, during a period extending over nearly three hundred years. Only two of these are to be found in the Apocrypha; and although possessing no canonical authority, they are useful as throwing light upon an interesting portion of Jewish history. The Greek Church includes among their canonical books the third book of Maccabees, but the fourth and fifth are universally rejected. The first book is generally regarded as far more accurate and trustworthy than the second. Josephus is supposed to have been much indebted to it for the materials of his history; and Michaelis alleges that in some instances he has mistaken its meaning. The whole of the five books of Maccabees have been published with notes and illustrations by Dr Cotton, of Oxford.

MACCABEES, the name usually given to the whole of the sons of Mattathias, by whose warlike exploits their country was delivered from the oppression of the Syrians.

MACEDONIA, a province of Greece, situated between the Ægean and the Adriatic Seas. When Alexander the Great, son of Philip, king of Macedonia, carried his conquests over all Asia, the name of the Macedonians became celebrated throughout all the East. After the death of Alexander, his kingdom was divided among his own generals, who, as they had aided him in the conquest of them, were apparently entitled to share in the fruits of the conquest. Thus Alexander's vast empire was broken up, and Macedonia was conquered by the Romans, B.C. 168. Afterwards it became a portion of the Eastern Empire, and in the fifteenth century it fell into the hands of the Turks, who still maintain authority over it. Paul was commissioned by a vision to preach the gospel in Macedonia: "And a vision appeared to Paul in the night: There stood a man of Macedonia, and prayed him, saying, Come over into Macedonia, and help us." Acts xvi. 9. In this province he founded the Churches of Philippi and Thessalonica.

MACEDONIANS, the followers of Macedonius, bishop of Constantinople, who, through the influence of the Eunomians, was deposed by the Council of Constantinople, in 360, and sent into exile. He considered the Holy Ghost as a divine energy diffused throughout the universe, and not as a person distinct from the Father and the Son. The sect of the Macedonians was crushed before it had arrived at its full maturity, by the council assembled by Theodosius, in 381, at Constantinople. See SEMI-ARIANS.

MACHIR, the son of Manasseh, and the father of Gilead, used poetically in Judg. v. 14, for the tribe of Manasseh: that is, the half of that tribe which dwelt on the west of Jordan.

MACHELAH, the name of a cave near Hebron, purchased by Abraham from the children of Heth for a burial-place for his wife Sarah. In this cave were buried Abraham, Sarah, Isaac, Rebecca, Jacob, and Leah. The site was preserved by tradition, and the Empress Helena erected a church over it; but this has long since been converted into a Mohammedan mosque. The word Machpelah signifies double, and, accordingly, some have supposed that there was one cave within another, or two or more, contiguous to each other, in one of which Sarah was buried, and afterwards Abraham in another. But in Arabic, the word means shut up, as tombs in Eastern countries usually are.

MAD, MADNESS. Insanity, or mental derangement, a state which is frequently referred to in Sacred Scripture. The cases of demoniacal possessions which are noticed in the gospels have sometimes been confounded with madness. But it is far more consistent with the facts or phenomena, as related, to consider the Devil as having been permitted, in the time of our Lord, to exercise a supernatural influence over the bodies and minds of the demoniacs, thus affording an opportunity to the Redeemer of manifesting his power over unclean spirits. A case of feigned madness on the part of David is recorded in 1 Sam. xxi. 12-15. It has been sometimes alleged that David on that occasion was really seized with an epileptic affection. Such an idea, however, is entirely gratuitous, not being sanctioned in the slightest degree by the statements of the inspired record. The epithet mad is used in Scripture in a variety of different circumstances. It is applied (1.) To one really insane. Acts xxvi. 24; 1 Cor. xiv. 23. (2.) To one infuriated by angry passions. Acts xxviii. 11. (3.) To one in a state of bewilderment and perplexity. Deut. xxviii. 34; Eccles. vii. 7. (4.) To one infatuated in his attachment to idols. Jer. i. 38. (5.) Wholly under the influence of folly, deceit, and falsehood. Hosea ix. 7.

MADAI, the third son of Japheth (Gen. x. 2), who appears to have given origin to the Medes. Some think that he was the father of the Macedonians.

MADIAN. See MIDIAN.

MADMANNAH, a city of the tribe of Judah mentioned in Josh. xv. 31. It was inhabited by the posterity of Shaaph, one of the sons of Caleb. 1 Chron. ii. 49.

MAGDALA, a town on the west side of the Sea of Galilee, mentioned in Matt. xv. 39. It is supposed to have been the city of Mary Magdalene. No trace of the town is now to be found, unless a village called Migdol, close to the edge of the Lake of Tiberias, be, as Mr Buckingham thinks, the place in question. "The coasts of Magdala," spoken of by Matthew, are termed by Mark "the parts of Dalmanutha," but it is impossible to identify, in the present day, either the one site or the other.

MAGDALENE. See MARY MAGDALENE.

MAGI, or MAGIANS. This appellation is used to denote an ancient religious sect of Persia and other Eastern countries, who, abominating the adoration of images, worshipped God only by fire, in which they were directly opposite to the Sabians. (See SABIAN.) The Magi believed that there were two principles—one the cause of all good, and the other the cause of all evil; in which opinion they were followed by the sect of the Manichees. (See MANICHEES.) They called the good principle Jezden, and Ormuzd; and the evil principle Ahriman, or Aherman. The former was by the Greeks called Oromasdes; and the latter, Arimanius. The reason of their worshipping fire was, because they looked upon it as the truest symbol of Oromasdes, or the good god; as darkness was of Arimanius, or the evil god. In all their temples they had fire continually burning upon their altars, and in their own private houses.

The religion of the Magi fell into disgrace on the death of the ringleaders, who had usurped the sovereignty after the death of Cambyzes; and the slaughter that was made of the chief men among them sunk it so low, that Sabianism everywhere prevailed against it, Darius and most of his followers on that occasion going over to it. But the affection which the people had for the religion of their forefathers not being easily to be rooted out, the famous Zoroaster, some ages after, undertook to revive and reform it.

The reformation which this great man made in the Magian religion was in the first principle of it; for he introduced a god superior both to Oromasdes and Arimanius. Dr. Prideaux is of opinion that Zoroaster took the hint of this alteration in their theology from the prophet Isaiah, who brings in God saying to Cyrus, king of Persia, "I am the Lord, and there is none else: I form the light, and create darkness; I make peace and create evil." Isa. xlv. 7. In short, Zoroaster held that there was one supreme independent Being, and under him two principles, or angels—one the angel of light, or good, and the other the angel of evil, or darkness; that there is a perpetual struggle between them, which shall last to the end of the world; that then the angel of darkness and his disciples shall go into a world of their own, where they shall be punished in everlasting darkness; and the angel of light and his disciples shall go into a world of their own, where they shall be rewarded in everlasting light.

Zoroaster was the first who built fire-temples, the Magians before his time performing their devotion on the tops of hills and in the open air, by which means they were exposed to the inconvenience of rain and tempests, which often extinguished their sacred fires. To procure the greater veneration for these sacred fires, he pretended to have received fire from heaven, which he placed on the altar of the first fire-temple he erected, which was that of Xis, in Media, from whence, they say, it was propagated to all the rest. The Magian priests kept their sacred fire with the greatest diligence, watching it day and night, and never suffering it to be extinguished. They fed it only with wood stript of the bark, and they never blew it with their breath or with bellows, for fear of polluting it. To do either of these was death by their law. The Magian religion, as reformed by Zoroaster, seems, in many things, to be built upon the plan of the Jewish. The Jews had their sacred fire which came down from heaven upon the altar of burnt-offerings, which they never suffered to go out, and with which all their sacrifices and oblations were made. Zoroaster, in like manner, pretended to have brought his holy fire from heaven; and as the Jews had a Shekinah of the divine presence among them, resting over the mercy-seat in the Holy of Holies, Zoroaster likewise told his Magians to look upon the sacred fire in their temples as a Shekinah, in which God especially dwelt. From these and some other instances of analogy between the Jewish and Magian religion, Prideaux infers that Zoroaster had been first educated and brought up in the Jewish religion.

The priests of the Magi were the most skilful mathematicians and philosophers of the age in which they lived, insomuch that a learned man and a Magian became equivalent terms. This proceeded so far that the vulgar, looking on their knowledge to be more than natural, imagined they were inspired by some supernatural power. And hence those who practised wicked and diabolical arts, taking upon themselves the name of Magians, drew on it that ill signification which the word magician now bears among us.

The Magian priests were all of one tribe; as, among the Jews, none but the son of a priest was capable of bearing that office among them. The royal family among the Persians, as long as this sect subsisted, was always of the sacerdotal tribe. They were divided into three orders—the inferior clergy, the superintendents or bishops, and the archimagus or arch-priest.

Zoroaster had the address to bring over Darius to his new Reformed religion, notwithstanding the strongest opposition of the Sabians; and from that time it became the national religion of all that country, and so continued for many ages after, till it was supplanted by that of Mohammed. Zoroaster composed a book containing the principles of the Magian religion. It is called Zendavesta, and by contraction Zend.

MAGIC, MAGICIAN. In the earlier ages of the world, all who applied their minds to the study of science, and especially physical science, were termed magicians, so that the word was equivalent to learned men. At length, however, it became connected with astrology, witchcraft, and sorcery, and a magician was accounted a man who had intercourse with evil spirits. All such practices were expressly forbidden in the Old Testament, but there were many among the Israelites who made pretensions to be acquainted with sorcery. Josephus speaks of individuals in his time as practising deceptions of this kind, and in the Acts of the Apostles mention is made more than once of such persons. Acts xiii. 6-11; viii. 9.

MAGISTRATE. See ACTIONS AT LAW.

MAGNIFY, to make great, or declare to be great. God magnifies his own mercy or name, when, by the fulfilment or powerful application of his word, he discovers the unbounded nature of his mercy, and other perfections. Gen. xix. 19; Acts xix. 17. He magnifies his word above all his name, when he clearly discovers his mercy and faithfulness contained and pledged in it. Ps. cxxxviii. 2. Jesus magnified the law and made it honourable. His subjection to it, as he was the great Lawgiver, highly demonstrated the honour and immutable obligation of it; and he rendered to it an infinitely more valuable obedience than it could ever have received of men. Isa. xlii. 21. Men magnify God or his works when they publish and declare his greatness and glory. Ps. xxxiv. 3; Job xxxvi. 24.

MAGOG, the son of Japheth (Gen. x. 2), the ancestor of the Mogul, or Mongol Tartars, inhabiting the country of the ancient Scythians.

MAHALATH, is the title of Psalms liii. and lxxxviii. "To the chief musician on Mahalath;" which some think signifies a musical instrument; but Calmet rather thinks it imports dancing, which is certainly its proper signification in Hebrew; as if the title of the Psalm imported to be: "An instructive Psalm of David, for the chief master of dancing;" or, for the chorus of singers and dancers. Gesenius thinks it was probably the Ethiopian wahlet or cithara; others suppose it to have been the flute.

MAHANAIM, a city of the Levites, beyond the Jordan, on the brook Jabbok. The word signifies "two hosts." It was situated between the tribes of Gad and Manasseh, and derived its name from Jacob's meeting with the angels on his way to Padan-aram. Gen. xxxii. 2. Being a place of great strength, it was selected as a place of residence for Ishbosheth, the son of Saul. 2 Sam. ii. 8. The precise situation of Mahanaim is not now known, but Dr Robinson considers it probably identical with the modern Mahanah.

MAHANEH-DAN, literally "the Camp of Dan," a place near Kirjath-jearim, where six hundred Danites encamped on their way to Laish, as mentioned in Judg. xviii. 12.

MAHER-SHALAL-HASH-BAZ (he hasteneth to the prey), a name given to one of the sons of the prophet Isaiah, by way of prediction. The prophet observes, that his children were for signs and wonders, and this name is evidence of the fact. Of the same nature we are to consider Immanuel and some other names.

MAHOMET. See MOHAMMED—MOHAMMEDANISM.

MAID-SERVANT. See HANDMAID.

MAIN-SAIL. The word thus translated in Acts xxvii. 40, has given rise to considerable discussion. The Greek word rarely occurs, and hence the opinions concerning it have been various. Luther took it for the mast; but the mast had been already lowered, and perhaps cut away. Erasmus supposes it to have been the sail-yard. Some, as Junius, Alberti, Wolf, and Facciolati, regard it as a sail answering to the mizen-sail. Grotius, Vossius, Wetstein, Michæelis, Rosenmüller, and Kuinoel, understand by it a smaller sail near the prow, which was used to keep the ship steady, and prevent its working too much when the larger and upper sails were set.

MAJESTY, pomp, glory, royal dignity; frequently used in Scripture when speaking of the Divine Being.

MAKAZ, a city probably of Dan (1 Kings iv. 9), supposed by Calmet to be the Maktesh, the jaw-tooth or Enhakkore of Judg. xv. 19; Zeph. i. 11. See LEHI.

MAKHELOTH, an encampment of Israel in the desert (Numb. xxxiii. 25, 26); thought to be Malathis, which Eusebius and Jerome place twenty miles from Hebron, in the south of Judah.

MAKKEDAH, a city in the tribe of Judah, about fourteen miles south-west of Jerusalem. It was at this place that Joshua hanged Adoni-zedek and four other confederate kings, after which he destroyed the city.

MALACHI, the last of the minor prophets. This name signifies an angel or messenger of the Lord; and it has sometimes been doubted whether the word may not be used rather as a generic term than to denote a particular individual. Origen held the strange notion that he was an incarnate angel. Jerome alleged him to be identical with Ezra, an opinion which has been adopted by Calmet. From internal evidence, however, this idea may be easily disproved, as it bears plain marks of having been written a considerable time after the return from the Babylonian captivity, and probably posterior to the death of Ezra. Dr Kennicott, followed by Dr Hales, supposes that he wrote about B.C. 420. The temple seems to have been rebuilt, and the Jewish worship re-established, when Malachi prophesied; and in strong language he reproves both priests and people for their irreligious practices. Bishop Lowth thinks the style of Malachi's prophecies to indicate that in his time Hebrew poetry had begun to decline.

MALCHUS, a servant of Caiaphas, the high priest of the Jews in the latter period of our Lord's sojourn upon the earth. The name was not unfrequent among the Greeks; and seems, from its derivation, to correspond to our name king. Malchus being one of those who were commissioned to seize our Lord in the garden of Gethsemane, Peter in his zeal cut off his right ear; but Jesus instantly restored it, thus performing a miracle of mercy at the very time of his apprehension by his enemies.

MALICE, is a settled or deliberate determination to revenge or do hurt to another. It more frequently denotes the disposition of inferior minds to execute every purpose of mischief within the more limited circle of their abilities. It is a most hateful temper in the sight of God (Rom. i. 29), strictly forbidden in his holy Word (Col. iii. 8-13), disgraceful to rational creatures (1 Cor. xiv. 20), and every way inimical to the spirit of Christianity. Matt. v. 44; 1 Pet. ii. 1. See CHARITY—LOVE.

MALLOWS. This word occurs only in Job xxx. 4: "Who cut up mallows by the bushes, and juniper roots for their meat." It is uncertain what is meant by the original term. Gesenius supposes it to be the Atriplex halimus of Linnæus, a plant growing in Palestine, and resembling a salad; the fresh leaves of which serve as food for the poor, either raw or boiled. Dr. Mason Good thinks it a species of salsola or salt-wort.

MALTA. See MELITA.

MAMMON, the Syriac god of wealth, or worldly acquisitions of all kinds, answering to the Greek Plutus. Matt. vi. 24.

MAMRE, a city (Gen. xiii. 18), either the same as Hebron and Arba (Gen. xxiii. 17-19, xxxv. 27), or a place at a short distance from it. It was named after Mamre, an Amorite, the brother of Aner and Eshcol, who lived there. Travellers describe the plain as bounded on all sides and shut in by stony mountains; and there can be no doubt that it was on the summit of one of the mountains which border the valley that the memorable intercession of the patriarch for Sodom took place. Gesenius translates Gen. xiii. 18, "the terebinth or turpentine tree of Mamre." This tree is said by Sozomen, the ecclesiastical historian, to have still existed, six miles from Hebron, in the time of Constantine the Great.

MAN, the head and lord of the animal creation, in whose complex structure the organic or vegetable, the animal or sensitive, and the intellectual or spiritual world, are wonderfully united, and his condition on earth modified by the laws of each. See ADAM—PHYSIOLOGY—MATERIALISM—SOUL—DEPRIVITY—SALVATION.

MANAEN, a Christian prophet and teacher, who had been in early life a foster-brother of Herod Antipas. Acts xiii. 1. It is thought that he was one of the seventy disciples, but no particulars of his life are known.

MANASSEH, the eldest son of Joseph, born in Egypt B.C. 1714. His name denotes forgetfulness, because Joseph said, "God hath made me forget all my toil, and all my father's house." When on his death-bed Jacob adopted Manasseh, and giving him his parting blessing, assigned him an inheritance equally with his own sons. Guided by the Spirit of God, however, the old man preferred Ephraim before Manasseh, saying, "His younger brother shall be greater than he." Moses also speaks of "the ten thousands of Ephraim, and the thousands of Manasseh." When the Israelites were first numbered (Numb. i. 35), the descendants of Manasseh amounted to 32,200 fighting men. On the entrance of the Israelites into Canaan, the tribe of Manasseh was divided, one-half having settled beyond, and the other half on this side the river Jordan.

MANASSEH, the fourteenth king of Judah, who succeeded his father Hezekiah, ascending the throne at the early age of twelve years, and reigning during the extended term of fifty-five years. During the first part of his reign, the conduct of Manasseh formed a striking and painful contrast to that of his godly father. Led away probably by wicked counsellors, he re-established that system of idolatry which Hezekiah had abolished; nay, he built altars to the whole host of heaven, and caused his son to pass through the fire to Moloch. He patronised wickedness in every form among the people, and persecuted even to the death those who refused to surrender their allegiance to the true God. The multiplied and aggravated crimes of Manasseh cried aloud to heaven for the infliction of Jehovah's judgments. The cruel and idolatrous prince was carried captive into Babylon, towards the twenty-second year of his reign. Thus laid down under the mighty hand of God, he was brought to deep humiliation and confession of sin. The Lord heard his prayer, and restored him to his own land, where he sought to repair the serious injuries which he had inflicted upon his subjects. He restored the worship of God, he repaired the fortifications of Jerusalem, and placed strong garrisons in all the fenced cities of Judah. Manasseh died at Jerusalem, and was buried "in the garden of his own house, in the garden of Uzza." 2 Kings xxi. 18. There is a portion of the Apocrypha entitled, "The Prayer of Manasses, King of Judah, when he was holden captive in Babylon." It was never recognised as canonical, and it is rejected as spurious even by the Church of Rome.

MAN-CHILD. In Job iii. 3, we find the patriarch exclaiming, under the severity of his sufferings: "Let the day perish wherein I was born, and the night in which it was said, There is a man-child conceived." There is in this passage an obvious reference to the joy which was, and indeed still is, expressed in the East when a male child is born. Jeremiah (xx. 15) alludes to the same custom: "Cursed be the man who brought tidings to my father, saying, A man-child is born unto thee; making him very glad." See BIRTH.

MANDRAKE (dudaim; Gen. xxx. 14-16; Cant. vii. 13). Interpreters have wasted much time and pains in endeavouring to ascertain what is intended by the Hebrew word dudaim. Some translate it by "violet," others, "lilies," "jasmynes," "truffle or mushroom;" and some think that the word means "flowers," or "fine flowers," in general. Bochart, Calmet, and Sir Thomas Browne, suppose the citron intended; Celsius is persuaded that it is the fruit of the lote tree; Hiller, that cherries are spoken of; and Ludolf maintains that it is the fruit which the Syrians call mauz, resembling in figure and taste the Indian fig. But the generality of interpreters and commentators understand by dudaim, mandrakes, a species of melon; and it is so rendered in the Septuagint, and in both the Targums, on Gen. xxix. 32-34, xxx. 14. It appears from Scripture, that they were in perfection about the time of wheat harvest, have an agreeable odour, may be preserved, and are placed with pomegranates. Cant. vii. 13. Nor was the opinion of their prolific virtue confined to the Jews; the Greeks and the Romans had the same notion of mandrakes. They gave to the fruit the name of "Apple of Love," and to Venus that of Mandragoritis. The Emperor Julian, in his epistle to Calixenes says that he drank the juice of mandrakes to excite his inclinations. And before him, Dioscorides had observed of it, "The root is supposed to be used in philters or love-potions." On the whole, there seems little doubt but this plant had a provocative quality, and therefore its Hebrew name dudaim may be properly deduced, says Calmet, from dudim, pleasures of love.

MANEH, a weight which, comparing 1 Kings x. 16, with 2 Chron. ix. 16, seems to have amounted to an hundred shekels. During the Babylonish captivity, however, the Jews seem to have used the weights and measures of foreign nations. Hence we find Ezekiel (xlv. 12) thus describing the maneh: "And the shekel shall be twenty gerahs: twenty shekels, five and twenty shekels, fifteen shekels, shall be your maneh." Cocceius and Michælis think that Ezekiel refers to a triple maneh.

MANGER. The original word thus translated in Luke ii. 7, 12, 16, has occasioned no small difference of opinion. It properly signifies an open court enclosed by high wooden pales, and communicating with the house. Dr. Campbell reasons strongly in favour of the ordinary translation, "a manger." Oriental travellers assure us that the Eastern nations use no manger properly so called, but only a coarse hair-bag. Most of the fathers and ancient interpreters explain the word as referring to those natural stables which abound in Palestine, affording shelter to both men and cattle.

MANICHEES, or MANICHEANS (Manichæi), "a sect of ancient heretics, who asserted two principles, so called from their author Manes, or Manichæus, a Persian by nation, and educated among the Magi, being himself one of that number before he embraced Christianity.

"This heresy had its first rise about the year 277, and spread itself principally in Arabia, Egypt, and Africa. St Epiphanius, who treats of it at large, observes that the true name of this heresiarch was Cubricus, and that he changed it for Manes, which in the Persian or Babylonish language signifies vessel. A rich widow, whose servant he had been, dying without issue, left him stores of wealth; after which, he assumed the title of the apostle or envoy of Jesus Christ.

"The doctrine of Manes was a motley mixture of the tenets of Christianity with the ancient philosophy of the Persians, in which he had been instructed during his youth. He combined these two systems, and applied and accommodated to Jesus Christ the characters and actions which the Persians attributed to the god Mithras. He established two principles, viz., a good and an evil one: the first a most pure and subtle matter, which he called light, did nothing but good; and the second a gross and corrupt substance, which he called darkness, nothing but evil. This philosophy is very ancient, and Plutarch treats of it at large in his Isis and Osiris."

MANIFEST, to show a thing clearly, and render it visible. Eccles. iii. 18; 1 Tim. iii. 16. The Son of God was manifest when he appeared visibly in our nature. 1 John iii. 5. The apostles were manifest when it fully appeared, by their behaviour, doctrine, and success, that they were sent of God. 2 Cor. xi. 6. The saints and the wicked are manifest when the difference between their characters and states is clearly discovered. 1 John iii. 10. The manifestation of the Spirit is either that which the Holy Ghost shows to men, the doctrines of the Gospel, the love of God, and our interest in it, and the things of another world; or his gifts and graces, whereby his power and residence in us are plainly evinced. 1 Cor. xii. 7. The manifestation of the sons of God is the public display of their station and happiness, in their being openly acknowledged and honoured by Christ at the last day. Rom. viii. 19.

MANIFOLD. God's wisdom, mercy, and grace, are manifold; unbounded in their nature, showed forth in a variety of ways, and numerous in their fruits. Eph. iii. 10; Neh. ix. 19; 1 Pet. iv. 10. Temptations and trials are manifold, when very numerous, and in many different forms, and from various sources. 1 Pet. i. 6. Transgressions are manifold, when many in number, and of many different forms, and in many various degrees of aggravation. Amos v. 12.

MANNA. The food which Jehovah gave the children of Israel during their continuance in the deserts of Arabia, from the eighth encampment in the Wilderness of Sin. Moses describes it as white like hoar frost, round, and of the bigness of coriander seed. It fell every morning upon the dew; and when the dew was exhaled by the heat of the sun, the manna appeared alone, lying upon the rocks or the sand. It fell every day except on the Sabbath, and this only around the camp of the Israelites. Every sixth day there fell a double quantity; and though it putrefied and bred maggots when it was kept any other day, yet on the Sabbath there was no such alteration; and the same substance which was melted by the heat of the sun when it was left abroad, was of so hard a consistence when brought into the tent that it was beaten in mortars, and would even endure the fire made into cakes and baked in pans. It fell in so great quantities during the whole forty years of their journey, that it was sufficient to feed the whole multitude of above a million of souls. Every man (that is, every male or head of a family), was to gather each day the quantity of an omer (about three quarts English measure); and it is observed that "he that gathered much had nothing over, and he that gathered little had no lack," because his gathering was in proportion to the number of persons for whom he had to provide. Some having fewer, others more in family, and the gathering being in proportion to the persons who were to eat of it, therefore he that gathered much had nothing over, and he that gathered little had no lack. Probably every man gathered as much as he could; and then, when brought home and measured by an omer, if he had a surplus it went to supply the wants of some other family that had not been able to collect a sufficiency, the family being large, and the time in which the manna might be gathered, before the heat of the day, not being sufficient to collect enough for so numerous a household, several of whom might be so confined as not to be able to collect for themselves. Thus there was an equality; and in this light the words of St Paul, 2 Cor. viii. 15, lead us to view the passage.

What this substance was we know not. It was nothing that was common to the wilderness. It is evident that the Israelites never saw it before, for Moses says, Deut. viii. 3, 16: "He fed thee with manna which thou knewest not, neither did thy fathers know." And it is very likely that nothing of the kind had ever been seen before; and, by a pot of it being laid up in the ark, it is as likely that nothing of the kind ever appeared more, after the miraculous supply in the wilderness had ceased.

In our version of Psalm lxxviii. 24, 25, we read, "He rained down manna upon them to eat, and gave them of the corn of heaven. Man did eat angels' food; he sent them meat to the full." Dr Durell observes that Abirim is used in no other place to denote angels, and seems here to denote oxen, as in Ps. xxii. 12; l. 13; lxxviii. 30; Isa. xxxiv. 7; and Jer. l. 11; and that the corresponding word, Tsheda, which signifies any food procured by hunting, countenances this sense. He would, therefore, render it, "Every one eat the flesh of oxen; he sent them venison (or victuals) in plenty."

The author of the Book of Wisdom (xvi. 20, 21) says, that the manna so accommodated itself to every one's taste that it proved palatable and pleasing to all.

It has been remarked that at this day manna is found in several places of the world,—in Arabia, on Mount Libanus, Calabria, and elsewhere. The most famous is that of Arabia, which is a kind of condensed honey, which exudes from the leaves of trees, from whence it is collected when it has become concremented. Salmasius thinks this of the same kind which fed the children of Israel; and that the miracle lay, not in creating any new substance, but in making it fall duly at a set time every day throughout the whole year, and that in such plenty as to suffice so great a multitude. But, in order for this, the Israelites must be supposed every day to have been in the neighbourhood of the trees on which this substance is formed, which was not the case, neither of those trees grow in those deserts. Besides, this kind of manna is purgative, and the stomach could not endure it in such quantity as is implied by its being eaten for food. In short, the whole history of the giving the manna is miraculous. On the typical character of the manna the following observations of Burkitt are valuable:—"As Christ is the truth and substance of all types in the Old Testament, so, particularly, the manna was an illustrious type of Christ. In many things they agree, and in some they differ. They agree in their original: manna came down from above—so did Christ; manna was freely given—so is Jesus Christ the free gift of God; manna was not fit to be eaten as it lay in the field, but must be ground in a mill, or beaten in a mortar, and baked in an oven, before it was fit for food—Christ was ground by his sufferings, bruised on the cross, scorched in the fiery oven of his Father's wrath, that he might become a fit Saviour for us. Again, as the manna was gathered by the Israelites daily and equally, it was rained down about their tents, and every man had his omer; thus is Christ in the ministry of the word daily offered to a lost world, and all that believe in him shall share alike in the benefit of the justification, sanctification, and glorification from him. But the manna and Christ differ in this, and the truth excels the type, thus: there is a quickening, enlivening virtue, or life-giving power, in Christ, the bread of life, which was never found in manna, the bread of Israel; and whereas manna only fed the body of an Israelite, and this only for a little time in the wilderness, Christ nourisheth the soul—the souls of believers—be they Jew or Gentile, bond or free, and this not for a time, but for eternity: the bread of God is He which cometh down from heaven, and giveth life unto the world."

MANNER. God spake unto the fathers, under the Old Testament, in divers manners; not fully, and all at once, but by little and little, sometimes more and sometimes less clearly; and by the different means of angels, prophets, visions, dreams, voices from heaven, Urin and Thummim, &c. Heb. i. 1. To say The manner of Beersheba liveth, was to swear by the idol there worshipped. Amos viii. 14.

MANOAH, the father of Samson, was of the tribe of Dan, and a native of the city of Zorah. Judg. xiii. 6-23. See SAMSON.

MAN OF GOD generally signifies a prophet, a man devoted to God—to his service. Moses is called peculiarly "The man of God." Deut. xxxiii. 1; Josh. xiv. 6. Our Saviour frequently calls himself "the Son of Man," in allusion, probably, to the prophecy of Daniel, in which the Messiah is spoken of. Dan. vii. 13.

MAN OF SIN. See ANTICHRIST.

MANSION, a habitation or dwelling. In John xiv. 2, it is said, "In my Father's house are many mansions: if it were not so, I would have told you. I go to prepare a place for you;" implying that heaven is a palace sufficiently capacious to contain an immense multitude "which no man can number." See HEAVEN.

MANSLAYER. See AVENGER—REFUGE.

MANTLE, a large flowing robe of an elegant make, worn over their gowns by the Oriental ladies at home. It is referred to in Isaiah's description of an Eastern lady's dress. Isa. iii. 22. A sacred cloak or mantle was worn in ancient times by the prophets, as a badge of their office. It was in the time of Elijah of camel's hair, and this continued in use for a long time. John the Baptist wore a dress of camel's hair, probably referring to his mantle, in token of his prophetic office. In India the Brahmans wear a yellow cloak. Such importance was attached to the prophet's cloak, that we find Elijah, on his ascension, dropping his mantle into the arms of Elisha, as his successor.

MANURE. See AGRICULTURE.

MAON, a city in the south of Judah (Josh. xv. 55; 1 Sam. xxiii. 24, 25, xxv. 2), and near which Nabal the Carmelite had great possessions. It is thought to be the Mænois, or Mæonis which Eusebius places in the neighbourhood of Gaza; and the Menæum of the Codex Theodosianus, which is near Beersheba.

MAONITES, a people who are mentioned in Judg. x. 11, 12, as, along with the Amalekites, Sidonians, Philistines, and others, having oppressed the Israelites.

MARAH (bitterness). When the Israelites, coming out of Egypt, arrived at the desert of Etham, in Arabia, they there found the water to be so bitter that neither themselves nor their cattle could drink it. Exod. xv. 23. They therefore began to murmur against Moses, who, praying to the Lord, was shown a kind of wood which, being thrown into the water, made it potable. This wood is called alviah by the Mohammedans. The word alua has some relation to aloes, which is a very bitter wood; and some interpreters have hinted that Moses took a very bitter sort of wood, on purpose that the power of God might be more remarkable in sweetening these waters. Josephus says, that this legislator used the wood which he found by chance lying at his feet.

MARAN-ATHA. See ANATHEMA.

MARBLE (shish—1 Chron. xxix. 2; Esth. i. 6; Cant. v. 15), a valuable kind of stone, of a texture so hard and compact, and of a grain so fine, as readily to take a beautiful polish. It is dug out of quarries in large masses, and is much used in buildings, ornamental pillars, &c. Marble is of different colours—black, white, &c.; and is sometimes elegantly clouded and variegated. The Septuagint and Vulgate render it "Parian stone," which was remarkable for its bright white colour. Probably the cliff Ziz (2 Chron. xx. 16), was so called from its being a marble crag: the place was afterwards called Petra. The variety of stones mentioned in the pavement of Ahasuerus might be marble of different colours. The ancients sometimes made pavements wherein were set very valuable stones.

MARCH. See ARMY.

MARIOLATRY, the worship of the Virgin Mary. The Roman Catholic and the Greek Church both retain this idolatrous practice. Romish writers refuse to admit that they give the Virgin the same kind of worship which is given to the Divine Being. They try to make a distinction of degree in the worship paid to beings of different rank. Thus the worship paid to God they call latría, that paid to saints and angels they call dulia, and that paid to the Virgin hyperdulia, the last being intermediate in degree between the two first. This distinction, however, meets with not the slightest countenance from the Word of God. Little indeed is said of Mary at all in the Bible, but that little the Romanist considers as affording sufficient warrant for this species of creature-worship. Thus Luke i. 26-38 is often adduced in support of Mariolatry. Nay, it has been asserted that the angel

Gabriel worshipped the Virgin, though no such statement is made in the account of his visit given by the evangelist Luke. He approached her, it is true, with the salutation "Hail;" but nothing is more common than such a mode of salutation in the East. It is a Greek form in ordinary use, and equivalent to the Hebrew expression, "Peace be to thee." And if Mary was so confessedly superior to the angel, that he came to worship her, how are we to explain the alarm and consternation into which she was thrown by the sight and the words of the angel? "When she saw him," it is said, "she was troubled at his saying." The word translated "troubled" has a preposition prefixed to it, which gives to the verb an intensive force, implying that Mary was greatly troubled. Sinful men are often said in Scripture to have been struck with solemn awe and dread at the sight of a heavenly messenger; but it was surely scarcely befitting the "Queen of Heaven" to tremble at the sight of one who came in humble adoration to bow before her. Jesus, while he was on the earth, was frequently attended by angels, but nowhere do we find him troubled either at the sight of them or at their sayings. If Mary, then, was in any respect equal to Jesus, why should she have been filled with such alarm that the angel behoved to quiet her anxious mind with the soothing words, "Fear not, Mary; for thou hast found favour with God." And in what was this divine favour shown? In the high honour conferred upon her of being the mother of Jesus; but, lest we should unduly honour Mary on account of this her earthly relationship to the Saviour, we read of a woman, who, on one occasion cried to him from the crowd, "Blessed is the womb that bare thee, and the paps which thou hast sucked;" but how significant the reply of Christ, "Yea, rather, blessed are they that hear the word of God and keep it!" And, accordingly, we find her cousin Elisabeth declaring afterwards, in speaking of Mary, "And blessed is she that believed: for there shall be a performance of those things which were told her from the Lord,"—language to which Mary replies in words expressive of her own sense of sin and dependence upon Jesus, "My soul doth magnify the Lord, my spirit doth rejoice in God my Saviour."

MARCUS. See MARK.

MARESHAH, or MARISSA, a city of Judah, called also Moresheth and Morasthi. The prophet Micah was a native of this city. It was two miles from Eleutheropolis; and near to it, in the vale of Zephathah, was fought a famous battle between Asa, king of Judah, and Zerah, king of Cush, in which Asa defeated a million of men. 2 Chron. xiv. 9–13. In the latter times of the Jewish commonwealth, Maresah belonged to Idumea, as did several other southerly cities of Judah.

MARIAMNE. See HEROD.

MARK, one of the four Evangelists, and the nephew of Barnabas. Col. iv. 10. Epiphanius and some others allege that he was one of the seventy disciples, but this is quite uncertain. His mother was Mary, the sister of Barnabas, who appears to have been a devout woman, as the early Christians often met together in her house for prayer. Acts xii. 12. He seems to have been held in great esteem by Peter, who styles him his son (1 Peter v. 13), an expression which has led some to imagine that he owed his conversion, under God, to the Apostle Peter. He accompanied Paul and Barnabas in their jour-neyings for a time; but at length, it may be from want of zeal in his Master's cause, he returned to Jerusalem. Acts xiii. On an after occasion, when Paul and Barnabas were about to visit the churches, Barnabas proposed that Mark should accompany them. To this, however, Paul decidedly objected, because he had formerly forsaken them. The difference of opinion led to a separation between Paul and Barnabas, and the latter, accompanied by his relative Mark, went to Cyprus. Acts xv. 37–39. It appears evident that Paul afterwards was reconciled to Mark, for we find him desiring Timothy to take Mark with him to Rome, accompanying the desire with a warm expression of approbation. Thus, "Only Luke is with me. Take Mark, and bring him with thee: for he is profitable to me for the ministry." 2 Tim. iv. 11. Such is the whole amount of information with which we are furnished by the Sacred Scriptures. The early writers inform us that after Mark left Rome he went into Asia, where, meeting with Peter, he returned with him to Rome, where he remained for some time, and is supposed to have written his Gospel in that city. Some writers assert that he preached afterwards in Egypt, and planted a Christian church in Alexandria. According to Jerome, he died there, in the eighth year of the reign of Nero; but there is no evidence that he suffered martyrdom, as some more modern writers affirm.

MARK'S GOSPEL. This is the second in order of the four Gospels. There is no doubt as to its authorship, the early writers being unanimous in attributing it to Mark, who, although perhaps he was not a direct eye-and-ear-witness of what he has written, yet being the intimate friend of the Apostle Peter, must have received from that eminent apostle the most correct and authentic account of the transactions which he records. Some have even gone the length of affirming that Peter revised and approved this Gospel, and others have even given it the name of the Gospel according to Peter. Eusebius, quoting from Clement, declares that Mark wrote the Gospel at the earnest request of the hearers of Peter at Rome. While, however, the genuineness and authenticity of the Gospel are undoubted, some critics have suspected that the last twelve verses of the sixteenth chapter were not written by the Evangelist, but are spurious. There is no doubt that the verses are not found in the Vatican MSS., and in the canons of Eusebius, in the Codex Alexandrinus, in the Peshito or Old Syriac, and in the Arabic version. But what is still more important, Irenæus, who wrote so early as the second century, says:—"But at the end of the Gospel, Mark says: 'And when the Lord Jesus, after he had spoken to them, was received up into heaven, and sat on the right hand of God.'" No authority of equal antiquity has been produced in opposition to the disputed passage. Hippolytus, who wrote in the early part of the third century, also bears testimony in favour of the disputed fragment. The following remarks on the design of the Gospel are quoted from the valuable pages of Mr Hartwell Horne:—

"From the Hebraisms discoverable in the style of this Gospel, we should readily conclude that its author was by birth and education a Jew; but the numerous Latinisms it contains not only show that it was composed by a person who had lived among the Latins, but also that it was written beyond the confines of Judea. That this Gospel was designed principally for Gentile believers (though we know that there were some Jewish converts in the church at Rome), is further evident from the explanations introduced by the Evangelist, which would have been unnecessary if he had written for Hebrew Christians exclusively. Thus, the first time the Jordan is mentioned, the appellation 'river' is added to the name. Mark i. 5. Again, as the Romans could not understand the Jewish phrase of 'defiled or common hands,' the Evangelist adds the parenthetical explanation of, 'that is, unwashen.' (vii. 2.) When he uses the word corban he subjoins the interpretation, 'that is, a gift' (vii. 11); and instead of the word mammon he uses the common term, 'riches.' Again, the word Gehenna, which in our version is translated hell (ix. 43), originally signified the Valley of Hinnom, where infants had been sacrificed to Moloch, and where a continual fire was afterwards maintained to consume the filth of Jerusalem. As this word could not have been understood by a foreigner, the Evangelist adds the words "unquenchable fire" by way of explanation. These particularities corroborate the historical evidence above cited, that Mark designed his Gospel for the use of Gentile Christians.

"Lastly, the manner in which St Mark relates the life of our Saviour is an evidence that he wrote for Gentile Christians. His exordium is singular; for while the other Evangelists style our Saviour the 'Son of Man,' St Mark announces him at once as the Son of God (i. 1), an august title, the more likely to engage the attention of the Romans; omitting the genealogy of Christ, his miraculous conception, the massacre of the infants at Bethlehem, and other particulars, which could not be essentially important in the eyes of foreigners."

MARKET. In early times it was usual to hold markets at the gates of cities, sometimes inside, and at other times outside the walls. This is still the practice in the East, at least in so far as the sale of agricultural produce and cattle are concerned; but manufactured goods are sold in bazaars within the towns. The market or forum in ancient cities was a large area or open space, one side of which was appropriated as a public market, while the other sides were occupied with public buildings, such as temples, theatres, or courts of justice. Of the market-places at Athens, of which there were many, the most celebrated were the Old and New Forum. The former was in the Ceramicus, a very ample space, partly within and partly without the city. The latter was outside of the Ceramicus, in a place called Eretria. And this appears to have been the market-place to which reference is made in Acts xvii. 17; for at the time when Paul was at Athens, the forum had been transferred from the Ceramicus into the Eretria, a change which indeed had been introduced in the time of Augustus; and that this was the most frequented part of the city, we learn from Strabo. Besides, the Eretriac forum was situated before the portico or stoa, in which the Stoics, of whom mention is made in verse 18th, used to hold their public discourses. It is well observed by Harmer, that though in our country the carrying on of religious disputations in the markets would be thought improper, and the effect of intemperate zeal, yet it would even now not be strange in Arabia and other parts of the East, where people meet in such places for conversation. And it appears from various writers that the practice was not unusual at Athens.

MARONITES, a sect of Eastern Christians, who follow the Syrian rites, and are subject to the pope; their principal habitation being on Mount Libanus, or between the Ansarians to the north, and the Druses to the south. Mosheim informs us, that the Monothelites, condemned and exploded by the council of Constantinople, found a place of refuge among the Mardaites, signifying in Syriac rebels, a people who took possession of Lebanon, A.D. 676, which became the asylum of vagabonds, slaves, and all sorts of rabble; and about the conclusion of the seventh century they were called Maronites, after Maro, their first bishop; a name which they still retain. None, he says, of the ancient writers give any certain account of the first person who instructed these mountaineers in the doctrine of the Monothelites; it is probable, however, from several circumstances, that it was John Maro, whose name they have adopted; and that this ecclesiastic received the name of Maro from his having lived in the character of a monk, in the famous convent of St. Maro, upon the borders of the Orontes, before his settlement among the Mardaites of Mount Libanus. One thing is certain, from the testimony of Tyrius, and other unexceptionable witnesses, as also from the most authentic records, namely, that the Maronites retained the opinions of the Monothelites until the twelfth century, when, abandoning and renouncing the doctrine of one will in Christ, they were re-admitted into the communion of the Romish Church. The most learned of the modern Maronites have left no method unemployed to defend their Church against this accusation; they have laboured to prove, by a variety of testimonies, that their ancestors always persevered in the Roman Catholic faith, and in their attachment to the Roman pontiff, without ever adopting the doctrine of the Monophysites or Monothelites. But all their efforts are insufficient to prove the truth of these assertions, and the testimonies they allege will appear absolutely fictitious and destitute of authority.

"Mosheim observes that the subjection of the Maronites to the spiritual jurisdiction of the Roman pontiff was agreed to with this express condition, that neither the popes nor their emissaries should pretend to change or abolish any thing that related to the ancient rites, moral precepts, or religious opinions of this people; so that in reality there is nothing to be found among the Maronites that savours of Popery, if we except their attachment to the Roman pontiff, who is obliged to pay very dear for their friendship. For as the Maronites live in the utmost distress of poverty, under the tyrannical yoke of the Mahomedans, the bishop of Rome is under the necessity of furnishing them with such subsidies as may appease their oppressors, procure a subsistence for their bishop and clergy, provide all things requisite for the support of their churches and the uninterrupted exercise of public worship, and contribute in general to lessen their miseries. It is certain that there are Maronites in Syria who still behold the Church of Rome with the greatest aversion and abhorrence; nay, what is still more remarkable, great numbers of that nation residing in Italy, even under the eye of the pontiff, opposed his authority during the last century, and threw the court of Rome into great perplexity. One body of these nonconforming Maronites retired into the valleys of Piedmont, where they joined the Waldenses; another, above six hundred in number, with a bishop and several ecclesiastics at their head, fled into Corsica, and implored the protection of the republic of Genoa against the violence of the inquisitors.

"The Maronites have a patriarch who resides in the monastery of Canobin, on Mount Libanus, and assumes the title of patriarch of Antioch, and the name of Peter, as if he seemed desirous of being considered as the successor of that apostle. He is elected by the clergy and the people, according to the ancient custom; but, since their reunion with the Church of Rome, he is obliged to have a bull of confirmation from the Pope. He keeps a perpetual celibacy, as well as the rest of the bishops, his suffragans: as to the rest of the ecclesiastics, they are allowed to marry before ordination; and yet the monastic life is in great esteem among them. Their monks are of the order of St Anthony, and live in the most obscure places in the mountains, far from the commerce of the world.

"As to their faith, they agree in the main with the rest of the Eastern Church. Their priests do not say mass singly, but all say it together, standing round the altar. They communicate in unleavened bread; and the laity have hitherto partaken in both kinds, though the practice of communicating in one has of late been getting footing, having been introduced by little and little. In Lent they eat nothing, unless it be two or three hours before sun-rising; their other fastings are very numerous."

MARRIAGE, a civil and religious contract, by which a man is intimately and permanently united to one woman, for the various important ends ordained of God. Gen. i. 28, ii. 18-24; Mal. ii. 14, 15; Matt. xix. 3-11; Eph. v. 22-33, vi. 1-4; 1 Cor. vii. 2-39. It is founded on the original constitution of the sexes, and dignified by peculiar sentiments of affection, delicacy, and honour. Marriage is a part of the law of nations.

The public use of the marriage institution consists, according to Paley, in its promoting the following beneficial effects:—(1.) The private comfort of individuals. (2.) The production of the greatest number of healthy children, their better education, and the making of due provision for their settlement in life. (3.) The peace of human society, in cutting off a principal source of contention, by assigning one or more women to one man, and protecting his exclusive right by sanctions of morality and law. (4.) The better government of society, by distributing the community into separate families, and appointing over each the authority of a master of a family, which has more actual influence than all civil authority put together. (5.) The additional security which the State receives for the good behaviour of its citizens, from the solicitude they feel for the welfare of their children, and from their being confined to permanent habitations. (6.) The encouragement of industry.

It was and still is the custom in Eastern countries, that parties are generally betrothed from one to three months before marriage, sometimes for as many years. Thus Josephus tells us that Herod the Great and his wife Mariamne were betrothed for four years before the celebration of the marriage ceremony. It would appear that during the period which elapsed between the espousal of Joseph and Mary and their subsequent marriage, she was found with child of the Holy Ghost. Probably it was after her visit to her cousin Elizabeth, with whom she had resided three months, that Joseph made the discovery that this was the case with Mary. They were betrothed or engaged in marriage, and the punishment of unfaithfulness in such circumstances was the same as if she had been living with her husband—death by stoning. Mary had no doubt been informed by an angel sent from God, not only that she was to be a mother, but the mother of the Messiah. "The Holy Ghost shall come upon thee, and the power of the Highest shall overshadow thee: therefore also that holy thing, which shall be born of thee, shall be called the Son of God." Luke i. 35. This woman, highly favoured of the Lord, knew well the divine original of her child before it was born, and yet it was impossible for her to establish it by any proof convincing or even intelligible to men. What remained, then, but that she should be treated as one who had violated the bond of her solemn engagement. "Bring her forth," was the saying of Judah in a case of unfaithfulness, "and let her be burnt." But Joseph the husband of Mary (for betrothed persons were currently spoken of as husband and wife), is described as being a just or righteous man, one who himself had found mercy of the Lord, and therefore had learned to exercise that tenderness and forbearance and Christian charity which so well becomes a sinner saved by grace. Instead, therefore, of proceeding to the utmost extremity which the law allowed, and making his wife a public example as a warning to others of the aggravated nature of the crime of unfaithfulness, he proposed to effect a private separation, by presenting her with a bill of divorce simply in the presence of two witnesses. Even this step, however, he did not think of taking without due deliberation. He would do nothing rashly. There was, no doubt, a strange combination and conflict of feelings in the heart of Joseph. Affection for Mary, and yet horror at the crime of which she seemed to have been guilty; unwillingness to believe that she could be chargeable with so heinous a sin, and yet the undoubted certainty, not even denied by herself, that all appearances were against her—these, and a thousand other thoughts and feelings, rushed into the mind and heart of the righteous Joseph, and overwhelmed him with perplexity. While he thought on these things, an angel was sent from God to relieve the mind of Joseph. It was natural to be afraid of consummating his marriage with one who, to all human appearance, had proved so unworthy of his choice. All his fears and apprehensions, however, were set at rest by the statement of the angel, "Fear not to take unto thee Mary thy wife: for that which is conceived in her is of the Holy Ghost." Matt. i. 20. Instead, therefore, of being afraid lest, by his marriage with Mary, he would be degraded and put to shame, he might well regard it as a most exalted and honourable union, conferring upon him the enviable distinction of being the reputed, and, in the eye of the Jewish law, the legal father of the Messiah. He rose from his sleep, and not conferring with flesh and blood, not hesitating for a moment as to the line of duty, having heard the will of God, he hastened to do it. He did as the Lord had bidden him, and took unto him Mary his wife, waiting patiently for the development of the divine plans, when he felt assured that Jehovah would cause his righteousness to shine forth as the light and his judgment as the noonday.

The mother of Jesus was privileged to be a believer in Christ, as well as related to him by the tenderest earthly ties. Without faith even she could not be saved. She was a sinful woman, but a sinner saved by grace. It was a high honour to be the mother of that child whose name is Emmanuel, God with us; but it was a higher honour still to be a true disciple of Christ. And on one occasion, accordingly, when a certain woman said unto him, "Blessed is the womb that bare thee, and the paps which thou hast sucked," he instantly replied, "Yea, rather, blessed are they that hear the word and keep it." This incident viewed in connection with that recorded in Matt. xii. 46-50, reads a striking rebuke to the Papists, who are guilty of worshipping the mother of Jesus.

MARRIAGE CEREMONY. "The marriage ceremony," says Professor Paxton, "was commonly performed in a garden, or in the open air; the bride was placed under a canopy, supported by four youths, and adorned with jewels according to the rank of the married persons; all the company crying out with joyful acclamations, 'Blessed be he that cometh.' It was anciently the custom, at the conclusion of the ceremony, for the father and mother and kindred of the woman to pray for a blessing upon the parties. Bethuel and Laban, and the other members of their family, pronounced a solemn benediction upon Rebecca before her departure: 'And they blessed Rebecca, and said unto her, Thou art our sister, be thou the mother of thousands of millions; and let thy seed possess the gate of those that hate them.' And in times long posterior to the age of Isaac, when Ruth the Moabitess was espoused to Boaz: 'All the people that were in the gate, and the elders, said, We are witnesses: The Lord make the woman that is come into thine house like Rachel, and like Leah, which two did build the house of Israel; and do thou worthily in Ephratah, and be famous in Bethlehem.' After the benediction, the bride is conducted with great pomp to the house of her husband: this is usually done in the evening; and as the procession moved along, money, sweetmeats, flowers, and other articles, were thrown among the populace, which they caught in cloths made for such occasions, stretched in a particular manner upon frames. The use of perfumes at Eastern marriages is common; and upon great occasions very profuse. Not only are the garments scented, till, in the Psalmist's language, they smell of myrrh, aloes, and cassia: it is also customary for virgins to meet, and lead the procession, with silver gilt pots of perfumes; and sometimes aromatics are burned in the windows of all the houses in the streets through which the procession is to pass, till the air becomes loaded with fragrant odours. In allusion to this practice it is demanded, 'Who is this that cometh out of the wilderness, like pillars of smoke perfumed with myrrh and frankincense?' So liberally were these rich perfumes burned on this occasion, that a pillar of smoke ascended from the censers, so high that it could be seen at a considerable distance; and the perfume was so rich as to equal in value and fragrance all the powders of the merchant. The custom of burning perfumes on these occasions, still continues in the East; for Lady Mary Wortley Montague, describing the reception of a young Turkish bride at the bagnio, says: 'Two virgins met her at the door; two others filled silver gilt pots with perfumes, and began the procession, the rest following in pairs to the number of thirty. In this order they marched round the three rooms of the bagnio.' And Maillet informs us, that, when the ambassadors of an Eastern monarch, sent to propose marriage to an Egyptian queen, made their entrance into the capital of that kingdom, the streets through which they passed were strewn with flowers; and precious odours burning in the windows, from very early in the morning, embalmed the air.

"Those that were invited to the marriage, were expected to appear in their best and gayest attire. If the bridegroom was in circumstances to afford it, wedding garments were prepared for all the guests, which were hung up in the ante-chamber, for them to put on over the rest of their clothes, as they entered the apartment where the marriage-feast was prepared. To refuse, or even to neglect putting on the wedding garment, was reckoned an insult to the bridegroom, aggravated by the circumstance that it was provided by himself for the very purpose of being worn on that occasion, and was hung up in the way to the inner apartment, and that the guests must have seen it, and recollected the design of its suspension. This accounts for the severity of the sentence pronounced by the king, who came in to see the guests, and found among them one who had neglected to put it on: 'And he saith unto him, Friend, how camest thou in hither, not having a wedding garment? And he was speechless'—because it was provided at the expense of the entertainer, and placed full in his view. 'Then said the king to the servants, Bind him hand and foot, and take him away and cast him into outer darkness: there shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth.'

"The arrival of the bride at the house of her husband, was followed by the marriage feast, at which they indulged in great mirth and hilarity. It was made entirely at the expense of the bridegroom. From the parable of the marriage-feast, we have a right to conclude that such entertainments among the Jews were equally free. 'The kingdom of heaven is like unto a certain king which made a marriage for his son, and sent forth his servants to call them that were bidden to the wedding.'

"The marriage feast was of old frequently protracted to the length of seven days; for so long Samson entertained his friends at Timnath. To this festival Laban is thought by many divines to refer, in his answer to Jacob's complaint, that he had imposed Leah upon him instead of Rachel: 'Fulfil the week of the marriage, and we will give thee this also.' This feast was called the nuptial joy, with which no other was to be intermixed; all labour ceased while it continued, and no sign of mourning or sorrow was permitted to appear. It may be only further observed, that even in modern times, none but very poor people give a daughter in marriage without a female slave for a handmaid, as hired servants are scarcely known in the Oriental regions. Hence Laban, who was a man of considerable property in Mesopotamia, gave unto his daughter Leah, Zilpah his maid, for an handmaid; and 'to Rachel his daughter, Bilhah his handmaid, to be her maid.' On the third day, the bride presented her bridegroom with a robe; gifts were likewise made to the bride and bridegroom, by the bride's father and friends; these consisted of golden vessels, beds, couches, plates, and all sorts of necessaries for housekeeping, which were carried in great state to the house by women, preceded by a person carrying a basket, in the manner usual at processions, before whom went a boy in white vestments, with a torch in his hand. It was also customary for the bridegroom and his friends to give presents to the bride, after which the bridegroom had leave to converse freely with her, and she was permitted to appear in public without her veil. The money, says Dr. Russel, which the bridegrooms of Aleppo pay for their brides, is laid out in furniture for a chamber, in clothes, jewels, or ornaments of gold, for the bride, whose father makes some addition, according to his circumstances; which things are sent with great pomp to the bridegroom's house three days before the wedding. In Egypt, these gifts are carried on the marriage day, immediately before the bride. To these circumstances the holy psalmist certainly refers, in his magnificent description of Messiah's kingdom: 'And the daughter of Tyre shall be there with a gift; even the rich among the people shall entreat thy favour' with gifts and offerings suited to their wealth and thy dignity." See ESPOUSALS.

MARROW, a soft oily substance contained in the bones of animals. There is a reference to it in Job xxi. 24: "His breasts are full of milk, and his bones are moistened with marrow." The word is sometimes used figuratively for the most precious blessings of the gospel.

MART, a place of trade or merchandise. Thus Tyre is described, in Isa. xxiii. 3, as "a mart of nations;" that is, a place to which all nations resort for purposes of commerce.

MARTHA, sister of Lazarus and Mary, and mistress of the house where our Saviour was entertained, in the village of Bethany. Martha is always named before Mary, probably because she was the elder sister. Whether she was truly pious previous to the time referred to in Luke x. 38, is extremely doubtful. That she was afterwards, at the period of her brother's death, is certain. John xi. 1-27. May we not hope that the Saviour's well-known reproof was the means of her real conversion from the world to God?

MARTYR, is one who lays down his life or suffers death for the sake of his religion. The word is Greek, and properly signifies "a witness." It is applied by way of eminence to those who suffer in witness of the truth of the gospel. The Christian Church is illustrious with martyrs. Prophecy had foretold that so it should be, and history is filled with surprising accounts of their singular constancy and fortitude under the most cruel torments human nature was capable of suffering.

MARY, the mother of Jesus, and wife of Joseph. She is called by the Jews the daughter of Eli; and by the early Christian writers, the daughter of Joakim and Anna: but Joakim and Eliakim are sometimes interchanged (2 Chron. xxxvi. 4), and Eli, or Heli, is therefore the abridgment of Eliakim. Luke iii. 23. She was of the royal race of David, as also was Joseph her husband; and she was also cousin to Elizabeth, the wife of Zacharias the priest. Luke i. 5, 36.

MARY, the mother of Mark the Evangelist, at whose house in Jerusalem the early Christians were wont to assemble for prayer, and where they were met when Peter was miraculously delivered from prison.

MARY, sister of the Virgin, and mother of James the Less and Joses, and wife of Alphaeus or Cleophas. She seems to have been an early believer in and follower of Jesus. She was present at the most remarkable events of his life, stood by the cross at his death, and was among the earliest at the sepulchre. Jesus appeared to her after his resurrection.

MARY, sister of Martha and Lazarus, at Bethany.

At the house of this pious family Jesus was wont to find a home after his daily labours in Jerusalem. Mary received from the mouth of Jesus the expression of his warm approval. "Mary hath chosen that good part which shall never be taken from her." She was present at an entertainment, along with Jesus, at the house of Simon the leper. Grateful for the resurrection of her brother from the dead, she poured upon his head a box of precious ointment of spikenard, which Jesus declared to be a token of his death and burial.

MARY MAGDALENE, so called, perhaps, from the town of Magdala, to which she belonged. We are informed by Luke (viii. 2), that Jesus had cast out of her seven devils. She seems to have been a woman of good circumstances, and of considerable standing in society. She is said by the Evangelists to have followed our Saviour, and ministered unto him. She was present at his death, and also at the sepulchre. Matt. xxviii. 1-5.

MASCHIL, a title or inscription placed at the head of thirteen psalms. The word signifies "instruction," or, as Rosenmüller thinks, "a song of instruction." The Jewish rabbins allege that the psalms which have this inscription were accompanied, when read, with an exposition. Others, again, think that the word was intended to denote that such psalms needed no exposition.

MASORA, a critical version of the Old Testament Scriptures executed by some learned rabbins of the school of Tiberias. The object of these Jewish doctors, in the preparation of such a book, was to fix the reading and interpretation of Scripture; and undoubtedly their labours were of considerable advantage, they having been the first to distinguish the books and sections of books into verses. To prevent any interference with the integrity of the sacred books, they numbered the verses of each book and section, giving the amount at the end of each either in numeral letters or in symbol. Most of the labour, however, of these rabbins was expended in learned trifling; for example, in calculating the middle verse of each book, and how often each of the letters of the Hebrew alphabet occurs in each of the books. Considerable dispute has taken place among the learned as to the precise time when the Masorites lived; but the opinion of Bishop Marsh seems to be nearest the truth—that they flourished in the fourth or fifth century. No little difference of opinion exists also in reference to the value which is to be attached to the Masoretic system of notation. Bishop Marsh thinks that the text itself, as regulated by the Masorites, was the result of a collation of manuscripts.

MASS, a name given by the Romish Church to the Eucharist or sacrament of the Lord's Supper. The origin of the name is somewhat doubtful; but it may possibly be derived, as some have imagined, from the Hebrew word messach, or oblation, the ordinance being regarded by Romish divines as in its true nature a propitiatory sacrifice. Jesus Christ, they allege, celebrated the first mass, referring to his institution of the Supper. Thus in the Douay Catechism we find, "Who said the first mass? Jesus Christ. When did he say it? At his last Supper." Papists further hold that "in the mass there is offered to God a true, proper, and propitiatory sacrifice for the living and the dead." Accordingly they allege that when Christ first instituted the Supper, he offered himself to God as a propitiatory sacrifice. In vain are they reminded that on that occasion no sacrifice was offered, no blood was shed, and the invariable principle of the divine government has ever been that "without shedding of blood there is no remission." And, moreover, there was nothing offered to God; if anything was offered, it was to the disciples in these words, "Take, eat." It is true, the bread and wine were offered them as a memorial of a sacrifice; but the memorial of a sacrifice is plainly not a sacrifice. And, besides, if Christ in the eucharist offered himself to God, then he must needs have offered himself twice, he having afterwards offered himself on the cross. Such an idea is in obvious contradiction to the express language of Scripture, Heb. ix. 28: "So Christ was once offered to bear the sins of many; and unto them that look for him shall he appear the second time without sin unto salvation;" and Heb. x. 10: "By the which will we are sanctified through the offering of the body of Jesus Christ once for all." If the Romish doctrine be true, then must Christ have been offered not twice only, but numberless times. In every mass that has ever been said, he is believed to be offered. So that we must admit the strange solecism, that he is offered on earth while he is interceding in heaven, and thus the great High Priest is at one and the same moment atoning and interceding, a practice which was never heard of among the Jewish priests. Christ's work, according to this doctrine, is not finished, and its being finished depends upon the will of a human priest.

Nodoubt the Romish divines attempt to make a distinction in arguing upon this subject, alleging that the sacrifice in the eucharist was unbloody, while the sacrifice of the cross was bloody. But this distinction is of no service; for if the sacrifice in the eucharist was unbloody, it was not propitiatory. Yet, in the very face of the established scriptural principle, that "without shedding of blood there is no remission," they allege that it was unbloody and yet propitiatory. If such a sacrifice could exist, then it follows as a plain consequence, that it was not necessary Christ should have died; without the shedding of his blood, it was possible there might be remission. Action, not passion—doing, not suffering, constituted the sacrifice of the eucharist in Romish theology; and thus we are brought to the strange and wholly unscriptural conclusion, that, without the shedding of one drop of the blood of Christ, there might have been a full and an everlasting remission of sins.

In support of the doctrine of the mass, Roman Catholics are in the habit of hazarding an appeal to Scripture; and the passage which they chiefly adduce in favour of their views is to be found in Gen. xiv. 18-20: "And Melchizedek king of Salem brought forth bread and wine: and he was the priest of the most high God. And he blessed him, and said, Blessed be Abram of the most high God, possessor of heaven and earth: and blessed be the most high God, which hath delivered thine enemies into thy hand. And he gave him tithes of all."

On this incident, as supposed to support the mass, Dr Nevins, in his admirable "Thoughts on Popery," thus remarks:—

"Let the reader observe, first, that it was as king, not as priest, that Melchizedek brought forth the bread and wine. 'Melchizedek, king of Salem, brought forth bread and wine.' It was an act of royal bounty—an exercise of kingly hospitality. True, it is said immediately after, that he was a priest as well as a king; but that is said in reference to what follows, not what precedes. 'And he was priest of the most high God. And he blessed him.' In his capacity of king he brought forth bread and wine. In the exercise of his priestly office he blessed Abraham. To bless, we know, was one part of the priest's office. Numb. vi. 23. His bringing forth bread and wine had nothing to do with his being a priest. What proves this view of the passage correct is the manner in which the author of the Epistle to the Hebrews refers to it. In his seventh chapter he introduces Melchizedek as a priest, and in that character as the model of Christ's priesthood; and he speaks of his blessing Abraham, but says not a word about his bringing forth bread and wine. Why is not this circumstance—this most material circumstance, according to the Catholic notion—alluded to, if in it he acted as a priest and as the sacerdotal type of Christ? Why does the apostle, when speaking of him as a priest, mention only his benediction of Abraham? Now if, as I think is manifest, he brought forth bread and wine not in the exercise of his office as priest, it overturns the Catholic argument at once.

"But, secondly, consider what in all human probability was the object of the bread and wine. Would any one, in reading the passage, suppose it could have been for any other purpose than refreshment? What an idea! to come out to a people returning famished and wearied with the toils of conflict, with a sacrifice—a propitiatory sacrifice, too—the mass—with bread and wine, not to be eaten and drunk, but to be offered to God! What more unnatural than such a supposition! On the other hand, what more natural and proper, than to bring forth, for those fatigued soldiers, 'wine that maketh glad the heart of man, and bread which strengtheneth man's heart,' to refresh them? It was just what, under the circumstances, they needed.

"In further proof of the correctness of this view of the passage, we find that Abraham recognised the priesthood of Melchizedek, not by receiving bread and wine at his hands, but by giving him tithes. 'And he gave him tithes of all.'

"We see, then, there is no proof of any sacrifice in this transaction. There was nothing offered to God. What was offered, was to Abraham and his company. But if the offering were to God, it could but constitute an eucharistic sacrifice. Bread and wine might be offered as thank-offerings, but a bloodless propitiatory sacrifice was unknown under the Old Testament. Whatever view we take of the passage, it cannot make for the mass. That which was offered was only bread and wine. The Catholics do not pretend that they were changed into the body and blood of Christ. Melchizedek lived nearly two thousand years before Christ had a body. How could transubstantiation take place so long before the incarnation? But if simple bread and wine were offered, then the act of Melchizedek, if any thing more than an example of hospitality, was rather the model of the Protestants' Lord's Supper than the Roman Catholics' mass. And here it may be observed, that Melchizedek does not seem to have denied the cup to the laity, as later priests have done. Oh, no, it was the Council of Constance, in the fifteenth century, that established that custom."

Another argument, and one to which Romish divines attach no little importance, is drawn from the perpetuity of the priesthood of Christ. This argument is well put and answered by Dr Nevins in these words:—

"If, say they, Christ is a priest for ever, and 'every high priest is ordained to offer gifts and sacrifices,' there must be a perpetual sacrifice, else he would be a priest without exercising priestly functions. But do they not see that this is to suppose Christ a priest after the order of Aaron, and not after that of Melchizedek? It is true the Aaronic priests offered sacrifice during the whole term of their priesthood. They stood 'daily ministering, and offering oftentimes the same sacrifice.' But what is said of Christ? He 'needeth not daily, as those high priests, to offer up sacrifice: for this he did once, when he offered up himself.' Heb. vii. 27. And again: 'But this man, after he had offered one sacrifice for sins, for ever sat down on the right hand of God.' Heb. x. 12. Yet the Roman Catholics say he needeth daily to offer up sacrifice, and that He, as well as the Aaronic priests, offers oftentimes the same sacrifices! They make Christ to resemble the Jewish priests in those very particulars in which the apostle says he stands in contrast to them!

"As to Christ being a priest for ever, if that means any thing more than is expressed in Heb. vii. 24, where he is said to have 'an unchangeable priesthood,' that is, a priesthood that passes not from one to another, as did the Aaronic, it is explained in the succeeding verse, where it is said that 'He ever liveth to make intercession.' He is a priest for ever, because he ever liveth to make intercession. It is not at all necessary that he should ever live to offer sacrifice in order to his being a priest for ever. Intercession is as much a part of the priest's office as sacrifice. And here I would ask whether the Jewish high priest was not as much a priest when he went into the most holy place to sprinkle the blood of the sacrifice, and to burn incense, as when, before he entered, he was engaged in offering the sacrifice? Undoubtedly he was. He offered no sacrifice while he was in the holy place. He went in for another purpose altogether. So Christ, the great antitype, has entered 'not into the holy places made with hands, which are the figures of the true, but into heaven itself, now to appear in the presence of God for us.' Heb. ix. 24. And there he remains. He has never come out. He had no need to come out to offer another sacrifice, as the Jewish high priest had. 'By one offering he hath perfected for ever them that are sanctified.' Were another sacrifice necessary, he would return in person to earth to offer it; nor would it be 'under the form of bread and wine;' for the apostle argues in Heb. ix. 25, 26, that he must suffer as often as he offers himself—that he cannot be offered without suffering. Yet the Douay Catechism says he 'continues daily to offer himself.' He is sacrificing according to them, while he is interceding—sacrificing in the place appropriated to intercession, and offering himself without suffering! The Bible tells us, 'Christ was once offered,' but that 'he ever liveth to make intercession.' It makes the perpetuity of his priesthood to consist in his intercession. The Romish doctrine, on the other hand, teaches us that he is continually offered, and therefore a priest for ever. And yet they appeal to the Bible in proof of their doctrine!"

The mass, then, of the Romish Church, is an idolatrous, unscriptural, and blasphemous ceremony, perverting the simple and impressive institution of the Lord's Supper into a cumbrous and unmeaning mass of human observances.

MASSALIANS, or MESSALIANS, a sect which sprung up about the year 361, in the reign of the emperor Constantius, who maintained that men have two souls, a celestial and a diabolical; and that the latter is driven out by prayer. From these words of our Lord, "Labour not for the meat that perisheth," it is said that they concluded they ought not to do any work to get their bread. We may suppose, says Dr. Jortin, that this sect did not last long; that these sluggards were soon starved out of the world; or rather, that cold and hunger sharpened their wits, and taught them to be better interpreters of Scripture. It is more probable, however, that they have been misrepresented by their enemies.

MAST. This word occurs in Prov. xxiii. 34: "Yea, thou shalt be as he that lieth down in the midst of the sea, or as he that lieth upon the top of a mast." A different Hebrew word is also translated "mast" in Ezek. xxvii. 5.

MATERIALISTS, a sect in the ancient Church, composed of persons who, being prepossessed with that maxim in philosophy, "Out of nothing, nothing can arise," had recourse to an eternal matter, on which they supposed God wrought in the creation, instead of admitting him alone as the sole cause of the existence of all things. Tertullian vigorously opposed them in his treatise against Hermogenes, who was one of their number.

Materialists are also those who maintain that the soul of man is material, or that the principle of perception and thought is not a substance distinct from the body, but the result of corporeal organization. Most of these theorists are sceptics; but some of them are professed believers in Christianity.

The followers of the late Dr Priestley are Materialists, and hence philosophical Necessarians. According to the Doctor's writings he believed—

1. That man is no more than what we now see of him: his being commences at the time of his conception, or perhaps at an earlier period. The corporeal and mental faculties, inhering in the same substance, grow, ripen, and decay together; and whenever the system is dissolved, it continues in a state of dissolution till it shall please that Almighty Being who called it into existence, to restore it to life again. For if the mental principle were, in its own nature, immaterial and immortal, all its peculiar faculties would be so too; whereas we see that every faculty of the mind, without exception, is liable to be impaired, and even to become wholly extinct before death. Since, therefore, all the faculties of the mind, separately taken, appear to be mortal, the substance, or principle, in which they exist, must be pronounced mortal too. Thus we might conclude that the body was mortal, from observing that all the separate senses and limbs were liable to decay and perish.

This system gives a real value to the doctrine of the resurrection of the dead, which is peculiar to revelation, on which alone the sacred writers build all our hope of future life; and it explains the uniform language of the Scriptures, which speak of one day of judgment for all mankind; and represent all the rewards of virtue, and all the punishments of vice, as taking place at that awful day, and not before. In the Scriptures, the heathens are represented as without hope, and all mankind as perishing at death, if there be no resurrection of the dead.

The Apostle Paul asserts, in 1 Cor. xv. 16–18, that "if the dead rise not, then is not Christ raised: and if Christ be not raised, your faith is vain; ye are yet in your sins. Then they also who are fallen asleep in Christ are perished." And again, verse 32: "If the dead rise not, let us eat and drink; for to-morrow we die." In the whole discourse, he does not even mention the doctrine of happiness or misery without the body.

If we search the Scriptures for passages expressive of the state of man at death, we find such declarations as expressly exclude any trace of sense, thought, or enjoyment. See Ps. vi. 5; Job xiv. 7, &c.

2. That there is some fixed law of nature respecting the will, as well as the other powers of the mind, and every thing else in the constitution of nature; and, consequently, that it is never determined without some real or apparent cause foreign to itself; that is, without some motive of choice, or that motives influence us in some definite and invariable manner, so that every volition, or choice, is constantly regulated and determined by what precedes it: and this constant determination of mind, according to the motives presented to it, is what is meant by its necessary determination. This being admitted to be fact, there will be a necessary connection between all things past, present, and to come, in the way of proper cause and effect, as much in the intellectual as in the natural world; so that, according to the established laws of nature, no event could have been otherwise than it has been, or is to be, and, therefore, all things past, present, and to come, are precisely what the Author of nature really intended them to be, and has made provision for.

To establish this conclusion, nothing is necessary but that throughout all nature the same consequences should invariably result from the same circumstances. For if this be admitted, it will necessarily follow, that at the commencement of any system, since the several parts of it, and their respective situations, were appointed by the Deity, the first change would take place according to a certain rule established by himself, the result of which would be a new situation, after which, the same laws continuing, another change would succeed, according to the same rules, and so on for ever; every new situation invariably leading to another, and every event, from the commencement to the termination of the system, being strictly connected; so that unless the fundamental laws of the system were changed, it would be impossible that any event should have been otherwise than it was. In all these cases, the circumstances preceding any change are called the causes of that change; and since a determinate event, or effect, constantly follows certain circumstances, or causes, the connection between cause and effect is concluded to be invariable, and therefore necessary.

It is universally acknowledged, that there can be no effect without an adequate cause. This is even the foundation on which the only proper argument for the being of a God rests. And the Necessarian asserts, that if, in any given state of mind, with respect both to dispositions and motives, two different determinations or volitions be possible, it can be on no other principle than that one of them should come under the description of an effect without a cause; just as if the beam of a balance might incline either way, though loaded with equal weights. And if any thing whatever, even a thought in the mind of man, could arise without an adequate cause, any thing else, the mind itself, or the whole universe, might likewise exist without an adequate cause.

This scheme of philosophical necessity implies a chain of causes and effects established by infinite wisdom, and terminating in the greatest good of the whole universe; evils of all kinds, natural and moral, being admitted, as far as they contribute to that end, or are in the nature of things inseparable from it. Vice is productive, not of good, but of evil to us, both here and hereafter, though good may result from it to the whole system; and according to the fixed laws of nature, our present and future happiness necessarily depend on our cultivating good dispositions. Such is the reasoning of Dr Priestley.

Much has been written of late years against the doctrine of Materialism, and the different modifications which it has assumed; but the able and condensed argument of Wollaston, in his "Religion of Nature Delineated," if well considered, will furnish every one with a most clear and satisfactory refutation of this antisciptural and irrational error.

MATTHEW, called also Levi, was the son of Alpheus, but probably not of that Alpheus who was the father of the Apostle James the Less. He was a native of Galilee; but it is not known in what city of that country he was born, or to what tribe of the people of Israel he belonged. Though a Jew, he by trade or profession was a publican or tax-gatherer, or probably a collector of customs at the port of Capernaum. These taxes were imposed upon the people by the Roman government, to which the Jews in Palestine were subject, and the oppressive manner in which they were exacted rendered them peculiarly odious. The taxes were first let out to men who farmed large districts of them, and sublet them in small divisions to others, who, in their anxiety to make the most of them, were frequently guilty of extortion. Matthew was employed in his ordinary occupation when Jesus passed by. He was sitting at the receipt of custom, his heart absorbed in the desire of amassing money. But at the very moment when the world with its fascinating power was binding the soul of Matthew to the earth, the voice of Jesus fell upon his ear, and reached his heart, "Follow me." There is every likelihood that, like the publicans generally, he was an avaricious worldling; and yet so resistless was the power of Christ, that, without the slightest hesitation, or communing with flesh and blood, he arose and followed Jesus. In his own account of this remarkable event in his history, Matthew makes no mention of the sacrifices which he made in thus obeying the call of Christ; but the other Evangelists tell us that "he left all,"—he surrendered his worldly gains, and renounced his worldly prospects. And no sooner does he receive the grace of Christ into his heart than he desires to have the presence of Christ in his house. He made a great feast, to which he invited Jesus and his disciples. On this occasion, the Redeemer was reproached by the Scribes and Pharisees for sitting at meat with publicans and sinners, whereupon he replied, "I came not to call the righteous, but sinners to repentance." Soon after his conversion, Matthew was called to the apostleship; and concerning his history as an apostle Scripture is silent. The accounts from the early fathers and historians are very doubtful and conflicting. He appears, however, to have preached in Judea for nearly eight years after the ascension of Christ, and then he went to Ethiopia, where he suffered martyrdom.

MATTHEW'S GOSPEL. This Gospel is supposed to have been written at the request of the Jewish converts, while Matthew was yet labouring in Judea. It is generally understood, accordingly, to have been written in Hebrew originally, and afterwards translated into Greek. The account which it gives of the life, sufferings, and death of our gracious Redeemer is remarkably simple, minute, and circumstantial. Little is known concerning its author, but it is a precious record of the sayings and doings of Him who is the way, and the truth, and the life.

MATTHIAS, one of the disciples of our blessed Lord, who was chosen to be an apostle in the room of Judas Iscariot. Acts i. 26. He is supposed to have been one of the seventy. Little is known concerning the history of this individual. After the outpouring of the Spirit on the day of Pentecost, he is said to have laboured for some time in Judea, and afterwards in Greece, where he is reported to have suffered martyrdom, but in what precise form authors are not agreed. Both the Greek and Roman Churches celebrate his memory. An apocryphal gospel, published in his name, is mentioned by Eusebius.

MATTOCK, enumerated among agricultural implements in 1 Sam. xiii. 20. A different Hebrew word is translated mattock in Isa. vii. 25.

MAUL. In Prov. xxv. 18, we are told that "a man that beareth false witness against his neighbour is a maul," or a hammer.

MAW. This word occurs in Deut. xviii. 3, where those who offered sacrifices are said to be bound to give the priests "the shoulder, the two cheeks, and the maw." The term is now used to denote the rough stomach of those animals which chew the cud; but Josephus and Philo have instead of it the fourth stomach, which was esteemed by the ancients, as Bochart says, a peculiar delicacy.

MAZZAROTH. This word occurs in Job xxxviii. 32, "Canst thou bring forth Mazzaroth in his season?" The precise meaning of the word is somewhat doubtful. In the margin it is translated "the twelve signs," that is, of the zodiac. But Hebrew critics seem to be generally of opinion that it denotes some particular star or constellation, though all the attempts which have been made by Michaelis and others to discover the precise star or constellation referred to, have hitherto proved entirely fruitless. The general idea of the passage above quoted obviously is, "Canst thou regulate the motions of the heavenly bodies?"

MEADOW. In Pharaoh's dream, recorded in Gen. xli., we are informed that the kine were represented to him as feeding "in a meadow;" literally, "among the sedge;" that is, in the low marshy places by the river's brink, where reeds and sedges grow. The original word occurs only in the passage now referred to, and in Job viii. 11, where it is translated "flag." "Can the rush grow up without mire? can the flag grow without water?" Jerome says, in his Hebrew Questions on Genesis: "I have heard that by the Egyptians everything green which grows in marshes or swamps is called in their language by this name." It has been supposed by some that the plant referred to is the Cyperus esculentus.

MEANS OF GRACE, those ordinances which God has established as the channels of his mercy in Christ, and which we are to use for the purpose of improving our minds, affecting our hearts, and obtaining spiritual blessings; such as hearing the gospel, reading the Scriptures, self-examination, meditation, prayer, praise, Christian conversation, &c. The means are to be used without any reference to merit, solely with a dependence on the Divine Being; nor can we ever expect happiness in ourselves, nor be good exemplars to others, while we live in the neglect of them. It is vain to argue that the divine decrees supersede the necessity of them, since God has as certainly appointed the means as the end. Besides, he himself generally works by them; and the more means he thinks proper to use, the more he displays his glorious perfections. Jesus Christ, when on earth, used means; he prayed, he exhorted, and did good, by going from place to place. Indeed, the systems of nature, providence, and grace, are all carried on by means. The Scriptures abound with exhortations to them (Matt. v., Rom. xii.), and none but enthusiasts or immoral characters ever refuse to use them. The Roman Catholic Church attaches such exaggerated importance to the means of grace as entirely to do away with the necessity of the Spirit's operation, teaching, as they do, that the ordinances necessarily, and ex opere operato, communicate grace to those who faithfully observe them.

MEDAD and ELDAD, two men who were alleged by the Jews to be brothers of Moses and Aaron by the mother's side. They were of the number of the seventy who were chosen to aid Moses in his important functions as a ruler of the people. While remaining in the camp, we are informed (Numb. xi. 26-30) that they prophesied; but what was the precise subject of their prophecies we have no means of ascertaining.

MEDAN, or MADAN, the third son of Abraham and Keturah (Gen. xxv. 2), is thought, with Midian his brother, to have peopled the country of Midian or Madian, east of the Dead Sea.

MEDEBA, a city anciently belonging to Moab. It was situated in a plain bearing the same name. It was here that Joab gained a victory over the Ammonites and Syrians. 1 Chron. xix. 6-14. The ruins of this town are about seven miles south-east of Heshbon. They are situated on a round hill, and cover a space about two miles in circumference. Not a single edifice, Burckhardt tells us, remains entire; the city is completely ruined. Well, therefore, might Isaiah (xv. 2) prophesy concerning this city: "Moab shall howl over Medeba."

MEDIA, a large country of Asia, situated south of the Caspian Sea, generally supposed to have been peopled by the descendants of Madai, the son of Japheth. This was the original kingdom of Cyrus, but afterwards its history was merged in that of Persia. The inhabitants of Media were subject to the Assyrians until the reign of Sardanapalus, when, B.C. 747, the Median monarchy was founded by Arbaces. It was into Media that the ten tribes were carried, in the Assyrian captivity, by Tiglath-Pileser and Shalmaneser. 2 Kings xvii. 6; 1 Chron. v. 26. Its geographical position, abounding, as it did, in mountains and rivers, rendered it peculiarly well fitted for the distribution of the captives, as well as for their safe custody, escape from such a country being almost impossible. Media may be said to have formed a kind of pass between the cultivated parts of Eastern and Western Asia, and might well be regarded as a country of great interest and importance. Considerable doubt hangs over the early history of Media, Justin alleging that the Median monarchy lasted for three hundred and fifty years, while Herodotus assigns it a duration of only one hundred and fifty years. The Medes appear to have been a distinct people in the age of the apostles, and maintaining a distinct language. Acts ii. 9.

MEDIATOR, a person that intervenes between two parties at variance, in order to reconcile them. Thus Jesus Christ is the Mediator between an offended God and sinful man. 1 Tim. ii. 5. Both Jews and Gentiles have a notion of a Mediator: the Jews call the Messiah the Mediator, or Middle One. The Persians call their god Mithras, mesitēs, a mediator; and the demons, with the heathens, seem to be, according to them, mediators between the superior gods and men. Indeed, the whole religion of Paganism was a system of mediation and intercession. The idea, therefore, of salvation by a Mediator, is not so novel or restricted as some imagine; and the Scriptures of truth inform us, that it is only by this way human beings can arrive at eternal felicity. Acts iv. 12; John xiv. 6.

Man, in his state of innocence, was in friendship with God; but, by sinning against him, he exposed himself to his just displeasure; his powers became enfeebled, and his heart filled with enmity against him (Rom. viii. 7); he was driven out of his paradisiacal Eden, and became totally incapable of returning to God, and making satisfaction to his justice. Jesus Christ, therefore, was the appointed Mediator to bring about reconciliation (Gen. iii. 15; Col. i. 21); and in the fulness of time he came into this world, obeyed the law, satisfied justice, and brought his people into a state of grace and favour; yea, into a more exalted state of friendship with God than was lost by the fall. Eph. ii. 18.

Now, in order to the accomplishing of this work, it was necessary that the Mediator should be God and man in one person. It was necessary that he should be man—(1.) That he might be related to those of whom he was a Mediator and Redeemer. (2.) That sin might be satisfied for, and reconciliation be made for it, in the same nature which sinned. (3.) It was proper that the Mediator should be capable of obeying the law broken by the sin of man, as a divine person could not be subject to the law, and yield obedience to it. Gal. iv. 4; Rom. v. 19. (4.) It was meet that the Mediator should be man, that he might be capable of suffering death, for, as God, he could not die, and without shedding of blood there was no remission. Heb. ii. 10–15, viii. 3. (5.) It was fit he should be man, that he might be a faithful high priest, to sympathize with his people under all their trials, temptations, &c. Heb. ii. 17, 18, iv. 15. (6.) It was fit that he should be a holy and righteous man, free from all sin, original and actual, that he might offer himself without spot to God, take away the sins of men, and be an advocate for them. Heb. vii. 26, ix. 14; 1 John iii. 5. See INCARNATION.

But it was not enough to be truly man, and an innocent person; he must be more than a man: it was requisite that he should be God also, for—(1.) No mere man could have entered into a covenant with God to mediate between him and sinful men. (2.) He must be God, to give virtue and value to his obedience and sufferings; for the sufferings of men or angels would not have been sufficient. (3.) Being thus God-man, we are encouraged to hope in him. In the person of Jesus Christ the object of trust is brought nearer to ourselves; and those well-known tender affections which are only figuratively ascribed to the Deity, are in our great Mediator thoroughly realized. Further: were he God, and not man, we should approach him with fear and dread; were he man, and not God, we should be guilty of idolatry to worship and trust him at all. Jer. xvii. 5. The plan of salvation, therefore, by such a Mediator, is the most suitable to human beings that possibly could be; for here “mercy and truth meet together, righteousness and peace kiss each other.” Ps. lxxxv. 10. See JESUS CHRIST.

The properties of Christ as Mediator are these: (1.) He is the only Mediator. 1 Tim. ii. 5. Praying, therefore, to saints and angels, is an error of the Church of Rome, and has no countenance from the Scripture. (2.) Christ is a Mediator of men only, not of angels; good angels need not any, and as for evil angels, none is provided nor admitted. (3.) He is the Mediator both for Jews and Gentiles. Eph. ii. 18; 1 John ii. 2. (4.) He is Mediator both for Old and New Testament saints. (5.) He is a suitable, constant, willing, and prevalent Mediator; his mediation always succeeds, and is infallible. See ATONEMENT—ADVOCATE.

MEDICINE, the art of healing. The first time mention is made of physicians in Scripture is in connection with the embalming of the body of Jacob. “And Joseph commanded his servants the physicians to embalm his father: and the physicians embalmed Israel.” Gen. l. 2. These physicians, then, were Egyptians; so that, in all probability, Egypt was the cradle of this, as well as of the other sciences. Among the Jews, indeed, medicine appears to have been very little known, in so far as concerns the nature and treatment of internal diseases. Their skill seems to have been almost wholly limited to the cure of external wounds; and, accordingly, their medical men were surgeons rather than physicians. The following valuable remarks by Sir Gardner Wilkinson show the state of the medical art among the ancient Egyptians:—

“The Egyptians paid great attention to health, and ‘so wisely,’ says Herodotus, ‘was medicine managed by them, that no doctor was permitted to practise any but his own peculiar branch. Some were oculists, who only studied diseases of the eye; others attended solely to complaints of the head; others to those of the teeth; some again confined themselves to complaints of the intestines; and others to secret and internal maladies: accoucheurs being usually, if not always, women.

“The employment of numerous drugs in Egypt has been mentioned by sacred and profane writers; and the medicinal properties of many herbs which grow in the deserts, particularly between the Nile and Red Sea, are still known to the Arabs; though their application has been but imperfectly recorded and preserved. ‘O virgin, daughter of Egypt,’ says Jeremiah (lxvi. 11), ‘in vain shalt thou use many medicines, for thou shalt not be cured.’ Homer, in the Odyssey, describes the many valuable medicines given by Polydamia, the wife of Thonis, to Helen while in Egypt, ‘a country whose fertile soil produces an infinity of drugs, some salutary and some pernicious; where each physician possesses knowledge above all other men;’ and Pliny makes frequent mention of the productions of that country, and their use in medicine.

“He also notices the physicians of Egypt; and, as if their number was indicative of the many maladies to which the inhabitants were subject, he observes, that it was a country productive of numerous diseases. In this, however, he does not agree with Herodotus, who affirms that, 'after the Libyans, there are no people so healthy as the Egyptians, which may be attributed to the invariable nature of the seasons in their country.' In Pliny's time, the introduction of luxurious habits and excess had probably wrought a change in the people; and to the same cause may be attributed the numerous complaints among the Romans, 'unknown to their fathers and ancestors.'

"The same author tells us, that the Egyptians examined the bodies after death, to ascertain the nature of the diseases of which they had died; and we can readily believe that a people, so far advanced in civilization and the principles of medicine, as to assign each physician his peculiar branch, would have resorted to this effectual method of acquiring knowledge and experience for the benefit of the community."

MEDITATION, is an act by which we consider anything closely, or wherein the soul is employed in the search or consideration of any truth. In religion it is used to signify the serious exercise of the understanding, whereby our thoughts are fixed on the observation of spiritual things, in order to practice.

MEEKNESS, a calm, serene temper of mind, not easily ruffled, or provoked to resentment. Where the great principles of Christianity have disciplined the soul, where the holy grace of meekness reigns, it subdues the impetuous disposition, and teaches it, trusting in God, both to submit and to forgive. It teaches us to govern our own anger whenever we are at any time provoked, and patiently to bear the anger of others, that it may not be a provocation to us. The former is its office especially in superiors, the latter in inferiors, and both in equals. James iii. 13.

MEGIDDO, a city of Manasseh (Josh. xvii. 11; Judg. i. 27), famous for the defeat of king Josiah. 2 Kings xxiii. 29, 30. It is alluded to under this character. Rev. xvi. 16. (See ESDRAELON.) Near this town Jabin's army was routed by Deborah and Barak. Judg. iv. Its site can scarcely now be ascertained. The waters of Megiddo, mentioned in Judg. v. 19, seem to be the River Kishon.

MELANCTHON, PHILIP, the intimate friend of Luther, and his associate in the Reformation in Germany. He was born February 16, 1497, at Bretten. He was early marked by a powerful mind, and a kind, benevolent heart. At the University of Heidelberg, where he was partly educated, he distinguished himself by his attainments both in languages and philosophy. He completed his studies both in literature and theology at Tubingen. When only twenty-one years, such was his acknowledged eminence in philological researches, that he was appointed professor of the Greek language and literature at the University of Wittemberg. It was at this seat of learning that he became acquainted with Luther, and entered with his whole soul into the cause of the Reformation. By the mildness and suavity of his temper, the extraordinary caution and prudence which on all occasions characterised him, combined with an enlightened judgment and an unflinching zeal, he contributed not a little to the progress of reformed principles. In 1521 he published his "Loci Theologici," which gave a model of Scripture interpretation to the Protestant writers. He showed that we ought not to interpret Scripture by the fathers, but the fathers by Scripture. At the university in which he taught, he was eminently successful in diffusing right views of Scripture interpretation. From fifteen hundred to two thousand auditors, collected from many different countries, were often assembled around him. His house became the resort of the friends of the Reformation. "Melancthon," said Luther, "is a wonder; all men confess it now. He is the most formidable enemy of Satan and the schoolmen, for he knows their foolishness, and Christ the rock. The little Grecian surpasses me even in divinity; he will be as serviceable to you as many Luthers." This youthful champion of the truth of God was not afraid to reply with the utmost plainness to the attacks which were made upon Luther by the learned professors of Sorbonne. Not content with defending his friend, he accused the Sorbonne of having obscured the gospel, extinguished faith, and substituted an empty philosophy in the place of Christianity. On the subject of the mass, Melancthon published fifty-five propositions, well calculated to enlighten men's minds. But his "Loci Communes," especially, did much for the advancement of the Reformation, presenting, as it did, a systematic and consistent body of theological doctrine, founded on a correct interpretation of the Word of God. This book was a remarkable favourite with Luther. "If you would desire to become theologians," he would say, "read Melancthon." It is not to be denied that from his mild temper Melancthon was sometimes in danger of yielding more than was right to the demands of the Papists. He wished as many of the old ceremonies as possible to be retained, from fear of giving too much offence. But into the celebrated protest of the 19th April 1529, at Spire, from which Protestants derived their name, he entered with the utmost decision. He was the honoured instrument, also, in drawing up the Augsburg Confession, which, says D'Aubigné, "will ever remain one of the masterpieces of the human mind, enlightened by the Spirit of God." When the Emperor Charles the Fifth took a decisive part with the enemies of Luther, Melancthon fell into great despondency; and anxious to conciliate the opponents, he reduced the Confession to its minimum, and entreated the Elector to demand only the two kinds in the Eucharist, and the marriage of priests. And not only this, but, trembling at the storm of opposition with which he and his brother Reformers were assailed, he retracted his principles, and but for the firmness and determination of Luther, he would have ruined the very cause which he had done so much to uphold. Though the gentle Reformer recovered from this humiliating fall, he displayed, both at Worms, in 1541, and at Bonn, in 1543, too great a tendency to compromise at the expense of truth; yet neither Luther nor the most decided of his followers doubted for a moment the sincerity of his adherence to the cause of God. At the death of Luther, the confidence of the Protestants was in a great measure transferred to Melancthon; and although attempts were made to dispute his orthodoxy, the correctness of his theological views even his enemies were compelled on examination to admit. He died at Wittemberg, in 1560, aged sixty-three years.

The following beautiful comparison between Luther and Melancthon is quoted from D'Aubigné's admirable History of the Reformation:—

"We cannot sufficiently admire the goodness and wisdom of God in uniting two men so different, and yet so necessary to each other. What Luther had in warmth, elasticity, and force, Melancthon had in perspicuity, wisdom, and gentleness. Luther animated Melancthon; Melancthon moderated Luther. They were like the two forms of electric matter, the positive and the negative, which modify each other. Had Luther been without Melancthon, the stream had perhaps overflowed its bank; and, on the other hand, Melancthon, when without Luther, hesitated, and even yielded, when he ought to have stood firm. Luther did much by vigour, and Melancthon perhaps did not less by pursuing a slower and calmer course. Both were upright, open, and generous; and both, smitten with the love of the word of eternal life, served it with a fidelity and devotedness which formed the distinguishing feature of their lives."

MELCHIZEDEK, king of Salem, and priest of the most high God. Scripture tells us nothing of his father, or of his mother, or of his genealogy, or of his birth, or of his death. Gen. xiv. 18; Heb. vii. 1-3. And in this sense he was, as Paul says, a figure of Jesus Christ, who is a priest for ever, according to the order of Melchizedek; and not according to the order of Aaron, whose origin, consecration, life, and death, are known.

The person of Melchizedek presents an interesting subject of inquiry. He has been variously and absurdly supposed to be the Holy Spirit, the Son of God, Enoch, or an angel; and also Shem. The last opinion has been elaborately supported by Mr. Taylor, in his edition of Calmet. But the remarks of Mr. Taylor on this subject appear more ingenious than sound. The following observations of Dr. Candlish, in his "Contributions towards the Exposition of the Book of Genesis," set the matter in a much clearer light, resting, as they very properly do, not so much on the person as on the office of the mysterious personage to whom even Abraham paid tithes:—

"1. Melchizedek was undoubtedly an eminently holy man—a believer in the true God and in the promised Messiah; and accordingly the interview between him and Abram, considered merely as the meeting of two eminent believers and patriarchs, is full of interest—the one, Melchizedek, being a remarkable example of the grace of God, preserving, amid the dregs of a general apostasy, an elect remnant; the other, Abram, being an instance no less striking of the same sovereign grace, bringing in, from without, a new seed; and the two mutually recognising and acknowledging each other. It is as if the torch were here visibly handed over from the last of the former band, to the first of that which is to succeed; the Church is transferred to a new stock or stem; the cause receives a new impulse, and is to have a fresh start; and this singular transaction between Melchizedek and Abram is the connecting link between the two systems, or orders, or dispensations, of which the one is now waxing old, and the other is but just beginning to appear. The general unrestricted dispensation of religious faith and worship, transmitted indiscriminately by tradition, among all the descendants of Noah, is about to give place to one limited to a particular family or race, to whom ultimately are to be committed the oracles of God. One form of the primitive system is to be superseded by another. The patriarchal institute is to be succeeded by the Levitical and legal ordinances which are to be established in Abram's house; and the substantial identity of the two, the Patriarchal and the Levitical, is indicated by the meeting of the representatives, respectively, of both. It is like aged Simeon, embracing in his arms the infant Saviour—the last patriarch and prophet of the law, not departing till he sees and hails the new-born hope of the gospel; the lingering twilight of declining day, mingling with the dawn of a better morn. It is like what we read of in the early rise of the Reformation, in the experience of the great reformer, when, at the very turning point of his spiritual history, the decisive and critical energy that wrought in him, was to all appearance the word in season spoken to him by a monk of Rome. "I believe in the forgiveness of sins," said that holy man, reciting a portion of the Creed, for the relief of the deep despondency which had long settled down upon the soul of the awakened sinner. It was instant life and healing to his aching bones. The gospel of the free grace of God was preached. The reformer caught and grasped the principle, never afterwards to be let go, on which the whole blessed Reformation was to hinge; and this memorable meeting marked the fellowship between the spirit of the new era or order of the Church, and that which still survived, in a few instances, amid the hopeless declension and decay of the old. So in the interview between Melchizedek and Abram, we have the blending, as it were, and uniting of two different streams—the one, now become diffuse, troubled, and impure, and about to lose itself in shifting sands; the other, bursting fresh from a new source, and just beginning to flow in a straiter channel. At a single point, as it were, at which the former stream is yet unpolluted, they approach towards each other—they meet and mingle their waters. Thus regarded, the blessing which Melchizedek pronounced on Abram, and the offering which Abram presented to Melchizedek, are felt to be peculiarly significant and appropriate.

"2. But that a higher view still is to be taken of this transaction, is plain from the use which the apostle writing to the Hebrews makes of it, and the importance which he attaches to it. Melchizedek officiated as the type of the Messiah, who was to be a priest after the same order with himself; and Abram undoubtedly had respect to him in that character. It was not the mediation of a mere man that he acknowledged; it was not the ministry of an earthly priest in which he trusted. Melchizedek, king and priest as he was, could not really and effectually convey to Abram the blessing of the most high God, the possessor of heaven and of earth; nor was it through him that the glory of Abram's victory, and the tithes of his spoil and of his goods, could be acceptably transmitted to God. But a greater than Melchizedek is here; present surely not, indeed, to the senses, but to the minds of both. In His name Melchizedek acts, and to Him, in Melchizedek's person, Abram does homage. The two patriarchs understand one another. Melchizedek, as the last preserver, as it were, of the patriarchal hope, hands over his function to one more highly favoured than himself, in the very spirit of the Baptist—"He must increase, but I must decrease." His own occupation, as a witness and standing type of the Messiah, is over; one newly called out of heathenism is to succeed and to take his place. Melchizedek is content. He hails in Abram the promised seed, and blesses him accordingly; while again, in Melchizedek, Abram sees the day of Christ afar off and is glad; and thus, both the Patriarchal and the Levitical dispensations appear in their true character as subordinate and shadowy; and in the eyes of Melchizedek, and of Abram alike, Christ is all in all."

MELCHIZEDEKIAN, a denomination which arose about the beginning of the third century. They affirmed that Melchizedek was not a man, but a heavenly power superior to Jesus Christ; for Melchizedek, they said, was the intercessor and mediator of the angels; and Jesus Christ was only so for man, and his priesthood only a copy of that of Melchizedek.

MELITA, probably the island now called Malta; an island in the Mediterranean Sea, between Africa and Sicily, twenty miles in length and twelve in breadth, formerly reckoned a part of Africa, but now belonging to Europe. Paul suffered shipwreck upon the coast. Acts xxviii. 1-6.

In the opinion of Dr. Hales, the island where this happened was Meleda, near the Illyrian coast, not Malta on the southern coast of Sicily. In opposition, however, to this opinion, it may be remarked, in the words of La Trobe in his "Scriptural Illustrations," that "tradition has ever assigned the locality to Malta—that the winds south-east, east-south-east, and east, were equally calculated to drive a ship to Malta, in a direct course from Crete—that had the vessel taken the course of Meleda, there had been no danger of falling upon the Syrtis—that it does not appear that the Romans had ever such an establishment in Meleda as to require the residence of a pro-prætor—that it is not probable that a ship of Alexandria would choose such an island to winter in, which implies the arrival before the stormy season—that, in the event of a ship making the western coast of Italy from Meleda, there would have been no need to touch at Syracuse before it could arrive at Rhegium."

MELON (abattehim, clingers—Numb. xi. 5), a luscious fruit, so well known that a description of it would be superfluous. It grows to great perfection, and is highly esteemed, in Egypt, especially by the lower class of people, during the hot months.

MEMBER, properly denotes a part of the natural body. 1 Cor. xii. 12-27. Figuratively, sinful habits or affections, which in an unrenowned state compose a system, like a body consisting of many members (Rom. vii. 23); also, true believers, members of Christ's mystical body, as forming one society or body, of which Christ is the head. Eph. iv. 25.

MEMORY, that faculty of the mind by which past objects, thoughts, and feelings, may be recalled, so as again to become the objects of investigation. Without memory, it has been often said, our knowledge would have been limited exclusively to the present; but we feel warranted in affirming, that without the power of recalling past thoughts and feelings, we would have had no knowledge whatever. The human mind would have simply been subject to numberless unconnected sensations or feelings, which could have led to no thoughts, no feeling, no action beyond themselves. What, then, is the peculiar character of this reproductive power by which the past is, as it were, converted into the present? In what may it be distinguished from the faculty of perception, which is cognizant of present objects? Both are mental acts exercised upon the objects or ideas now before them. The subjective acts of mind are in both cases the same, but the difference lies in the object, which in the one case is present to the mind for the first time, and in the other case had also been formerly present to it. It is not the notion or belief of past time which characterizes memory as distinguished from perception; but it is the actual pastness of the objects in memory and the actual presentness of the objects in perception. It is, in short, not a subjective but an objective difference, not to be sought in an analysis of the act itself, but in a consideration of the object which forms the ground of the mental act. Hence we put equally implicit credence in what we fully remember as in what we clearly see. The objects are different in so far as the relation of time is concerned; but the act of mind is the same. We see distinctly, and therefore, we assert with firm assurance; we remember distinctly having seen, and therefore we assert with as firm an assurance of its truth. But though the evidence in both cases is equally strong to us, it is not so to others. They can have no possible consciousness of our mental state, but they know simply that the object is past, and this with them is a sufficient reason why they should put less confidence in our recollection of a fact than in our actual perception of it. To others, then, the evidence of memory is by no means so satisfactory as the evidence of sense; but to ourselves it is quite as much so. Memory is asserted by Dr. Reid and Mr. Stewart to be a distinct faculty; and by Mr. Hartley and Dr. Brown it is regarded as resolvable into ASSOCIATION (which see). By whatever name it may be called, the existence of an important law of our mental constitution is undeniable, in virtue of which past objects, thoughts, and feelings recur to the mind.

MENAIHEM, the sixteenth king of Israel, who murdered Shallum, and took possession of the throne. He was a wicked and cruel prince. He reigned about ten years.

MENDÆANS, MENDAITES, or disciples of John, that is, the Baptist. From twenty to twenty-five thousand families of this sect still remain, chiefly in the neighbourhood of Bassora, a city between Arabia and Persia, on the extremity of the desert of Irac. They are sometimes called Christians of St. John; a name which they probably received from the Turks, and to which they contentedly submit for the sake of the toleration it affords them; but they are better known in ecclesiastical history as Hemero (or every day) Baptists, from their frequent washings. See CHRISTIANS OF ST. JOHN.

MENDELSON, MOSES. See ANTI-TALMUDISTS.

MENDICANTS, or BEGGING FRIARS, several orders of religious in Popish countries, who, having no settled revenues, are supported by charitable contributions. They were instituted by Pope Innocent III. in 1215, for the express purpose of opposing heretics, and maintaining the authority of the Pope and the Church of Rome. Their affectation of humility and poverty, travelling barefooted, with a cord for a girdle round their loins, and begging from door to door, gave them great influence with the people, which they uniformly employed to the support of ignorance and superstition, and, in many cases, of persecution. They multiplied like locusts in the earth, and formed four great swarms—Dominicans, Franciscans, Carmelites, and Hermits of St. Augustine; which will be found severally noticed in their proper places.

MENE, a Chaldean word, signifying he has numbered, or he has counted. Daniel explained this ill-boding inscription to the king of Babylon.

MENI, the name of an idol referred to in the margin of Isa. lxx. 11, as having libations poured out to it. Meni was a Babylonian deity, supposed by some to be the moon, and by others to be one of the planets, either Venus or Saturn. Calmet thinks Meni to be the same with Astarte and Venus Cœlestis, who was worshipped by the Phœnicians and Carthaginians. Professor Jahn says, "Perhaps Meni is fate, from manah to number, to define; or perhaps the idol known under the Arabic word Manah, which was formerly worshipped by the tribes Hudeil and Choraa, between Mecca and Medina, before the time of Mohammed."

MENNO SIMONS, one of the illustrious reformers of the sixteenth century, a man whose apostolical spirit and labours have never yet been appreciated, was born in Friesland, in 1505. In his twenty-fourth year (1528) he entered into orders as a Romish priest although in utter darkness of mind and worldliness of spirit, yet not without some tenderness of conscience and apparent piety. In 1530, he was induced to examine the New Testament with diligence, in consequence of doubts concerning transubstantiation. He now became through grace gradually enlightened, his preaching changed, and he was called by some an evangelical preacher, though he says of himself that at the time, "The world loved me, and I loved the world." At length an account of the martyrdom of Sieke Snyder at Leuwarden, for Anabaptism, roused him to a similar inquiry concerning the other sacrament, which resulted in his embracing the views of the persecuted Baptists, though he for several years struggled to suppress his secret convictions, on account of the odium and suffering the avowal must incur. "By the gracious favour of God," he observes, "I have acquired my knowledge, as well of baptism as of the Lord's supper, through the enlightening of the Holy Spirit, attendant on my much reading and contemplating the Scriptures, and not through the efforts and means of seducing sects, as I am accused." Menno was a man of genius, and sound judgment. He possessed a natural and persuasive eloquence, and such a degree of learning as made him pass with many for an oracle. He appears, moreover, to have been a man of probity, of a meek and tractable spirit, gentle in his manners, affable in his commerce with persons of all ranks and characters, and extremely zealous in promoting practical religion and virtue, which he recommended by his example as well as by his precepts. He died in 1561, in the duchy of Holstein, at the country seat of a certain nobleman not far from the city of Oldeslohe, who, moved with compassion by the view of the perils to which Menno was exposed, and the snares that were daily laid for his ruin, took him, with certain of his associates, into his protection, and gave him an asylum. The writings of Menno, which are almost all composed in the Dutch language, were published in folio, at Amsterdam, in the year 1651.

MENNONITES, a society of Baptists in Holland, so called from Menno Simons. (See MENNO.) This great man, as Mosheim observes, reduced the system of the scattered sect then called Anabaptists to consistency and moderation. See ANABAPTISTS—BAPTISTS.

The Mennonites maintain that practical piety is the essence of religion, and that the surest mark of the true Church is the sanctity of its members. They plead for universal toleration in religion; and debar none from their societies who lead pious lives, and own the Scriptures for the word of God. They teach that infants are not the proper subjects of baptism; that ministers of the gospel ought to receive no salary from the State. They also object to the terms, person and trinity, as not consistent with the simplicity of the Scriptures.

They are, like the Society of Friends, utterly averse to oaths and war, and to capital punishments, as contrary to the spirit of the Christian dispensation. In their private meetings every one has the liberty to speak, to expound the Scriptures, and to pray. They assemble (or used to do so) twice every year from all parts of Holland, at Rynsborgh, a village two leagues from Leyden; at which time they receive the communion, sitting at a table in the manner of the Independents; but in their form of discipline they are said more to resemble the Presbyterians.

The ancient Mennonites professed a contempt of erudition and science, only when put in competition with piety in their ministers, and excluded all from their communion who deviated in the least from the most rigorous rules of simplicity and gravity; but this primitive austerity is greatly diminished in their most considerable societies. Those who adhere to their ancient discipline are called Flemings, or Flandrians. The whole sect were formerly called Waterlandians, from the district in which they lived. An unspeakable number have been martyrs.

With respect to the number of Mennonites in Holland, they are calculated at thirty thousand, including children, and form about one hundred and thirty churches. In the United States of America, it appears, "there are more than two hundred Mennonite churches, some of which contain as many as three hundred members in each; and," Mr. Ward says, "they are mostly the descendants of the Mennonites who emigrated in great numbers from Palitz."

MEPHIBOSHETH, a son of Jonathan, and a nephew of Saul, whose proper name was Meribaa. At the death of his father, who was slain in the battle of Mount Gilboa, Mephibosheth was very young, and his nurse, on hearing that David had won the battle, fled with the child, who in her flight dropped from her arms and became lame for life. Chiefly, perhaps, in consequence of this accident, he took no active part in public affairs, and it was highly creditable to the generosity of David that Mephibosheth was put in possession of all his father's property, and retained in David's house all the rest of his life. Through the treachery of his servant, Ziba, however, Mephibosheth was again deprived of his paternal estates by order of the king. And even although David learned that he had been deceived by false representations, he hastily proposed that the inheritance of Mephibosheth, instead of being wholly restored to him, should be divided between him and Ziba. But with noble generosity, the injured prince replied, "Yea, let him take all, forasmuch as my lord the king is come again in peace unto his own house." 2 Sam. xix. 30. At an after period, David spared the life of Mephibosheth, when, by his permission, the Gibeonites sought to exterminate the house of Saul." 2 Sam. xxi. 7.

MERAB, the eldest daughter of Saul, who was promised to be given in marriage to David on account of his victory over Goliath of Gath. The promise, however, was never fulfilled; but Merab was married to Adriel the son of Bazillai the Meholathite, by whom she had five sons, all of whom were slain by the Gibeonites, as being descendants of the house of Saul.

MERCHANTS. In Oriental cities every distinct trade has its own bazaar, in which merchandise of a different description is not found. Each class of merchants or tradesmen have their allotted street, where the shop-keepers, seated in front of their warehouses upon little raised divans of wood or earth, on which a mat is spread, spend the day in exhibiting their commodities. Hence we find mention made in Jer. xxxvii. 21, of "the bakers' street." Merchants, however, have from early times been accustomed in the East to wander from place to place for purposes of trade. Hence we are told of the Midianitish merchants being on their way to Egypt with caravans of merchandise, when Joseph was sold to them as a slave. The description of the caravan of foreigners proceeding to Egypt for a market more than seventeen centuries before the Christian era corresponds with what may be seen at the present day. Even in the days of the apostles merchants must have been accustomed to wander from one place to another, for the Apostle James (iv. 13-15) thus speaks, referring to this practice, "Go to now, ye that say, To-day or to-morrow we will go into such a city, and continue there a year, and buy and sell, and get gain: whereas ye know not what shall be on the morrow. For what is your life? It is even a vapour, that appeareth for a little time, and then vanisheth away. For that ye ought to say, If the Lord will, we shall live, and do this or that."

MERCURY, a heathen god, worshipped among the ancient Romans, and also, under the name of Hermes, by the ancient Greeks. He was regarded as the god of learning and eloquence. Hence the people of Lystra, when they heard Paul preach and saw him work miracles, cried out, "The gods are come down to us in the likeness of men;" and they gave Paul the name of Mercury (Acts xiv. 12), because he was the chief speaker, Mercury being considered as the interpreter of the will of the gods.

MERCY, the exercise of good will towards those who have not merited it, and especially towards those who have merited anger and punishment. It is said of Jehovah that "he delighteth in mercy," but it is only through the Redeemer that mercy is exercised towards fallen man.

MERCY-SEAT, literally a covering, from a Hebrew verb to cover. The verb is, however, used for the most part in a moral sense, being applied to the covering, that is, the expiation, of sins. The Greek version unites the two senses, rendering a propitiatory covering or mercy-seat, a rendering sanctioned by the apostle: "And over it the cherubims of glory shadowing the mercy-seat; of which we cannot now speak particularly." Heb. ix. 5. The same term is applied to Christ in Rom. iii. 25: "Whom God hath set forth to be a propitiation through faith in his blood, to declare his righteousness for the remission of sins that are past, through the forbearance of God." So also 1 John ii. 2: "And he is the propitiation for our sins; and not for ours only, but also for the sins of the whole world." Whence the conclusion is probably fairly to be drawn that the mercy-seat was in some sense an adumbration of Christ, as the grand medium of expiation for the sins of men. This mercy-seat, which was made of solid gold, was the upper side of the sacred chest, made to be removed entirely, or, as Josephus says, raised by hinges, when the tables of testimony were to be taken out or put in.

MERIBAH, literally strife or chiding, the name given to a spring in the desert of Sin, from an incident in the history of the Israelites, recorded in Exod. xvii. 1-7. According to tradition, the scene of the miracle is at the foot of Mount Sinai in the valley which separates it from the mountain of St Catherine.

MERIT signifies desert, or the earning of a fair title to a reward. Originally the word was applied to soldiers and other military persons, who, by their labours in the field, and by the various hardships they underwent during the course of a campaign, as also by other services they might occasionally render the commonwealth, were said, merere stipendia, to merit, or earn their pay; which they might properly be said to do, because they yielded in real service an equivalent to the State for the stipend they received, which was therefore due to them in justice. Here, then, we come at the true meaning of the word merit; from which it is very clearly to be seen that there can be no such thing as merit in our best obedience. One man may merit of another, but all mankind together cannot merit from the hand of God, because, being originally his, all possible service is but a duty, the failing of which is sin. This still more evidently appears, if we consider the imperfections of all our services, and the express declarations of the divine Word. Luke xvii. 10; Eph. ii. 8, 9; Rom. xi. 5, 6; Tit. iii. 5; Rom. x. 1, 4.

MERITS OF CHRIST, a term used to denote the active and passive obedience of Christ; all that he wrought and all that he suffered for the salvation of mankind. See ATONEMENT—IMPUTATION—OBEDIENCE—RIGHTEOUSNESS OF CHRIST.

MERODACH, the name of a Babylonian idol, as appears from the connection of the passage in which the word is found. "Declare ye among the nations, and publish, and set up a standard; publish, and conceal not: say, Babylon is taken, Bel is confounded, Merodach is broken in pieces; her idols are confounded, her images are broken in pieces." Jer. l. 2. As the Babylonian worship chiefly consisted of the adoration of the heavenly bodies, Merodach is supposed to have been the name which they gave to one of the planets.

MEROM, or, as it is termed in Josh. xi. 5, the Waters of Merom, a lake supplied by the Jordan. It is called by Josephus, Semechonites, and at the present day Bahr Huleh and Bahr Klait. It is situated in a valley between two parts of Mount Hermon. Dr Wilson says that the greatest body of the lake is to the west of the emergence of the Jordan, and the Jordan is rather wide at its exit. Seetzen says that the shores of the lake are frequented by wild boars, which conceal themselves among the rushes, and Dr Wilson adds that he heard of wolves and jackals as being found on the shores of the lake, but that none of these can make the marsh itself their habitation.

MEROZ, a place near the brook Kishon, which was declared to be accursed because its inhabitants refused to come to the assistance of their brethren when they fought with Sisera. Judg. v. 23. There is a place some twenty miles north of Samaria, which is alleged to be the site of the ancient Meroz, and which is now called Mezra.

MESHIA, a place in Arabia anciently inhabited by the descendants of Joktan. Gen. x. 30. By some it is supposed to have been a port on the Red Sea, and by others it is thought to have been Mecca, the city to which the Mohammedan pilgrims are in the habit of resorting.

MESHACH, the name given to Mishaël, one of the three Hebrew youths, by the prince of the eunuchs at Babylon. What might be the object of changing the names of the captives is not very apparent; perhaps to degrade them.

MESHECH, the sixth son of Japheth (Gen. x. 2), who seems to have settled along with his brother Tubal in the country extending from the shores of the Black Sea to the south of Mount Caucasus. The prophet Ezekiel gives a description of these regions, which agrees with the statements of classical writers: "Javan, Tubal, and Meshech, they were thy merchants: they traded the persons of men and vessels of brass in thy market." Ezek. xxvii. 13. These were probably the same people whom the Greeks called Moschi, and their settlements correspond to Cappadocia and Armenia.

MESOPOTAMIA, a large province of Asia, so named from being situated between the two rivers Tigris and Euphrates. Gen. xxiv. 10. The Scripture often speaks of this country by the name of Aram or Aramea, because it was first peopled by Aram the fifth son of Shem. It is also called the land of Shinar, where men first settled after the deluge. It was anciently a very fertile country abounding in vines. Here stood the ancient Babylon and the region of Babylonia (which see), washed by the two navigable rivers, the Tigris and Euphrates, most advantageously situated for commerce. Babylonia corresponds to Irak-el-Arabia, and Mesopotamia to Algizira. The latter varies in climate and soil; the northern part being hilly, elevated, yet well watered, and abounding in excellent pastures; the middle, or Mesopotamia Proper, being flat and level, and capable of yielding every kind of grain and fruit; while the southern part is desert.

"On the fifth or sixth day after leaving Aleppo," says Campbell in his Overland Journey to India, "we arrived at the city of Diarbeker, the capital of the province of that name; having passed over an extent of country of between three and four hundred miles, most of it blessed with the greatest fertility, and abounding with as rich pastures as I ever beheld, covered with numerous herds and flocks. The air was charmingly temperate in the day-time, but, to my feeling, extremely cold at night. Yet notwithstanding the extreme fertility of this country, the bad administration of government conspiring with the indolence of the inhabitants, leaves it unpeopled and uncultivated. Diarbeker proper, called also Mesopotamia, from its lying between two famous rivers, and by Moses called Padan-aram—that is, 'the fruitful Syria,'—abounds with corn, wine, oil, fruits, and all the necessities of life. It is supposed to have been the seat of the earthly paradise; and all geographers agree that here the descendants of Noah settled immediately after the flood. To be treading that ground which Abraham trod, where Nabor the father of Rebecca lived, where holy Job breathed the pure air of piety and simplicity, and where Laban, the father-in-law of Jacob resided, was to me a circumstance productive of delightful sensations." See ABRAHAM.

MESSENGER. It is customary in Eastern countries to employ messengers on foot to convey important despatches, and these persons run with amazing rapidity. Messengers were also sent to announce the approach of kings or nobles. Hence of John the Baptist, the forerunner of our Lord, it was predicted, "Behold, I will send my messenger, and he shall prepare the way before me: and the Lord, whom ye seek, shall suddenly come to his temple, even the messenger of the covenant, whom ye delight in: behold, he shall come, saith the Lord of hosts." Mal. iii. 1.

MESSIAH. The Greek word Christos, from whence comes Christ and Christian, exactly answers to the Hebrew Messiah, which signifies him that hath received unction, a king, a prophet, or a priest. See JESUS CHRIST.

The ancient Jews had just notions of the Messiah, which came gradually to be corrupted, by expecting a temporal monarch and conqueror; and finding Jesus Christ to be poor, humble, and of an unpromising appearance, they rejected him. Most of the modern rabbins, according to Buxtorf, believe that the Messiah is come, but that he lies concealed because of the sins of the Jews. Others believe he is not yet come, fixing different times for his appearance, many of which are elapsed; and, being thus baffled, have pronounced an anathema against those who shall pretend to calculate the time of his coming. To reconcile the prophecies concerning the Messiah that seemed to be contradictory, some have had recourse to a twofold Messiah; one in a state of poverty and suffering, the other of splendour and glory. The first, they say, is to proceed from the tribe of Ephraim, who is to fight against Gog, and to be slain by Armillus (Zech. xii. 10); the second is to be of the tribe of Judah and lineage of David, who is to conquer and kill Armillus—to bring the first Messiah to life again, to assemble all Israel, and rule over the whole world.

That Jesus Christ is the true Messiah, and actually come in the flesh, is evident, if we consider (as Mr. Fuller observes) that it is intimated that whenever he should come, the sacrifices and ceremonies of the Mosaic law were to be superseded by him. Ps. xl. 6-8; 1 Sam. xv. 22; Dan. ix. 27; Jer. xxxi. 31-34; Heb. viii. 13. Now sacrifice and oblation have ceased. They virtually ceased when Jesus offered himself a sacrifice, and in a few years after they actually ceased. A few of the ancient ceremonies are indeed adhered to, but, as one of the Jewish writers acknowledges, "the sacrifices of the holy temple have ceased." Let every Jew, therefore, ask himself this question: Should Messiah the Prince come at some future period, how are the sacrifice and oblation to cease on his appearance, when they have already ceased nearly eighteen hundred years? See CHRISTIANITY—JESUS CHRIST.

METEMPSYCHOSIS, the doctrine of the transmigration of souls to other bodies. It was a dogma of Pythagoras, derived from the Egyptians. It has been alleged, from some remarks of Josephus, that he attributed this opinion to the Pharisees, to which sect he himself belonged. Thus he says, describing their doctrine, "Every soul is immortal; those of the good only enter into another body, but those of the bad are tormented with everlasting punishment." It is plain from this statement that if Josephus is speaking of metempsychosis, he only applies it to the good. The passage, therefore, which is sometimes adduced to support the idea that metempsychosis was believed by the Pharisees, "And his disciples asked him, saying, Master, who did sin, this man, or his parents, that he was born blind?" (John ix. 2) has no force since the question is asked in reference to sinners, not to the good. A more apposite passage is found in the apocryphal Book of Wisdom, viii. 20 : "Being good, he came into a body undefiled." The doctrine of the metempsychosis prevails at the present day almost universally in the East. Thus Dr Duff describes the Hindu notions on this subject : "As bodily forms, the temporary abodes of souls, undergo a constant succession of mutation, the proper destiny of every soul is to transmigrate with a view to expiate its guilt and wipe away its stains by means of pains and sufferings, through millions and millions more of these forms, throughout the stupendous cycle which constitutes the life of Brahma or the duration of the present universe."

METE-YARD. This word occurs only in Lev. xix. 35, and signifies a measuring line.

METHODISTS, WESLEYAN. This large and respectable denomination was founded, in the year 1729, by Mr. Morgan and Mr. John Wesley. (See WESLEY, JOHN.) These constitute the great body of the Arminian Methodists, who hold the chapels, schools, &c., built or founded by the great father of Methodism, and consider themselves as representatives to the present generation of what that system was when originally established.

1. Doctrine. The doctrines of the Wesleyan Methodists, according to their own account, are the same as the Church of England, as set forth in her liturgy, articles, and homilies. This, however, has been disputed. Mr. Wesley, in his Appeal to men of Reason and Religion, thus declares his sentiments :—"All I teach," he observes, "respects either the nature and condition of justification, the nature and condition of salvation, the nature of justifying and saving faith, or the Author of faith and salvation. That justification whereof our articles and homilies speak, signifies present forgiveness, and consequently acceptance with God; I believe the condition of this is faith: I mean not only that without faith we cannot be justified, but also that, as soon as any one has true faith, in that moment he is justified. Good works follow this faith, but cannot go before it; much less can sanctification, which implies a continued course of good works, springing from holiness of heart. But it is allowed that sanctification goes before our justification at the last day. Heb. xii. 14. Repentance, and fruits meet for repentance, go before faith. Repentance absolutely must go before faith; fruits meet for it, if there be opportunity. By repentance I mean conviction of sin, producing real desires and sincere resolutions of amendment; by salvation I mean, not barely deliverance from hell, but a present deliverance from sin. Faith, in general, is a divine supernatural evidence or conviction of things not seen, not discoverable by our bodily senses: justifying faith implies not only a divine evidence or conviction that God was in Christ reconciling the world unto himself, but a sure trust and confidence that Christ died for my sins, that he loved me, and gave himself for me. And the moment a penitent sinner believes this, God pardons and absolves him; and as soon as his pardon or justification is witnessed to him by the Holy Ghost, he is saved. From that time (unless he make shipwreck of the faith) salvation gradually increases in his soul.

"The Author of faith and salvation is God alone. There is no more of power than of merit in man; but as all merit is in the Son of God, in what he has done and suffered for us, so all power is in the Spirit of God. And, therefore, every man, in order to believe unto salvation, must receive the Holy Ghost." So far Mr. Wesley. Respecting original sin, free will, the justification of men, good works, and works done before justification, he refers us to what is said on these subjects in the former part of the ninth, the tenth, the eleventh, the twelfth, and thirteenth articles of the Church of England. In order that we may form still clearer ideas respecting Mr. Wesley's opinions, we shall here quote a few questions and answers as laid down in the Minutes of Conference. Q. "In what sense is Adam's sin imputed to all mankind?" A. "In Adam all die; that is, (1.) Our bodies then became mortal; (2.) Our souls died—that is, were disunited from God; and hence, (3.) We are all born with a sinful, devilish nature; by reason whereof, (4.) We are children of wrath, liable to death eternal." Rom. v. 18; Eph. ii. 3. Q. "In what sense is the righteousness of Christ imputed to all mankind, or to believers?" A. "We do not find it expressly affirmed in Scripture that God imputes the righteousness of Christ to any, although we do find that faith is imputed for righteousness. That text, 'As by one man's disobedience all men were made sinners, so by the obedience of one all were made righteous,' we conceive, means, by the merits of Christ all men are cleared from the guilt of Adam's actual sin." Q. "Can faith be lost but through disobedience?" A. "It cannot. A believer first inwardly disobeys; inclines to sin with his heart; then his intercourse with God is cut off—that is, his faith is lost; and after this he may fall into outward sin, being now weak, and like another man." Q. "What is implied in being a perfect Christian?" A. "The loving the Lord our God with all our heart, and with all our mind, and soul, and strength." Q. "Does this imply that all inward sin is taken away?" A. "Without doubt; or how could we be said to be saved from all our uncleannesses?" Ezek. xxxvi. 29. Q. "How much is allowed by our brethren who differ from us with regard to entire sanctification?" A. "They grant, (1.) That every one must be entirely sanctified in the article of death; (2.) That till then a believer daily grows in grace, comes nearer and nearer to perfection; (3.) That we ought to be continually pressing after this, and to exhort all others to do so." Q. "What do we allow them?" A. "We grant, (1.) That many of those who have died in the faith, yea, the greater part of those we have known, were not sanctified throughout, not made perfect in love, till a little before death; (2.) That the term sanctified is continually applied by St. Paul to all that were justified, that were true believers; (3.) That by this term alone he rarely (if ever) means saved from all sin; (4.) That, consequently, it is not proper to use it in this sense, without adding the word 'wholly, entirely,' or the like; (5.) That the inspired writers almost continually speak of or to those who were justified, but very rarely either of or to those who were sanctified; (6.) That, consequently, it behoves us to speak in public almost continually of the state of justification; but more rarely in full and explicit terms concerning entire sanctification." Q. "What, then, is the point wherein we divide?" A. "It is this: Whether we should expect to be saved from all sin before the article of death?" Q. "Is there any clear Scripture promise of this, that God will save us from all sin?" A. "There is: 'He shall redeem Israel from all his iniquities.' Ps. cxxx. 8.

This is more largely expressed in Ezek. xxxvi. 25-29; 2 Cor. vii. 1; Deut. xxx. 6; 1 John iii. 8; Eph. v. 25-27; John xvii. 20, 23; 1 John iv. 17."

2. Discipline. Mr. Wesley having formed numerous societies in different parts, he, with his brother Charles, drew up certain rules, by which they were, and, it seems, in many respects, still are, governed. They state the nature and design of a Methodist society in the following words:—

"Such a society is no other than a company of men having the form and seeking the power of godliness; united in order to pray together, to receive the word of exhortation, and to watch over one another in love, that they may help each other to work out their salvation.

"That it may the more easily be discerned whether they are indeed working out their own salvation, each society is divided into smaller companies, called classes, according to their respective places of abode. There are about twelve persons (sometimes fifteen, twenty, or even more) in each class; one of whom is styled the leader. It is his business, (1.) To see each person in his class once a-week, at least, in order to inquire how their souls prosper; to advise, reprove, comfort, or exhort, as occasion may require; to receive what they are willing to give to the poor, or towards the gospel. (2.) To meet the minister and the stewards of the society once a-week, in order to inform the minister of any that are sick, or of any that walk disorderly, and will not be reprov'd; to pay to the stewards what they have received of their several classes in the week preceding; and to show their account of what each person has contributed."

"The practice of the Wesleyan Methodists is, not to preach long in any place unless they succeed in forming a 'society;' so that, generally speaking, wherever they have a congregation they have also a 'society,' consisting sometimes of a single class, and from one to a considerable number, according to the number of the members. The classes attached to each chapel or preaching place are, in the aggregate, called a 'society.' Each class has its 'leader,' and the meeting of all the leaders of a society is called a 'leaders' meeting.' Each society answers nearly to a 'church' in other denominations; and as many societies as it may be found convenient to attach together form a 'circuit.'

"The public worship of these societies is conducted in each circuit by two descriptions of preachers, one clerical, the other lay. The clerics are separated entirely to the work of the ministry,—are members of, or in connection with, or received as probationers by, the Conference,—and are supported by funds raised for that purpose in the classes and congregations. From one to four of these, called 'itinerant preachers,' are appointed annually, for not exceeding three years in immediate succession, to the same circuit. Their ministry is not confined to any particular chapel in the circuit, but they act interchangeably from place to place, seldom preaching in the same place more than one Sunday without a change, which is effected according to a plan generally remade every quarter. Of itinerant preachers there are at present about 915 in Great Britain. The lay, or 'local' preachers as they are denominated, follow secular callings, like others of their fellow-subjects, and preach on the Sabbaths at the places appointed for them in the above-mentioned plan; as great an interval being observed between their appointments to the same place as can be conveniently arranged. By this means great variety and freshness is produced in their ministrations. No local or lay preacher is permitted to receive any remuneration for his services. By these means a circuit comprising perhaps twenty preaching places is adequately served with from two to four regular itinerants, assisted by the local preachers, and at an expense proportionably small when compared with any system having a fixed minister for each congregation. The number of these local or lay preachers is estimated at present at between 13,000 and 14,000.

"At present there are 428 circuits in Great Britain. Besides preaching in the various chapels in their respective circuits, the itinerant preachers administer the sacraments of baptism and the Lord's Supper. One or other of them, according to an arrangement amongst themselves, meets every class in his circuit once in every quarter, personally converses with every member, and distributes to all such as have throughout the past three months walked orderly a ticket, which authenticates their membership. One of the ministers in every circuit is called the 'superintendent,' whose duties, in addition to his ordinary labours as a travelling preacher, are, to see that the Methodist discipline is properly maintained,—to admit candidates into membership (subject to a veto by a leaders' meeting),—and to expel from the society any member whom a leaders' meeting shall pronounce guilty of any particular offence. Appeal, however, lies from his decision to a district meeting, and ultimately to the Conference. The Conference, the highest Wesleyan court, is composed exclusively of ministers.

"The census accounts show 6579 chapels in England and Wales, belonging to this Connection in March 1851; containing (allowance being made for defective returns) accommodation for 1,447,580 persons. The number of attendants on the census Sunday was—morning, 492,714; afternoon, 383,964; evening, 667,850; including an estimate for 133 chapels, for which the number of attendants was not stated.

"In 1839 was celebrated the Centenary of the existence of Wesleyan Methodism; and the gratitude of the people towards the system under which they had derived so much advantage was displayed by contributions to the large amount of £216,000, which sum was appropriated to the establishment of theological institutions in Yorkshire and at Richmond,—the purchase of the 'Centenary Hall and Mission House' in Bishopsgate Street,—the provision of a missionary ship,—the discharge of chapel debts,—and the augmentation of the incomes of the Methodist religious societies. Of late years a considerable agitation has diminished to a great extent the number of the members in connection. The Minutes of Conference for 1853 report their number as being 270,265; so that, as compared with 1850, the official account of the diminution puts it at 87,312."

II. NEW CONNECTION. Since Mr Wesley's death his people have been divided; but this division, it seems, respects discipline more than sentiment. At the first Conference after his death, which was held at Manchester, the preachers published a declaration, in which they said that they would "take the plan as Mr Wesley had left it." This was by no means satisfactory to many of the preachers and people, who thought that religious liberty ought to be extended to all the societies which desired it. In order to favour this cause, so agreeable to the spirit of Christianity and the rights of Englishmen, several respectable preachers came forward; and by the writings which they circulated through the Connection, paved the way for a plan of pacification, by which it was stipulated, that in every society where a threefold majority of class-leaders, stewards, and trustees desired it, the people should have preaching in church hours, and the sacraments of baptism and the Lord's supper administered to them.

"Foremost among many who remained unsatisfied by these concessions was the Rev. Alexander Kilham, who, singularly enough, was born at Epworth, in Lincolnshire, the birthplace of the Wesleys. Mr Kilham, first acquiring prominence as an assertor of the right of Methodists to meet for worship in church hours and to receive the sacraments from their own ministers, was gradually led to take an active part in advocacy of the principle of lay participation in the government of the Connection. For the vigorous expression of these sentiments in a pamphlet entitled the 'Progress of Liberty,' he was tried at the Conference of 1796, and expelled from the Connection. The excitement consequent on these proceedings led to the establishment, in August 1797, when the hope was dissipated of procuring an amendment in the parent body, of the New Connection, now discussed.

"Originated by a movement for a certain and specific alteration in the constitution of Wesleyan Methodism, the New Connection differs from the parent body only with respect to those ecclesiastical arrangements which were then the subjects of dispute. In doctrines, and in all the essential and distinctive features of Wesleyan Methodism, there is no divergence: the Arminian tenets are as firmly held by the New as by the Old Connection; and the outline of ecclesiastical machinery—comprising classes, circuits, districts, and the Conference—is in both the same. The grand distinction rests upon the different degrees of power allowed in each communion to the laity. It has been shown that, in the 'Original Connection,' all authority is virtually vested in the preachers: they alone compose the Conference—their influence is paramount in the inferior courts—and even when, as in financial matters, laymen are appointed to committees, such appointments are entirely in the hands of Conference. The 'New Connection,' on the contrary, admits in all its courts the principle of lay participation in church government: candidates for membership must be admitted by the voice of the existing members, not by the minister alone; offending members cannot be expelled but with the concurrence of a leaders' meeting; officers of the body, whether leaders, ministers, or stewards, are elected by the church and ministers conjointly; and in district meetings and the annual Conference lay delegates (as many in number as the ministers) are present, chosen by the members of the churches.

"From the Minutes of Conference in 1853, it appears that the state of the Connection, in England and Wales, is as follows:—Chapels, 301; societies, 298; circuit preachers, 95; local preachers, 814; members, 16,670."

For a further account of their principles and discipline, we must refer the reader to a pamphlet, entitled, "General Rules of the United Societies of Methodists in the New Connection," in which the peculiarities of this vigorous offshoot from Wesleyan Methodism are set forth with the utmost clearness. The distinctive characteristic feature is lay representation in the courts of the Church, which has long been felt to be a desideratum in the original body as established by Wesley, but now that the question is mooted, it will be difficult to prevent it from gathering strength.

Besides the two large sections of Methodists there are some smaller offshoots from the Wesleyan body. Among these may be mentioned the Primitive Methodists or Ranters, who, along with a few other peculiarities, allow females to preach; the Independent Methodists, who form a very small sect; the Wesleyan Protestant Methodists, who are found chiefly in and around Leeds; the Bryanites, who differ little from the Ranters; and the Reformed Methodists, who, although the latest secession from the Wesleyan body, are a very large and increasing body, who have separated chiefly on the principle that lay-members ought to be admitted to a share in the administration of the public affairs of the Society.

METHODISTS, CALVINISTIC. This name, as distinguished from the Wesleyan or Arminian Methodists, includes three distinct bodies, known by the names of the Tabernacle Connection, Lady Huntingdon's Connection, and the Welsh Calvinistic Methodists. The last named is a large, highly respectable, and useful body of Christians, found chiefly in Wales. They arose at first from the labours of Howel Harris, Esq. of Trevecca, in Brecknockshire, much about the time that Methodism began in England. The organization of the body, however, is due to the Rev. Thomas Charles of Bala, who joined the Society in 1785. The constitution is peculiar, the body being arranged into private societies, which consist of faithful members in each district, who meet once every week, privately, under the superintendence of two or more leaders; monthly societies, which consist of preachers or leaders of private societies within the county, and such of the officers from neighbouring counties as may conveniently attend; and quarterly societies, which are convened once every quarter of a year, both in North and South Wales.

METHUSELAH, son of Enoch (Gen. v. 21, 22), was born A.M. 687. He begat Lamech, A.M. 874, and died A.M. 1656, aged nine hundred and sixty-nine years; the greatest age attained by any man. The year of his death was that of the deluge.

METROPOLITAN, a bishop of a mother-church, or of the chief church in the chief city. See BISHOP—EPISCOPACY.

MEZUZZOTH, a Hebrew word signifying a door-post of the house, and applied by the modern Jews to a roll of parchment which they fix to the door-posts of their houses. On a square piece of prepared parchment, with a particular ink, and in a square character, are written Deut. vi. 4-9. Then, leaving a little space, they quote Deut. xi. 13-21. The parchment is rolled up and put in lead in the form of a cylindrical tube, with Shaddai inscribed on it. This leaden case is fastened to the posts of their doors, when they must say the following grace: "Blessed art thou, O Lord our God, King of the universe! who hath sanctified us with his commandments, and commanded us to fix the Mezuzza." This practice originates in a literal observance of the command contained in Deut. vi. 9: "And thou shalt write them upon the posts of thy house, and on thy gates."

MICAH, the third of the minor prophets, according to the arrangement both in the Hebrew and the Septuagint. He was a native of Morasthi, a small town in the southern part of the territory of Judah. He prophesied in the reigns of Jotham, Ahaz, and Hezekiah, as he himself informs us in the commencement of his prophecy. The book contains seven chapters, which Mr Horne divides into three parts. The first chapter, which forms the first part, contains denunciations against both Judah and Israel, delivered in the reign of Jotham king of Judah, and Pekah king of Israel. The second part, which extends from the commencement of the second chapter to the eighth verse of the fourth chapter, contains the predictions delivered in the reign of Ahaz king of Judah, with whom Pekah was also contemporary. The third part, which extends from the ninth verse of the fourth chapter to the end of the book, includes the prophecies delivered during the reign of Hezekiah king of Judah, referring chiefly to the Babylonish captivity, the overthrow and murder of Sennacherib, and the promise of the Messiah.

The prophecy of Micah, contained in the 5th chapter, is, perhaps, the most important single prophecy in all the Old Testament, and the most comprehensive respecting the personal character of the Messiah, and his successive manifestations to the world. It crowns the whole chain of predictions respecting the several limitations of the promised seed—to the line of Shem; to the family of Abraham, of Isaac, and of Jacob; to the tribe of Judah, and to the royal house of David; terminating in his birth at Bethlehem, "the city of David." It carefully distinguishes his human nativity from his divine nature and eternal existence; foretells the casting off of the Israelites and Jews for a season; their ultimate restoration; and the universal peace which should prevail in the kingdom and under the government of the Messiah. This prophecy, therefore, forms the basis of the New Testament revelation, which commences with the birth of the Messiah at Bethlehem, the miraculous circumstances of which are recorded by Matthew and Luke in the introduction to their respective histories; the eternal subsistence of Christ as "the Word," in the sublime introduction to John's Gospel; his prophetic character, and second coming, illustrated in the four Gospels and in the apostolic Epistles.

MICAH, of Ephraim, son of a rich widow, who became an occasion of falling to Israel (Judg. xvii. 18), by making an ephod (or priestly habit) and images of metal for a domestic chapel. He made one of his own sons priest; and afterwards a young Levite. It is believed this happened in the interval after the death of Joshua and the elders that succeeded him, till Othniel judged Israel. Thus idolatry took root, and diffused its influence throughout the country.

MICAH, son of Imnah, of Ephraim, and a prophet, who lived in the time of Ahab. I Kings xxii. 8-38.

MICHAEL, the name of an archangel spoken of in Jude 9, 10, "Yet Michael the archangel, when, contending with the devil, he disputed about the body of Moses, durst not bring against him a railing accusation, but said, The Lord rebuke thee. But these speak evil of those things which they know not: but what they know naturally, as brute beasts, in those things they corrupt themselves." He is mentioned by Daniel as one of the chief angels who presided over the Israelites as a nation.

MICHMAS, a city of Ephraim, on the confines of Benjamin (Ezra ii. 27; Neh. vii. 31); called also Michmash. 1 Sam. xiii. 2; Isa. x. 28. Comp. Neh. xi. 31. Eusebius says it was, in his time, a considerable place, about nine miles from Jerusalem, towards Rama. Here Jonathan and his armour-bearer, by a gallant achievement, routed the Philistines who were defending the pass of Michmash. Travellers tell us that it is now called Beer, or a well, from a delicious spring situated at the bottom of the hill on which the village is built. From the days of Helena, who here built a church to commemorate the event, this has been looked upon as the spot where the parents of Jesus, on their return from the capital, discovered that their son was amissing, and whence they returned to Jerusalem to seek him.

MID-DAY. See DAY—Hour—TIME.

MIDIANITES, the inhabitants of the country of Midian, who are sometimes divided into the northern and southern Midianites. The former, who had connected themselves with the Moabites, were almost totally destroyed because of idolatry; the latter, who were also called Cushites, and among whom Moses dwelt for forty years, preserved the knowledge and the worship of the true God. The Midianites, along with the Ishmaelites, early traded with Egypt. Accordingly we find Joseph sold to Midianitish merchants who were carrying spices into Egypt. It was this people that combined with the Moabites against the Israelites, and made application to Balaam the soothsayer that he would curse them. Balaam, however, was constrained to bless instead of to curse, and the Midianites were utterly overthrown. The inhabitants of Midian appear to have in course of time recovered their strength, for, nearly two hundred years after, we find them harassing the Israelites for the space of seven years, but at length undergoing a miraculous defeat in the valley of Jezreel. This discomfiture the nation never recovered.

MID-NIGHT. See DAY—Hour—NIGHT—TIME.

MIGDOL, Exod. xiv. 2. It is not known whether Migdol was a city, or only a fortress, as the name signifies; probably the latter, in which a garrison was stationed. It seems to have been in Egypt, not far from the Arabian Gulf. Accordingly, we find it mentioned by Jeremiah (xlv. 1) among the cities of Egypt. The last encampment of the Israelites, before they crossed the Red Sea, was between Migdol and that sea. From Migdol to Sycne was a proverbial expression, to denote from one end of the land to the other.

MIGDON, a city in the tribe of Benjamin, to the north of Michmash. No trace of it is now to be found.

MILDEW, the blighting of trees or plants of any kind. It seems also to be applied to some disease incident to the human frame, as in Deut. xxviii. 22. In Amos iv. 9, the word evidently applies to the wasting of the fruits of the ground.

MILE, a measure of length, which is mentioned in Matt. v. 41. It must be understood as referring to a Roman mile, which consisted of a thousand paces, from which, probably, it derived its name. The Greeks, on the other hand, chiefly measured by furlongs or stadia, eight of which constituted a mile. The ancient Hebrews had no such measure as a mile, but the Rabbinical writers make the Roman mile consist of two thousand Hebrew cubits.

MILETUS, a once powerful city of Asia Minor, sixty-five miles south of Smyrna. It was termed the metropolis of Ionia, the bulwark of Asia. In the reign of Darius Hystaspes it was besieged and taken by the Persians, but afterwards recovered somewhat of its former wealth and honour. It stood out with great vigour against Alexander the Great, but instead of punishing the city, he restored it to its ancient freedom, and it continued to be a considerable city until the thirteenth century, when it fell into the hands of the Turks. The city has undergone numerous changes. At one time its people were distinguished for their skill in the useful arts, and their refinement, luxury, and wealth; now this once famed city is a mean deserted place, still bearing the name, as if in derision, of Palat, the Palaces. At present the Turks call it Molas, and it is not far distant from the true Meander, which encircles all the plain with many mazes and innumerable windings. In it was a magnificent temple of Apollo. It was to this place that Paul called the elders of the Church of Ephesus, to deliver his last charge to them. Acts xx. 15, &c. There was another Miletus in Crete, mentioned 2 Tim. iv. 20.

MILITANT (from militans, fighting), a term applied to the Church on earth, as engaged in a warfare with the world, sin, and the devil; in distinction from the Church triumphant in heaven.

MILK. The first natural food or nutriment of infancy. It is pure, sweet, simple, wholesome, and its reception requires no labour of the yet tender organs, either to chew, swallow, or digest, in order to yield nourishment. Milk was in very frequent use as an article of food among the Hebrews. It is the milk of sheep and goats that is principally employed in the preparation of dishes for the table. Indeed, the word which our translators render "butter," is properly cream. (See BUTTER.) We find, in Gen. xxxii. 15, milch camels mentioned, which shows that the milk of that useful animal was then an article of diet, as it still is among the Arabs. Goats' milk is also spoken of in Prov. xxvii. 27. A curious custom prevails in the East of pouring milk upon their heads after performing the funeral obsequies. To this there seems to be an allusion in Job x. 10: "Hast thou not poured me out as milk, and curdled me like cheese?" Paul compares some of his converts to little children, to be fed with milk, and not with solid food (1 Cor. iii. 2; Heb. v. 12); and Peter exhorts the faithful universally, "As newborn babes, desire the sincere milk of the word, that ye may grow thereby." 1 Pet. ii. 2. Such is the simple testimony of God to his children. Whatever requires an effort of the reasoning powers, on the other hand, is called "strong meat," and is adapted to the mature stage of Christian knowledge and experience. Hence it is evident that the doctrines of human sinfulness and condemnation; of justification by faith in Christ only; of the deity, incarnation, and atonement of the Saviour; of the necessity of regeneration by the Holy Spirit; of gratuitous election to salvation, according to God's eternal purpose and irrevocable calling; and of the everlasting tenure of future retribution; with their kindred truths, belong strictly and properly to the first class, not the latter. They are to be received on divine testimony, without reasoning, in all their integrity, simplicity, and sweetness, by the weakest believer; not as strong meat, but as the pure milk of the word. When thus received, their nourishing properties, as the sustenance of the divine life, will soon be conspicuous in the growth, health, and cheerful activity of the believer. Then in due time he will acquire the power of reasoning with a sound judgment on spiritual things. 1 Cor. ii. 15.

A land flowing with milk and honey, is a country of extraordinary fertility. In the prophets the kingdom of the Messiah is represented as a time of great abundance, "when the mountains should flow with milk and honey." Joel iii. 18. And Isaiah says to the Church: "Thou shalt also suck the milk of the Gentiles, and shalt suck the breasts of kings." Isa. lx. 16.

MILL. At a very early period, so far back indeed as the time of Abraham (Gen. xviii. 6), we learn that the flour was ground by small handmills, which consisted of two flat circular stones, one placed upon the other; the upper one was turned round, while the corn was poured between them through a hole at the top. These mills were usually worked by two women (Matt. xxiv. 41), who sat one on each side, and turned the upper stone round, pushing the handle from the one to the other. It seems to have been one of these millstones that the women of Thebez, as recorded in Judg. ix. 53, cast upon the head of Abimelech. This process is usually gone through every day in the East, so that it is usual early in the morning to hear the sound of the grinding and the accompanying songs of the women; so that when these sounds are not heard, the neighbours fear that all is not well. Hence, in the prediction of the desolation which was to come upon Jerusalem, it is said, "Moreover, I will take from them the voice of mirth, and the voice of gladness, the voice of the bridegroom, and the voice of the bride, the sound of the millstones, and the light of the candle." Jer. xxv. 10. The millstones being absolutely essential to the comfort of a family, the prohibition may be easily understood which we find in Deut. xxiv. 6, "No man shall take the nether or the upper millstone to pledge: for he taketh a man's life to pledge." It was usual for female slaves to be employed in grinding. Hence we may see the propriety of the expression in the declaration of Moses: "And all the firstborn in the land of Egypt shall die, from the firstborn of Pharaoh that sitteth upon his throne, even unto the firstborn of the maid-servant that is behind the mill." Exod. xi. 5.

The manner in which the handmills are worked is well described by Dr E. D. Clarke, in his Travels: "Scarcely had we reached the apartment prepared for our reception, when, looking from the window into the court-yard belonging to the house, we beheld two women grinding at the mill, in a manner most forcibly illustrating the saying of our Saviour: 'Two women shall be grinding at the mill, the one shall be taken and the other left.' They were preparing flour to make our bread, as it is always customary in the country when strangers arrive. The two women, seated upon the ground opposite to each other, held between them two round flat stones, such as are seen in Lapland, and such as in Scotland are called querns. In the centre of the upper stone was a cavity for pouring in the corn, and by the side of this an upright wooden handle for moving the stone. As this operation began, one of the women opposite received it from her companion, who pushed it towards her, who again sent it to her companion; thus communicating a rotatory motion to the upper stone, their left hands being all the while employed in supplying fresh corn, as fast as the bran and flour escaped from the sides of the machine."

The millstone, on account of its weight, was sometimes attached to the neck of malefactors in Syria, who were condemned to the punishment of drowning. Hence the remark of our Lord: "But whoso shall offend one of these little ones which believe in me, it were better for him that a millstone were hanged about his neck, and that he were drowned in the depth of the sea." Matt. xviii. 6. This mode of inflicting death was very common in the time of Christ, and is still resorted to in some countries of the East.

MILLENARIANS, or CHILIASTS, a name given to those who believe that the saints will reign on earth with Christ a thousand years. See next article.

MILLENNIUM, "a thousand years;" generally employed to denote the thousand years during which, according to an ancient tradition in the Church, grounded on some texts in the Apocalypse and other Scriptures, our blessed Saviour shall reign with the faithful upon earth after the first resurrection, before the final completion of beatitude.

Though there has been no age of the Church in which millenarian opinions were not admitted by individual divines, it is yet evident, from the writings of Eusebius, Irenæus, Origen, and others, among the ancients, as well as from the histories of Dupin, Mosheim, and all the moderns, that they were never adopted by the whole Church, or made an article of the established creed in any nation.

About the middle of the fourth century, the Millenarians held the following tenets: 1. That the city of Jerusalem should be rebuilt, and that the land of Judea should be the habitation of those who were to reign on the earth a thousand years. 2. That the first resurrection was not to be confined to the martyrs, but that, after the fall of Antichrist, all the just were to rise, and all that were on the earth were to continue for that space of time. 3. That Christ shall then come down from heaven, and be seen on earth, and reign there with his servants. 4. That the saints, during this period, shall enjoy all the delights of a terrestrial paradise.

These opinions were derived from several passages in Scripture which the Millenarians among the fathers understood in no other than a literal sense; but which the moderns, who hold that opinion, consider as partly literal, and partly metaphorical. Of these passages, that upon which the greatest stress has been laid, we believe to be the following: "And I saw an angel come down from heaven, having the key of the bottomless pit and a great chain in his hand. And he laid hold on the dragon, that old serpent, which is the Devil, and Satan, and bound him a thousand years, and cast him into the bottomless pit, and shut him up, and set a seal upon him, that he should deceive the nations no more, till the thousand years should be fulfilled: and after that he must be loosed a little season. And I saw thrones, and they sat upon them, and judgment was given unto them: and I saw the souls of them that were beheaded for the witness of Jesus, and for the word of God, and which had not worshipped the beast, neither his image, neither had received his mark upon their foreheads, nor in their hands; and they lived and reigned with Christ a thousand years. But the rest of the dead lived not again till the thousand years were finished. This is the first resurrection." Rev. xx. 1-5. This passage the ancient Millenarians took in a sense grossly literal, and taught that, during the millennium, the saints on earth were to enjoy every bodily delight. The moderns, on the other hand, consider the power and pleasures of this kingdom as wholly spiritual; but they represent them as not to commence till after the conflagration of the present earth. This last supposition is, however, a mistake, as the very next verse but one assures us; for we are there told, that, "when the thousand years are expired, Satan shall be loosed out of his prison, and shall go out to deceive the nations which are in the four quarters of the earth;" and we have no reason to believe that he will have such power or such liberty in "the new heavens and the new earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness."

Respecting the real millennium, we may observe the following things:—1. That the Scriptures afford us ground to believe that the Church will arrive at a state of prosperity which it never has yet enjoyed. Rev. xx. 4-6; Ps. lxxii. 11; Isa. ii. 2-4, xi. 9, xlix. 23, lx.; Dan. vii. 27.

2. That this will continue at least a thousand years, or a considerable space of time, in which the work of salvation may be fully accomplished in the utmost extent and glory of it. In this time, in which the world will soon be filled with real Christians, and continue full by early regeneration, to supply the place of those who leave the world, there will be many thousands born and live on the earth, to each one that has been born and lived in the preceding six thousand years; so that, if they who shall be born in that thousand years shall be all, or most of them saved (as they will be), there will, on the whole, be many thousands of mankind saved to one that shall be lost.

3. This will be a state of great happiness and glory. The idea has been often broached, and since the time of the Rev. Edward Irving not a few have held, and still continue to hold, the opinion, that Christ will reign personally on earth, and that there will be a literal resurrection of the saints. Rev. xx. 4, 7. The prevailing opinion, however, is, that Christ's coming will be spiritual, in the establishment of true Christianity on the earth, "the Jews being brought in with the fulness of the Gentile nations." That will be a time of eminent holiness, love, and peace, when, as there is one Shepherd, there will also be one sheepfold. The art of war will then be no longer studied, but peace and concord shall every where prevail. Kings, nobles, magistrates, and rulers in churches, shall act with principle, and be forward to promote the best interests of men: tyranny, oppression, persecution, bigotry, and cruelty shall cease. Business will be attended to without contention, dishonesty, or covetousness. Trades and manufactures will be carried on with a design to promote the general good of mankind, and not with selfish interests as now. Merchandise between distant countries will be conducted without fear of an enemy; and works of ornament and beauty, probably, shall not be wanting in those days. Learning, which has always flourished in proportion as religion has spread, shall then greatly increase, and be employed for the best of purposes. Astronomy, geography, natural history, metaphysics, and all the useful sciences, will be better understood, and consecrated to the service of God; and by the improvements which have been made, and are making, in ship-building, navigation, electricity, medicine, &c., "the tempest shall lose half its force, the lightning lose half its terrors," and the human frame not be nearly so much exposed to danger. Above all, the Bible will be more highly appreciated, its harmony perceived, its superiority owned, and its energy felt by millions of human beings. In fact, the earth shall be filled with the knowledge of the Lord, as the waters cover the sea.

4. The time when the millennium will commence cannot be fully ascertained; but the common idea is, that it will be in the seven thousandth year of the world. It will, most probably, come on by degrees, and be in a manner introduced years before that time. And who knows but the present convulsions among different nations, the overthrow which Popery has had in places where it has been so dominant for hundreds of years, the fulfilment of prophecy respecting infidels, and the falling away of many in the last times; and yet, in the midst of all, the number of missionaries sent into different parts of the world, together with the increase of gospel ministers; the thousands of ignorant children that have been taught to read the Bible, and the vast number of different societies that have been lately instituted for the benevolent purpose of informing the minds and impressing the hearts of the ignorant;—who knows but that these things are the forerunners of events of the most delightful nature, and which may usher in the happy morn of that bright and glorious day, when the whole world shall be filled with his glory, and all the ends of the earth see the salvation of our God?

Of late years the controversy between the pre-millenarians and post-millenarians has raged both in England and Scotland. Writings of no slight talent have been published on both sides, but the work of Dr David Brown of Glasgow on the Second Advent throws more light upon the subject than any work of modern times. The work is characterised by ability, learning, and conclusiveness. The prospect of the latter-day glory as set forth in Scripture is truly refreshing to the pious mind. It is exhibited in the Bible with divine grandeur: "And I heard as it were the voice of a great multitude, and as the voice of many waters, and as the voice of many thundrings, saying, Alleluia; for the Lord God omnipotent reigneth"—"The kingdoms of this world are become the kingdoms of our Lord and his Christ"—"And I saw a new heaven and a new earth; for the first heaven and the first earth were passed away; and there was no more sea. And I saw the holy city, new Jerusalem, coming down from God out of heaven, and I heard a great voice out of heaven, saying, Behold the tabernacle of God is with men, and he will dwell with them, and they shall be his people, and God himself shall be with them, and be their God." Rev. xix. 6, xi. 15, xxi. 1-4.

MILLET (dochan—Ezek. iv. 9), a kind of maize, so called from its thrusting forth such a quantity of grains. Thus in Latin it is called millium, as if one stalk bore a thousand seeds. It has been supposed that the dochan means what is now called in the East durra; which, according to Niebuhr, is a sort of millet, and when made into bad bread with camel's milk, oil, butter, or grease, is almost the only food which is eaten by the common people in Arabia Felix. "I found it so disagreeable," says he, "that I should willingly have preferred plain barley bread to it." This illustrates the appointment of it to the prophet Ezekiel as a part of his hard fare. It is also used in Palestine and Syria, and it is generally agreed that it yields much more than any other kind of grain. It is the Panicum miliaceum of Linnaeus.

MILLO, supposed to have been a deep valley situated between the ancient Jebus or Jerusalem and the city of David. It appears to have been filled up by David and Solomon, and David built upon it, giving the command of the place to Joab. 1 Chron. xi. 8. In Judges ix. 6, we read of "the house of Millo," probably a family of influence: "And all the men of Shechem gathered together, and all the house of Millo, and went, and made Abimelech king, by the plain of the pillar that was in Shechem." Millo is spoken of in various passages of the Old Testament. 2 Sam. v. 9; 1 Kings ix. 15; 2 Kings xii. 20; 1 Chron. xi. 8. We are told also in 1 Kings ix. 24, that Solomon built on Millo a palace for his queen, the daughter of Pharaoh.

MINA. See MANEH.

MINCING. This word occurs in Isa. ii. 16, where the prophet is describing the behaviour of the daughters of Jerusalem. It seems to refer to the light, trifling, affected walk of a wanton woman.

MIND, the thinking principle whose existence is made known to us by conscious thought. It might, perhaps, be expected that we should be able to describe the nature of mind. This, however, is a speculation in which it were altogether fruitless to engage. What is the nature of mind? Is it anything existing independently of matter, or is it the result of a certain mode of organization? These are questions which, in our present state, we can never hope to solve. We know mind, and can only know it under the conditions in which it develops itself, as giving rise to thought; or, in other words, as the thinking principle. Whether it possesses any other qualities than that of thinking, whether it has an existence independently of its existence as a thinking principle, are points which, it must be confessed, lie beyond our grasp. By consciousness alone is thought, which is mind in operation, made known to us. The study is a deeply interesting one, and is generally known by the name of mental philosophy, or the philosophy of mind.

MINISTER, strictly denotes one who officiates, serves, or waits upon another. Thus Joshua is called the minister of Moses (Exod. xxiv. 13), and John Mark, the minister of Paul and Barnabas. Acts xiii. 5. The term is applied in a general way in the Scriptures to magistrates, pastors, and teachers, and even to the Son of God himself, Matt. xx. 28. The following remarks from the pen of the Rev. Robert Hall, describe the final reward of the faithful minister:—"When the church, in the perfection of beauty, shall be presented to Christ, as a bride adorned for her husband, the faithful pastor will appear as the friend of the bridegroom, who greatly rejoices because of the bridegroom's voice. His joy will be the joy of his Lord, inferior in degree, but of the same nature, and arising from the same sources: while he will have the peculiar happiness of reflecting that he has contributed to it; contributed, as an humble instrument, to that glory and felicity of which he will be conscious he is utterly unworthy to partake. To have been himself the object of mercy, to have been the means of imparting it to others, and of dispensing the unsearchable riches of Christ, will produce a pleasure which can never be adequately felt or understood, until we see him as he is. From that oneness of spirit, from that inseparable conjunction of interest, which will then be experienced in its utmost extent, will arise a capacity of sharing the triumph of the Redeemer, and of participating in the delight with which he will survey his finished work, when a new and fairer creation shall arise out of the ruins of the first. And is this the end, he will exclaim, of all my labours, my toils, and watchings, my expostulation with sinners, and my efforts to console the faithful! and is this the issue of that ministry under which I was often ready to sink! and this the glory, of which I heard so much, understood so little, and announced to my hearers with lisping accents and a stammering tongue! well might it be styled the glory to be revealed! Auspicious day! on which I embarked in this undertaking, on which the love of Christ, with a sweet and sacred violence, impelled me to feed his sheep and to feed his lambs. With what emotion shall we, who, being entrusted with so holy a ministry, shall find mercy to be faithful, hear that voice from heaven, Rejoice and be glad, and give honour to him: for the marriage of the Lamb is come, and his wife hath made herself ready! with what rapture shall we recognise, amidst an innumerable multitude, the seals of our ministry, the persons whom we have been the means of conducting to that glory!" "He who is called," says Bernard, "to instruct souls, is called of God and not by his own ambition; and what is this call but an inward incentive of love, soliciting us to be zealous for the salvation of our brethren? So often as he who is engaged in preaching the word shall feel his inward man excited with divine affections, so often let him assure himself that God is there, and that he is invited by him to seek the good of souls. Truly, I love to hear that preacher who does not move me to applaud his eloquence, but to groan for my sins. Efficacy will be given to your voice, if you appear to be yourself persuaded of that to which you advise me. 'Thou who teachest another, teachest thou not thyself?'"

MINISTERIAL CALL, a term used to denote that right or authority which a person receives to preach the gospel. This call is considered as twofold—divine and ecclesiastical. The following things seem essential to a divine call: 1. A holy, blameless life. 2. An ardent and constant inclination and zeal to do good. 3. Abilities suited to the work; such as knowledge, aptness to teach, courage, &c. 4. An opportunity afforded in providence to be useful.

An ecclesiastical call consists in the election which is made of any person to be a pastor. But here the Episcopalian and the Dissenter differ—the former believing that the choice and call of a minister rest with the superior clergy, or those who have the gift of an ecclesiastical benefice; the latter supposes that it should rest on the suffrage of the people to whom he is to minister. Whoever will attentively examine the history of the primitive times, will find that all ecclesiastical officers for the first three hundred years were elected by the people. We must refer the reader for more on this subject to ORDINATION—CHURCH—EPISCOPACY—CONGREGATIONALISTS—BAPTISTS.

MINISTRY, GOSPEL, an ordinance appointed for the purpose of instructing men in the principles and knowledge of the gospel. Eph. iv. 8, 11; Rom. x. 15; Heb. v. 4. That the gospel ministry is of divine origin, and intended to be kept up in the Church, will evidently appear, if we consider the promises that in the last and best times of the New Testament dispensation there would be an instituted and regular ministry in her (Eph. iv. 8, 11; Tit. i. 5; 1 Pet. v.; 1 Tim. i.), also from the names of office peculiar to some members in the Church, and not common to all (Eph. iv. 8, 11); from the duties which are represented as reciprocally binding on ministers and people (Heb. xiii. 7, 17; 1 Pet. v. 2, 3, 4); from the promises of assistance which were given to the first ministers of the new dispensation (Matt. xxviii. 20); and from the importance of a gospel ministry, which is represented in the Scripture as a very great blessing to those who enjoy it, and the removal of it as one of the greatest calamities which can befall any people. Rev. ii. and iii.

MINISTRY OF JESUS CHRIST. It is doubtful how long the ministry of Christ upon the earth lasted. On this point there has been considerable dispute among the learned, some considering it as extending to five and others to four passovers. We gladly avail ourselves of the following interesting arrangement chronologically of the events of our Lord's ministry, given by Bowyer in his "Conjectures on the New Testament," and which has also been copied by Jones in his "Biblical Cyclopædia."

CHRONOLOGY OF CHRIST'S PUBLIC MINISTRY.

The fifteenth of Tiberius began August 19, in the year 4742 of the Julian period. (Tiberius' reign began August 19, A.J.P. 4727, A.D. 14.) So soon as winter was over, and the weather became warm enough, John began to baptize. Luke iii. 1-3. (Suppose in March.)

A.D. Tib. The First Passover (John ii. 23), Wednesday, 16-17. day, March 28, after Christ's baptism (which was, we may suppose, in September, the 17th of Tiberius not beginning till August 19); he came into Judea; stayed baptizing there, while John was baptizing in Ænon. John iii. 22, 23.

John cast into prison in November. About the time of the winter solstice (in December), four months before the harvest, Jesus Christ went through Samaria into Cana of Galilee. Matt. iv. 12. A nobleman of Capernaum went to him there, and desired he would come and heal his son. He did not go, but said, "Go, thy son liveth." John iv. 43-53.

After some time there, he passed through the midst of the people, and dwelt in Capernaum. Luke iv. 30, 31.

32. 17-18. The Second Passover, Monday, April 14. He called Peter, Andrew, James, and John; preached the sermon on the mount (Matt. v.-vii.), whither multitudes followed him from Jerusalem, where he had been at the feast. When the winter was coming on, he went to the feast of tabernacles in September. Matt. viii. 18; Luke ix. 51.

He went about the villages of Galilee, teaching in their synagogues, and working many miracles. Matt. ix. Sent forth the twelve. Matt. x. Received a message from John the Baptist. Upbraided the cities of Chorazin, Bethsaida, and Capernaum, because they repented not (Matt. xi.), which shows there was a considerable time from the imprisonment of John till now.

33. 18-19. The Third Passover, Friday, April 3. After which the disciples, going through the corn fields, rubbed the ears in their hands (Matt. xii. 1-8; Luke vi. 1-5), deuteroprôtō, "on the second prime Sabbath," that is, the second of the two great feasts of the passover.

He healed a man on the Sabbath-day. Matt. xii. 9-13; Luke vi. 6-10.

The Pharisees consulted to destroy him, when he withdrew. Matt. xii. 14, 15.

He spake in a ship three parables; one of

A.D. Tib. the seedsmen sowing the fields (Matt. xiii.), whence we may infer it was now seed-time; and that the feast of tabernacles, in September or October, was past. He went into his own country, and taught in the synagogues; but did not any mighty work, because of their unbelief. The twelve returned, having been abroad a year, and told him of John's being beheaded. He departed privately in a ship to Bethsaida. Fed five thousand in the desert. Matt. xiv. 13-21; Luke ix. 10-17; John vi. 5-13.

34. 19-20. The Fourth Passover, Friday, April 23 (John vi. 4), to which he went not up. John vii. 1-9. Henceforward he was found on the coast of Tyre and Sidon, then by the Sea of Galilee, next on the coast of Cæsarea Philippi, and lastly, at Capernaum. Matt. xv. 21, 29, xvi. 13, xvii. 24. Went privately to the feast of tabernacles in autumn. John vii. 10. The Jews thought to stone him, but he escaped. John viii. 59. Went to the feast of dedication in winter. John x. 22. The Jews seeking to kill him, he fled beyond Jordan. John x. 39, 40; Matt. xix. 1. On the death of Lazarus, came to Bethany. John xi. 7, 18. Walked no more openly, but retired to Ephraim, a city in the wilderness, till

35. 20. The Fifth and last Passover, Wednesday, April 13 (John xi. 53-55), in the consulship of Fabius and Vitellius.

MINNI, mentioned Jer. li. 27, is thought by Calmet to denote Minias, a province of Armenia.

MINNITH, a city beyond Jordan, situated four miles from Heshbon, on the road to Philadelphia. Judg. xi. 33. It is mentioned by Ezekiel (xxvii. 17) as famed for fine wheat.

MINSTREL, a musician. The prophet Elisha, in 2 Kings iii. 15, sends for one of these players on instruments: "But now bring me a minstrel. And it came to pass, when the minstrel played, that the hand of the Lord came upon him." What was the precise object which the prophet had in view is not apparent. In another passage, however, we have a reference to the minstrels as being hired, on the occasion of a death, to sing and play mournful airs: "And when Jesus came into the ruler's house, and saw the minstrels and the people making a noise," &c. Matt. ix. 23. From the word employed in the original to denote a minstrel, auletes, it would appear the instrument used was pipes, or perhaps a flute. See MOURNING WOMEN.

MINT (Matt. xxiii. 23; Luke xi. 42), a garden herb well known. The law did not oblige the Jews to give the tithe of this sort of herbs; it only required it of those things which could be comprehended under the name of income or revenue. But the Pharisees, desirous of distinguishing themselves by a more scrupulous and literal observance of the law than others, gave the tithes "of mint, anise, and cummin." Matt. xxiii. 23. Our blessed Lord did not blame them for paying tithes of such herbs, but for neglecting the weightier matters of the law.

MIRACLES. A miracle, in the popular sense, is a prodigy, or an extraordinary event, which surprises us by its novelty. In a more accurate and philosophic sense, "a miracle is a work effected in a unan-ner unusual, or different from the common and regular method of providence, by the power of God himself, for the proof of some particular message, or in attestation of the authority of some particular divine messenger."

In judging of miracles there are certain criteria peculiar to the subject, sufficient to conduct our inquiries, and warrant our determination. Assuredly they do not appeal to our ignorance, for they presuppose not only the existence of a general order of things, but our actual knowledge of the appearance which that order exhibits, and of the secondary material causes from which it, in most cases, proceeds. If a miraculous event were effected by the immediate hand of God, and yet bore no mark of distinction from the ordinary effects of his agency, it would impress no conviction, and probably awaken no attention. Our knowledge of the ordinary course of things, though limited, is real; and therefore it is essential to a miracle, both that it differ from that course, and be accompanied with peculiar and unequivocal signs of such difference.

The argument for the divine authority of the Jewish religion, and more especially of Christianity, arising from the miracles that were wrought to confirm them, is a subject of great importance, and deserves the particular attention of the Biblical student. Happily for Christians of the present day, the doctrine of miracles has been investigated by a host of able writers during the last century; and by Drs. Campbell, Douglas, Farmer, Paley, Gregory, Chalmers, and others, it has been placed in such a luminous point of view, that little remains to be added by any subsequent writer. The following observations on the subject will be found to exhibit a compendious statement of the question:—

I. STATEMENT OF THE ARGUMENT FROM MIRACLES. Let us suppose any man, assuming to be an inspired teacher in any place, to tell his countrymen that he did not desire them, on his ipse dixit, to believe that he had any preternatural communion with the Deity, but that, for the truth of his assertion, he would give them the evidence of their own senses; and after this declaration, let us suppose him immediately to raise a person from the dead in their presence, merely by calling upon him to come out of his grave; would not the only possible objection to the man's veracity, in making so extraordinary a claim, be removed by this miracle? and his solemn affirmation that he had received such and such doctrines from God, be as fully credited as if it related to the most common occurrence? Undoubtedly it would; for when so much preternatural power was visibly communicated to this person, no one could have reason to question his having received an equal portion of preternatural knowledge. A palpable deviation from the known laws of nature, in one instance, by the infinitely wise Author of them, implies an end of the utmost importance; and in such a case as this, it is nothing less than the witness of God to the truth of the man.

Miracles, then, under which we include prophecy, are the only direct evidence which can be given of divine inspiration. When a religion, or any religious truth, is to be revealed from heaven, they appear to be absolutely necessary to enforce its reception among men; and this is the only case in which we can suppose them necessary, or believe for a moment that they ever have been or will be performed.

Now the history of almost every religion abounds with relations of prodigies and wonders, and of the intercourse of men with the gods; but we know of no religious system, those of the Jews and Christians excepted, which appealed to miracles as the grand palpable evidence of its truth and divinity. The pretended miracles mentioned by pagan historians and poets, were not even pretended to have been publicly wrought to enforce the truth of a new religion, contrary to the reigning idolatry. Many of them may be clearly shown to have been mere natural events; others of them are represented as having been performed in secret on the most trivial occasions, and in obscure and fabulous ages, long prior to the era of the writers by whom they are recorded; and such of them as at first view appear to be best attested, are evidently tricks contrived for interested purposes, to flatter power, or to promote the prevailing superstitions. For these reasons, as well as on account of the immoral character of the divinities by whom they are said to have been wrought, they are altogether unworthy of comparison, not to say of examination, and early in the very nature of them the completest proofs of falsehood and imposture.

II. CREDIBILITY OF MIRACLES. If we be asked whether miracles are credible, we reply,

That, abstractly speaking, miracles are not incredible. They may be granted to be in a high degree improbable, but they are by no means incapable of being proved, indirectly from analogy, and directly from testimony. How often has it been seen in common life, that events have occurred which, à priori, were in the highest degree improbable? Nor are miracles incapable of being proved by the evidence of testimony. "Mr Hume, indeed," says the late Bishop Gleig, "endeavoured to prove, that 'no testimony is sufficient to establish a miracle;' and the reasoning employed for this purpose is, that 'a miracle being a violation of the laws of nature, which a firm and unalterable experience has established, the proof against a miracle, from the very nature of the fact, is as entire as any argument from experience can be: whereas our experience of human veracity, which (according to him) is the sole foundation of the evidence of testimony, is far from being uniform, and can therefore never preponderate against that experience which admits of no exception.' This boasted and plausible argument has with equal candour and acuteness been examined by Dr Campbell, in his Dissertation on Miracles, who justly observes, that so far is experience from being the sole foundation of the evidence of testimony, that, on the contrary, testimony is the sole foundation of by far the greater part of what Mr Hume calls firm and unalterable experience; and that if, in certain circumstances, we did not give an implicit faith to testimony, our knowledge of events would be confined to those which had fallen under our own senses."

Miracles are spoken of in Scripture under a variety of names. Sometimes they are called "powers," "mighty works," and in such cases they are to be regarded as simply manifestations of supernatural power. But when they are presented to us as fulfilments of the divine decrees in reference either to individuals or to the world, they are termed "signs;" and when they are regarded as occurrences exciting wonder, they are called "miracles," or "wonders." But the most significant expression of all, and that which sets them forth as the natural movements of the Son of God, is the term "works," as in Matt.

xi. 2, and very frequently throughout the gospel of John. Jesus is described by Isaiah as himself "the Wonderful," and it is not at all surprising, therefore, that his "works," the natural outgoings of his wonderful character, should partake of the miraculous or the wonderful. His mediatorial nature was itself a miracle of the most astonishing description, and every movement of that nature, as "the Word manifest in the flesh," could not fail to be regarded by men as a miracle. Men are often accustomed to understand by a miracle, a suspension for a time of the laws of nature; and though such a view may suit our limited understandings, yet when we look at miracles from a higher point, we shall regard them as a suspension of no law, but a regulation of a higher law under the management of Him who is "the Wonderful, the Counsellor, the Mighty God." To the creature every movement of the man Christ Jesus is a miracle; but when we view it in relation to the Godhead, all is pure order and regularity, and in strict accordance with the highest law. The intention of miracles in the case of the Redeemer was to show, not separated from but in close connection with the doctrines which he taught, that he was sent from God. Accordingly, when John the Baptist sent to ask of Jesus, "Art thou he that should come, or do we look for another?" the reply of Jesus was to this effect, "Go and show John again those things which ye do hear and see: The blind receive their sight, and the lame walk; the lepers are cleansed, and the deaf hear; the dead are raised up, and the poor have the gospel preached to them. And blessed is he, whosoever shall not be offended in me." (Matt. xi. 4-6.) The remark of Nicodemus, therefore, was fully borne out by the facts of the case, "No man can do those miracles that thou doest except God be with him." There is no doubt that, as in the case of the magicians of Egypt, referred to in the Old Testament, and the lying wonders of Antichrist in the New, miracles have been performed under the influence of the Evil One; and hence the absolute necessity of combining the evidence of miracles with the nature of the truth which is taught by him who works them. The possession of miraculous gifts is in itself no evidence whatever of the divine approval. But when combined, as in the case of Jesus, with spotless purity of character, and doctrine the most spiritual and heavenly, there could be no doubt that he who wrought them could be no other than the Son of God, God manifest in the flesh.

III. SPURIOUS MIRACLES CONFIRM THE REALITY OF THE GENUINE. As to the supposed miracles of the Romish Church, it is evident, as Doddridge observes, that many of them were ridiculous tales, according to their own historians; others were performed without any credible witnesses, or in circumstances where the performer had the greatest opportunity for juggling; and it is particularly remarkable, that they were hardly ever wrought where they seem most necessary; that is, in countries where those doctrines are renounced which that Church esteems of the highest importance. It was, in fact, foretold that such "lying wonders" should be connected with the great apostasy. 2 Thess. ii. These counterfeits, therefore, not only presuppose the existence of the true, but fulfil the voice of prophecy.

MIRAGE. Bishop Lowth translates the first clause of Isa. xxxv. 7: "And the glowing sand shall become a pool." In his note on the passage, he says, "The word is Arabic as well as Hebrew; but it means the same thing in both languages, namely, a glowing, sandy plain, which in the hot countries, at a distance, has the appearance of water. It sometimes tempts thirsty travellers out of their way, but deceives them when they come near; either going forward—for it always appears at the same distance—or it quite vanishes." Dr E. D. Clarke, in his Travels, has given a very lively view of this wonderful appearance. He says: "We arrived at the wretched solitary village of Utiko, near the muddy shore of the lake of that name, the entrance to which is called Maodic. Here we procured asses for all the party; and setting out for Rosetta, began to scour the desert, now appearing like an ocean of sand, but flatter and firmer as to its surface than before. The Arabs, uttering their harsh guttural language, ran chattering by the side of our asses, until some of them calling out 'Raschid' (or Rosetta), we perceived its domes and turrets, apparently upon the opposite side of an immense lake or sea, that covered all the intervening space between us and the city. Not having in my own mind at the time any doubt as to the certainty of its being water, and seeing the tall minarets and buildings of Rosetta, with all its groves of dates and sycamores, as perfectly reflected by it as by a mirror, insomuch that even the minutest detail of the architecture, and the trees, might have been delineated thence, I applied to the Arabs to know in what manner we were to pass the water. Our interpreter, although a Greek, and therefore likely to have been informed of such a spectacle, was as fully convinced as any of us that we were drawing near to the water's edge, and became indignant when the Arabs maintained that within an hour we should reach Rosetta, by crossing the sands in the direct line we then pursued, and that there was no water. 'What!' said he, giving way to his impatience, 'do you suppose me to be an idiot, to be persuaded contrary to the evidence of my own senses?' The Arabs, smiling, soon pacified him, and completely astonished the whole party, by desiring us to look back at the desert we had already passed, when we beheld a precisely similar appearance. It was in fact the mirage, a prodigy to which every one of us were then strangers. Although it afterwards became more familiar, yet upon no future occasion did we behold this extraordinary illusion so marvellously displayed. The view of it afforded us ideas of the horrible despondency to which travellers must be sometimes exposed, who, in travelling the interminable desert, destitute of water, and perishing with thirst, have sometimes this deceitful prospect before their eyes. Job vi. 15-20."

MIRIAM, the daughter of Amram and Jochebed, and consequently the sister of Moses and Aaron. She appears to have been some ten or twelve years older than Moses, and, accordingly, when the future leader and lawgiver of Israel was cast a helpless babe upon the waters of the Nile, no sooner was the child rescued by the Egyptian princess from what might seem likely to prove a watery grave, than Miriam, who had been standing at a little distance witnessing the scene, came forward at that critical moment, and put the question, no doubt with a beating heart, "Shall I go and call to thee a nurse of the Hebrew women, that she may nurse the child for thee?" In the gracious providence of God, it turned out as she had wished. "And Pharaoh's daughter said to her, Go. And the maid went and called the child's mother." It is enough. God had heard the prayer of this anxious family. Miriam runs to announce to her mother that the child was saved. Miriam seems to have had the gift of prophecy. She is thought to have married Hur. Exod. xvii. 10, 11. She led the song of praise after the passage of the Red Sea. She died in Kadesh-Barnea. Num. xx. 1.

MIRRORS. These in eastern countries were made of burnished metal, consisting of several small convex pieces about an inch square. Oriental women are still accustomed to carry mirrors about with them, even when engaged in domestic duties. To metallic mirrors Elihu evidently alludes when he asks, "Hast thou with him spread out the sky, which is strong, and as a molten looking-glass?" (Job xxxvii. 18.) Shaw informs us that "in the Levant, looking-glasses are a part of female dress. The Moorish women in Barbary are so fond of their ornaments, and particularly of their looking-glasses, which they hang upon their breasts, that they will not lay them aside, even when, after the drudgery of the day, they are obliged to go two or three miles with a pitcher or a goat's skin, to fetch water." The Israelitish women used to carry their mirrors with them, even to their most solemn place of worship. The word mirror should be used in the passages here referred to. To speak of "looking-glasses made of steel," and "glasses molten," is palpably absurd; whereas the term mirror obviates every difficulty, and expresses the true meaning of the original.

MIRTH, joy, gaiety, merriment. It is distinguished from cheerfulness thus: Mirth is considered as an act; cheerfulness, a habit of the mind. Mirth is short and transient; cheerfulness fixed and permanent. Those are often raised into the greatest transports of mirth who are subject to the greatest depressions of melancholy: on the contrary, cheerfulness, though it does not give such an exquisite gladness, prevents us from falling into any depths of sorrow. Mirth is like a flash of lightning, that breaks through a gloom of clouds, and glitters for a moment; cheerfulness keeps up a kind of daylight in the mind, and fills it with a steady and perpetual serenity. Mirth is sinful—1. When men rejoice in that which is evil. 2. When unreasonable. 3. When tending to commit sin. 4. When a hindrance to duty. 5. When it is blasphemous and profane.

MISER (Lat. miser), a term formerly used in reference to a person in wretchedness or calamity; but it now denotes a parsimonious person, or one who is covetous to extremity, who denies himself even the comforts of life to accumulate wealth.

MISERY, a state of wretchedness, unhappiness, or calamity.

MISHNA (from the Heb. meshna, repetition), a part of the Jewish Talmud. The Mishna contains the text; and the Gemara, which is the second part of the Talmud, contains the commentaries: so that the Gemara is, as it were, a glossary on the Mishna. The Mishna consists of various traditions of the Jews, and of explanations of several passages of Scripture: these traditions, serving as an explication of the written law and supplement to it, are said to have been delivered to Moses during the time of his abode on the mount; which he afterwards communicated to Aaron, Eleazar, and his servant Joshua. By these they were transmitted to the seventy elders, by them to the prophets, who communicated them to the men of the great sanhedrim, from whom the wise men of Jerusalem and Babylon received them. Dr. Prideaux, rejecting the Jewish fictions, observes, that after the death of Simeon the Just, about 299 years before Christ, the Mishnical doctors arose, who, by their comments and conclusions, added to the number of those traditions which had been received and allowed by Ezra and the men of the great synagogue; so that towards the middle of the second century after Christ, under the empire of Antoninus Pius, it was found necessary to commit these traditions to writing; more especially as their country had considerably suffered under Adrian, and many of their schools had been dissolved, and their learned men cut off; and, therefore, the usual method of preserving their traditions had failed. Rabbi Judah on this occasion being rector of the school at Tiberias, and president of the sanhedrim in that place, undertook the work, and compiled it in six books, each consisting of several tracts, which altogether make up the number of sixty-three. Dr. Prideaux computes that the Mishna was composed about the 150th year of our Lord; but Dr. Lightfoot says, that Rabbi Judah compiled the Mishna about A.D. 190, in the latter end of the reign of Commodus; or, as some compute, A.D. 220. Dr. Lardner is of opinion that this work could not have been finished before the year 190, or later. Thus the book called the Mishna was formed; a book which the Jews have generally received with the greatest veneration. The original has been published with a Latin translation by Surenhusius, with notes of his own, and others from the learned Maimonides, &c., in six volumes folio, Amsterdam A.D. 1698-1703. (See CABALA—GEMARA—TALMUD.) It is written in a much purer style, and is not nearly so full of dreams and visions as the Gemara.

MISR, a name given to the land of Egypt. See MIZRAIM.

MISSAL, the Romish mass-book, containing the several masses to be said on particular days. It is derived from the Latin word missa, which, in the ancient Christian Church, signified every part of divine service. In the ancient church the several parts of divine service were arranged in distinct books. Thus the collects and the invariable portion of the communion office formed the Sacramentary; the lessons from the Old and New Testaments constituted the Sectionary; and the Gospels made another volume, called the Evangelisterium. The Antiphony consisted of anthems designed for chanting. About the eleventh or twelfth century, these books were collected together and obtained the name of the Complete or Plenary Missal or Book of Missal.

MISSION, a combination of Christians, engaged in fulfilling to the utmost of their power the last command of Christ to his disciples, "Go and preach the gospel to every creature." The desire to obey this injunction has led to the establishment of Christian missions to the Jews, the heathen, and the infidels; and it is a remarkable fact, that a revival of vital godliness in any Church is invariably accompanied with an ardent desire to advance the cause of missions both at home and abroad.

MIST, a fog or cloud. In Gen. ii. 6, it is said: "But there went up a mist from the earth, and watered the whole face of the ground." Professor Bush suggests that a more correct rendering of the words would be, "Neither had there gone up a mist," &c.; and the idea may be thus expressed: "So far from there having been a rain, not even a mist had arisen, to which the result could be attributed." This rendering occurs in the Arabic version of Saadiah, and is adopted in that of Junius and Tremellius.

MITE, the smallest Jewish coin that could be cast into the treasury in the days of our Lord. It was equal to half a kodrant, or three farthings of our money. It is said of the poor widow, in Mark xii. 42: "And there came a certain poor widow, and she threw in two mites, which make a farthing." The word for "farthing" in this passage is different from that rendered farthing in Matt. x. 29: "Are not two sparrows sold for a farthing? and one of them shall not fall on the ground without your Father." Some think that the mite (lepton) mentioned by Mark was exclusively a Jewish coin.

MITRE, an ornament worn by the ancient Jewish high-priest (Exod. xxviii. 4.) The original word for mitre occurs in Job xxix. 14, where it is rendered "diadem," leading us to the inference that the sacerdotal mitre is closely allied with the kingly crown. Thus, too, Lev. viii. 9: "And he put the mitre upon his head; also upon the mitre, even upon his forefront, did he put the golden plate, the holy crown; as the Lord commanded Moses." This conjunction of sacerdotal and royal symbols in the mitre was intended to serve as a typical intimation of the union of these two offices in the person of Christ, who was to sit as "a high priest upon his throne." The word mitre is used in modern times to denote a turban or cap cleft at the top, which is worn by bishops and certain abbots. The Pope wears four different mitres on different occasions.

MITYLENE, the capital of the island of Lesbos, through which Paul passed as he went from Corinth to Jerusalem, A.D. 58. Acts xx. 14. Some remains of the ancient Mitylene are supposed to exist near Castro, the chief town of the island.

MIZAR. The word signifies, literally, small, and is supposed by some to refer to a small hill, or perhaps a ridge of Mount Lebanon; others think that it denotes Mount Hermon.

MIZPEH, a city of Benjamin renowned in the Old Testament. Here the tribes often assembled; here Samuel offered sacrifices and judged the people; here Saul was chosen king by lot; and here, under the Chaldeans, Gedaliah the governor resided and was assassinated. The position of this city is nowhere described, neither in the Old Testament nor by Josephus; and "we only know," says Dr Robinson, "that it must have lain near Ramah of Benjamin, since King Asa fortified it with materials brought from the latter place. The name, too, which signifies 'a place of look-out, watch-tower,' implies that it was situated on an elevated spot." "There are two such high points," adds Dr Robinson, "which in these respects might correspond to the site of Mizpeh. One is Tell-el-Fûl (Beanhill) lying about an hour south of Er-Râm (Ramah) toward Jerusalem. The other point is Nabi Samwil, which, though somewhat farther distant from Er-Râm, is a higher and more important station than the other. On these grounds, as well as from the traces of an ancient town upon it, I am inclined to regard Nabi Samwil as the probable site of Mizpeh." Dr Robinson's opinion is corroborated by Dr Wilson.

MIZRAIM, the son of Ham, and ancestor of the Egyptians, who are accordingly often called Mizraim, while their country bears the same name.

MNASON, described in Acts xxi. 16, as "an old disciple"—at whose house Paul lodged, A.D. 58. Mnason is a Greek name. He seems to have been a native of Cyprus, and an inhabitant of Jerusalem, as was the case with Joses and Barnabas. Whether Mnason was converted by Paul and Barnabas when at Cyprus (Acts xiii. 1-13), as Grotius and others think, or before that time by Jesus himself, is not certain. But the latter opinion seems far more correspondent with what is affirmed of him, namely, that he was an old disciple.

MOABITES, a tribe descended from Moab, the son of Lot, who inhabited the district of country which lies east of the Jordan. Having dispossessed a gigantic nation called the Emim, they took possession of their country. The northern part of the district, however, was seized upon by the Amorites, whose kingdom, of which Heshbon was the capital, extended from the Jabbok to the Arnon. Moses reconquered the country which the Amorites had taken, and assigned to the tribe of Reuben the southern part of it, while the northern part was allotted to Gad. The Moabites continued to be inveterate enemies to the Israelites, and we find Baalam the false prophet seducing the Hebrews to idolatry by means of the daughters of Moab.

The country of the Moabites was well adapted for rearing cattle. At an after period of their history they seem to have devoted themselves to commerce. The Chaldeans reduced the power of Moab, and the Saracens completed its overthrow. Mr Wylie has given a very interesting view of the present state of the country as compared with the predictions of ancient prophecy. Thus he remarks:—

"On all sides we are encompassed by ruins. Heaps of rubbish, broken walls, fallen columns, cover her eminences, and obstruct the banks of her rivers, while the only signs of life which are visible are the black tents of the Bedouin, pitched beside some ruined city, which serves as a fold to his flocks and herds. From the same spot from which an hundred cities might be seen of old, the traveller now beholds as many ruins. 'Give wings unto Moab, that it may flee and get away: for the cities thereof shall be desolate, without any to dwell therein. Judgment is come upon the plain country; upon Holon, and upon Jahazah, and upon Mephaath, and upon Dibon, and upon Nebo, and upon Beth-diblaithaim, and upon Kiriaihaim, and upon Beth-gamul, and upon Beth-meon, and upon Kerioth, and upon Bozrah, and upon all the cities of the land of Moab, far or near.' Jer. xlviii. 9, 21-24. The word of the prophet has prevailed. Neither the number nor the strength of the palaces of Moab could avert their fate. No city has escaped; all have fallen; and while the traveller surveys with astonishment the wide scene of desolation spread around him, he remembers the prophecy, 'They shall cry, saying, How is it broken down?' The ruins of Moab are mere heaps of rubbish, which the Arab has trodden down for ages, till at last they are so mingled with the soil that it is rare to find any architectural ornaments remaining: 'Moab is confounded; for it is broken down. Moab shall be trodden down under him, even as straw is trodden down for the dunghill.' Isa. xxv. 10. But although they possess no interest as ruins, it is otherwise when we view them as monuments of the truth of prophecy; this invests them with an impressive and solemn character, to which, as mere ruins, however fine, they could assert no claim. It was over this city, whose places then covered this now naked eminence, that the prophet poured this lament, 'Therefore will I howl for Moab, and I will cry out for all Moab; mine heart shall mourn for the men of Kir-heres.' There is not at this day either dwelling or inhabitant on the spot; there is nothing even amongst her ruins which could betoken that the city had ever possessed the wealth and splendour of a capital: 'Ar of Moab is laid waste, and brought to silence.' Isa. xv. 1. Considering that this was the capital, the ruins cover a very disproportionate space—not much more than a mile in circuit; but it is probable that great part of the city is buried in the earth. The remains are chiefly those of private dwellings, their appearance indicating unusual strength. The ruins of a temple still remain, the gate of another edifice, and two Corinthian columns. In a plain west of the ruins is an insulated altar; but no worshipper is there. 'The shrine is forsaken and desecrated.' Jer. xlviii. 13. 'Moab shall be ashamed of Chemosh, as the house of Israel was ashamed of Beth-el their confidence.' Isa. xvi. 7. Irby and Mangles say that they could find no traces of the city walls: 'For the foundations of Kir-hareseth shall ye mourn; surely they are stricken.' The following words of Irby and Mangles will give us some idea of the multitude of ruins to be met with in Moab:—'The whole of the fine plains in this quarter are covered with sites of towns on every eminence or spot convenient for the construction of one.' Our travellers were at that time about twelve miles south of Rabbah. The commencement of their journey next morning is thus described: 'This morning we were off before sunrise; the same downs continued, with numerous Arab camps in various directions, the ruined sites being still in numbers all around us.' We have before us abundant evidence that the prophecy has been fulfilled: 'There shall be lamentation generally upon all the house-tops of Moab, and in the streets thereof; for I have broken Moab like a vessel wherewithin is no pleasure, saith the Lord. Moab is spoiled, and gone up out of her cities.' (Jer. xlviii. 38, 15.)

"It is of little importance to determine the time or the manner in which the cities of Moab were overthrown, seeing the prophecy is so clearly fulfilled in their total and universal ruin. No history contains any lengthened account of their fall. We find them existing in splendour at the beginning of the Christian era. We lift the veil after a lapse of eighteen centuries, and discover them in ruins. It is probable that they were overthrown at the same period with the towns of the Ammonites. The tide of Arabian invasion, which issued from the Desert in the middle of the seventh century, overwhelmed all these countries at the same time; and to this event we conceive the prophet alludes in the following words, in which he portrays with equal fidelity and beauty the martial valour of the Saracens, and the terror with which they inspired the effeminate inhabitants of Syria, the rapidity with which they overran the country, and the utter ruin which they brought along with them: 'Thus saith the Lord, Behold, he shall fly as an eagle, and spread his wings over Moab. Kerioth is taken, and the strongholds are surprised, and the mighty men's hearts in Moab at that day shall be as the heart of a woman in her pangs. And Moab shall be destroyed from being a people, because he hath magnified himself against the Lord.'" (Jer. xlviii. 40-42.)

MODALISTS, those who resolve the distinction between the persons of the Trinity merely into the manner of their subsistence, as Father, Son, and Holy Spirit. See NOETIANS—SABELLIANS.

MODERATION, the state of keeping a due medium between extremes; calmness, temperance, or equanimity. It is sometimes used with reference to our opinions (Rom. xii. 3); but, in general, it respects our conduct in that state which comes under the description of ease or prosperity, and ought to take place in our wishes, pursuits, expectations, pleasures, and passions.

MODESTY is sometimes used to denote humility, and sometimes to express elasticity. The Greek word kosmios signifies neat or well arranged. It suggests the idea of simple elegance. Modesty, therefore, consists in purity of sentiment and manners, inclining us to abhor the least appearance of vice and indecency, and to fear doing anything which will justly incur censure. An excess of modesty is called bashfulness, and the want of it impertinence or impudence.

MOHAMMED, or МАНОМЕТ, the founder of Islamism, was born in the reign of Anushirwan the Just, emperor of Persia, about the end of the sixth century of the Christian era. He came into the world under some disadvantages. His father, Abd'allah, was a younger son of Abd'almotaleb, and dying very young, and in his father's lifetime, left his widow and infant son in mean circumstances, his whole subsistence consisting but of five camels and one Ethiopian female slave. Abd'almotaleb was therefore obliged to take care of his grandchild Mohammed; which he not only did during his life, but at his death enjoined his eldest son, Abu Taleb, who was brother to Abd'allah by the same mother, to provide for him for the future, which he very affectionately did, and instructed him in the business of a merchant, which he followed; and to that end he took him into Syria, when he was but thirteen. He afterwards recommended him to Khadijah, a noble and rich widow, for her factor; in whose service he behaved himself so well, that by making him her husband, she soon raised him to an equality with the richest in Mecca.

It was after he began by this advantageous match to live at his ease, that he formed the scheme of establishing a new religion, or, as he expressed it, of replanting the only true and ancient one professed by Adam, Noah, Abraham, Moses, Jesus, and all the prophets, by destroying the gross idolatry into which the generality of his countrymen had fallen, and weeding out the corruptions and superstitions which the later Jews and Christians had, as he thought, introduced into their religion, and reducing it to its original purity, which consisted chiefly in the worship of one God.

Before he made any attempt abroad, he rightly judged that it was necessary for him to begin with the conversion of his own household and relations. He soon afterwards began to preach in public to the people, who heard him with some patience, till he came to upbraid them with the idolatry, obstinacy, and perverseness of themselves and their fathers; which so highly provoked them, that they declared themselves his enemies, and would soon have procured his ruin, had he not been protected by Abu Taleb, one of his uncles. The chief of the Koreish warmly solicited this person to desert his nephew, making frequent remonstrances against the innovations he was attempting; which proving ineffectual, they at length threatened him with an open rupture if he did not prevail on Mohammed to desist. At this Abu Taleb was so far moved, that he earnestly dissuaded his nephew from pursuing the affair any further, representing the great danger that he and his friends must otherwise run. But Mohammed was not to be intimidated, telling his uncle plainly, "that if they set the sun against him on his right hand, and the moon on his left, he would not leave his enterprise;" and Abu Taleb, seeing him so firmly resolved to proceed, used no further arguments, but promised to stand by him against all his enemies.

The Koreish, finding they could prevail neither by fair words nor menaces, tried what they could do by force and ill treatment—using Mohammed's followers so very injuriously, that it was not safe for them to continue at Mecca any longer; whereupon Mohammed gave leave to such of them as had no friends to protect them, to seek for refuge elsewhere. And accordingly, in the fifth year of the prophet's mission, sixteen of them, four of whom were women, fled into Ethiopia; and among them, Othman Ebn Affan, and his wife Rakiah, Mohammed's daughter. This was the first flight; but afterwards several others followed them, retiring, one after another, to the number of eighty-three men and eighteen women, besides children. These refugees were kindly received by the nagush, or king of Ethiopia, who refused to deliver them up to those whom the Koreish sent to demand them, and, as the Arab writers unanimously attest, even professed the Mohammedan religion.

In the sixth year of his mission, Mohammed had the pleasure of seeing his party strengthened by the conversion of his uncle Hamza, a man of great valour and merit; and of Omar Ebn al Kattab, a person highly esteemed, and once a violent opposer of the prophet. As persecution generally advances rather than obstructs the spreading of a religion, Islamism made so great a progress among the Arab tribes, that the Koreish, to suppress it effectually, if possible, in the seventh year of Mohammed's mission, made a solemn league or covenant against the Hashemites, and the family of Abd'almotaleb, engaging themselves to contract no marriages with any of them, and to have no communication with them; and, to give it the greater sanction, reduced it into writing, and laid it up in the Kaaba. Upon this the tribe became divided into two factions; and the family of Hashem all repaired to Abu Taleb as their head; except only Abd'al Uzza, surnamed Abu Laheb, who, out of inveterate hatred to his nephew and his doctrine, went over to the opposite party, whose chief was Abu Sossian Ebn Harb, of the family of Ommeya.

The families continued thus at variance for three years; but in the tenth year of his mission Mohammed told his uncle Abu Taleb, that God had manifestly showed his disapprobation of the league which the Koreish had made against them, by sending a worm to eat out every word of the instrument except the name of God. Of this accident Mohammed had probably some private notice; for Abu Taleb went immediately to the Koreish, and acquainted them with it—offering, if it proved false, to deliver his nephew up to them; but, in case it were true, he insisted that they ought to lay aside their animosity, and annul the league they had made against the Hashemites. To this they acquiesced, and, going to inspect the writing, to their great astonishment found it to be as Abu Taleb had said; and the league was thereupon declared void.

In the twelfth year of his mission it was that Mohammed gave out that he had made his night journey from Mecca to Jerusalem, and thence to heaven, so much spoken of by all that write of him. Dr. Prideaux thinks he invented it either to answer the expectations of those who demanded some miracle as a proof of his mission; or else, by pretending to have conversed with God, to establish the authority of whatever he should think fit to leave behind by way of oral tradition, and make his sayings to serve the same purpose as the oral laws of the Jews. But it does not appear that Mohammed himself ever expected so great a regard should be paid to his sayings as his followers have since done; and, seeing he all along disclaimed any power of performing miracles, it seems rather to have been a fetch of policy to raise his reputation, by pretending to have actually conversed with God in heaven, as Moses had heretofore done in the mount, and to have received several institutions immediately from him; whereas, before, he contented himself with persuading them that he had all by the ministry of Gabriel.

However, this story seemed so absurd and incredible, that several of his followers left him upon it, and had probably ruined the whole design, had not Abu Beer, a man of great authority among the Koreish, vouched for his veracity, and declared, that if Mohammed affirmed it to be true, he verily believed the whole; which happy incident not only retrieved the prophet's credit, but increased it to such a degree, that he was secure of being able to make his disciples swallow whatever he pleased to impose on them for the future. And this fiction, notwithstanding its extravagance, was one of the most artful contrivances Mohammed ever put in practice, and what chiefly contributed to the raising of his reputation to that great height to which it afterwards arrived.

The next year, being the thirteenth of Mohammed's mission, Masab returned to Mecca, accompanied by seventy-three men, and two women of Medina, who had professed Islamism, besides some others who were as yet unbelievers. On their arrival they immediately sent to Mohammed, and offered him their assistance, of which he was now in great need; for his adversaries were by this time grown so powerful in Mecca, that he could not stay there much longer without imminent danger. Wherefore he accepted their proposal, and met them one night, by appointment, at Al Akaba, north of the city, attended by his uncle, Al Abbas; who, though he was not then a believer, wished his nephew well, and made a speech to those of Medina, wherein he told them, that, as Mohammed was obliged to quit his native city, and seek an asylum elsewhere, and they had offered him their protection, they would do well not to deceive him; that if they were not firmly resolved to defend, and not betray him, they had better declare their minds, and let him provide for his safety in some other manner. Upon their protesting their sincerity, Mohammed swore to be faithful to them, on condition that they should protect him against all insults as heartily as they would their own wives and families. They then asked him what recompense they were to expect if they should happen to be killed in his quarrel? he answered, Paradise. Whereupon they pledged their faith to him, and so returned home, after Mohammed had chosen twelve out of their number, who were to have the same authority among them as the twelve apostles of Christ had among his disciples.

Hitherto Mohammed had propagated his religion by fair means; so that the whole success of his enterprise, before his flight to Medina, must be attributed to persuasion only, and not to compulsion. For before the above oath of fealty or inauguration at Al Akaba, he had no permission to use any force at all; and in several places of the Koran, which he pretended were revealed during his stay at Mecca, he declares his business was only to preach and admonish; that he had no authority to compel any person to embrace his religion; and that whether people believe or not was none of his concern, but belonged solely unto God. And he was so far from allowing his followers to use force, that he exhorted them to bear patiently those injuries which were offered them on account of their faith; and, when persecuted himself, chose rather to quit the place of his birth, and retire to Medina, than to make any resistance. But this great passiveness and moderation seem entirely owing to his want of power, and the great superiority of his opposers, for the first twelve years of his mission; for no sooner was he enabled, by the assistance of those of Medina, to make head against his enemies, than he gave out that God had allowed him and his followers to defend themselves against the Infidels; and at length, as his forces increased, he pretended to have the divine leave even to attack them, and destroy idolatry, and set up the true faith by the sword; finding, by experience, that his designs would otherwise proceed very slowly, if they were not utterly overthrown; and knowing, on the other hand, that innovators, when they depend solely on their own strength, and can compel, seldom run any risk; whence, says Machiavel, it follows, that all the armed prophets have succeeded, and the unarmed ones have failed. Moses, Cyrus, Theseus, and Romulus, he adds, would not have been able to establish the observance of their institutions for any length of time had they not been armed. The first passage of the Koran which gave Mohammed the permission of defending himself by arms, is said to have been that in the 22d chapter; after which a great number to the same purpose were revealed. The flight to Medina begins the Mohammedan era, or Hegira, as it is termed.

Mohammed, being securely settled at Medina, and able not only to defend himself against the insults of his enemies, but to attack them, began to send out small parties to make reprisals on the Koreish; the first party consisting of no more than nine men, who intercepted and plundered a caravan belonging to that tribe, and in the action took two prisoners. But what established his affairs very much, and was the foundation on which he built all his succeeding greatness, was the gaining of the battle of Bedr, which was fought in the second year of the Hegira, and is so famous in the Mohammedan history. Some reckon no less than twenty-seven expeditions, wherein Mohammed was personally present, in nine of which he gave battle, besides several other expeditions in which he was not present. His forces he maintained partly by the contributions of his followers for this purpose, which he called by the name of zacad, or alms, and the paying of which he very artfully made one main article of his religion; and partly by ordering a fifth part of the plunder to be brought into the public treasury for that purpose, in which matter he likewise pretended to act by the divine direction.

In the seventh year of the Hegira, Mohammed began to think of propagating his religion beyond the bounds of Arabia, and sent messengers to the neighbouring princes, with letters to invite them to Mohammedanism. Nor was this project without some success.

The eighth year of the Hegira was a very fortunate year to Mohammed. In the beginning of it, Khaled Ebn al Walid and Amru Ebn al As, both excellent soldiers, the first of whom afterwards conquered Syria and other countries, and the latter Egypt, became proselytes to Mohammedanism. And soon after, the prophet sent three thousand men against the Grecian forces, to revenge the death of one of his ambassadors, who, being sent to the governor of Bosra on the same errand as those who went to the above-mentioned princes, was slain by an Arab of the tribe of Ghassan, at Muta, a town in the territory of Balka, in Syria, about three days' journey eastward from Jerusalem, near which town they fought. The Grecians being vastly superior in number (for, including the auxiliary Arabs, they had an army of one hundred thousand men), the Mohammedans were repulsed in the first attack, and lost successively three of their generals, viz., Zeid Ebn Haretha, Mohammed's freedman; Jaasar, the son of Abu Taleb; and Abdaliali Ebn Rawalia; but Khaled Ebn Walid, succeeding to the command, overthrew the Greeks with great slaughter, and brought away abundance of rich spoil; on occasion of which action Mohammed gave him the title of Seif min soyuf Allah—"One of the swords of God."

In this year, also, Mohammed took the city of Mecca, the inhabitants whereof had broken the truce concluded two years before.

The remainder of this year Mohammed employed in destroying the idols in and around Mecca, sending several of the generals on expeditions for that purpose, and to invite the Arabs to Islamism; wherein it is no wonder if they now met with success.

The next year, being the ninth of the Hegira, the Mohammedans call the year of embassies; for the Arabs had been hitherto awaiting the issue of the war between Mohammed and the Koreish; but as soon as that tribe, the principal of the whole nation, and the genuine descendants of Ishmael, whose prerogatives none offered to dispute, had submitted, they were satisfied that it was not in their power to oppose Mohammed; and, therefore, began to come in to him in great numbers, and to send embassies to make their submissions to him, both to Mecca, while he stayed there, and also to Medina, whither he returned this year. Among the rest, five kings of the tribe of Hamyer professed Mohammedanism, and sent ambassadors to notify the same.

In the tenth year, Ali was sent into Yemen to propagate the Mohammedan faith there; and, as it is said, converted the whole tribe of Hamdan in one day. Their example was quickly followed by all the inhabitants of that province, except only those of Najran, who, being Christians, chose rather to pay tribute.

Thus was Mohammedanism established, and idolatry rooted out, even in Mohammed's lifetime (for he died the next year), throughout all Arabia, except only Yamama, where Moseilama, who set up also as a prophet, and as Mohammed's competitor, had a great party, and was not reduced till the caliphate of Abu Becr; and the Arabs being then united in one faith, and under one prince, found themselves in a condition for making those conquests which extended the Mohammedan faith over so great a part of the world. See ARABIA—MOHAMMEDANISM.

MOHAMMEDANISM, the religious system devised and propagated by the false prophet, whose life has just been sketched in the preceding article. It has extended over many countries in different parts of the earth, particularly among the Turks and Persians, and several nations in Africa and Eastern Asia. It is divided by its adherents into two general parts: faith and practice.

1. RELIGIOUS BELIEF.—First, they believe both Mohammed, and those among his followers who are reckoned orthodox, had, and continue to have, just and true notions of God. This, indeed, appears so plain from the Koran itself, and all the Mohammedan divines, that it would be loss of time to refute those who suppose the God of Mohammed to be different from the true God, and only a fictitious deity or idol of his own creation.

2. The existence of angels, and their purity, are absolutely required to be believed in the Koran; and he is reckoned an infidel who denies there are such beings, or hates any of them, or asserts any distinction of sexes among them. They believe them to have pure and subtile bodies, created of fire; that they neither eat nor drink, nor propagate their species; that they have various forms and offices, some adoring God in different postures, others singing praises to him, or interceding for mankind. They hold that some of them are employed in writing down the actions of men; others in carrying the throne of God, and other services.

3. As to the Scriptures, the Mohammedans are taught by the Koran, that God, in divers ages of the world, gave revelations of his will in writing to several prophets, the whole and every one of which it is absolutely necessary for a good Moslem to believe. The number of these sacred books were, according to them, one hundred and four; of which ten were given to Adam, fifty to Seth, thirty to Edris or Enoch, ten to Abraham; and the other four, being the Pentateuch, the Psalms, the Gospel, and the Koran, were successively delivered to Moses, David, Jesus, and Mohammed; which last being the seal of the prophets, those revelations are now closed, and no more are to be expected. All these divine books, except the four last, they agree to be now entirely lost, and their contents unknown; though the Sabians have several books which they attribute to some of the antediluvian prophets. And of those four, the Pentateuch, Psalms, and Gospel, they say have undergone so many alterations and corruptions, that though there may possibly be some part of the true word of God therein, yet no credit is to be given to the present copies in the hands of the Jews and Christians.

4. The number of the prophets, who have been from time to time sent by God into the world, amounts to no less than two hundred and twenty-four thousand, according to one Mohammedan tradition; or to one hundred and twenty-four thousand, according to another; among whom three hundred and thirteen were apostles, sent with special commissions to reclaim mankind from infidelity and superstition; and six of them brought new laws or dispensations, which successively abrogated the preceding: these were Adam, Noah, Abraham, Moses, Jesus, and Mohammed. All the prophets in general, the Mohammedans believe to have been free from great sins and errors of consequence, and professors of one and the same religion—that is, Islamism—notwithstanding the different laws and institutions which they observed. They allow of degrees among them, and hold some of them to be more excellent and honourable than others.

In this great number of prophets they not only reckon divers patriarchs and persons named in Scripture, but not recorded to have been prophets (wherein the Jewish and Christian writers have sometimes led the way), as Adam, Seth, Lot, Ishmael, Nun, Joshua, &c., and introduced some of them under different names, as Enoch, Heber, and Jethro, who are called, in the Koran, Edris, Hud, and Shoaib; but several others whose very names do not appear in Scripture (though they endeavour to find some persons there to fix them on), as Saleh, Khedr, Dhu'lkefl, &c.

5. The belief of a general resurrection and a future judgment.

The time of the resurrection the Mohammedans allow to be a perfect secret to all but God alone; the angel Gabriel himself acknowledged his ignorance in this point, when Mohammed asked him about it. However, they say the approach of that day may be known from certain signs which are to precede it.

After examination is past (the account of which is too long and tedious for this place), and every one's works weighed in a just balance, they say that mutual retaliation will follow, according to which every creature will take vengeance of another, or have satisfaction made them for the injuries which they have suffered. And, since there will then be no other way of returning like for like, the manner of giving this satisfaction will be by taking away a proportional part of the good works of him who offered the injury, and adding it to those of him who suffered it. Which being done, if the angels (by whose ministry this is to be performed) say, "Lord, we have given to every one his due, and there remaineth of this person's good works so much as equalleth the weight of an ant," God will, of his mercy, cause it to be doubled unto him, that he may be admitted into Paradise; but if, on the contrary, his good works be exhausted, and there remain evil works only, and there be any who have not yet received satisfaction from him, God will order that an equal weight of their sins be added unto his, that he may be punished for them in their stead, and he will be sent to hell laden with both. This will be the method of God's dealing with mankind. As to brutes, after they shall have likewise taken vengeance of one another, he will command them to be changed into dust; wicked men being reserved to more grievous punishment, so that they shall cry out, on hearing this sentence passed on the brutes, "Would to God that we were dust also!" As to the genii, many Mohammedans are of opinion that such of them as are true believers, will undergo the same fate as the irrational animals, and have no other reward than the favour of being converted into dust; and for this they quote the authority of their prophet.

The trials being over, and the assembly dissolved, the Mohammedans hold that those who are to be admitted into Paradise will take the right hand way, and those who are destined for hell-fire will take the left; but both of them must first pass the bridge called in Arabic Al Sirat, which they say is laid over the midst of hell, and described to be finer than a hair, and sharper than the edge of a sword; so that it seems very difficult to conceive how any one shall be able to stand upon it; for which reason most of the sect of the Motazalites reject it as a fable; though the orthodox think it a sufficient proof of the truth of this article, that it was seriously affirmed by him who never asserted a falsehood, meaning their prophet; who, to add to the difficulty of the passage, has likewise declared, that this bridge is beset on each side with briars and hooked thorns, which will, however, be no impediment to the good; for they shall pass with wonderful ease and swiftness, like lightning, or the wind, Mohammed and his Moslems leading the way; whereas, the wicked, what with the slipperiness and extreme narrowness of the path, the entangling of the thorns, and the extinction of the light which directed the former to Paradise, will soon miss their footing, and fall down headlong into hell, which is gaping beneath them.

As to the punishment of the wicked, the Mohammedans are taught that hell is divided into seven storeys or apartments, one below another, designed for the reception of as many distinct classes of the damned. The first, which they call Jehenan, they say will be the receptacle of those who acknowledged one God—that is, the wicked Mohammedans—who, after having been punished according to their demerits, will at length be released; the second, named Ladha, they assign to the Jews; the third, named al Hotama, to the Christians; the fourth, named al Sair, to the Sabians; the fifth, named Sakar, to the Magians; the sixth, named al Jakin, to the idolaters; and the seventh, which is the lowest and worst of all, and is named al Hawyat, to the hypocrites, or those who outwardly professed some religion, but in their hearts were of none. Over each of these apartments they believe there will be set a guard of angels, nineteen in number; to whom the damned will confess the just judgment of God, and beg them to intercede with him for some alleviation of their pain, or that they may be delivered by being annihilated.

Mohammed has, in his Koran and traditions, been very exact in describing the various torments of hell, which, according to him, the wicked will suffer both from intense heat and excessive cold. We shall, however, enter into no detail of them here, but only observe, that the degrees of these pains will also vary in proportion to the crimes of the sufferer, and the apartment he is condemned to; and that he who is punished the most lightly of all will be shod with shoes of fire, the fervour of which will cause his skull to boil like a caldron. The condition of these unhappy wretches, as the same prophet teaches, cannot be properly called either life or death; and their misery will be greatly increased by their despair of being ever delivered from that place, since, according to that frequent expression in the Koran, "they must remain therein for ever." It must be remarked, however, that the infidels alone will be liable to eternity of damnation; for the Moslems, or those who have embraced the true religion, and have been guilty of heinous sins, will be delivered thence after they shall have expiated their crimes by their sufferings. The time which these believers shall be detained there, according to a tradition handed down from their prophet, will not be less than nine hundred years, nor more than seven thousand. And, as to the manner of their delivery, they say that they shall be distinguished by the marks of prostration on those parts of their bodies with which they used to touch the ground in prayer, and over which the fire will therefore have no power; and that, being known by this characteristic, they will be released by the mercy of God, at the intercession of Mohammed and the blessed: whereupon those who shall have been dead will be restored to life, as has been said; and those whose bodies shall have contracted any sootiness or filth from the flames and smoke of hell, will be immersed in one of the rivers of Paradise, called the river of life, which will wash them whiter than pearls.

The righteous, as the Mohammedans are taught to believe, having surmounted the difficulties, and passed the sharp bridge above mentioned, before they enter Paradise, will be refreshed by drinking at the pond of their prophet, who describes it to be an exact square, of a month's journey in compass; its water, which is supplied by two pipes from al Cawthay, one of the rivers of Paradise, being whiter than milk or silver, and more odoriferous than musk, with as many cups set around it as there are stars in the firmament; of which water whoever drinks will thirst no more for ever. This is the first taste which the blessed will have of their future, and now near approaching felicity.

Though Paradise be so very frequently mentioned in the Koran, yet it is a dispute among the Mohammedans, whether it be already created, or is to be created hereafter; the Motazalites and some other sectaries asserting, that there is not at present any such place in nature, and that the Paradise which the righteous will inhabit in the next life will be different from that from which Adam was expelled. However, the orthodox profess the contrary, maintaining that it was created even before the world, and describe it, from their prophet's traditions, in the following manner:—

They say it is situated above the seven heavens (or in the seventh heaven), and next under the throne of God; and to express the amenity of the place, tell us that the earth of it is of the finest wheat flour, or of the purest musk, or, as others will have it, of saffron; that its stones are pearls and jacinths, the walls of its buildings enriched with gold and silver, and that the trunks of all its trees are of gold; among which the most remarkable is the tree called tuba, or the tree of happiness. Concerning this tree they fable, that it stands in the palace of Mohammed, though a branch of it will reach to the house of every true believer; that it will be laden with pomegranates, grapes, dates, and other fruits, of surprising bigness and of tastes unknown to mortals; so that if a man desire to eat of any particular kind of fruit, it will immediately be presented him; or if he choose flesh, birds ready dressed will be set before him, according to his wish. They add, that the boughs of this tree will spontaneously bend down to the hand of the person who would gather of its fruits, and that it will supply the blessed not only with food, but also with silken garments, and beasts to ride, on ready saddled and bridled, and adorned with rich trappings, which will burst forth from its fruits; and that this tree is so large, that a person mounted on the fleetest horse would not be able to gallop from one end of its shade to the other in one hundred years.

As plenty of water is one of the greatest additions to the pleasantness of any place, the Koran often speaks of the rivers of Paradise as a principal ornament thereof; some of these rivers, they say, flow with water, some with milk, some with wine, and others with honey; all taking their rise from the root of the tree tuba.

But all these glories will be eclipsed by the resplendent and ravishing girls of Paradise, called, from their large black eyes, Hur al ayun, the enjoyment of whose company will be a principal felicity of the faithful. These, they say, are created not of clay, as mortal women are, but of pure musk; being, as their prophet often affirms in his Koran, free from all natural impurities, defects, and inconveniences incident to the sex, of the strictest modesty, and secluded from public view in pavilions of hollow pearls, so large, that, as some traditions have it, one of them will be no less than four parasangs (or, as others say, sixty miles) long, and as many broad.

The name which the Mohammedans usually give to this happy mansion is al Jannat, or "the Garden;" and sometimes they call it with an addition, Jannat al Ferdaws, "the Garden of Paradise;" Jannat Adan, "the Garden of Eden" (though they generally interpret the word Eden not according to its acceptance in Hebrew, but according to its meaning in their own tongue, wherein it signifies "a settled or perpetual habitation"); Jannat al Mara, "the Garden of Abode;" Jannat al Naim, "the Garden of Pleasure;" and the like; by which several appellations some understand so many different gardens, or at least places of different degrees of felicity (for they reckon no less than a hundred such in all), the very meanest whereof will afford its inhabitants so many pleasures and delights, that one would conclude they must even sink under them, had not Mohammed declared that, in order to qualify the blessed for a full enjoyment of them, God will give to every one the abilities of one hundred men.

6. God's absolute decree and predestination both of good and evil. The orthodox doctrine is, that whatever hath or shall come to pass in this world, whether it be good or whether it be bad, proceedeth entirely from the divine will, and is irrevocably fixed and recorded from all eternity in the preserved table; God having secretly predetermined not only the adverse and prosperous fortune of every person in this world, in the most minute particulars, but also his faith or infidelity, his obedience or disobedience, and consequently his everlasting happiness or misery after death; which fate or predestination it is not possible by any foresight or wisdom to avoid.

II. RELIGIOUS PRACTICE.—1. The first point is prayer, under which are also comprehended those legal washings or purifications which are necessary preparations thereto.

For the regular performance of the duty of prayer among the Mohammedans, it is requisite, while they pray, to turn their faces towards the temple of Mecca; the quarter where the same is situated being, for that reason, pointed out within their mosques by a niche, which they call al Mehrah; and without by the situation of the doors opening into the galleries of the steeples; there are also tables calculated for the ready finding out their Keblah, or part towards which they ought to pray, in places where they have no other direction.

2. Alms are of two sorts, legal and voluntary. The legal alms are of indispensable obligation, being commanded by the law, which directs and determines both the portion which is to be given, and of what things it ought to consist; but the voluntary alms are left to every one's liberty, to give more or less, as he shall see fit. The former kind of alms some think to be properly called zacam, and the latter sadakat, though this name be also frequently given to the legal alms. They are called zacam, either because they increase a man's store by drawing down a blessing thereon, and produce in his soul the virtue of liberality; or because they purify the remaining part of one's substance from pollution, and the soul from the filth of avarice; and sadakat, because they are a proof of a man's sincerity in the worship of God. Some writers have called the legal alms tithes; but improperly, since in some cases they fall short, and in others exceed that proportion.

3. Fasting is a duty of so great moment, that Mohammed used to say it was "the gate of religion;" and that the "odour of the mouth of him who fasteth is more grateful to God than that of musk;" and Al Ghazali reckons fasting one-fourth part of the faith. According to the Mohammedan divines, there are three degrees of fasting. (1.) The restraining of the belly and other parts of the body from satisfying their lusts. (2.) The restraining of the ears, eyes, tongue, hands, feet, and other members, from sin. (3.) The fasting of the heart from worldly cares, and restraining the thoughts from everything besides God.

4. The pilgrimage to Mecca is so necessary a point of practice, that, according to a tradition of Mohammed, he who dies without performing it may as well die a Jew or a Christian; and the same is expressly commanded in the Koran.

III. CAUSES OF SUCCESS.—The rapid success which attended the propagation of this new religion was owing to causes that are plain and evident, and must remove, or rather prevent, our surprise, when they are attentively considered. The terror of Mohammed's arms, and the repeated victories which were gained by him and his successors, were, no doubt, the irresistible arguments that persuaded such multitudes to embrace his religion, and submit to his dominion. Besides, his law was artfully and marvellously adapted to the corrupt nature of man; and, in a most particular manner, to the customs and opinions of the Eastern nations, and the vices to which they were naturally addicted: for the articles of the faith which it proposed were few in number, and extremely simple; and the duties it required were neither many nor difficult, nor such as were incompatible with the empire of appetites and passions. It is to be observed, further, that the gross ignorance under which the Arabians, Syrians, Persians, and the greatest part of the Eastern nations, laboured at this time, rendered many an easy prey to the artifice and eloquence of this bold adventurer. To these causes of the progress of Mohammedanism we may add the bitter dissensions and cruel animosities that reigned among the Christian sects, particularly the Greeks, Nestorians, Eutychians, and Monophysites; dissensions that filled a great part of the East with carnage, assassinations, and such detestable enormities as rendered the very name of Christianity odious to many. We might add here, that the Monophysites and Nestorians, full of resentment against the Greeks, from whom they had suffered the bitterest and most injurious treatment, assisted the Arabians in the conquest of several provinces, into which, of consequence, the religion of Mohammed was afterwards introduced. Other causes of the sudden progress of that religion will naturally occur to such as consider attentively its spirit and genius, and the state of the world at this time.

MOLADAH, a city in the tribe of Judah. Josh. xv. 26. It afterwards changed masters and belonged to the tribe of Simeon.

MOLE. This word, in our version of Lev. xi. 30, answers to the word tenshemeth, which Bochart has shown to be the chameleon; but he conjectures, with great propriety, that choled, translated "weasel" in the preceding verse, is the true word for the mole. The present name of the mole in the East is khuld, which is undeniably the same word as the Hebrew choled. The import of the Hebrew word is, "to creep into," and the same Syriac word implies, "to creep underneath," to creep into by burrowing; which are well known characteristics of the mole.

MOLINISTS, a sect in the Romish Church who follow the doctrine and sentiments of the Jesuit Molina, relating to sufficient and efficacious grace. He taught that the operations of divine grace were entirely consistent with the freedom of the human will; and introduced a new kind of hypothesis to remove the difficulties attending the doctrines of predestination and liberty, and to reconcile the jarring opinions of Augustinians, Thomists, semi-Pelagians, and other contentious divines. He affirmed that the decree of predestination to eternal glory was founded upon a previous knowledge and consideration of the merits of the elect; that the grace, from whose operation these merits are derived, is not efficacious by its own intrinsic power only, but also by the consent of our own will, and because it is administered in those circumstances in which the Deity, by that branch of his knowledge which is called scientia media, foresees that it will be efficacious.

The kind of prescience denominated in the schools scientia media, is that foreknowledge of future contingents that arises from an acquaintance with the nature and faculties of rational beings, of the circumstances in which they shall be placed, of the objects that shall be presented to them, and of the influence which these circumstances and objects must have on their actions.

MOLLAH, an officer among the Turks, who is possessed of spiritual as well as civil and criminal jurisdiction over towns or districts.

MOLOCH, a god of the Ammonites (1 Kings xi. 7), to whom human victims were offered. The mode in which human beings were sacrificed to this heathen deity appears to have been by burning them or causing them to pass through the fire to Moloch. This practice is frequently forbidden in the Old Testament. Thus in Lev. xviii. 21, "And thou shalt not let any of thy seed pass through the fire to Moloch, neither shalt thou profane the name of thy God; I am the Lord." The word Moloch signifies a king, and he was generally worshipped under the form of a calf or an ox. Children were burnt in honour of this cruel god in the valley of Tophet or of Hinnom; and that the cries of the poor suffering infants might not be heard, the inhuman ceremony was performed amid the noise of drums and trumpets. It has sometimes been supposed that Moloch was identical with Saturn, to whom human victims are known to have been also offered. Moses commanded those who were guilty of perpetrating the awful crime of offering their children in sacrifice to Moloch to be stoned. Thus, Lev. xx. 2, "Again, thou shalt say to the children of Israel, Whosoever he be of the children of Israel, or of the strangers that sojourn in Israel, that giveth any of his seed unto Moloch, he shall surely be put to death: the people of the land shall stone him with stones." In such horror was this practice held among the more recent Jews, that the valley of Tophet was regarded as synonymous with the place of future torment.

MOLTEN SEA. See LAVER.

MOMIER (from momerie, mummery), a term of reproach, applied to the dissenters from the modern Church of Geneva.

MONACHISM, the history of monks. See MONK—MONASTERY.

MONARCHIANS, a name given to the Patripassians, (which see.)

MONASTERY, a convent or house built for the reception of religious, whether it be abbey, priory, nunnery, or the like. Monastery is only properly applied to the houses of monks, mendicant friars, and nuns: the rest are more properly called religious houses.

MONEY. The word thus translated in Gen. xxiii. 9-13 properly means silver. It is worthy of observation that this is the first money transaction which we read of in the world. Till then, and long after, both among the posterity of Abraham and other nations, wealth was estimated by the number and quality of cattle, and cattle were the principal instruments of commerce. Thus we read in many passages of Homer of a coat of mail worth a hundred oxen, a caldron worth twenty sheep, a cup or goblet worth twelve lambs, and the like. The words belonging to commerce or exchange of commodities in the Greek language are mostly derived from the names of certain animals by means of which that exchange was originally carried on. Thus the word which signifies to barter, traffic, or commute one kind of goods for another, is derived from that which signifies "a lamb;" the verb translated to sell comes from a noun signifying "a colt;" the Greek word for "buy" comes from that which signifies "an ass;" while the term denoting "rent or revenue," and that which signifies "a sheep," are of kindred origin and import. A criminal, according to the magnitude of his offence, was anciently condemned to pay a fine of four, twelve, or a hundred oxen. A wealthy person was said to be a person of many lambs. Two rival brothers are represented in Hesiod as fighting with each other about the sheep of their father; that is, contending who should be his heir. But it appears that as early as the time of Abraham, silver was employed as a more commodious means of traffic. From that period to the present, the precious metals have been mostly employed by all civilised and commercial nations for the same purpose. In early ages the value of money was reckoned by weight. For this reason the word shekel is at once the name of a weight and a coin. This is the oldest coin of which we any where read, for it occurs, Gen. xxiii. 16, and exhibits direct evidence against those who date the first coinage of money so low as the time of Croesus or Darius, it being expressly said that "Abraham weighed to Ephron four hundred shekels of silver, current money with the merchants." From this custom of weighing money arose probably the practice among the Hebrews of wearing scales at their girdles. (Hosea xii. 7.) The money which Joash collected for the repair of the temple was counted in bags, which probably each contained an exact quantity, and, after being sealed, passed current among merchants. Thus, 2 Kings xii. 10, "And it was so, when they saw that there was much money in the chest, that the king's scribe and the high priest came up, and they put up in bags, and told the money that was found in the house of the Lord." This practice of passing bags of money sealed with the banker's seal still prevails in the East. To this perhaps Job alludes, xiv. 17, "My transgression is sealed up in a bag, and thou sewest up mine iniquity."

MONEY-CHANGERS. These were not unlike our merchants or bankers who deal in bills of exchange. As the Jews were obliged to repair to Jerusalem from all quarters, there to offer their sacrifices and pay their half shekel for the use of the temple (Exod. xxx. 13), the institution of such dealers in money was highly necessary. Native was thus exchanged for foreign coins, and the people who came from remote parts were enabled to purchase the necessary sacrifices. It was not the profession of a money-changer to which our Lord objected, but the place which they had chosen to prosecute their traffic, the court of the temple. Hence the incident which is thus recorded in the gospel: "And Jesus went into the temple of God, and cast out all them that sold and bought in the temple, and overthrew the tables of the money-changers, and the seats of them that sold doves, and said unto them, It is written, My house shall be called the house of prayer; but ye have made it a den of thieves."—(Matt. xxi. 12, 13.)

MONK, anciently denoted "a person who retired from the world to give himself wholly to God, and to live in solitude and abstinence." The word is derived from the Latin monachus, and that from the Greek monachos, "solitary."

The original of monks seems to have been this:—The persecutions which attended the first ages of the gospel, forced some Christians to retire from the world, and live in deserts and places most private and unfrequented, in hope of finding that peace and comfort among beasts which were denied them among men; and this being the case of some very extraordinary persons, their example gave such reputation to retirement, that the practice was continued when the reason of its commencement ceased. After the empire became Christian, instances of this kind were numerous; and those whose security had obliged them to live separately and apart, became afterwards united into societies. We may also add, that the mystic theology, which gained ground towards the close of the third century, contributed to produce the same effect, and to drive men into solitude for the purposes of devotion.

The monks, at least the ancient ones, were distinguished into solitaries, cœnobites, and sarabites.

The solitaries are those who live alone, in places remote from all towns and habitations of men, as do still some of the hermits. The cœnobites are those who live in community with several others in the same house, and under the same superiors. The sarabites were strolling monks, having no fixed rule or residence.

The houses of monks, again, were of two kinds, namely, monasteries and lauræ.

Those who are now called monks are cœnobites, who live together in a convent or monastery, who make vows of living according to a certain rule established by the founder, and wear a habit which distinguishes their order.

MONOPHYSITES (from monos, "single," and physis, "nature"), a general name given to all those sectaries in the Levant who only own one nature in Jesus Christ; and who maintain that the divine and human nature of Jesus Christ were so united as to form only one nature, yet without any change, confusion, or mixture of the two natures. The Monophysites, however, properly so called, are the followers of Severus, a learned monk of Palestine, who was created patriarch of Antioch in 513, and Petrus Fulensis.

The Monophysites were encouraged by the Emperor Anastasius, but suppressed by Justin and succeeding emperors. However, this sect was restored by Jacob Baradaeus, an obscure monk, insomuch that when he died bishop of Edessa, A.D. 588, he left it in a most flourishing state in Syria, Mesopotamia, Armenia, Egypt, Nubia, Abyssinia, and other countries. The laborious efforts of Jacob were seconded in Egypt and the adjacent countries by Theodosius, bishop of Alexandria, and he became so famous that all the Monophysites of the East considered him as their second parent and founder, and are to this day called Jacobites, in honour of their new chief. The Monophysites are divided into two sects or parties, the one African and the other Asiatic; at the head of the latter is the patriarch of Antioch, who resides for the most part in the monastery of St Athanasias, near the city of Merdin; the former are under the jurisdiction of the patriarch of Alexandria, who generally resides at Grand Cairo, and are subdivided into Copts and Abyssinians.

MONOTHELITES (compounded of monos, "single," and thelēma, "will"), an ancient sect, which sprung out of the Eutychians; thus called as only allowing of one will in Jesus Christ. The opinion of the Monothelites had its rise in 630, and had the emperor Heraclius for an adherent: it was the same with that of the acephalous Severians. They allowed of two wills in Christ, considered with regard to the two natures: but reduced them to one, by reason of the union of the two natures, thinking it absurd that there should be two free wills in one and the same person. They were condemned by the sixth general council in 680, as being supposed to destroy the perfection of the humanity of Jesus Christ, depriving it of will and operation. Their sentiments were afterwards embraced by the Maronites.

MONSTERS. This word is found in Lam. iv. 3: "Even the sea monsters draw out the breast, they give suck to their young ones: the daughter of my people is become cruel, like the ostriches in the wilderness." The word here translated sea monsters seems to have been used to denote all large sea animals; and in Gen. i. 21, it is rendered "great whales." See WHALE.

MONTANISTS, a sect which sprung up about the year 171, in the reign of the emperor Marcus Aurelius. They were so called from their leader Montanus, a Phrygian by birth; whence they are sometimes called Phrygians and Cataphrygians. These sectaries denied the doctrine of the Trinity; but they held that the Holy Spirit made Montanus his organ for delivering a more perfect form of discipline than what was delivered by his apostles. They suffered women to preach and to baptize. They refused communion for ever to those who were guilty of notorious crimes, and believed that the bishops had no authority to reconcile them. They held it unlawful to fly in time of persecution. They condemned second marriages, allowed the dissolution of marriage, and observed three lents. According to Robinson, the practice of pedobaptism originated with this sect.

MONTH. The following explanation of this portion of time among the Hebrews is given by Mr Horne:—

"The Hebrews had their months, which, like those of all other ancient nations, were lunar ones, being measured by the revolutions of the moon, and consisting alternately of twenty-nine and thirty days. While the Jews continued in the land of Canaan, the commencement of their months and years was not settled by any astronomical rules or calculations, but by the phasis or actual appearance of the moon. As soon as they saw the moon, they began the month. Persons were therefore appointed to watch on the tops of the mountains for the first appearance of the moon after the change. As soon as they saw it, they informed the Sanhedrim, and public notice was given, first, by the sounding of trumpets, to which there is an allusion in Ps. lxxxii. 3, and afterwards lighting beacons throughout the land; though, as the Mishnic rabbins tell us, after they had frequently been deceived by the Samaritans, who kindled false fires, they used to announce the appearance by sending messengers. As, however, they had no months longer than thirty days, if they did not see the new moon the night following the thirtieth day, they concluded that the appearance was obstructed by the clouds; and, without watching any longer, made the next day the first of the following month. But, on the dispersion of the Jews throughout all nations, having no opportunities of being informed of the appearance of the new moons, they were obliged to have recourse to astronomical calculations and cycles, in order to fix the beginning of their months and years. At first, they employed a cycle of eighty-four years; but this being discovered to be defective, they had recourse to the Metonic cycle of nineteen years, which was established by the authority of Rabbi Hillel, prince of the Sanhedrim, about the year 360 of the Christian era. This they still use, and say that it is to be observed until the coming of the Messiah. In the compass of this cycle there are twelve common years, consisting of twelve months, and seven intercalary years, consisting of thirteen months.

"Originally the Jews had no particular names for their months, but called them the first, second, &c. Thus the deluge began in the second month, and came to its height in the seventh month, at the end of 150 days (Gen. vii. 11–24, viii. 4), and decreased until the tenth month, when the tops of the mountains were seen. Chap. viii. 5. Afterwards they acquired distinct names; thus Moses named the first month of the year Abib (Exod. xii. 2, xiii. 4), signifying green, from the green ears of corn at that season; for it began about the vernal equinox. The second month was named Zif, signifying in Chaldee glory or splendour; in which the foundation of Solomon's temple was laid. 1 Kings vi. 1. The seventh month was styled Ethanim; which is interpreted harvests by the Syriac version. 1 Kings viii. 2. The eighth month Bul; from the fall of the leaf. 1 Kings vi. 38. But concerning the origin of these appellations critics are by no means agreed. On their return from the Babylonish captivity, they introduced the names which they had found among the Chaldeans and Persians. Thus the first month was also called Nisan, signifying flight, because in that month the Israelites were thrust out of Egypt (Exod. xii. 39); the third month, Sivan, signifying a bramble (Esth. iii. 7; Neh. ii. 1); and the sixth month Elul, signifying mourning, probably because it was the time of preparation for the great day of atonement, on the tenth day of the seventh month. Neh. vi. 15. The ninth month was called Chisleu, signifying chilled, when the cold weather sets in, and fires are lighted. Zech. vii. 1; Jer. xxxvi. 22. The tenth month was called Tebeth, signifying miry. Esth. ii. 16. The eleventh, Shebet, signifying a staff or a sceptre. Zech. i. 7. And the twelfth, Adar, signifying a magnificent mantle, probably from the profusion of flowers and plants with which the earth then begins to be clothed in warm climates. Ezra vi. 15; Esth. iii. 7. It is said to be a Syriac term. 2 Mac. xvi. 36.

MONUMENTS. In Isa. lxxv. 4, people are spoken of who "remain in the graves and lodge in the monuments." Lowth translates the latter word "caverns," and Gesenius "concealed places." It was a very frequent practice in ancient times to lodge among the tombs, and pretend to hold secret converse with the spirits of the departed.

MOON. The creation of this orb as well as of the sun is related in Gen. i. 14, 15: "And God said, Let there be lights in the firmament of the heaven, to divide the day from the night; and let them be for signs, and for seasons, and for days, and years: and let them be for lights in the firmament of the heaven, to give light upon the earth: and it was so." That the worship of the moon prevailed among the Hebrews, in common with the other nations of the East, is plain from the warning which is given by Moses in Deut. iv. 19; and in Deut. xvii. 3 he commands every such idolater to be stoned. Job thus adverts to the same kind of worship, chap. xxxi. 26, 27: "If I beheld the sun when it shined, or the moon walking in brightness; and my heart hath been secretly enticed, or my mouth hath kissed my hand." Jeremiah speaks of the moon under the designation of the "Queen of heaven," to whom the Hebrews offered cakes, poured out libations, and burned incense. The moon was also worshipped by the Zidonians under the name of Ash-taroath or Astarte, (which see). The moon was considered among the Egyptians as a male deity. The feast of the new moon was celebrated on the first appearance of the moon, which was proclaimed by sound of trumpets.

MORAL, (1.) relating to the actions or conduct of life, or that which determines an action to be good or virtuous. (2.) A moral agent is a being capable of those actions that have a moral quality, and which can properly be denominated good or evil. (See MORAL AGENCY.) (3.) A moral certainty is a very strong probability, and is used in contradistinction to mathematical probability. (4.) Moral fitness is the agreement of the actions of any intelligent being with the nature, circumstances, and relation of things. (5.) A moral impossibility is a very great or insuperable difficulty arising from the state of the will; opposed to a natural impossibility. (See INABILITY.) (6.) Moral obligation is the necessity of doing or omitting any action in order to be happy and good. (See MORAL OBLIGATION.) (7.) Moral philosophy is the science of manners, the knowledge of our duty and felicity. (See PHILOSOPHY.) (8.) Moral sense is that whereby we perceive the difference between right and wrong, and approve what is good, virtuous, and beautiful, in actions, manners, and character. Some call this natural conscience, others intuitive perception of right and wrong, &c. (See SENSE—CONSCIENCE—MORAL OBLIGATION.) (9.) Moral law. See LAW—EVIDENCE.

MORAL AGENCY, the capacity of acting voluntarily and deliberately in view of motives, or the action of one under moral obligation, law, and responsibility.

The custom of considering the volitions and agency of man as a matter of abstract science, has favoured the supposition, that volition is simple or uniform in its mode of springing up in the mind. But if the real world of sentient beings is looked at, it will at once be seen, both that each species' has its peculiar conditions of the voluntary principle, and that volition in each species results, at different times, from very different internal processes. It would appear, then, to be the most natural course to look out first for the simpler instances of volition; and then to ascend from them to such as are complex, and not so readily analyzed. For, as we may fairly presume, the more complicated orders take up into their mental machinery the elements that have been singly developed in the lower ranks of existence. To this general truth, however, there is one exception. Whatever principle of agency in the animal world is no element of the human constitution, is called INSTINCT; and as this, of course, throws no light upon the agency of man, it must be excluded from our process of induction.

I. Conditions of Moral Agency. The agency of one class of animals is found to differ from that of another, by all the amount of an additional element. A horse may, therefore, be managed by means which it would be utterly absurd to address to a pig or a hen; and it would be highly unphilosophical to reason concerning the two classes as if they were one and the same.

We ascend many degrees in the scale of reason, of moral sensibility, and of complex volition, when we turn from the horse to the dog, which is the object of far more sentiment, and the subject of abundantly more education; not arbitrarily or accidentally, but because he possesses more intellectual faculty, moral feeling, and fitness for social companionship with man. Yet the dog is limited in his intellectual range to a narrow circle; and in comparing his powers with those of man, we discern the more clearly the foundation of that different treatment of which the higher nature is the subject; and discern, too, the ineffable absurdity of the metaphysical doctrine which assumes the agency of men, of brutes, and of machines, to be one and the same thing!

The want, or at least the extreme limitation, of the power of abstraction, and of comparing complex relations, affects, in an essential manner, the moral constitution of these inferior species, even of the most intelligent of them. And the possession of such powers gives to man his responsibility; invests him with the anxious prerogative of being, under God, master of his destinies; and, in a word, transfers him, in a great degree, from the present to a future system of retributive treatment. Man alone can be influenced by motives drawn from eternity.

Accordingly, an inward voluntary reformation of manners is never looked for from the brute. He may, indeed, be amended in his dispositions by external treatment; he may become more or less bland and tractable, in consequence of changes in his constitution and diet; but he never changes in consequence of a mental process bringing two abstract moral qualities into comparison, and allowing the one to be chosen and followed, while the other is hated and avoided. If it be asked on what ground we infer these deficiencies of internal structure in the brute mind, we reply, that the internal defect may fairly be implied from the absence of the proper outward results of the supposed faculty. In following even the most sagacious animal through his movements, in connection with new and artificial occasions, we catch him at fault precisely for the want of the power of abstraction. The internal structure is as good as laid bare in such instances; and we cease to wonder that a being so deficient should not provide for his welfare by artificial means.

The very same deficiency necessitates his moral condition; and knowing it, though we feel complacency or displacency towards the dog or the elephant, according to his dispositions, we neither assign to him in the one case the praise of virtue, nor in the other impute to him the blame of vice. The animal that does not observe proportions, nor use instruments, nor construct machines, for the same reason does not turn or remodel his own character—does not, in any degree, educate himself. His is not the power to choose what he shall be in view of an unlimited futurity.

Virtue, vice, praise, blame, law, government, retribution, are proper conditions of the existence of a being who, by his use of arbitrary signs, by his employment of complicated means, by his conversion of the powers of nature to his particular advantage, above all, by his conscience, or power of introverted, deliberative, directive thought, in connection with his moral sensibilities, makes it evident that he possesses an agency which renders virtue, vice, praise, blame, law, government, retribution, the true correlatives of his nature, and which must attach to it for ever. These are plainly conditions of man's moral nature in his present state.

The sophism which would sever these things from human nature, contains an absurdity of precisely the same degree as must belong to an argument that would attach them to the brute. It were a whim of the same order to look for arts and accomplishments among tigers, kites, sharks, as not to look for them among men; and it is nonsense of the same magnitude to deny that the being who builds, plants, writes, and calculates, can work upon his own dispositions, as to affirm that tigers, kites, and sharks, might, if they so pleased, become more amiable and less rapacious than they have hitherto shown themselves. And when metaphysical abstractions of a certain order are attempted to be dovetailed upon the actual constitution of nature, the one set of principles calls the other fool, and both utterly refuse to coalesce. What man can do, and what he will do, are things perfectly distinct. (See DEPRAVITY, HUMAN.)

II. Development of Moral Agency. The conjunction of the higher elements of intellectual and moral being with the common ingredients of animal life, is beautifully developed to the eye that with philosophical attention observes the growth and expansion of the human mind from infancy to manhood. Man, throughout the period of his infancy, is, as an agent, below zero. Though launched as a separate being in the world, he is still an embryo, and exists only within the coil of maternal vigilance. At a very early period, however, the agency of the infant is enriched and extended, by the development of the two correlative emotions, which, in their multiform combinations, are afterwards to constitute the moral life, LOVE and RESENTMENT. These feelings, liable as they are to perversion, are, when properly directed and governed, the conservative elements of existence. The intelligent mother uses her skill incessantly, as manager of the two elementary and antagonist principles of the moral life; and by avoiding as far as possible to excite the irascible emotion, and by giving the fullest play to the loving principle, she strengthens the latter by all the force of habit, and deprives the former of the corresponding advantage.

That development of the reasoning faculty, and that power of complex thought, which are the grounds of intelligent and responsible agency, are not apparently developed, even in the lowest degree, until some time after the habits, both of the animal and moral life, have become firmly settled.

It would be curious and entertaining, if not instructive, to trace, by a series of exact observations, the influence of language, and other signs, in eliciting or hastening that last expansion of the mind, which imparts to it a deliberative power; or which constitutes man a voluntary agent in the higher sense of the term; and which, in its matured state, carries him to an immeasurable distance beyond the inferior species of sentient beings. Daily, hourly, occasions arise in that little world of commencements, the nursery, whereon the hasty strides of desire are arrested by maternal vigilance, and other motives placed before the mind, and antagonist considerations urged upon its attention. HERE BEGINS THE PROCESS OF COMPLEX VOLITION. At the moment of its commencement the little being sets foot upon a course that has no limit; is translated from the lower world of animal life into the higher sphere of rational and moral existence; is introduced into the community of responsible agents, and takes up his heirship of an interminable destiny. See JUDGMENT, DAY OF.

MORALITY is that relation or proportion which actions bear to a given rule. (See APPROBATION—DISAPPROBATION.) Morality, in this sense, is distinguished from religion thus: "Morality is a studious conformity of our actions to the relations in which we stand to each other in civil society. Morality comprehends only a part of religion; but religion comprehends the whole of morality. Morality finds all her motives here below; religion fetches all her motives from above. The highest principle in social morals is a just regard to the rights of men; the first principle in religion is the love of God." The various duties of morality are considered in their respective places in this work.

MORAL SENSE. See CONSCIENCE.

MORAVIANS, UNITAS FRATRUM, or UNITED BRETHREN, a body of Christians, generally said to have arisen under Nicholas Lewis, count of Zinzendorf, a German nobleman of the last century, and thus called because the first converts to their system were some Moravian families.

According to the society's own account, however, they derive their origin from the Greek Church in the ninth century, when, by the instrumentality of Methodius and Cyrillus, two Greek monks, the kings of Bulgaria and Moravia, being converted to the faith, were, together with their subjects, united in communion with the Greek Church. Methodius was their first bishop; and for their use Cyrillus translated the Scriptures into the Slavonian language.

The antipathy of the Greek and Roman Churches is well known, and by much the greater part of the brethren were in process of time compelled, after many struggles, to submit to the see of Rome. A few, however, adhering to the rites of their mother Church, united themselves, in 1170, to the Waldensians, and sent missionaries into many countries. In 1547, they were called Fratres Legis Christi, or Brethren of the Law of Christ; because, about that period, they had thrown off all reverence for human compilations of the faith, professing simply to follow the doctrines and precepts contained in the Word of God.

There being at this time no bishops in the Bohemian Church who had not submitted to the Papal jurisdiction, three preachers of the society of United Brethren were, about the year 1467, ordained by Stephen, a bishop of the Waldenses, in Austria (see WALDENSES); and these, on their return to their own country, ordained ten bishops, or seniors, from among the rest. In 1523, the United Brethren commenced a friendly correspondence, first with Luther, and afterwards with Calvin, and other leaders among the Reformers. A persecution, which was brought upon them on this account, and some religious disputes which took place among themselves, threatened for a while the society with ruin; but the disputes were, in 1570, put an end to by a synod, which decreed that differences about non-essentials should not destroy their union; and the persecution ceased in 1575, when the United Brethren obtained an edict for the public exercise of their religion. This toleration was renewed in 1609, and liberty granted them to erect new churches. But a civil war which, in 1612, broke out in Bohemia, and a violent persecution which followed it in 1621, occasioned the dispersion of their ministers, and brought great distress upon the Brethren in general. Some of them fled to England, others to Saxony and Brandenburg; whilst many, overcome by the severity of the persecution, conformed to the rites of the Church of Rome. One colony of these, who retained in purity their original principles and practice, was, in 1722, conducted by a brother, named Christian David, from Fulneck, in Moravia, to Upper Lusatia, where they put themselves under the protection of Nicholas Lewis, count of Zinzendorf, and built a village on his estate, at the foot of a hill called Hutberg, or Watch Hill. They called their settlement Herrnhut—"the watch of the Lord." The count, who, soon after their arrival, removed from Dresden to his estate in the country, showed every mark of kindness to the poor emigrants; but being a zealous member of the Church established by law, he endeavoured for some time to prevail upon them to unite themselves with it, by adopting the Lutheran faith and discipline. This they declined; and the count, on a more minute inquiry into their ancient history and distinguishing tenets, not only desisted from his first purpose, but became himself a convert to the faith and discipline of the United Brethren.

The synod which, in 1570, put an end to the disputes which then tore the Church of the Brethren into factions, had considered as non-essentials the distinguishing tenets of their own society, of the Lutherans, and of the Calvinists. In consequence of this, many of the reformers of both these sects had followed the Brethren to Herrnhut, and been received by them into communion; but not being endued with the peaceable spirit of the Church which they had joined, they started disputes among themselves, which threatened the destruction of the whole establishment. By the indefatigable exertions of Count Zinzendorf, these disputes were allayed; and statutes being, in 1727, drawn up and agreed to for the regulation both of the internal and of the external concerns of the congregation, brotherly love and union were again established; and no schism whatever, in point of doctrine, has since that period disturbed the Church of the United Brethren.

In 1735, the Count, who, under God, had been the instrument of renewing the Brethren's Church, was ordained one of their bishops. Dr. Potter, then archbishop of Canterbury, in England, congratulated him upon this event, and promised his assistance to a Church of confessors, of whom he wrote in terms of the highest respect, for their having maintained the pure and primitive faith and discipline in the midst of the most tedious and cruel persecutions.

This sect, like many others, has been shamefully misrepresented, and things laid to their charge of which they never were guilty. It must, however, be acknowledged, that some of their converts having previously imbibed extravagant notions, propagated them with zeal among their new friends in a phraseology extremely reprehensible; and that Count Zinzendorf himself frequently adopted the very improper language of those fanatics, whom he wished to reclaim from their errors to the soberness of truth; but much of the extravagance and absurdity which has been attributed to the Count is not to be charged to him, but to those persons who, writing his extempore sermons in short-hand, printed and published them without his knowledge or consent.

This eminent benefactor to the United Brethren died in 1760, and it is with reason that they honour his memory, as having been the instrument by which God restored and built up their Church. But they do not regard him as their head, nor take his writings, nor the writings of any other man, as the standard of their doctrines, which they profess to derive immediately from the Word of God.

The United Brethren allow to their bishops no elevation of rank or pre-eminent authority—their Church having from its first establishment been governed by councils or synods, consisting of deputies from all the congregations, and by other subordinate bodies, which they call conferences. The synods, which are generally held once in seven years, are called together by the elders who were in the former synod appointed to superintend the whole Unity. In the first sitting a president is chosen, and these elders lay down their office; but they do not withdraw from the assembly; for they, together with all bishops, seniores civiles, or lay elders, and those ministers who have the general care or inspection of several congregations in one province, have seats in the synod without any particular election. The other members are, one or more deputies sent by each congregation, and such ministers or missionaries as are particularly called to attend. Women, approved by the congregations, are also admitted as hearers, and are called upon to give their advice in what relates to the ministerial labour among their sex; but they have no decisive vote in the synod. The votes of all the other members are equal.

In questions of importance, or of which the consequences cannot be foreseen, neither the majority of votes nor the unanimous consent of all present can decide; but recourse is had to the lot. For adopting this unusual mode of deciding in ecclesiastical affairs, the Brethren allege as reasons the practice of the ancient Jews and the apostles; the insufficiency of the human understanding, amidst the best and purest intentions, to decide for itself in what concerns the administration of Christ's kingdom; and their own confident reliance on the comfortable promises that the Lord Jesus will approve himself the head and ruler of his Church. The lot is never made use of but after mature deliberation and fervent prayer; nor is anything submitted to its decision which does not, after being thoroughly weighed, appear to the assembly eligible in itself. (See Lot.)

In their opinion, Episcopal consecration does not confer any power to preside over one or more congregations; and a bishop can discharge no office but by the appointment of a synod, or of the elders' conference of the Unity. Presbyters among them can perform every function of the bishop, except ordination. Deacons are assistants to the presbyters; and in the Brethren's Churches, deaconesses are retained, for the purpose of privately admonishing their own sex, and visiting them in their sickness; but though they are solemnly blessed to this office, they are not permitted to teach in public, and far less to administer the sacraments. They have likewise seniores civiles, or lay elders, in contradistinction to spiritual elders, or bishops, who are appointed to watch over the constitution and discipline of the Unity of the Brethren, over the observance of the laws of the country in which congregations or missions are established, and over the privileges granted to the Brethren by the governments under which they live. They have economies, or choir houses, where they live together in community; the single men and single women, widows and widowers, apart, each under the superintendence of elderly persons of their own class. In these houses every person who is able, and has not an independent support, labours in their own occupation, and contributes a stipulated sum for their maintenance.

"No marriage takes place without the consent of the board of elders of the congregation. Upon due application this consent is signified to the parties; whereupon they are solemnly betrothed, in presence of the elders and nearest connections, and the marriage then takes place, according to the forms prescribed by law in each country.

"The education of youth is regarded by the Brethren as worthy of the greatest attention, being persuaded that a good education is the most valuable legacy which parents can leave to their children. It is therefore their principal aim, that their youth, from their tenderest age, be not only screened as far as possible from all pernicious examples, hurtful impressions, and seductions to evil; but that the love of God in Christ Jesus may be implanted in the tender hearts of their children; that virtue may be represented to them in the most amiable light; and that they, as the property of the Lord, who created and redeemed them, may live wholly to his joy and honour, and become useful members of human society.

"Whoever does not walk conformably to the rules established, thus losing sight of the aim of his living in a congregation of the Brethren, incurs that Church discipline which has been introduced agreeably to the example of the apostolic age and the ancient Church of the Brethren."

But what characterizes the Moravians most, and holds them up to the attention of others, is their missionary zeal. In this they are superior to any other body of people in the world. "Their missionaries," as one observes, "are all of them volunteers; for it is an inviolable maxim with them to persuade no man to engage in missions. They are all of one mind as to the doctrines they teach, and seldom make an attempt where there are not half a dozen of them in the mission. Their zeal is calm, steady, persevering. They would reform the world, but are careful how they quarrel with it. They carry their point by address, and the insinuations of modesty and mildness; which commends them to all men, and gives offence to none. The habits of silence, quietness, and decent reserve, mark their character. If any of their missionaries are carried off by sickness or casualty, men of the same stamp are ready to supply their place."

As to the tenets of the Moravians, though they acknowledge no other standard of truth than the Sacred Scriptures, they adhere to the AUGSBURG CONFESSION (see that article). They profess to believe that the kingdom of Christ is not confined to any particular party, community, or Church; and they consider themselves, though united in one body, or visible Church, as spiritually in the bond of Christian love to all who are taught of God. The members of the Moravian Church do not amount to more than 12,000 in Europe and 6000 in America, but at least 100,000 persons are virtually connected with the society, and under the spiritual care of its preachers. The number of their chapels in England and Wales, by the last census, was thirty-two, with 9305 sittings.

MORDECAI, the son of Jair, of the tribe of Benjamin. At an early age, probably, he had been carried captive to Babylon. Through the influence of Esther with Ahasuerus, he became prime minister to the king of Persia; and under his administration the Jews experienced that wonderful deliverance which is recorded in the Book of Esther, and in commemoration of which they observe the festival of Purim to this day. The sepulchre of Mordecai and Esther is still to be seen in the city of Hamadan.

MORIAH, MOUNT, to the north-east of Jerusalem, and celebrated as the mountain on which Abraham was ordered to offer up Isaac; and on which the temple of Solomon was afterwards built; and on part of which, namely, mount Calvary, Christ was crucified. In the time of David it stood apart from the city, and appears to have been under cultivation, for it was the site of the threshing-floor of Araunah the Jebusite. 2 Sam. xxiv. 15-25.

MORMONITES, believers in the "Book of Mormon." This famous book, which its misguided followers regard as a second Bible, or, more properly, as the Mohammedans do the Koran, is said to be a translation from certain brass plates, found by one Joseph Smith, in the town of Palmyra, New York, in 1826. The contents of the Book of Mormon are a series of puerile Eastern romance, with abundance of names, but no dates, localities, or connection of any sort with sober history. Its style affects an imitation of Scripture, which, with the ignorant, gives it an air of sacredness, like that of a revelation from heaven.

MORNING, sunrise, or break of day. At one period the Jews were wont to reckon two mornings—one when the eastern division of the horizon, and the other when the western, was illuminated. See DAY—HOUR—TIME.

MORTALITY, subjection to death. This is a condition of man's existence on earth in his fallen condition. In Adam all died; man not only died spiritually, but he became, even as to his body, liable to an innumerable mass of accidents, diseases, and disasters, all of which were destined to terminate, gradually it may be, but not on that account the less certainly, in death. The question has been raised whether man would not have died, even although he had continued in his primeval state of innocence. Such inquiries are idle, and, from want of proper data, incapable of being satisfactorily answered. We know what is, but we cannot know what in totally different circumstances might have been.

THE MOUNTAIN

THE MOUNTAIN

MORTAR. This word signifies clay. In Palestine and the surrounding countries, they were accustomed to tread the clay with their feet. To this custom there is an allusion in Isa. xli. 25, and still more clearly in Nahum iii. 14. It is apparently to the practice of treading ashes, to make mortar or cement, that the Prophet Malachi (iv. 3) refers: "And ye shall tread down the wicked; for they shall be ashes under the soles of your feet in the day that I shall do this, saith the Lord of hosts." In Ezek. xiii. 10, we find mention made of "untempered mortar;" referring probably, as indeed the Targum and Vulgate understand it, to the cement used in building walls to this day in the East, namely, clay and straw, which requires to be well tempered, which is generally done by long-continued treading or beating. There is a remarkable passage in Prov. xxvii. 22: "Though thou shouldest bray a fool in a mortar among wheat with a pestle, yet will not his foolishness depart from him." The mode of punishment here referred to may be proved to exist in the East, by the positive testimony of Volney and others. "Fanaticism has enacted, in Turkey," says the Baron du Tott, "in favour of the Ulemats, or body of lawyers, that their goods shall never be confiscated, nor themselves put to death but by being bruised in a mortar. The honour of being treated in so distinguished a manner may not, perhaps, be sensibly felt by every one—examples are rare—yet the insolence of the mufti irritated Sultan Osman to such a degree, that he ordered the mortars to be replaced, which, having been long neglected, had been thrown down, and almost covered with earth. This order alone produced a surprising effect: the body of Ulemats, justly terrified, submitted." "As for the guards of the towers, who had let Prince Coreskie [a prisoner] escape, some of them were empaled, and some were pounded, or beaten to pieces, in great mortars of iron, wherein they do usually pound their rice, to reduce it to meal." It is by no means probable, however, that such a punishment as this was known to the Hebrews, and, therefore, the expression in the Proverbs may simply be intended to denote, as Dr. Boothroyd suggests, "No correction, however severe, will cure him."

MORTGAGE. The original word arab is several times used in Scripture, always in the sense of a pawn or pledge. Thus, Neh. v. 3: "Some also there were that said, We have mortgaged our lands, vineyards, and houses, that we might buy corn, because of the dearth." It appears to be a strictly commercial term.

MORTIFICATION, among the Romauists, is any severe penance observed on a religious account. The mortification of sin in believers is a duty enjoined in the Sacred Scriptures. Rom. viii. 13; Col. iii. 5. It consists in breaking the league with sin, declaration of open hostility against it, and strong resistance to it. Eph. vi. 10-18; Gal. v. 24; Rom. viii. 13. The means to be used in this work are, not macerating the body, seclusion from society, or our own resolutions; but the Holy Spirit is the chief agent (Rom. viii. 13); while faith, prayer, and dependence are subordinate means to this end. The evidences of mortification are, not the cessation from one sin, for that may be only exchanged for another; or it may be renounced because it is a gross sin; or there may not be an occasion to practise it: but if sin be mortified, we shall not yield to temptation; our minds will be more spiritual; we shall find more happiness in spiritual services, and bring forth the fruits of the Spirit.

MOSAIC DISPENSATION. See DISPENSATION.

MOSAIC LAW, or the law of Moses, is the most ancient that we know of in the world, and is of three kinds—the moral law, the ceremonial law, and the civil or judicial law. Some observe, that the different manner in which each of these laws was delivered may suggest to us a right idea of their different natures. The five books of Moses, called the Pentateuch, are frequently styled, by way of emphasis, the law. This was held by the Jews in such veneration, that they would not allow it to be laid upon the bed of any sick person, lest it should be polluted by touching the dead. See LAW.

MOSEROTH, or MOSERAH (Numb. xxxiii. 30), a station of the Israelites, probably the same as Hazeroth, or Hazerah, near Kadesh and Mount Hor. Burckhardt mentions a valley east of Mount Hor, called Wady Mousa, which is probably a corruption of Moserah. See EXODUS.

MOSES, the famous legislator of the Israelites. It would appear, from Exod. vi. 20, that Amram, the son of Kohath, the son of Levi, had married his aunt; marriages between kindred thus nearly related not having as yet been forbidden by the law. The parents of Moses had evidently been married some years before his birth; for Aaron his brother was at that time three years old, and Miriam his sister was the oldest of the family. It is probable that Pharaoh's bloody edict had been issued shortly before the birth of Moses, for there is no mention made of the infancy of Aaron as being in any way exposed to danger; and indeed the martyr Stephen expressly says that it was while the edict was in force that Moses was born. Acts vii. 20. The expectation of the Israelites at that time was fixed upon the appearance of a mighty deliverer, who should execute the promise given by the mouth of Joseph, Gen. i. 24: "God will surely visit you, and bring you out of this land unto the land which he sware to Abraham, to Isaac, and to Jacob;" and although the bones of Joseph, which they had carefully preserved, as an emblem and assurance of God's faithfulness, were fast mouldering into dust, yet the years which were rapidly rolling away were bringing to a close the predicted term of bondage. As a wife and a mother Jochebed was longing for the birth of another man-child; but how must her feelings of joy have been restrained as she thought of the fate which awaited her son, if she should bear one,—that no sooner should he see the light than he should be consigned to the devouring jaws of the crocodile of the Nile! Yet when Moses was born, it would appear that some extraordinary impression rested on the minds of his parents as to the future greatness of their child. "And when his mother saw him," it is said, "he was a goodly child." The word which Stephen uses (Acts vii. 20) is a strong one: "He was fair to God, or divinely fair;" and the apostle describes him (Heb. xi. 23) as "a proper child," being the same word as is employed by Stephen, meaning "a fair child." Josephus also speaks in highly-coloured language of the personal beauty of Moses. There can be no doubt, from the whole statement, that there had been something peculiarly attractive in the outward appearance of the child, which operated powerfully in leading his parents to use all efforts for the preservation of his life. It is plain, however, from the language of the apostle, that the prevailing motive in the minds of the parents of Moses was one much higher and more powerful than even natural affection or their admiration of the loveliness of his countenance. They acted, we are told, "by faith." The question, of course, naturally arises, in what their faith rested? Some have supposed that an express revelation was vouchsafed to them from heaven; and Josephus relates at length a dream which Amram had before the birth of the child. It is unnecessary for us, however, to resort to any Jewish tradition to explain the matter, since we know that an explicit promise had been again and again given by Jehovah as to the deliverance of the Israelites from Egyptian bondage. The parents of Moses, indulging the fond hope that this child, from his peculiar appearance, was destined to be the future deliverer of his countrymen, resolved to conceal the child, "and were not afraid of the king's commandment." Their faith overcame their fear. They doubted not that their covenant God would be the protector of their child; and in utter defiance, therefore, of Pharaoh's stern decree, they resolved to conceal him. For three months did the parents of Moses carefully, and, no doubt, with much anxiety, watch over the babe. There was no probability that they could much longer evade the cruel edict. But He who has the hearts of all men in his hands suggested to them a plan which, wild and romantic though it may appear, was nevertheless overruled by God for the preservation of the child and his advancement to high honour in the land of Egypt: "And when she could not longer hide him, she took for him an ark of bulrushes, and daubed it with slime and with pitch, and put the child therein; and she laid it in the flags by the river's brink." Exod. ii. 3. The appointed morning came when the festival of the Nile was to be observed, and the haughty daughter of Pharaoh was expected with her maidens to bathe in the dark waters, and to pay her vows to that venerated god of her country. The vessel containing Israel's hope was committed to the waters. Miriam, the sister of the child, hovered in the neighbourhood, waiting the approach of the Egyptian princess; and in the distance might be seen the dark-eyed Hebrew mother, watching with eager anxiety the fortunes of her child. In that hour of solemn suspense was the safety of the church in all ages wrapped up with Moses in an ark of bulrushes. The hour or two which elapsed after the ark had been cast upon the river was doubtless a time of deep anxiety to the Hebrew family whose child was resting in unconscious slumber on the surface of the waters. At length the sound of music was heard, and a gaudy procession of gay Egyptian maidens was seen approaching the banks of the sacred river; and among them, with stately step, marched the proud heiress of the throne of the Pharaohs. She had come to bathe in the honoured waters, and to pay her devotions to the river-god. The splendid procession moved along the shore to the place appropriated for the sacred purification of the royal princess. The procession stopped; Thermuthis,—for such is the name given by Josephus and other historians to the daughter of the king of Egypt,—had reached the spot to which she was accustomed to resort on such festival occasions. She stands and gazes on the consecrated stream, and, behold, an object meets her eye floating upon the surface of the waters. It is an ark or basket of reeds. She sends her most confidential attendant, as the word implies, to fetch it. The vessel is presented before her; when, on removing the covering, she beholds, to her astonishment, an interesting male child. She had compassion on the weeping babe; and all the more, probably, that his colour, his features, and the mark of the covenant, betokened him to be a Hebrew. Any other than the king's daughter could not have dared to save the child; but historians tell us that though she had been long a mother, she was now childless, and, accordingly, she formed the bold resolution to adopt him as her son. The attendants of the princess crowded around her, to gaze upon the lovely face of the Hebrew child. His sister Miriam, who had been witnessing the scene from a little distance, came forward at this critical moment, and put the question, no doubt with a beating heart, "Shall I go and call to thee a nurse of the Hebrew women, that she may nurse the child for thee?" Exod. ii. 7. In the gracious providence of God, it turned out as she had wished: "And Pharaoh's daughter said to her, Go. And the maid went, and called the child's mother." Exod. ii. 8. It was enough. God had heard the prayers of this anxious family. Miriam ran to announce to her mother that their most ardent wishes, their most earnest prayers, had been fulfilled; and, without a moment's delay, the happy mother, with a heart bounding with gratitude to her covenant God, hastened to obey the call of the Egyptian princess. What must have been her feelings as she stood beside her rescued child, and listened to these joyful words from the mouth of Pharaoh's daughter: "And Pharaoh's daughter said unto her, Take this child away, and nurse it for me, and I will give thee thy wages. And the woman took the child, and nursed it." Exod. ii. 9. She accepts the task; and often, doubtless, as she nursed her beautiful babe, did she look back upon the danger from which he had been rescued, and forward to the honour which yet awaited him. At what age he passed from his mother's care to the court of Pharaoh we are not informed; but it evidently appears from his history, that he had lived long enough under his parents' roof to acquire an intimate acquaintance with the principles of the faith of his fathers. It is generally supposed that Thermuthis secretly designed Moses to be the heir of her father's throne, and, with this view, the utmost attention was paid to his education. Stephen tells us, Acts vii. 22, that he was "learned in all the wisdom of the Egyptians, and was mighty in words and in deeds." Scripture is silent as to the active employments of Moses up to his fortieth year; but if we may credit Josephus and the Jewish traditions, Moses distinguished himself by the victories which he gained as leader of the Egyptian armies in an expedition against the Ethiopians. Stephen informs us that when Moses was "full forty years old, it came into his heart to visit his brethren the children of Israel." The Old Testament narrative says, "He went out unto his brethren, and looked on their burdens." The Apostle Paul leaves us in no doubt as to the motives of Moses on this occasion: "By faith Moses, when he was come to years, refused to be called the son of Pharaoh's daughter; choosing rather to suffer affliction with the people of God, than to enjoy the pleasures of sin for a season; esteeming the reproach of Christ greater riches than the treasures in Egypt: for he had respect unto the recompense of the reward." Heb. xi. 24-26. The resolution of Moses was taken; worldly advantages he cheerfully renounced, and, influenced by that faith which overcometh the world, he went forth to visit his brethren. He saw the heartless oppression to which they were subjected, and he longed for an opportunity of publicly avowing his resolution to espouse their cause. Nor was he long without an opportunity; for we are told that he spied an Egyptian smiting a Hebrew, one of his brethren. It was probably a cruel taskmaster who was chastising a poor Hebrew slave with such severity that his life was obviously in danger. Moses, however, interposed in behalf of the injured Hebrew; and so hot was the contest that ensued, that Moses found it necessary to slay the Egyptian; and he hid his body in the sand. This incident came to the ears of Pharaoh; and Moses, to escape the wrath of the king, took refuge in Midian, where he remained for forty years, until the Lord was pleased specially to call him forth, that he might conduct the Israelites from the land of their cruel bondage.

It would extend this article too far to dwell upon the numerous acts of Moses as the leader and legislator of the Israelites in the wilderness. That he was an inspired and divinely-appointed ambassador of God might be argued from the miracles which he wrought, from the institutions which he established, and from the predictions which he uttered; but we are not left to the mere deductions of reason on this point, for the divine authority of Moses is expressly asserted by the Son of God himself. Thus Luke xvi. 29, 31, "Abraham saith unto him, They have Moses and the prophets; let them hear them. And he said unto him, If they hear not Moses and the prophets, neither will they be persuaded though one rose from the dead." John v. 46, "For had ye believed Moses, ye would have believed me; for he wrote of me." After Moses had conducted the Israelites to the borders of Canaan, he was not permitted himself to enter it; but having been privileged to behold the land from the top of Mount Abarim or Nebo, he expired there. The place of his burial was not known to the Israelites; probably to prevent them from idolatrous worship of the remains, or, it may be, of the sepulchre. Besides the Pentateuch, Moses is considered as the author of the 90th Psalm; which, indeed, bears his name. Several apocryphal books have been ascribed to Moses, and some of the Fathers have even ascribed to him the authorship of the Book of Job.

MOSES, BOOKS OF. See PENTATEUCH.

MOSQUE (Arab. Mesjed), a temple or place of religious worship among the Mohammedans. All mosques are square buildings, generally constructed of stone. Before the chief gate there is a square court paved with white marble, and low galleries round it, whose roof is supported by marble pillars. In these galleries the Turks wash themselves before they go into the mosque. In each mosque there is a great number of lamps; and between these hang many crystal rings, ostrich eggs, and other curiosities, which, when the lamps are lighted, make a fine show. As it is not lawful to enter the mosque with stockings or shoes on, the pavements are covered with pieces of stuff sewed together, each being wide enough to hold a row of men kneeling, sitting, or prostrate. The women are not allowed to enter the mosque, but stay in the porches without. About every mosque there are six high towers, called minarets, each of which has three little open galleries, one above another; these towers, as well as the mosques, are covered with lead, and adorned with gilding and other ornaments: and from thence, instead of a bell, the people are called to prayers by certain officers appointed for that purpose. Most of the mosques have a kind of hospital, in which travellers of what religion soever are entertained three days. Each mosque has also a place called tarbe, which is the burying-place of its founders; within which is a tomb six or seven feet long, covered with green velvet or satin; at the ends of which are two tapers, and round it several seats for those who read the Koran, and pray for the souls of the deceased.

MOTE. Small faults and errors discovered in others through the magnifying medium of prejudice, are compared by our Lord to motes in the eye, which the censorious only are proud of detecting. Matt. vii. 1-5. The word rendered by our translators "mote," has been translated by Robinson and Wahl a "twig." It rather seems to denote a splinter or chip of wood. Doddridge very unwarrantably regards both the "mote" and the "beam" as names of diseases of the eye. See EYE—JUDGING.

MOTH (oish, Job iv. 19, and oshsh, Job xiii. 28, xxvii. 18; Ps. vi. 7, xxxi. 9, 10, xxxix. 11; Isa. l. 9; Hos. v. 12). The allusions to this insect in the Sacred Writings are very striking: "Lay not up for yourselves treasures upon earth, where moth and rust doth corrupt, and where thieves break through and steal." Matt. vi. 19. The same idea seems to be conveyed under this allusion, in several other texts of Scripture: "Lo, they all shall wax old as doth a garment; the moth shall eat them up." Isa. l. 9. "Fear ye not the reproach of men, neither be ye afraid of their revilings. For the moth shall eat them up like a garment, and the worm shall eat them like wool." Isa. li. 7, 8. They shall perish with as little noise as a garment under the tooth of a moth. "The young moth or moth-worm," says the Abbé Pluche, "upon leaving the egg which a papilio had lodged upon a piece of stuff commodious for her purpose, finds a proper place of residence, grows and feeds upon the nap, and likewise builds with it an apartment, which is fixed to the ground-work of the stuff with several cords and a little glue. From an aperture in this habitation, the mothworm devours and demolishes all about him; and, when he has cleared the place, he draws out all the fastenings of his tent; after which he carries it to some little distance, and then fixes it with the slender cords in a new situation. In this manner he continues to live at our expense, till he is satisfied with his food, at which period he is first transformed into the nympha, and then changed into the papilio." In Job iv. 18, 19, there is an allusion to the moth as follows: "Behold, he put no trust in his servants; and his angels he charged with folly: how much less in them that dwell in houses of clay, whose foundation is in the dust, which are crushed before the moth?" Niebuhr supposes that this passage refers to a disease common in Arabia, arising from an attack of the moth-worm. The following ingenious explanation, however, appears, on the whole, more satisfactory. It is given by the Rev. Dr. Jamieson: "In Arabia, the common houses are, for the most part, no better than thatched huts, their walls being composed of clay, dried and whitened in the sun; and though, with the view of giving them a little more thickness and stability, there is also added sometimes an internal framework of reeds, they are still, after all, but very fragile and unsubstantial fabrics; the more so, that, owing to the light character of the soil in that land, a solid substratum of rock or earth can nowhere be found, and the dwellings almost universally 'have their foundation in the dust,' or sand. In serene and settled weather, these ephemeral structures do well enough, and serve all the purposes of the natives; but amid the sudden and violent changes to which their climate is subject, when the face of the country is swept by the furious gusts of the tornado, or by the immense columns of moving sand that shift from place to place, these slight edifices are often overwhelmed, and their walls dashed down with resistless force to the ground. The owners, if they do not consult their safety by timely flight, are buried in the ruins, and everything that has life is 'crushed' to death along with them. The only creature that has a chance of escape is the moth-worm, which, from its diminutive size, and the soft yielding nature of the stuffs in which it makes its bed, has frequently, on excavating the flattened furniture, when the storm has ceased, been found surviving the human inmates of the dwelling. This well known fact gives a beautiful and striking propriety to the expression 'They are crushed before the moth.'

MOTHER. God has declared in almost every part of his living creation, that the mother for a certain time is the natural protector of her offspring. To woman he has been particularly emphatic, by implanting in her affections which are rarely subdued, and by giving her an organization most wonderfully fitted for the exercise of her best and most enviable feelings.

There is nothing, indeed, more worthy of admiration than that powerful sentiment, at once so mild and so tender, which unites the mother to her child; and which as it were makes but one existence of two individuals, so different in age, and apparently in necessities. Children would perish, and with them the whole human race would be extinct, did not woman take an active and continual care of them, did she not consecrate to them every moment, did she not sacrifice to them her whole life, health, youth, beauty, ease—everything.

What wonder, then, that this vivid sentiment should be so often alluded to in the Sacred Volume, to illustrate the love of God to his people, and of Christian ministers to the souls of men? See particularly those exquisite passages, Isa. xlix. 15; 1 Cor. iii. 2; Gal. iv. 19, 20; 1 Thess. ii. 7, 8. The attachment of children to their mother is often alluded to in Scripture. Thus, Judg. viii. 19: "And he said, They were my brethren, even the sons of my mother: as the Lord liveth, if ye had saved them alive, I would not slay you." And to describe the most intense grief, the Psalmist says (Ps. xxxv. 14): "I behaved myself as though he had been my friend or brother: I bowed down heavily, as one that mourneth for his mother." An Oriental will take little notice of an insult offered to his father, but he will instantly, on a single word spoken to the disadvantage of his mother. To abuse one's mother is a favourite species of indignity in the East. Hence Saul, in rage at his son Jonathan, for maintaining intercourse with David, calls him "The son of the perverse rebellious woman."

Mother is sometimes used, also, for a metropolis, the capital city of a country, or of a tribe; and sometimes for a whole people. 2 Sam. xx. 19; Isa. l. 1; Gal. iv. 26; Rev. xvii. 5.

"A mother in Israel" signifies a woman whom

God uses to cherish or deliver his people. This name is given to Deborah. Judg. v. 7. Wisdom, in the Apocrypha, calls herself the mother of chaste love. The earth, to which at our death we must all return, is called the mother of all men. Job has a still stronger image. Job xvii. 14.

MOTIVE, that which moves, excites, or invites the mind to volition. It may be one thing singly, or many things conjunctly. It may be adequate or inadequate, strong or weak. It may also be internal or external. Internal motives, or such as arise from the affections, are again distinguishable into pure and impure. See MORAL AGENCY—WILL.

MOTIVITY, the capacity of being influenced by motives; moral agency. See MORAL AGENCY.

MOULDY. It is said of the Gibeonites, Josh. ix. 5: "All the bread of their provisions was dry and mouldy." Gesenius thinks that instead of "mouldy," we should read, "had fallen into crumbs."

MOUNT. In besieging a city, it was not unusual to raise a mount higher than the walls of the besieged place. The pile consisted of all sorts of materials, as earth, wood, boughs, stones; and from the top they poured shot into the city. To this contrivance Habakkuk (i. 10.) probably alludes: "And they shall scoff at the kings, and the princes shall be a scorn unto them: they shall deride every strong hold: for they shall heap dust, and take it." Movable towers of wood were usually placed upon the top of the mount. These were formed into several storeys capable of carrying soldiers and several kinds of engines. Isaiah (xxix. 3) threatens Jerusalem with these modes of attack: "And I will camp against thee round about, and will lay siege against thee with a mount, and I will raise forts against thee." The prophet Ezekiel (iv. 1, 2) also speaks in similar language: "Thou also, son of man, take thee a tile, and lay it before thee, and portray upon it the city, even Jerusalem: and lay siege against it, and build a fort against it, and cast a mount against it; set the camp also against it, and set battering rams against it round about."

MOUNTAIN. In Palestine hills and mountains are so abundant, that it is scarcely to be wondered at that there are very frequent allusions to such eminences in the sacred writings. Throughout Scripture we find the summits of mountains often selected by Jehovah as the scene of his remarkable manifestations. It was on the top of Sinai that the Law was given; it was on Horeb that Moses beheld the miraculous vision of the bush burning but not consumed; it was on Mount Sion that the Temple stood, where Jehovah was wont more especially to display his glory; it was on a mountain Christ openly promulgated the principles of his kingdom; on Calvary he was crucified, and from Olivet he ascended to glory. The mountains of Palestine were remarkably fruitful. Hence the language of Moses in describing them:—"He made him ride on the high places of the earth, that he might eat the increase of the fields; and he made him to suck honey out of the rock, and oil out of the flinty rock." Deut. xxxii. 13.

MOUNTAIN-MEN. See SYNOD, REFORMED PRESBYTERIAN.

MOURNING, sorrow, grief. See SORROW.

MOURNING, a particular dress or habit, worn to signify grief on some melancholy occasion, particularly the death of friends, or of great public characters. The modes of mourning are various in various countries, as also are the colours that obtain for that end. In Europe, the ordinary colour for mourning is black; in China, it is white; in Turkey, blue or violet; in Egypt, yellow; in Ethiopia, brown. Each people pretend to have their reasons for the particular colour of their mourning. White is supposed to denote purity; yellow, that death is the end of human hopes, as leaves when they fall, and flowers when they fade, become yellow; brown, denotes the earth, whither the dead return; black, the privation of life, as being the privation of light; blue, expresses the happiness which it is hoped the deceased enjoys; and purple or violet, sorrow on the one side, and hope on the other, as being a mixture of black and blue. For an account of the mourning of the Hebrews, see Lev. xix. 27, 28, xxi. 1-5, 10-12; Jer. xvi. 6; Numb. xx. 29; Deut. xxxiv. 8. (See BURIAL—DEAD.) In Gen. xxiii. 2, it is said: "And Sarah died in Kirjath-arba; the same is Hebron in the land of Canaan: and Abraham came to mourn for Sarah, and to weep for her." In what sense Abraham is said to have "come" to mourn for Sarah is not clear. Harmer thinks, that, according to a custom among the Syrians and Greeks, of mourning at the door within which a dead body lay, the patriarch came from his own tent to sit mourning on the ground at the door of Sarah's, which was distinct from his own. But it is quite possible that Abraham may have been absent from Hebron when Sarah died, and that he may have hastened home on receiving the melancholy intelligence. Mourners in the East divested themselves of all ornaments, and laid aside their jewels, gold, and everything rich or splendid in their dress. Thus God requires his offending people in the wilderness to show their humiliation. Exod. xxxiii. 5, 6. In Judea, the mourner was clothed in sackcloth of hair. Nay, signs of mourning were extended to domestic animals. Thus Jonah (iii. 6-8): "For word came unto the king of Nineveh, and he arose from his throne, and he laid his robe from him, and covered him with sackcloth, and sat in ashes. And he caused it to be proclaimed and published through Nineveh by the decree of the king and his nobles, saying, Let neither man nor beast, herd nor flock, taste anything: let them not feed, nor drink water: but let man and beast be covered with sackcloth, and cry mightily unto God: yea, let them turn every one from his evil way, and from the violence that is in their hands." The Oriental mourner was distinguished by the slovenliness of his dress. The hair of his head was allowed to grow; he neither trimmed his beard nor washed his feet, even in the hottest weather; during the whole time he refused to change his clothes. Hence it is said of David, after his child was dead: "Then David arose from the earth, and washed and anointed himself, and changed his apparel." The time of mourning varies according to the dignity of the deceased. The Egyptians mourned for Jacob seventy days. Among the modern Jews, the usual time is seven days, during which they remain shut up in their houses, or if they are obliged to appear in public, it is without shoes.

MOURNING WOMEN. See BURIAL.

MOUSE (Heb. achbar, in Chaldee acalbar, probably the same with the aliarbui of the Arabians, or the jerboa, described by Bruce. Lev. xi. 29; 1 Sam. vi. 4, 5, 11, 18; Isa. xlv. 17). Moses pronounces the mouse to be unclean in Lev. xi. 29. There is some difficulty in identifying the animal so spoken of in Scripture. Some think it to be the Jerboa or Dipus Sagitta, an animal which abounds in Syria and Palestine as well as in Egypt. The habits, and even in some respects the appearance, of Jerboas resemble squirrels; and accordingly, from their leaping upon their hind legs, they are termed by Pliny and Ælian, "mice walking on two legs." We are informed in 1 Sam. vi. 5, that on the return of the ark of the Lord, the Philistines offered as a trespass-offering five golden emerods and five golden mice, according to the number of the lords of the Philistines. It was customary in ancient, and the practice still prevails in heathen nations, of presenting to the gods an image representing the disease with which they have been visited, or the plague which has infested their land.

MOUTH. Eastern females show their respect for persons of high rank by gently lifting their hand to their mouth. In this way the ancient idolaters worshipped their unseen deities. Hence the remark of Job (xxx. 26-28): "If I beheld the sun when it shined, or the moon walking in brightness; and my heart hath been secretly enticed, or my mouth hath kissed my hand: this also were an iniquity to be punished by the judge: for I should have denied the God that is above." There is a curious custom in some parts of the East, that to reward a courtier or recompense any one who has done a service to a prince or great man, his mouth is filled with sweetmeats or with gold coins, as many as it will contain. To this custom, probably, David alludes, when he says, Ps. ciii. 5, "Who satisfieth thy mouth with good things;" and Ps. lxxxi. 10: "I am the Lord thy God, which brought thee out of the land of Egypt: open thy mouth wide, and I will fill it." When almighty power is to be expressed in Scripture language, the breath of the mouth is said to accomplish some difficult work. Thus the Man of Sin is said to be consumed with the breath of the Lord's mouth; and Isaiah (xi. 4) says of the Messiah, "He shall smite the earth with the rod of his mouth, and with the breath of his lips shall he slay the wicked." These expressions denote his sovereign authority and absolute power, and that it requires only one breath to destroy his enemies, perhaps by his judicial sentence.

MOWER. In Ps. exxix. 7, it is said in reference to the wicked: "Wherewith the mower filleth not his hand; nor he that bindeth sheaves his bosom." The sickle was used in Palestine and Syria in cutting down the crops: and, according to the existing custom, the reapers fill their hand with the corn, and those who bind up the sheaves their bosom. The mowing of grass is mentioned in Ps. lxxii. 6, "He shall come down like rain upon the mown grass."

MUFFLERS. These are mentioned in Isa. iii. 19, among the different parts of an Oriental lady's dress. Gesenius thinks that they are veils which hang down with a trembling motion, and hence their name rialoth, from the Arabic raal, to tremble.

MUFTI, the chief of the ecclesiastical order, or primate of the Mussulman religion. The authority of the mufti is very great in the Ottoman empire; for even the sultan himself, if he will preserve any appearance of religion, cannot, without first hearing his opinion, put any person to death, or so much as inflict any corporal punishment. In all actions, and especially criminal ones, his opinion is required, by giving him a writing in which the case is stated under feigned names, which he subscribes with the words Olur, or Olmaz; that is, he shall, or shall not be punished.

MULBERRY TREE (baca, 2 Sam. v. 23, 24;

1 Chron. xiv. 14, 15; Ps. lxxxiv. 6). The Seventy, in Chronicles, render the word by apiōn, "pear trees;" so Aquila and the Vulgate, both in Samuel and Chronicles, "pyrorum." Others translate it the "mulberry tree." More probably it is the large shrub which the Arabs still call "bacca;" and which gave name to the valley where it abounded. Of this valley Celsius remarks, that it was "rugged and embarrassed with bushes and stones, which could not be passed through without labour and tears;" referring to Ps. lxxxiv. 6, and the "rough valley" (Deut. xxi. 4); and he quotes from a manuscript of Abu'l Fideli, a description of the tree which grew there, and mentions it as bearing a fruit of an acrid taste. The passage in 2 Sam. v. 23, 24, Dr. Harris thinks should read, "When thou hearest a noise as of many people marching, upon the hills of Bochim, then fall immediately upon the enemy." The white mulberry (Marus alba), was anciently much cultivated in Syria and Lebanon. In the present day, this tree is a principal source of wealth to the Druses and Maronites, by the quantities of silk it enables them to produce. See BACA.

MULE, the offspring of two animals of different species, as a horse and an ass. There is no probability that the Jews bred mules, because it was forbidden to couple creatures of different species. Lev. xix. 19. But they were not forbidden to use them. Thus we may observe, especially after David's time, that mules were common among the Hebrews; formerly they used only male and female asses. 2 Sam. xiii. 29, xviii. 9; 1 Kings i. 33, 38, 44, x. 25, xviii. 5. Some have thought that Anah, son of Zibeon, of the posterity of Seir, being in the desert, found out the manner of breeding mules. This opinion was much espoused by the ancients. But Jerome, who notices it in his Hebraical questions on Genesis, translates, "that Anah found hot springs." The Syriac says, a fountain; but rather it signifies a people whom Anah surprised and defeated. See ANAH.

MUNITIONS. The prophet Isaiah (xxxiii. 16), thus describes the blessedness of the righteous: "He shall dwell on high: his place of defence shall be the munitions of rocks: bread shall be given him; his waters shall be sure." The word "munition" probably refers to a castle built upon a rock, perhaps to those natural fortresses which abounded so much in the mountainous regions of the East, and which were often resorted to for shelter.

MURDER, the act of wilfully and feloniously killing a person upon malice or forethought. (See LAW.)

Heart murder is the secret wishing or designing the death of any man; yea, the Scripture saith, "Whosoever hateth his brother is a murderer." 1 John iii. 15. We have instances of this kind of murder in Ahab (1 Kings xxii. 9), Jezebel (1 Kings xix. 2), the Jews (Mark xi. 18), David (1 Sam. xxv. 21, 22), Jonah (iv. 1-4).

Murder is contrary to the authority of God, the sovereign disposer of life (Deut. xxxii. 39); to the goodness of God, who gives it (Job x. 12); to the law of nature (Acts xvi. 28); to the love a man owes to himself, his neighbour, and society at large. Not but that life may be taken away, as in lawful war (1 Chron. v. 22); by the hand of the civil magistrate for capital crimes (Deut. xvii. 8, 10); and in self-defence. (See SELF-DEFENCE.)

According to the divine law, murder is to be punished with death. Gen. ix. 6; Deut. xix. 11, 12;

1 Kings ii. 28, 29. It is remarkable that God often gives up murderers to the terrors of a guilty conscience. Gen. iv. 13-15, 23, 24. Such are followed with many instances of divine vengeance (2 Sam. xii. 9, 10); their lives are often shortened (Ps. lv. 23); and judgments for their sin are oftentimes transmitted to posterity. Gen. xlix. 7; 2 Sam. xxi. 1.

Homicide or manslaughter was carefully distinguished by Moses from actual premeditated murder. For the protection of unintentional menslayers, Moses ordained six cities, three on each side Jordan, "so situated," says Dr Jamieson, "as to be easily reached from every part of Judea by plain and well-kept roads, within the walls of which every one who took refuge was secure beyond the reach of harm. But the great superiority of the Mosaic statute consisted in this—that the fugitive to these free cities was screened in the meantime only from the impetuous vengeance of the blood-avenger, and was, after a time, brought out to establish, by a calm and impartial investigation, his innocence or guilt; the law thus happily consulting the interests of humanity, while, at the same time, it provided for the ends of justice. In a densely peopled country like that of Judea, cases of unintentional homicide would be frequently occurring; and one can easily imagine the breathless haste with which, on the occurrence of such a fatal event, the unhappy man would remove to a distance from the spot; and how he would strain every nerve, especially if the avenger of blood were at his heels, to get within reach of the nearest sanctuary. The impetuous flight of a defenceless person, pursued by an enemy with sword in hand, the prodigious exertions he would make to keep at a safe distance before him, and the ecstasy with which he would grasp the wall, the gate, the first stone of the privileged city, are embodied in that striking metaphor of the apostle to the Hebrews, where he is describing believers in Christ 'as those who have fled for refuge to the hope set before them in the Gospel.'" Such was the abhorrence in which the crime of murder was held by the Jews, and such their dread of God's vengeance on its account, that when a dead body was found in the fields, and the murderer was unknown, the distance was appointed to be measured to the nearest city, and the elders and judges of that city were commanded to go through a striking ceremony, which is minutely described in Deut. xxi. 1-8, and by which they were to declare themselves innocent of the crime.

MURRAIN. One of the plagues of Egypt is thus described: "Behold, the hand of the Lord is upon thy cattle which is in the field, upon the horses, upon the asses, upon the camels, upon the oxen, and upon the sheep: there shall be a very grievous murrain." Exod. ix. 3. What was the precise nature of the disease here mentioned it is impossible to say, as the Egyptians, who have been in all ages famed for the cure of diseases in animals, were completely baffled in this instance. It is said that a murrain or pestilential disease among cattle breaks out from time to time in Egypt with so much severity, that they are compelled to send to Syria or the islands of the Archipelago for a new supply, particularly of oxen.

MUSIC. Musical instruments are so frequently mentioned in Scripture, that an inquiry into their nature could scarcely fail to be interesting, even though their use had formed no part of a divinely instituted service. Of course, a much higher interest ought to be excited when we remember that the music of the temple and tabernacle was appointed and arranged by men acting under the inspiration of Heaven. Believing, therefore, that what the Holy Spirit saw meet to reveal can never be undeserving of a Christian's examination, we propose shortly to exhibit the nature and use of the instruments employed in the public worship of the Jews, in an admirable sketch from the pen of the Rev. Mr Brodie of Monimail.

Though frequently spoken of in Scripture, there is no description given of their form or power. In like manner we may observe, that Greek and Roman authors, though often referring to the instruments with which they were familiar, either give no account of their nature, or supply us with such brief and imperfect statements respecting them, that if we depended upon books alone, the task we have undertaken would be altogether hopeless. Recent researches in Egypt, however, have thrown much light, not only on the antiquities of that country, but also on those of Judea; and to them we shall refer in endeavouring to illustrate the subject before us.

The ancient Egyptians expended immense labour and wealth in erecting temples to their gods, and in building and excavating tombs in honour of their departed friends. The pyramids, for instance, that still remain the wonder of the world, uninjured by the lapse of centuries, seem to have been intended as sepulchral monuments. These temples and tombs, more especially those which have been hewn out of the rock, are adorned with a prodigious number of drawings, representing the arts and customs that prevailed at the time when they were executed. They, in fact, give such full and accurate delineations, that we may be said to know more of the manners that prevailed in Egypt three thousand years ago, than we do of the customs of our own forefathers a few centuries back. Many of these tombs are proved, by the hieroglyphics on their walls, and by other circumstances, to be at least as old as the time of Moses; and some of them, there is every reason to believe, were finished long before: yet such is the dryness of the soil and climate, that the lines of the drawings are as distinct, and the colours as vivid, as when they were first put on!

Among the pictures, or rather sketches, adorning the tombs, a great variety of musical instruments are represented; and it deserves remark, that these instruments seem to have undergone no change of form during the whole period that the Pharaohs reigned; those that are delineated in the most ancient tombs being in every respect as complete as those found in the more recent excavations. The same uniformity characterises all their arts and customs, arising from the law of the land, which forbade any departure from the usages of their forefathers.

Being thus acquainted with the instruments in use among the ancient Egyptians, we are supplied with the means of ascertaining the nature of those employed by the Jews; for we cannot doubt that, during a sojourn of four hundred years, they would imitate the arts and implements in constant use among the people of the land in which they dwelt. We know, indeed, that they showed a desire to adopt the practices of their heathen neighbours, not only with regard to things indifferent, but even in their religious rites and ceremonies, though expressly forbidden by God. It is very probable, moreover, that a variety of the finer and more valuable instruments would be among the precious things that they 'borrowed of the Egyptians' before their departure. We cannot, therefore, be far mistaken in considering the instruments ordinarily in use in Egypt to have been essentially the same as those employed by the Israelites previous to the time of David.

The harp, of which the lyre is merely a smaller variety, may be considered as including all those instruments in which diversity of tone is produced by striking strings of unequal lengths. Among the Egyptians, harps were made of all sizes, from a few inches to six or seven feet in length, and of a great variety of forms. Some large ones, highly ornamented, are represented as having upwards of twenty chords; many of the smaller have but four or five. In groups of musicians, we generally find one harper at the least, and not unfrequently it would seem that the larger and smaller varieties of harps were used together, the one forming an accompaniment to the other. With the people of Israel the harp appears to have been a peculiar favourite. The first mention made of it in Scripture is in Gen. iv. 21, where its invention is ascribed to Jubal; but the passages in which it is referred to are almost innumerable. As there is no instrument that forms a finer accompaniment to the human voice, it was very extensively employed in the religious worship of the Jews, and is spoken of in the Book of Revelation as similarly employed by the redeemed in the latter day, when they shall stand with the Lamb in Mount Zion, and sing 'a new song before the throne.'

The nebel, which is generally translated psaltery, though rendered viol in Isaiah and Amos, is the only other stringed instrument spoken of in Scripture previous to the time of David. It seems to have been identical with the Egyptian guitar, which was perhaps even more commonly used than the harp. It may be considered as the type or representative of all those contrivances in which diversity of tone is produced by pressing the strings to the neck of the instrument, and thus making them in effect both tighter and shorter. The guitar of the ancient Egyptians was the same as that now in use, excepting that it had only three strings, none of which seems to have been of metal. It was played on in exactly the same manner as with us, the chords being struck with the finger. Like the harp, the psaltery was generally employed in the religious worship of the Israelites. Josephus says that 'it had twelve musical notes, and was played on with the fingers.'

Besides the psaltery, Josephus describes a viol, which he says had 'ten strings, and was played upon with a bow.' The use of the bow in bringing out the sound distinguishes it from the guitar, which it otherwise resembled. The number of the strings must have made it very difficult to manage; unless, as in the modern piano, they were arranged in pairs, in order to render the note more accurate and the tone more powerful. The ten-stringed instrument mentioned in the Book of Psalms, which is generally supposed to have been 'invented by David,' was probably the same as the viol described by the Jewish historian. It is spoken of, at least, in such a way as to induce the idea that it closely resembled the psaltery, as any one may perceive by referring to Psalms xxxiii., xcii., cxliv., where alone mention is made of it.

The pipe among the Jews was commonly used in the dance. Among the Egyptians it was similarly employed, and was sometimes made double, one branch being intended for the tenor and the other for the bass; generally, however, like our own, it was single. The flute, which is merely a larger variety, is mentioned in the Book of Daniel, and was longer than those now in use.

The trumpet, horn, and cornet, form a class by themselves; the tone depending on their size and form, as well as on the nature of the material employed in their formation. They are frequently pictured in Egyptian monuments, and in the temple-service of the Jews seem to have been employed in great number and variety.

The organ, of which the Pandian pipe is the simplest variety, may be described as a collection of tubes, varying in length and width of bore, and consequently emitting a diversity of notes when blown into by the musician. If the organ be the instrument denoted by the Hebrew word hoogab, it is mentioned in Gen. iv. 21, as invented by Jubal; it is again referred to in the Book of Job, and is enumerated, in the 150th Psalm, among the instruments employed in the praise of Jehovah. No similar contrivance seems to have been known to the Egyptians, and we have no means of ascertaining what improvements were made on it, in order to adapt it to the service of the sanctuary.

The cymbals were circular pieces of metal, more or less hollowed in the centre, and producing a sound by being struck together. The Egyptians made them of a small size, but Josephus says that those made by the Jews were 'broad and large instruments made of brass.' In Psalm cl. it is said, 'Praise him upon the loud cymbals: praise him upon the high-sounding cymbals.' This expression leads us to suppose that there must have been several varieties used. As there is no means by which any one pair of cymbals can be made to produce more than one note, it is probable that diversity of tone was effected by the employment of a number of instruments differing in size, which, however inconvenient in a limited band, could easily be accomplished when the performers were numbered by thousands, as was the case at the celebration of the passover and similar festivals.

The tabret, or timbrel, resembled the modern tambourine. Both among the Jews and the Egyptians it seems to have been most commonly played on by females, and was generally employed on festive occasions. Besides the tabret, we find, in the Egyptian tombs, representations of several varieties of the drum, an instrument similar in its principle and use.

In concluding our brief notice of the musical instruments of the Israelites, it may not be unnecessary to remark that, in the drawings on the tombs, the singers are generally represented as marking time by clapping their hands. This fact serves to illustrate the many allusions made to this practice in Scripture, and shows the force and propriety of various passages, which might at first seem incongruous and strange.

Whatever difference there may have been in construction and form, the instruments of the Israelites were the same in principle as those now employed. There is not, in fact, any one musical implement at present in use that has not its type or representative among those that we have enumerated. The ingenuity of modern mechanism has, no doubt, greatly increased the range and power of each separate instrument; the affixing of keys, for instance, to the organ, enables a single performer to produce a variety of notes, and a volume of sound, as great as ten could have done without that assistance; but any deficiency in their instruments was made up among the Jews by the number of performers. They could not, perhaps, attain to that rapidity and brilliancy of execution which enable modern musicians to supersede and dispense with vocal music at their concerts, but as accompaniments to the human voice their instruments were all that could be desired.

If any one be inclined to think lightly of the musical service of the temple, let him for a moment consider the nature of the implements used; let him recollect their number and variety; let him, above all, keep in mind that they were designed not to produce, but only to regulate, the harmony, and he will then find reason to alter his opinion. The magnificence of the other parts of the temple ritual required that the psalmody should be on a very extended scale; and that it was so, we may learn from the taunting proposal made to the captives in Babylon to sing to their masters 'one of the songs of Zion.' In I Chron. xv., we have an account of the method adopted by David for its improvement. To each family he assigned their peculiar instrument and part. Heman, Asaph, and Ethan were appointed to sound with cymbals of brass; Zechariah and his companions, with psalteries on Alamoth; Mattithiah and his associates, with harps on Sheminith; while Chenaniah, chief of the Levites, was for song. In the 23d chapter, we are told that four thousand of the Levites were stately employed in praising the Lord with the instruments that 'David made to praise therewith.' This seems to have been their daily and ordinary procedure. What, then, must have been the effect produced when the whole congregation of Israel assembled together to keep the feasts of the Lord, when the courts of the temple re-echoed the voices of five hundred thousand worshippers, and the sound of the trumpets, cymbals, and harps, powerful and numerous as they were, formed but a feeble accompaniment to the united voice of the people of the Lord!

MUSSULMAN. See ISLAMISM.

MUSTARD (sinapi—Matt. xiii. 32, xvii. 20; Mark iv. 31; Luke xiii. 19, xvii. 6), a well-known garden herb. Christ compares the kingdom of heaven to "a grain of mustard-seed, which a man took and sowed in the earth; which indeed," said he, "is the least of all seeds, but when it is grown, is the greatest among herbs, and becometh a tree, so that the birds of the air come and lodge in the branches thereof." Matt. xiii. 31, 32. "This expression will not appear strange," says Sir Thomas Browne, "if we recollect that the mustard-seed, though it be not simply and in itself the smallest of seeds, yet may be very well believed to be the smallest of such as are apt to grow into a ligneous substance, and become a kind of tree."

The expression, also, that it might grow into such dimensions that birds might lodge on its branches, may be literally conceived, if we allow the luxuriance of plants in India above our northern regions. And this appears also from what is recorded in the Jewish story, of a mustard tree that was to be climbed like a fig tree. The Talmud also mentions one whose branches were so extensive as to cover a tent. Without insisting on the accuracy of this, we may gather from it that we should not judge of Eastern vegetables by those that are familiar to ourselves. Scheuchzer describes a species of mustard which grows several feet high, with a tapering stalk, and spreads into many branches. Of this arborescent or tree-like vegetable he gives a print; and Linnæus mentions a species whose branches were real wood, which he names Sinapi erucoides.

But whatever kind of tree our Lord meant, it is clear, from the fact that he never takes his illustrations from any objects but such as were familiar, and often present in the scene around him, that he spoke of one which the Jews well knew to have minute seeds, and yet to be of so large growth as to afford shelter for the birds of the air.

MUTTER. This word occurs in Isa. viii. 19, where the prophet refers to the murmuring of soothsayers in uttering their spells or incantations. See DIVINATION—MAGICIAN.

MUZZLE. It is laid down in the law of Moses: "Thou shalt not muzzle the ox when he treadeth out the corn" (Deut. xxv. 4); a proverb quoted by the Apostle Paul to illustrate and enforce the claim which the ministers of the gospel have upon the adequate support of their people. Michaelis says, in speaking of this statute: "We must not think of our mode of threshing, but that used in the East, where the corn, being laid on the threshing-floor, is trodden out by oxen or asses, by threshing-wagons and threshing-planks, drawn over it by oxen. Here, then, Moses commands that no muzzle be put on the ox, but that he be allowed, as long as he is employed in threshing, to eat both the grain and the straw." This custom still prevails in the East.

MYRA, a city of Lycia, where Paul embarked in a ship of Alexandria, bound for Rome. It is still viewed by the Greeks as a place of peculiar sanctity and veneration.

MYRRH (mir—Exod. xxx. 23; Esther ii. 12; Ps. xlv. 8; Prov. vii. 17; Cant. i. 13, iii. 6, iv. 6, 14, v. 1, 5, 13; smurna—Eccles. xxiv. 15; Matt. ii. 11; Mark xv. 23; John xix. 39), a precious kind of gum, issuing by incision, and sometimes spontaneously, from the trunk and larger branches of a tree growing in Egypt, Arabia, and Abyssinia. Its taste is extremely bitter, but its smell, though strong, is not disagreeable; and among the ancients it entered into the composition of the most costly ointments. As a perfume, it appears to have been used to give a pleasant fragrance to vestments, and to be carried by females in little caskets in their bosoms. The magi, who came from the East to worship our Saviour at Bethlehem, made him a present of myrrh among other things. Matt. ii. 11.

In the Gospel (Mark xv. 23) is mentioned myrrh and wine, or wine mingled with myrrh, which was offered to Jesus, previous to his crucifixion, and intended to deaden in him the anguish of his sufferings. It was a custom among the Hebrews to give such kind of stupefying liquors to persons who were about to be capitally punished. Prov. xxxi. 6. Some have thought that the myrrhed wine of Mark is the same as the "wine mingled with gall" of Matthew; but others distinguish them. They suppose the myrrhed wine was given to our Lord from a sentiment of sympathy, to prevent him from feeling too sensibly the pain of his sufferings; while the potation, mingled with gall, of which he would not drink, was given from cruelty. Others, however, think that Matthew, writing in Syriac, used the word marra, which signifies either myrrh, bitterness, or gall; which the Greek translator took in the sense of gall, and Mark in the sense of myrrh. Wine mingled with myrrh was highly esteemed by the ancients.

MYRTLE (rush—Neh. viii. 15; Isa. xli. 19, lv. 13; Zech. i. 8–11), a shrub, sometimes growing to a small tree, very common in Judea. It has a hard woody root, that sends forth a great number of small flexible branches, furnished with leaves like those of box, but much less, and more pointed: they are soft to the touch, shining, smooth, of a beautiful green, and have a sweet smell. The flowers grow among the leaves, and consist of five white petals disposed in the form of a rose; they have an agreeable perfume, and ornamental appearance.

Savary, describing a scene at the end of the forest of Platanea, says: "Myrtles, intermixed with laurel roses, grow in the valleys to the height of ten feet. Their snow-white flowers, bordered with a purple edging, appear to peculiar advantage under the verdant foliage. Each myrtle is loaded with them, and they emit perfumes more exquisite than those of the rose itself. They enchant every one, and the soul is filled with the softest sensations."

The myrtle is mentioned in Scripture among lofty trees, not as comparing with them in size, but as contributing with them to the beauty and richness of the scenery. Thus Isaiah (xli. 19), intending to describe a scene of varied excellence: "I will plant in the wilderness the cedar, and the shittah tree, and the myrtle, and the oil tree;" that is, I will adorn the dreary and barren waste with trees famed for their stature and the grandeur of their appearance, the beauty of their form, and also the fragrance of their odour. The apocryphal Baruch (v. 8), speaking of the return from Babylon, expresses the protection afforded by God to the people by the same image: "Even the woods and every sweet-smelling tree shall overshadow Israel, by the commandment of God."

MYSIA, a small province in Asia Minor, mentioned in Acts xvi. 7, 8. It was visited by the apostle Paul in the course of his journey through Asia Minor, and there he was commissioned to pass over into Macedonia. The ancient city of Troy was situated in this province, and Pergamos, now called Bergamo, was its capital, which formed the site of one of the seven churches of Asia. When conquered by the Romans, it became a province of the empire, under the name of Hellespontus.

MYSTERY, secret, a wonder (from muco to stoma, to shut the mouth). It is taken—(1.) For a truth revealed by God which we could not have discovered without revelation; such as the call to the Gentiles (Eph. i. 9), the transforming of some without dying, &c. 1 Cor. xv. 51. (2.) The word is also used in reference to things which remain in part incomprehensible after they are revealed; such as the incarnation of Christ, the resurrection of the dead, &c. 1 Tim. iii. 9. Some critics, however, observe, that the word, in the Scripture, does not usually import what is incapable in its own nature of being understood by man, but barely a secret; anything not disclosed or published to the world. Eph. i. 9, iii. 3–12; 1 Cor. xiii. 1–3.

MYSTERIES, a term used to denote the secret rites of the pagan superstition, which were carefully concealed from the knowledge of the vulgar. The learned Bishop Warburton supposed that the mysteries of the pagan religion were the invention of legislators and other great personages, whom fortune or their own merit had placed at the head of those civil societies which were formed in the earliest ages in different parts of the world.

Mosheim was of opinion that the mysteries were entirely commemorative; that they were instituted with a view to preserve the remembrance of heroes and great men, who had been deified in consideration of their martial exploits, useful inventions, public virtues, and especially in consequence of the benefits conferred by them on their contemporaries.

Others, however, suppose that the mysteries were the offspring of bigotry and priestcraft, and that they originated in Egypt, the native land of idolatry. In that country, the priesthood ruled predominant. The kings were ingrafted into their body before they could ascend the throne. They were possessed of a third part of the land of all Egypt. The sacerdotal function was confined to one tribe, and was transmitted from father to son. All the Orientals, but more especially the Egyptians, delighted in mysterious and allegorical doctrines. Every maxim of morality, every tenet of theology, every dogma of philosophy, was wrapt up in a veil of allegory and mysticism. This propensity, no doubt, conspired with avarice and ambition to dispose them to a dark and mysterious system of religion. Besides, the Egyptians were a gloomy race of men; they delighted in darkness and solitude. Their sacred rites were generally celebrated with melancholy airs, weeping, and lamentation. This gloomy and unsocial bias of mind must have stimulated them to a congenial mode of worship.

MYTHOLOGY, in its original import, signifies any kind of fabulous doctrine. In its more appropriate sense, it means those fabulous details concerning the objects of worship, which were invented and propagated by men who lived in the early ages of the world, and by them transmitted to succeeding generations, either by written records, or by oral tradition. See HEATHEN—PAGANISM.

N.

NAAMAI, daughter of Lamech and Zillah, and sister of Tubal-cain (Gen. iv. 22), who is believed to have found out the art of spinning wool, and of making or enriching cloth and stuffs. This was also the name of a city in the tribe of Judah, mentioned in Josh. xv. 41.

NAAMAN, a general in the army of Ben-hadad king of Syria, who, being afflicted with a leprosy, was cured by bathing seven times in the Jordan, agreeably to the command of Elisha the prophet. 2 Kings v.; Lev. xiv. 7-32. See LEPROSY—ABANA.

The prophet having refused to receive a present which Naaman offered him, the Syrian requested permission to carry home two mules' burden of the earth of Canaan, declaring his resolution henceforth to worship only the God of Israel. Perhaps he wished to build an altar in Syria in accordance with the precept in Exod. xx. 24, "An altar of earth shalt thou make unto me." The request which Naaman makes to the prophet seems strange, as we find it recorded in 2 Kings v. 18, "In this thing the Lord pardon thy servant, that when my master goeth into the house of Rimmon to worship there, and he leaneth on my hand, and I bow myself in the house of Rimmon: when I bow down myself in the house of Rimmon, the Lord pardon thy servant in this thing." This passage has given rise to much discussion among commentators, and more especially as the act would seem not to be disapproved by Elisha, who answers, "Go in peace." Some, among whom is Dr Lightfoot, consider Naaman as asking forgiveness for a past transgression, not for what he should continue to do; and this explanation is sanctioned by the words in the Hebrew original. What became of Naaman after he returned to Syria, whether he was dismissed from the service of Ben-hadad for refusing to worship Rimmon, we are not informed, but his name does not occur, at all events, in the account of the wars which followed between Syria and Israel.

NAAMATHITE, an inhabitant of NAAMAH (which see). One of Job's friends is called Zophar the Naamathite. Job ii. 11.

NABATHEANS, the ancient inhabitants of a country extending from the Euphrates to the land of Edom. They were Arabians, descended from Ishmael. In the wars between the Jews and the Syrians, in the times of the Maccabees, the Nabatheans were the only neighbouring people who befriended the Jews.

NABONASSAR, a king of Babylon, the same as Baladan. See BABYLON.

NABOPOLASSAR, the father of Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon. He commanded the army of Sarcus, king of Assyria, and having entered into an alliance with Astyages, king of the Medes, he obtained for his son Nebuchadnezzar the daughter of Astyages in marriage. This alliance led to the destruction of the Assyrian monarchy, and the erection on its ruins of the twofold kingdom of the Medes, under Astyages, and the Chaldeans, under Nabopolassar. See ASSYRIA—BABYLON.

NABOTH, an Israelite belonging to the city of Jezreel, who was the proprietor of a fruitful vineyard lying contiguous to the palace of Ahab the king, who coveted it, and would have bought it from Naboth, but was refused. Jezebel the queen, being an unprincipled woman, was resolved, at whatever cost, to procure the vineyard for Ahab. She set herself accordingly by stratagem to effect her purpose. Having raised a false accusation against Naboth, she got him condemned and put to death; so that there was no obstacle to the king appropriating the coveted possession, Naboth's property being forfeited to the crown. See AHAH.

NABUCHODONOSOR. See ASSYRIA.

NACHON, or the prepared floor, was the name of a threshing-floor mentioned in 2 Sam. vi. 6, as the place where Uzzah was visited with immediate death for stretching forth his hand irreverently to touch the ark. The precise situation of this spot cannot be ascertained, although it was probably either in Jerusalem or near it.

NAHASH, mentioned in 2 Sam. xvii. 25 as the father of Abigail and Zeruiah. These, however, are described in 1 Chron. ii. 16 as sisters of David; so that it is plain that Nahash must either have been identical with Jesse the father of David, or a former husband of David's mother. Nahash was also the name of a king of the Ammonites, who, when besieging Jabesh-Gilead, proposed to inflict upon the inhabitants the cruel punishment of thrusting out their right eyes, an instance of barbarity which, although not unknown in oriental countries, in more civilized ages and nations awakens, at the very recital of it, sentiments of unmitigated abhorrence. Nahash somewhat redeemed his character by performing acts of kindness to David amid his persecutions, which the monarch did not forget in the days of his prosperity.

NAHOR, the son of Terah, and brother of Abraham (Gen. xi. 26), who married Milcah, the daughter of Haran, by whom he had several sons. Very little is said concerning Nahor, except that he dwelt in Haran, which was on that account termed the city of Nahor.

NAHUM, the seventh of the minor prophets. He was born in Elkosh, a village of Galilee. We have no means of ascertaining the precise time when this prophet flourished, but it was probably somewhere between the Assyrian and Babylonian captivities. The prophecy contains a prediction of the destruction of Sennacherib's army, the overthrow of the Assyrian empire, the deliverance of Hezekiah, and the death of Sennacherib. The destruction of Nineveh by the Babylonians and Medes is expressed, as Bishop Lowth says, "in the most vivid colours, and with images that are truly pathetic and sublime."

NAIL. This word, which occurs in Judges iv. 21, 22, signifies properly a tent-pin, or one of those long sharp pins or spikes which were driven into the ground, and to which cords were attached to stretch the cloth of the tent, and keep it firmly secured. They were probably made of iron. Josephus calls this an "iron nail."

NAIN, a city of Galilee, where Jesus restored a widow's son to life, as they were carrying him out to be buried. Eusebius says, it was in the neighbourhood of Endor and Scythopolis; and elsewhere that it was two miles from Tabor, south, at the foot of the lesser Mount Hermon, near the town of Endor. The brook Kishon ran between Tabor and Nain.

NAKEDNESS. This was the state of mankind in their primeval condition of innocence and purity, as we are informed in Gen. ii. 25: "And they were both naked, the man and his wife, and were not ashamed." Shame is a fruit of sin, and our first parents being originally without sin had no consciousness of anything that should occasion shame or cause a blush. The word "nakedness," however, is often used in Scripture in a metaphorical sense; thus, in the signification of known or manifest (Heb. iv. 13): "All things are naked and opened unto the eyes of him with whom we have to do;" and it is put for idolatry (Ezek. xvi. 36): "Thus saith the Lord God, Because thy filthiness was poured out, and thy nakedness discovered through thy whoredoms with thy lovers, and with all the idols of thy abominations, and by the blood of thy children, which thou didst give unto them."

NAME. The name by which an individual was known in early times had generally a reference to some peculiarity connected with the person so named. Bochart contends that the names given to animals in the Old Testament, which are commonly significant, are the same which were originally given them by Adam. Josephus says, "God brought to Adam the several species of animals, exhibiting them to him, male and female, and he imposed upon them the names by which they are even now called." Children received their names at the earliest times probably at their birth, but afterwards on the eighth day, when they were circumcised. Thus, on the first institution of that rite, we find the name of Abram changed: "Neither shall thy name any more be called Abram, but thy name shall be Abraham; for a father of many nations have I made thee." Gen. xvii. 5. This change of names, of which Abraham's is the first on record, implied some kind of change in the relative state of the subject. Accordingly, the name of Jacob was changed to that of Israel, from the circumstance mentioned Gen. xxxii. 28: "And he said, Thy name shall be called no more Jacob, but Israel: for as a prince hast thou power with God and with men, and hast prevailed." The name of Cephas also was authoritatively exchanged for that of Peter (Matt. xvi. 18): "And I say also unto thee, That thou art Peter, and upon this rock I will build my church; and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it;" and Saul for Paul (Acts xiii. 9): "Then Saul, (who also is called Paul,) filled with the Holy Ghost, set his eyes on him." In like manner, the promise to all true believers is (Isa. lxii. 2): "And the Gentiles shall see thy righteousness, and all kings thy glory: and thou shalt be called by a new name, which the mouth of the Lord shall name;" and again (Rev. iii. 12): "Him that overcometh will I make a pillar in the temple of my God, and he shall go no more out: and I will write upon him the name of my God, and the name of the city of my God, which is New Jerusalem, which cometh down out of heaven from my God: and I will write upon him my new name." The custom of changing names still prevails in the East. Sometimes among the ancient Hebrews both the old and the new name were retained. Hence we frequently find in the Scriptures persons having two names, which were apparently used indiscriminately. The name is sometimes used for the person. Thus (Rev. iii. 4): "Thou hast a few names even in Sardis which have not defiled their garments; and they shall walk with me in white: for they are worthy." It was not unusual to add to the name a second, derived from the country; thus Simon the Canaanite, and Judas Iscariot. On other occasions we find the name of the father or grandfather added. The names and titles of the heathen deities were occasionally inscribed upon their images. In allusion to this custom, probably, it is said of the Messiah, "And he hath on his vesture and on his thigh a name written, KING OF KINGS, AND LORD OF LORDS." Rev. xix. 16. For the most part, by a name being called upon any one, is to be understood his being enrolled and incorporated in the stock, community, society, or polity, which is considered as in some way originating from or governed by the person whose name it is made to bear. Thus God's people are said to have his name called on them: "And all people of the earth shall see that thou art called by the name of the Lord; and they shall be afraid of thee." Deut. xxviii. 10. Thus, too, of a wife: "And in that day seven women shall take hold of one man, saying, We will eat our own bread, and wear our own apparel: only let us be called by thy name, to take away our reproach." Isa. iv. 1.-

NAME OF GOD. By this term we are to understand—(1.) God himself (Ps. xx. 1), or whatever unfolds to us the glory of the divine character. (2.) His titles peculiar to himself. Exod. iii. 13, 14. (3.) His word. Ps. v. 11; Acts ix. 15. (4.) His works. Ps. viii. 1. (5.) His worship. Exod. xx. 24. (6.) His perfections and excellencies. Exod. xxxiv. 6; John xvii. 26. The properties or qualities of this name are these—(1.) A glorious name. Ps. lxxii. 17. (2.) Transcendent and incomparable. Rev. xix. 16. (3.) Powerful. Phil. ii. 10. (4.) Holy and reverend. Ps. cxi. 9. (5.) Awful to the wicked. Mal. i. 14. (6.) Perpetual. Isa. lv. 13. Thus the Psalmist, to illustrate the attractive excellence of the divine character, says: "They that know thy name, will put their trust in thee." So Moses (Deut. xxviii. 58): "That thou mayest fear this glorious and fearful name, THE LORD THY GOD." See GOD—JEHOVAH—LORD.

NAOMI. See RUTH.

NAPHTALI, the sixth son of Jacob, by Bilhah, Rachel's handmaid. The origin of the name, which signifies "wrestling," is given in Gen. xxx. 8: "And Rachel said, With great wrestlings have I wrestled with my sister, and I have prevailed: and she called his name Naphtali." The descendants of Naphtali seem to have multiplied very rapidly; for we find the tribe of Naphtali at the exodus from Egypt numbering fifty-three thousand four hundred men capable of bearing arms. The portion of Canaan assigned to this tribe was the beautiful woodland country extending from the Sea of Gennesareth to the Mountains of Lebanon. The only distinguished persons belonging to it were Barak the general, and Hiram the artificer. The district of Naphtali was laid waste at one time by the Syrians, under Benhadad the elder (1 Kings xv. 20), and most of the inhabitants were long after carried captive into Assyria by Tiglath-pileser. 2 Kings xv. 29. Our Lord and his apostles preached frequently in the land of Naphtali.

NAPHTUHIM, the descendants of a son of Mizraim; but in what region they were located is difficult to be determined. Bechart places them in Libya, while others suppose them to have inhabited part of Ethiopia, between Syene and Meroe.

NAPKIN. The Greek word translated napkin, in Luke xix. 20, is of Latin origin, denoting properly a linen cloth used by the Romans for the same purposes as those to which our handkerchief is applied; but it was occasionally used as a napkin or wrapper; and, indeed, in the Greek and Syriac languages, into which the word was introduced, it had chiefly that sense. It denotes literally a sweat-cloth.

NARCISSUS, a freedman of the Emperor Claudius, who, if we may credit Suetonius, had great influence at court. The Apostle Paul, in Rom. xvi. 11, salutes some Christians in the house of Narcissus.

NATHAN, a prophet illustrious for his union of prudence and faithfulness. He lived under David, and had much of the confidence of that prince, whom he served in a number of ways. The time and manner of Nathan's death are not known. 1 Chron. xxix. 29, notices that he, with Gad, wrote the history of David. There are several other persons of this name mentioned in Scripture.

NATHANAEL, a disciple of Christ, remarkable for his transparent sincerity of character, the manner of whose conversion is related in John i. 46. Many have thought that Nathanael was the same as Bartholomew. See BARTHOLOMEW.

NATION, all the inhabitants of a particular country (Deut. iv. 34); a country or kingdom (Exod. xxxiv. 10; Rev. vii. 9); countrymen, natives of the same stock (Acts xxvi. 4); the father, head, and original of a people (Gen. xxv. 23); the heathen or Gentiles (Isa. lv. 5). See GENTILES—HEATHEN.

NATIVITY OF CHRIST. See ADVENT—CHRISTMAS.

NATURAL, is, (1.) What proceeds from birth and natural causes. 1 Cor. xv. 44. (2.) What is agreeable to natural design, form, or inclination. Rom. i. 26, 27.

NATURAL MAN, a peculiar designation occurring in the apostolic writings, as opposed to the spiritual man; thus, 1 Cor. ii. 14, 15, "But the natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God; for they are foolishness unto him: neither can he know them, because they are spiritually discerned. But he that is spiritual judgeth all things, yet he himself is judged of no man." It is plain, then, that the "natural man" is an unregenerate, unconverted man, who, whatever may be his talents and advantages, is destitute of the Spirit of God, and still in his sins. However, it is said even concerning believers, that they "were by nature the children of wrath, even as others." Eph. ii. 3.

NATURE, the essential properties of a thing, or that by which it is distinguished from all others. It is used also for the system of the world, and the Creator of it; for the specific constitution of the sexes; and for common sense. Rom. i. 26, 27; 1 Cor. xi. 14. The word is also used in reference to a variety of other objects, which we shall here enumerate. 1. The divine nature is not any external form or shape, but his glory, excellency, and perfections, peculiar to himself. 2. Human nature signifies the state, properties, and peculiarities of man. 3. Good nature is a disposition to please, and is compounded of kindness, forbearance, forgiveness, and self-denial. 4. The law of nature is the will of God relating to human actions, grounded in the moral differences of things. Some understand it in a more comprehensive sense, as signifying those stated orders by which all the parts of the material world are governed in their several motions and operations. 5. The light of nature does not consist merely in those ideas which heathens have actually attained, but those which are presented to men by the works of creation, and which, by the exertion of reason, they may obtain, if they be desirous of retaining God in their mind. (See RELIGION.) 6. By the dictates of nature, with regard to right and wrong, we understand those things which appear to the mind to be natural, fit, or reasonable. 7. The state of nature is that in which men have not, by mutual engagements, implicit or express, entered into communities. 8. Depraved nature is that corrupt state in which all mankind are born, and which inclines them to evil. (See DEPRAVITY, HUMAN.)

Peter informs us (2 Pet. i. 4), that our Saviour has made us partakers of a divine nature; he has imparted to us the character of children of God, and grace to practise godliness, &c., like our Father who is in heaven. Compare 1 John iii. 1.

NAVE, the arch of the wheel. 1 Kings vii. 33. The word occurs in describing the ten vases of brass in Solomon's temple.

NAZARENE, an epithet applied to our blessed Lord, probably from Nazareth, the place where he was brought up. It was accounted a place of no repute, so that we find the question contemptuously asked, "Can any good thing come out of Nazareth?" It formed a part therefore of the humiliation of Jesus that there he should dwell, and thus realize the prediction of David in the twenty-second Psalm, which is throughout prophetic of Christ: "I am a worm, and no man; a reproach of men, and despised of the people;" or the saying of the prophet Isaiah (liii. 3), "He is despised and rejected of men. He was despised, and we esteemed him not." In all probability, to be called a Nazarene was in the time of our Lord a proverbial mode of expressing contempt.

NAZARENES, Christians converted from Judaism, whose chief error consisted in defending the necessity or expediency of the works of the law, and who obstinately adhered to the practice of the Jewish ceremonies. The name of Nazarenes, at first, had nothing odious in it, and it was often given to the first Christians. The fathers frequently mention the Gospel of the Nazarenes, which differs nothing from that of Matthew, which was either in Hebrew or Syriac, for the use of the first converts, but was afterwards corrupted by the Ebionites. These Nazarenes preserved their first Gospel in its primitive purity. Some of them were still in being in the time of Jerome, who does not reproach them with any gross errors. They were very zealous observers of the law of Moses, but held the traditions of the Pharisees in very great contempt.

It is recorded by Epiphanius, in proof of the bitter hatred of the Jews to the Christians in his days, that they were wont to repeat the imprecation in their synagogues three times a day, "Send thy curse, O God, upon the Nazarenes." Epiphanius supposes this imprecation to have been applied to a mere sect, but Jerome affirms that it was applied to Christians in general.

NAZARETH, a small town of Lower Galilee, where Christ chiefly resided before his entrance upon his public ministry. Hence it is called "his own city;" and from it he seems to have been called a Nazarene. It was situated about six miles west of Mount Tabor, on the brow of a hill, from one of the peaks of which the wicked inhabitants endeavoured, on one occasion, to cast down Jesus. The city, now called Nasseria, is thus described by Messrs Bonar and M'Cheyne:—

"The town of Nazareth lies on the west side of the valley, on the acclivity of one of the many hills that meet here. The valley has sometimes been compared to a cup; and the hills have all a whitish appearance, from the limestone of which they are composed. There are numerous tracks, worn deep in the calcareous rocks, leading from the town in different directions, to neighbouring villages on the other side of the hill. The houses are of a very white stone, and appear to be more substantial and regularly built than those of other towns of Palestine. The buildings of the convent are massy; and there is a mosque in the town, adorned with cypress trees. There were no ruins visible, except the remains of an old khan near the entrance of the town. Fig-trees and olives abounded in the gardens, hedged in with prickly pear. The women at the well also appeared to be better dressed, and in more comfortable circumstances, than in most other places of the land; and, on the whole, we found Nazareth a more thriving place than we had anticipated. We put up at the khan; which is one of the best specimens we met with of the Eastern inn. The bazaar, however, was poor, having no great show of things for sale. Cuscas and cucumbers, cloths and red shoes, formed the staple commodities. A great many bony-featured Bedouins, with the rope of camels' hair round their head, were loitering about the street.

"We visited the convent, and saw all its pretended wonders. We were shown the chamber of the annunciation, where the angel Gabriel saluted Mary, 'Hail, thou that art highly favoured;' also the house of Joseph, cut out of the rock, and the pillar curiously (the inhabitants say miraculously) suspended from the roof. They wished to take us to another part of the town, to see the stone table from which Christ dined with his disciples, both before and after his resurrection,—a visit which procures seven years' indulgence to the deluded pilgrims of the Romish Church! but we were no way inclined to see more of their follies, and grievously offended our guide by declining to go. One or two of the paintings in the convent are good, especially a large one of the annunciation; but it has the painful profanation of representing God the Father as an old man. There is also a curious ancient picture of Christ, said to be the very one sent by him to the King of Edessa, on which is inscribed, 'Hæc vera imago Domini,' &c.

"From the convent garden the monks pointed out to us the Mount of Precipitation, regarded by them as the hill from which the angry Nazarenes wished to cast the Saviour headlong, about a mile and a-half distant from the town. This is a tradition which disproves itself, being contrary to the express words of the Gospel narrative, 'They rose up, and thrust him out of the city, and led him unto the brow of the hill whereon their city was built, that they might cast him down headlong.' Luke iv. 29. We next visited the place where Dr Clarke conjectured to be the true precipice, immediately above the small church of the Maronites. This is really a continuation of the hill upon which the town is built. It is composed of limestone rock, forming several precipices, so that a person cast down from above would, without doubt, have more than one dangerous fall. We had no hesitation, when standing there, in concluding that the brow of that hill was the very spot where the men of Nazareth rejected the Lord of glory.

"The white rocks all round Nazareth give it a peculiar aspect. It appears dry and tame, and this effect is increased by the trees being powdered over with dust during the summer season. The heat was very great, and the glare from the rocks painful to the eyes. There is a good fountain near the entrance of the town called the Fountain of the Virgin, because it is said that Mary and her Son were in the habit of drawing water there."

NAZARITES, those under the ancient law who engaged by a vow to abstain from wine and all intoxicating liquors, to let their hair grow, not to enter any house polluted by having a dead corpse in it, nor to be present at any funeral. If, by accident, any one should have died in their presence, they recommenced the whole of their consecration and Nazariteship. This vow generally lasted eight days, sometimes a month, and sometimes their whole lives.

When the time of their Nazariteship was accomplished, the priest brought the person to the door of the temple, who there offered to the Lord a he-lamb for a burnt-offering, a she-lamb for an expiatory sacrifice, and a ram for a peace-offering. They offered, likewise, loaves and cakes, with wine necessary for the libations. After all this was sacrificed and offered to the Lord, the priest, or some other person, shaved the head of the Nazarite at the door of the tabernacle, and burnt his hair, throwing it upon the fire of the altar. Then the priest put into the hand of the Nazarite the shoulder of the ram roasted, with a loaf and a cake, which the Nazarite returning into the hands of the priest, he offered them to the Lord, lifting them up in the presence of the Nazarite. And from this time he might again drink wine, his Nazariteship being now accomplished. Numb. vi.; Amos ii. 11, 12.

Those that made a vow of Nazariteship out of Palestine, and could not come to the temple when their vow was expired, contented themselves with observing the abstinence required by the law, and after that cutting their hair in the place where they were. As to the offerings and sacrifices prescribed by Moses, which were to be offered at the temple by themselves, or by others for them, they deferred this till they could have a convenient opportunity. Hence it was that Paul, being at Corinth, and having made a vow of a Nazarite, had his hair cut off at Cenchrea, and put off fulfilling the rest of his vow till he should arrive at Jerusalem. Acts xviii. 18. When a person found that he was not in a condition to make a vow of Nazariteship, or had not leisure to perform the ceremonies belonging to it, he contented himself by contributing to the expense of the sacrifice and offerings of those that had made and fulfilled this vow; and by this means he became a partaker in the merit of such Nazariteship. When Paul came to Jerusalem, in the year of Christ 53, the Apostle James the Less, with the other brethren, said to him (Acts xxi. 23, 24), that, to quiet the minds of the converted Jews, who had been informed that he every where preached up the entire abolition of the law of Moses, he ought to join himself to four of the faithful who had a vow of Nazariteship upon them, and contribute to the charge of the ceremony at the shaving of their heads, by which the new converts would perceive that he continued to keep the law, and that what they had heard of him was not true.

NEAPOLIS, now called Napoli (Acts xvi. 11), a city of Macedonia, near the borders of Thrace. It was at this place that Paul disembarked, when he visited Macedonia from Asia.

NEAR, at hand. God is near, he is everywhere present, and is ready to help his people in every case, or when he offers to save, uphold, and comfort. Jer. xxiii. 23; Isa. lv. 6, xli. 5; Deut. iv. 7; Ps. xxxiv. 18; lxix. 18, lxxv. 1, cxix. 151, xxxii. 9; Lam. iii. 57. He is near in people's mouth, but far from their reins, when they are often talking of him, but are far from loving, desiring, and delighting in him. Jer. xii. 2. God's name is near; he is closely related to his people, and they intimate in their fellowship with him. His work is near, exerted in upholding, protecting, and comforting them. His word is nigh, in their mouth, and in their heart, preached to their ear, spoken by their lips, conceived by their mind, and powerfully applied to and believed by their heart. Israel was a people near to God; while the Gentiles were far off, they were closely related to him as his peculiar people; they had his ordinances and symbols of his presence among them; and he was ready to support and defend them. Ps. cxlviii. 14. We draw near to God when we worship him, and, by faith, prayer, &c., have intimate fellowship with him. Lev. xvi. 1; 1 Sam. xiv. 36.

NEBAJOTH, the son of Ishmael, from whom the Nabathean tribe of Arabs is said to have descended. See NABATHEANS.

NEBO, a part of the mountains of Abarim, in the land of Moab. It is remarkable as having been the spot where Moses died. Deut. xxxii. 49. There was a city also in the tribe of Reuben called Nebo, which belonged to the Moabites in the time of Jeremiah (xlviii. 1). Another city in the tribe of Judah bore the name of Nebo, which in Neh. vii. 33 is called "the other Nebo." Nebo was also the name of a Babylonish idol, which is mentioned in Isa. xlvi. 1.

NEBUCHADNEZZAR, called also Nebuchadrezzar, was king of Babylon, who made a conquest of the kingdom of Judah and carried the Jews captive into Babylon, where they continued for seventy years. In the reign of Jehoiakim, Nebuchadnezzar, as we are informed in 2 Kings xxiv. 1, invaded the country, and put the king in fetters, to carry him into Babylon; but at length he restored Jehoiakim to the throne, subjecting him to the payment of a yearly tribute. On returning to Babylon, Nebuchadnezzar took with him the ornaments of the temple and some distinguished persons, among whom were Daniel and the three Hebrew youths, whose firm and consistent adherence to the worship of the true God is so conspicuously noticed in the book of Daniel. Having conquered Judea, the Babylonian monarch attacked the Egyptians, expelling them from Syria, and taking possession of all the land from the river of Egypt to the river Euphrates. Jehoiakim, who had been left in Judea, meanwhile rebelled against the king of Babylon, but was taken prisoner and slain. He was succeeded by his son Jehoiachin, who reigned only three months, when Nebuchadnezzar having come in person to besiege Jerusalem, he surrendered to the Babylonian king. In this invasion, the great mass of the Jews, amounting to somewhere about fifty thousand who had still remained in Judea, were carried captive into Babylon, the government of the country being conferred upon Mattaniah the brother of Jehoiachin, to whom Nebuchadnezzar, in raising him to the throne, gave the name of Zedekiah. In the ninth year of his reign this monarch also rebelled, having formed an alliance with Pharaoh-Hophra, king of Egypt. In this war Nebuchadnezzar took Jerusalem, destroying the temple and massacring the inhabitants. Jeremiah, with a large mass of the Jewish people, took refuge in Egypt, but the king of Babylon conquered that country also, and carried many of the people into Babylon. It was this Nebuchadnezzar who almost rebuilt Babylon, and executed many stupendous works of art, including the hanging gardens and the magnificent canals which so much adorned the city. This celebrated king reigned forty-three years, when he was succeeded by Evil-Merodach.

NECESSITARIANS, an appellation which may be given to all who maintain that moral agents act from necessity. See next article, and MATERIALISTS.

NECESSITY, constraint, or restraint, by irresistible power; in which sense it is opposed to freedom.

Whether man is a necessary or a free agent, is a question which has been debated by writers of the first eminence. Hobbes, Collins, Hume, Leibnitz, Kames, Hartley, Priestley, Edwards, Toplady, and Belsham have written on the side of necessity; while Clarke, King, Law, Reid, Butler, Price, Bryant, Wollaston, Horsley, Beattie, Necker, Mackintosh, Gregory, Butterworth, and Dwight, have written against it. To state all their arguments in this place would take up too much room; suffice it to say, that the anti-necessitarians suppose that the doctrine of necessity charges God as the author of sin; that it takes away the freedom of the will, renders man unaccountable, makes sin to be no evil, and morality or virtue to be no good; precludes the use of means, and is of the most gloomy tendency. The necessitarians deny these to be legitimate consequences. All necessity, say they, doth not take away freedom. The actions of a man may be at one and the same time free and necessary too. It was infallibly certain that Judas would betray Christ, yet he did it voluntarily. Jesus Christ necessarily became man, and died, yet he acted freely. A good man doth naturally and necessarily love his children, yet voluntarily. It is part of the happiness of the blessed to love God unchangeably, yet freely, for it would not be their happiness if done by compulsion. Nor does it, says the necessitarian, render man unaccountable, since the Divine Being does no injury to his rational faculties; and man, as his creature, is answerable to him; besides, he has a right to do what he will with his own. That all necessity doth not render actions less morally good, is evident; for if necessary virtue be neither moral nor praiseworthy, it will follow that God himself is not a moral being, because he is a necessary one; and the obedience of Christ cannot be good, because it was necessary. Further, say they, moral necessity does not preclude the use of means; for means are no less appointed than the end. It was ordained that Christ should be delivered up to death; but he could not have been betrayed without a betrayer, nor crucified without crucifiers. That it is not a gloomy doctrine, they allege, because nothing can be more consolatory than to believe that all things are under the direction of an all-wise Being, that his kingdom ruleth over all, and that he doth all things well. So far from its being inimical to happiness, they suppose there can be no solid, true happiness without the belief of it; that it inspires gratitude, excites confidence, teaches resignation, produces humility, and draws the soul to God. It is also observed, that to deny necessity is to deny the foreknowledge of God, and to wrest the sceptre from the hand of the Creator, and to place that capricious and undefinable principle, the self-determining power of man, upon the throne of the universe. Besides, say they, the Scripture places the doctrine beyond all doubt. Job xxiii. 13, 14, xxxiv. 29; Prov. xvi. 4; Isa. xlv. 7; Acts xiii. 48; Eph. i. 11; 1 Thess. iii. 3; Matt. x. 29, 30, xviii. 7; Luke xxiv. 26; John vi. 37.

On the tendency of this doctrine of necessity, President Edwards offers these judicious remarks:—"It it should be said that the tendency of this doctrine of necessity to licentiousness appears by the improvement many at this day actually make of it to justify themselves in their dissolute courses, I will not deny that some men do unreasonably abuse this doctrine, as they do many other things which are true and excellent in their own nature; but I deny that this proves the doctrine itself has any tendency to licentiousness. I think the tendency of doctrines, by what now appears in the world, and in our nation in particular, may much more justly be argued from the general effect which has been seen to attend the prevailing of the principles of Arminians, and the contrary principles; as both have had their turn of general prevalence in our nation. If it be indeed, as is pretended, that Calvinistic doctrines undermine the very foundation of all religion and morality, enervate and disannul all rational motives to holy and virtuous practice; and that the contrary doctrines give the inducements to virtue and goodness their proper force, and exhibit religion in a rational light, tending to recommend it to the reason of mankind, and enforce it in a manner that is agreeable to their natural notions of things,—I say, if it be thus, it is remarkable, that virtue and religious practice should prevail most when the former doctrines, so inconsistent with it, prevailed almost universally; and that ever since the latter doctrines, so happily agreeing with it, and of so proper and excellent a tendency to promote it, have been gradually prevailing, vice, profaneness, luxury and wickedness of all sorts, and contempt of all religion, and every kind of seriousness and strictness of conversation, should proportionably prevail; and that these things should thus accompany one another, and rise and prevail one with another, now for a whole age together. It is remarkable, that this happy period, discovered by the free inquiries and superior sense and wisdom of this age, against the pernicious effects of Calvinism, so inconsistent with religion, and tending so much to banish all virtue from the earth, should, on so long a trial, be attended with no good effect; but that the consequence should be the reverse of amendment; that, in proportion as the remedy takes place, and is thoroughly applied, so the disease should prevail; and the very same dismal effect take place, to the highest degree, which Calvinistic doctrines are supposed to have so great a tendency to; even the banishing of religion and virtue, and the prevailing of unbounded licentiousness of manners. If these things are truly so, they are very remarkable, and matter of very curious speculation."

No writer, however, has set this difficult subject in so clear a light as Mr Isaac Taylor, author of the Natural History of Enthusiasm, in his Essay introductory to Edwards on the Will; to which we beg leave to refer the reader. See also the works of the above-mentioned writers on this subject; and MATERIALISTS—MORAL AGENCY—DECREES OF GOD—PRE-DESTINATION.

NECHO, king of Egypt, who appears to have been cotemporary with Josiah, the good Jewish monarch. He was distinguished in arms, particularly in his wars with the Syrians, in which he attacked and took Carchemish (which see.) This enterprising monarch fitted out fleets, which he sent on expeditions, both on the Mediterranean and the Red Sea. The battle of Megiddo, in which Josiah fell, was fought with Pharaoh-Necho, whose superior military prowess gained him the victory. He was himself conquered afterwards, however, by Nebuchadezzar, king of Babylon. At his death, Necho was succeeded by his son, Psammetichus II.

NECK. To harden the neck is a metaphor drawn from the practice of a bullock unaccustomed to the yoke. In 2 Sam. xxii. 41, it is said, "Thou hast given me the necks of mine enemies;" an expression which refers to a practice of trampling on the neck, as a mode of triumphing over a fallen foe.

NECROMANCY, the art of interrogating the dead, Deut. xviii. 11. The practice of pretending to raise up the spirits of deceased persons, with the view of learning from them future events, seems to have been brought by the Israelites from Egypt. The law of Moses expressly prohibits all such arts, under penalty of death by stoning. Lev. xx. 27. The forms to which the ancient necromancers resorted in raising the ghosts of the departed were very varied, but the only detailed instance which occurs in Scripture is the raising of the spirit of Samuel by the witch of Endor.

NEEDLE-WORK. See EMBROIDERY.

NEGINOTH, a term which is placed before some of the psalms, and signifies stringed instruments of music, to be played on by the fingers, or by female musicians. The titles of these psalms may be translated, "A Psalm of David to the master of music, who presides over the stringed instruments."

NEHEMIAH, the son of Hachaliah, a Jewish ruler, who, having been born at Babylon during the seventy years' captivity, acquired the favour of Artaxerxes Longimanus, whose cup-bearer he became. He was despatched on a mission to Jerusalem, to repair the walls and gates of the city, and to reform the administration of affairs. Having fulfilled his commission, he returned to Babylon, from which he was sent a second time to Jerusalem, invested with the high and honourable office of chief ruler or governor of the Jews. This office he filled for thirty years, when he died, B.C. 420. The canonical book of Scripture which bears his name gives an account both of his first and second administration in Judea.

NEHILOTH, a word which forms the superscription of the fifth Psalm. According to the Chaldee, and the greater number of modern expositors, it denotes the instrument, the flute as they think, with which the Psalm was to be accompanied. But in opposition to this idea, Hengstenberg suggests that only stringed instruments were used in the temple-service, and, particularly, that the flute was never an instrument with which the singing of the Psalms was accompanied. Others suppose that the word marks the object of the Psalm "for the inheritance." Thus, Luther remarks, "According to the title, this is the common purport of the Psalm, that it asks for the inheritance of God, desiring that the people of God may be kept and preserved for their Lord." This explanation is preferred by Hengstenberg, who translates it "upon the lots."

NEHUSHTAN, the name which was given by good king Hezekiah to the brazen serpent which had been preserved till his time. Perceiving that the Jews were in danger of worshipping this relic, he caused it to be burned, saying, it is Nehushtan, a mere piece of brass. 2 Kings xviii. 4. Serpent worship under various forms prevailed in the ancient world, particularly in Egypt.

NEIGHBOUR, any one related to us by whatever tie, even that of common humanity. The duty of loving our neighbour is enforced in the Jewish law. Thus, Lev. xix. 18, "Thou shalt not avenge, nor bear any grudge against the children of thy people; but thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself: I am the Lord." There can be no doubt, that in this verse, strictly speaking, the word "neighbour" might be interpreted as referring to the Israelites, who are described in the first clause as "the children of thy people." But not contented with restricting the term "neighbour" to the Jewish nation, the Scribes drew from the command itself the unwarranted inference, that they were permitted, if not commanded, to hate all if they were not of their own nation, and whom they were accustomed to consider as their enemies. And so extensively had this pernicious doctrine of the Scribes gained ground among the Jewish people, that by them the words stranger and enemy were considered as almost identical in meaning. Frequently in the course of his ministry did our Lord seek to rectify their views upon this point. Thus, in the parable of the good Samaritan, he shows by a beautiful and affecting example that it is our duty to show benevolence and kindness to the stranger and the enemy. Nor did the Scribes receive countenance in their false notions from the law of Moses, although, undoubtedly, its precepts were chiefly directed to the welfare of the Jewish people. Thus, in Exod. xxiii. 4, 5, we find the command given, "If thou meet thine enemy's ox or his ass going astray, thou shalt surely bring it back to him again. If thou see the ass of him that hateth thee lying under his burden, and wouldest forbear to help him; thou shalt surely help with him." And it is worthy of notice that when the same precept is recorded in fuller detail in Deut. xxii. 1-3, Moses exchanges the word "enemy" for that of "brother," thus plainly teaching the Israelites that it was their duty to regard even their enemies as brethren. The perverse doctrine of the Scribes, therefore, "Thou shalt love thy neighbour, and hate thine enemy," was opposed to the whole spirit and genius of the Word of God.

NEOLOGY, literally new doctrine, a term generally applied to denote the Rationalism and Socinianism, Deism and Pantheism, which have for some time past prevailed on the Continent, and especially Germany, corrupting the theological opinions even of their most accomplished divines. Its fundamental principle is to exalt reason above revelation, and to test the statements of the Bible by what are considered as the necessary deductions of reason. Proceeding on such a fallacious groundwork, the interpretation of Scripture becomes necessarily vague and uncertain. Whatever appears to contradict reason is instantly rejected, however strong may be the external evidence by which it is supported. The inspired writers are regarded as on a level with the profane writers of antiquity. All that is miraculous is explained away, and even the most sublime statements are viewed as no better than poetic exaggerations. It is pleasing, however, to learn that neological opinions are fast losing their influence on the Continent, and that a spirit of pure orthodox piety is in many parts of Germany rapidly becoming diffused both among pastors and people. Dr Bretschneider thus describes the Neologians: "Those who are generally termed Rationalists admit universally in Christianity a divine, benevolent, and positive appointment for the good of mankind, and Jesus as a messenger of divine providence, believing that the true and everlasting word of God is contained in the Holy Scripture, and that by the same the welfare of mankind will be obtained and extended. But they deny therein a supernatural and miraculous working of God, and consider the object of Christianity to be that of introducing into the world such a religion as reason can comprehend; and they distinguish the essential from the unessential, and what is local and temporary from that which is universal and permanent in Christianity."

NEONOMIANS, so called from the Greek neos new, and nomos, law; signifying a new law, the condition whereof is imperfect though sincere and persevering obedience.

Neonomianism seems to be an essential part of the Arminian system. "The new covenant of grace which, through the medium of Christ's death, the Father made with men, consists, according to this system, not in our being justified by faith, as it apprehends the righteousness of Christ; but in this, that God, abrogating the exaction of perfect legal obedience, reputes or accepts of faith itself, and the imperfect obedience of faith, instead of the perfect obedience of the law, and graciously accounts them worthy of the reward of eternal life." This opinion was examined at the Synod of Dort, and has been canvassed between the Calvinists and Arminians on various occasions.

Towards the close of the seventeenth-century, a controversy was agitated amongst the English Dissenters, in which the one side, who were partial to the writings of Dr. Crisp, were charged with Antinomianism, and the other, who favoured Mr. Baxter, were accused of Neonomianism.

It does not appear to have been a question in this controversy, whether God in his Word commands sinners to repent and believe in Christ, nor whether he promises life to believers, and threatens death to unbelievers; but whether it be the gospel under the form of a new law that thus commands or threatens, or the moral law on its behalf, and whether its promises to believing render such believing a condition of the things promised. In another controversy, however, which arose about forty years afterwards among the same description of people, it became a question whether God did by his Word (call it law or gospel) command unregenerate sinners to repent and believe in Christ, or to do anything which is spiritually good. (See CALLING.) Of those who took the affirmative side of this question, one party attempted to maintain it on the ground of the gospel being a new law, consisting of commands, promises, and threatenings, the terms or conditions of which were repentance, faith, and sincere obedience. But those who first engaged in the controversy, though they allowed the encouragement to repent and believe to arise merely from the grace of the gospel, yet considered the formal obligation to do so as arising merely from the moral law, which, requiring supreme love to God, requires acquiescence in any revelation which he shall at any time make known.

NEOPHYTE, the name usually given in the primitive church to a convert from Paganism or Judaism.

NEPHATH-DOR, a city in Manasseh, which also bears the name of Dor or Dora, Josh. xvii. 11; 1 Kings iv. 11. Jerome mentions the ruins of Dor as nine miles from Cæsarea, on the way to Ptolemais. The king of this city was smitten by Joshua. It was the residence of Ben-Abinadab, the son-in-law of Solomon, and probably at that time one of the ports of the Israelitish kingdom. Dr Wilson places it on the site of the modern Tanturah, where are now only a few wretched houses situated near a small bay, but there is a considerable mass of ruins.

NEREUS, the name of a Christian who, along with his sister, is mentioned by Paul in his Epistle to the Romans (xvi. 15). Nothing further is known concerning him.

NERGAL, an idol of the Cuthæans, referred to in 2 Kings xvii. 30, and called Nergal-sharezer in Jer. xxxix. 3, 13. Nothing definite is known in regard to this idol.

NERO, the fifth emperor of Rome, remarkable for his cruelty to the early Christians. He began his persecution of the Christians in A.D. 64. The following account of his attempts to check the progress of Christianity at its very outset is from the pen of the Rev. Dr Jamieson, in his "Manners and Trials of the Primitive Christians:"—

"The infamy of being the first to draw the sword against the Christians belongs to Nero, a prince who combined in his own person all the most disgusting qualities and enormous crimes that ever blackened and degraded humanity. But of all the odious features of his character, cruelty seems to have been the crowning vice, as there was scarcely a member of his court, related to him by nature, dignified by station, or recommended by public virtue, in whose life's blood he did not plunge the assassin's shaft. His father, mother, brother, two wives, besides many others of royal and patrician rank, all fell successively by his unnatural poignard, and among all classes of his subjects his severities were so oppressive, that Rome groaned under the scorpion lash of the imperial tyrant. From such a scourge of the human race, the Christians could not escape, and while by malicious calumnies, of which he had privately encouraged the circulation, their condition had been several times embittered, and thousands rendered odious in the eyes of their fellow-citizens, there is one instance of their trials under his reign which will ever be memorable in the history of persecution, and of which the origin and progress may be briefly told. Among innumerable other freaks of his folly and madness, he became discontented with the narrow streets and the poor antiquated style of building that distinguished the old city of Rome; and whether it was that he wished to enjoy the singular satisfaction of beholding an immense assemblage of houses in one common conflagration, or to bear the honour of becoming a second Romulus—the founder of a more beautiful and magnificent capital of the world—he secretly ordered it to be set on fire, in all parts of the city at once. This remarkable event took place on the 19th July, sixty-four years after Christ; and so well laid were the plans of the royal incendiary, and to so great a height had the flames attained, before the unsuspecting citizens were aware of the full extent of the catastrophe, that no measures of precaution or of force, no lavish use of the waters of the Tiber, could stem the progress of the devouring element. For six or seven days the fire raged with unabated fury, destroying, in its terrific career, palaces, temples, all the most splendid and venerable monuments of antiquity; and at length, when a calm view could be taken of the calamity, it was found that of the proud city which boasted of so many superb edifices of religion and temples of victory, which had witnessed so many proud triumphs, and on whose piazzas and streets foreigners from every region of the world had been proud to walk, nothing remained but a few blackened and tottering walls. During the progress of this fearful calamity, while thousands of Roman families were smothered in the falling ruins, or driven naked and houseless wanderers to the fields, Nero had stationed himself in the imperial gardens, where he feasted his inhuman eyes from the lofty tower of Mæcenas with the spectacle of horror, and in the fantastic garb of a player sang in Homeric strains the destruction of Troy. Universal indignation soon lighted upon him as the guilty cause of the catastrophe; but by address or intimidation he contrived to divert the attention of the public from himself; and with a meanness and cowardice, equalled only by his pre-eminent atrocity, he sought inglorious safety to himself by making the vengeance of the citizens fall like a thunderbolt on the Christians, who, besides their share of suffering the common calamity, had braved the greatest personal dangers in their benevolent attempts to rescue the unfortunate sufferers. The mercenary zeal of his creatures having discovered some of the believers, on whom every means of intimidation was practised, the rest of the brethren were, through their weakness or treachery, apprehended, and, on the false pretext of having occasioned the destruction of the city, proceeded against with unexampled severity. Tortures and modes of death unknown in the criminal code of Rome were invented for the incendiaries. The majority were bound in combustible garments, which, being set fire to, illumined the darkness of the night, and made the punishment resemble the crime. The spacious gardens of the palace were, with diabolical taste, selected as an appropriate scene of the executions, Nero himself being conspicuous in the crowded ranks of the spectators; and while the sad groups of victims were successively led to the stake, tears of pity streamed from a thousand eyes among the assembled multitudes, who knew that the spectacle was exhibited, not for the public benefit, but to gratify the savage heart of one man. The circumstance of this wicked prince ever meditating to criminate the Christians with the conflagration proves that they had previously been rendered deeply odious to the people, that the accusation would be credulously entertained, and that the punishment of that class would afford gratification to the mob on account of the calumnious reports of the wickedness to which they were secretly addicted. This persecution, in which a vast number of Christians fell by the most appalling death, among whom were Peter and Paul, was local, being confined chiefly to Rome and its immediate neighbourhood, and lasting about the space of four years. Nevertheless, proofs are not wanting that the atrocities of the emperor were imitated by his underlings in other places. From an inscription discovered in Spain, it appears that not a few Christians in that remote province met the hard fate of their brethren in the metropolis; and this terrible blow gave them the first experimental lesson, in all parts of the empire to which the tidings reached, that they who live godly in Christ Jesus must expect to suffer persecution."

NEST. One of the most beautiful and benevolent regulations of the Mosaic law is that which occurs in reference to birds' nests, in Deut. xxii. 6, 7: "If a bird's nest chance to be before thee in the way in any tree, or on the ground, whether they be young ones or eggs, and the dam sitting upon the young, or upon the eggs, thou shalt not take the dam with the young: but thou shalt in any wise let the dam go, and take the young to thee; that it may be well with thee, and that thou mayest prolong thy days." Birds were no doubt necessary as food to the Israelites, and the object of this law undoubtedly was to prevent any unnecessary cruelty in taking them. We find reference to a nest in Ps. lxxxiv. 3: "Yea, the sparrow hath found an house, and the swallow a nest for herself, where she may lay her young, even thine altars, O Lord of hosts, my King, and my God." In this passage Rosenmüller thinks that there is an allusion to a custom which obtained among several nations of antiquity, that birds which build their nests on the temples or within the limits of them were not suffered to be driven away, much less to be killed, but found a secure and uninterrupted dwelling.

NESTORIANS, the followers of Nestorius, the bishop of Constantinople, who lived in the fifth century. They believed that in Christ there were not only two natures, but two persons; of which the one was divine, even the eternal word; and the other, which was human, was the man Jesus: that these two persons had only one aspect: that the union between the Son of God and the Son of Man was formed in the moment of the virgin's conception, and was never to be dissolved: that it was not, however, a union of nature or of person, but only of will and affection. Nestorius, however, it is said, denied the last position: that Christ was, therefore, to be carefully distinguished from God, who dwelt in him as in his temple; and that Mary was to be called the mother of Christ, and not the mother of God.

One of the chief promoters of the Nestorian cause was Barsumas, created Bishop of Nisibis, A.D. 435. Such was his zeal and success, that the Nestorians who still remain in Chaldea, Persia, Assyria, and the adjacent countries, consider him alone as their parent and founder. By him Pherozes, the Persian monarch, was persuaded to expel those Christians who adopted the opinions of the Greeks, and to admit the Nestorians in their place, putting them in possession of the principal seat of ecclesiastical authority in Persia, the see of Seleucia, which the patriarch of the Nestorians has always filled even down to our time. Barsumas also erected a school at Nisibis, from which proceeded those Nestorian doctors who in the fifth and sixth centuries spread abroad their tenets through Egypt, Syria, Arabia, India, Tartary, and China.

In the tenth century, the Nestorians in Chaldea whence they are sometimes called Chaldeans, extended their spiritual conquests beyond Mount Imaus, and introduced the Christian religion into Tartary, properly so called, and especially into that country called Karit, bordering on the northern part of China. The Nestorians formed so considerable a body of Christians, that the missionaries of Rome were industrious in their endeavours to reduce them under the papal yoke.

About the middle of the seventeenth century, the Romish missionaries gained over to their communion a small number of Nestorians, whom they formed into a congregation or church; the patriarchs or bishops of which reside in the city of Amida, or Diarbeker, and all assume the denomination of Joseph. Nevertheless, the Nestorians in general persevere to our own times in their refusal to enter into the communion of the Romish Church, notwithstanding the earnest entreaties and alluring offers that have been made by the Pope's legate to conquer their inflexible constancy.

NET. "Surely in vain the net is spread in the sight of any bird;" that is, the very birds of the air are wiser than sinners, since they take warnings which sinners refuse to observe. Prov. i. 17.

NETHINIM. Persons devoted to the performance of the most humble offices in the services of the tabernacle and temple, such as carrying wood and water. They are supposed to have been descended from the Gibeonites, who, on account of their attempts to deceive Joshua, were condemned to this species of servitude. The Nethinim were servants of the Levites, as the Levites were of the priests. They were carried to Babylon with the tribe of Judah, and Ezra (viii. 17) brought two hundred and twenty of them back to Judea. A considerable number followed under Zerubbabel. That they might be near the temple for the performance of their duties, they occupied a particular place in Jerusalem called Ophel.

NETOPHAH, a city and district between Beth-lehem and Anathoth. Ezra ii. 22; Neh. vii. 26; Jer. xl. 8; 1 Chron. ix. 16.

NETTLES. We find this name given to two different words in the original. The first is cherul—Job xxx. 7; Prov. xxiv. 31; Zeph. ii. 9. It is not easy to determine what species of plant is here meant. From the passage in Job, the nettle could not be intended; for a plant is referred to large enough for people to take shelter under. The following extract from Denon's Travels may help to illustrate the text: "One of the inconveniences of the vegetable thickets of Egypt is, that it is difficult to remain in them; as nine-tenths of the trees and plants are armed with inexorable thorns, which suffer only an unquiet enjoyment of the shadow which is so constantly desirable, from the precaution necessary to guard against them." The kimosh (Prov. xxiv. 31; Isa. xxxiv. 13; Hos. ix. 6) is by the Vulgate rendered "urtica," which is well defended by Celsius, and very probably means "the nettle."

NEW MOON. The Hebrews had a particular veneration for the first day of every month, for which Moses appointed peculiar sacrifices (Numb. xxviii. 11–15); but he gave no orders that it should be kept as a holy day, nor can it be proved that the ancients observed it so; it was a festival of merely voluntary devotion. (See MONTH.) It appears that even from the time of Saul they made, on this day, a sort of family entertainment, since David ought then to have been at the king's table; and Saul took his absence amiss. 1 Sam. xx. 5, 18. Moses insinuates, that besides the national sacrifices then regularly offered, every private person had his particular sacrifices of devotion. Numb. x. 10. The beginning of the month was proclaimed by sound of trumpet, at the offering of solemn sacrifices. But the most celebrated neomenia was that at the beginning of the civil year, or first day of the month Tisri. Lev. xxiii. 24, 25. This was a sacred festival, on which no servile labour was performed. In the kingdom of the ten tribes, the people used to assemble at the houses of the prophets, to hear their instructions. 2 Kings iv. 23; Isa. i. 13, 14. Ezekiel says (see also 1 Chron. xxiii. 31, 2 Chron. viii. 13) that the burnt-offerings offered on the day of the new moon, were provided at the king's expense, and that on this day was to be opened the eastern gate of the court of the priests. Ezek. xlv. 17, xlv. 1, 2. Spenser has a long dissertation on the neomenia, in which he shows that the Gentiles honoured the first day of the month out of veneration to the moon. He would infer, that the Hebrews borrowed this practice from strange and idolatrous people. But he by no means proves this; and it is much more probable, that, without any design of imitating the Hebrews, the Gentiles thought fit to honour the moon at the beginning of the month; that is, her first appearance.

NEW TESTAMENT. See BIBLE—GOSPELS—ACTS—EPISTLES—INSPIRATION—SCRIPTURE.

NEWTON, SIR ISAAC, the greatest of philosophers, was born December 25, 1642, at Colsterworth, in Lincolnshire, and early displayed a talent for mechanics and drawing. On one occasion, having been sent to market with eorn and other products of the farm, young Newton left the sale of his goods to a servant, while he himself retired to a hay-loft at an inn in Grantham, to ruminate over the problems of Euclid and the laws of Kepler; in which situation his uncle happened to find him, probably meditating discoveries of his own, which should eclipse the glory of his predecessors. He was educated at Grantham school, and at Trinity College, Cambridge, and studied mathematics with the utmost assiduity. In 1667, he obtained a fellowship; in 1669, the mathematical professorship; and in 1671, he became a member of the Royal Society. It was during his abode at Cambridge that he made his three great discoveries,—of fluxions, the nature of light and colours, and the law of gravitation. To the last of these his attention was first turned by his seeing an apple fall from a tree. "The Principia," which unfolded to the world the theory of the universe, was not published till 1687. In that year also Newton was chosen one of the delegates to defend the privileges of the university against James II.; and in 1688 and 1701 he was elected one of the members of the university. He was appointed warden of the Mint in 1696; was made master of it in 1699; was chosen president of the Royal Society in 1703; and was knighted in 1705. He died March 20, 1727.

His "Observations on the Prophecies of Daniel and the Apocalypse" appeared in 1733, in quarto. "It is astonishing," says Dr. Hutton, "what care and industry Newton employed about the papers relating to chronology, church history, &c.; as, on examining them, it appears that many are copied over and over again, often with little or no variation." All the works of this eminent philosopher were published by Dr. Samuel Horsley, 1779, in five volumes quarto; and an English translation of his "Philosophiæ Naturalis Principia Mathematica" is extant.

The character of this great man has been thus drawn by Mr. Hume, at the close of his History of England: "In Newton, this island may boast of having produced the greatest and rarest genius that ever rose for the ornament and instruction of the human species. Cautious in admitting no principles but such as were founded on experiment; but resolute to adopt every such principle, however new or unusual: from modesty, ignorant of his superiority above the rest of mankind; and thence less careful to accommodate his reasonings to common apprehensions: more anxious to merit than acquire fame: he was from these causes, long unknown to the world; but his reputation at last broke out with a lustre which scarcely any writer, during his own lifetime, had ever before attained. While Newton seemed to draw off the veil from some of the mysteries of nature, he showed at the same time the imperfections of the mechanical philosophy; and thereby restored her ultimate secrets to that obscurity in which they ever did and ever will remain."

The remains of Sir Isaac Newton were interred in Westminster Abbey, where a magnificent monument is erected to his memory, with a Latin inscription, concluding thus: "Let mortals congratulate themselves that so great an ornament of human nature has existed." His character is shown by Dr. Brewster to have been that of the orthodox, humble, and sincere Christian. Of nature, antiquity, and the Holy Scriptures, he was a diligent, sagacious, and faithful interpreter. He maintained, by his philosophy, the dignity of the SUPREME BEING; and in his manners he exhibited the simplicity of the gospel. "I seem to myself," he said, "to be like a child, picking up a shell here and there on the shore of the great ocean of truth."

NIBHAZ, a god of the Avites. 2 Kings xvii. 31.

NICANOR, a king of Syria. (See MACEABEES.) This is the name also of one of the seven deacons chosen by the primitive Church at Jerusalem, and ordained by the apostles. Acts vi. 5.

NICENE CREED. See CREED.

NICODEMUS, a disciple of Jesus, but secretly, for fear of the Jews. He was a Pharisee by religious profession, a man of rank, and a member of the Sanhedrim or chief council of the Jews. Anxious to learn the doctrines which Christ taught, he came to him by night, and conversed with him upon the vitally important subject of regeneration. So much had he profited by the instructions of Jesus, that we find him at an after period venturing to speak publicly in his favour. John vii. 50. He joined Joseph of Arimathea also in paying the last duties to the remains of the crucified Redeemer. John xix. 39. Nothing more is recorded in Scripture concerning Nicodemus.

NICOLAS, a proselyte of Antioch, and one of the first deacons of the primitive church. Acts vi. 5. Though his eminent piety thus raised him to office in the church, his memory has been tarnished by an alleged blemish which gave rise to the sect of the Nicolaitanes. It is much doubted, however, whether Nicolas the deacon was the same person with the founder of the heretical sect.

NICOLAITANES, heretics who assumed this name from Nicolas of Antioch; who, being a Gentile by birth, first embraced Judaism and then Christianity; when his zeal and devotion recommended him to the Church of Jerusalem, by whom he was chosen one of the first deacons. Many of the primitive writers believed that Nicolas was rather the occasion than the author of the infamous practices of those who assumed his name, who were expressly condemned by the Spirit of God himself. Rev. ii. 6. And, indeed, their opinions and actions were highly extravagant and criminal. They allowed a community of wives, and made no distinction between ordinary meats and those offered to idols. According to Eusebius, they subsisted but a short time; but Tertullian says that they only changed their name, and that their heresies passed into the sect of the CAINITES (which see).

NICOPOLIS, a city mentioned by Paul in his Epistle to Titus (iii. 12); and which was probably a city of Macedonia, founded by Augustus in commemoration of his victory over Antony at Actium. Others, however, suppose that it was a city of Thraee, near the river Nessus.

NIDDUL. See EXCOMMUNICATION.

NIGER, the surname of Simeon, mentioned in Acts xiii. 1. He was a teacher at Antioch, and was engaged in the solemn work of setting apart Saul and Barnabas for the mission which the Holy Ghost had assigned to them. Epiphanius mentions the name of Niger as one of the seventy disciples of our Lord; whom he sent forth to preach the gospel, and perform wonderful works in his name; and it is not unlikely that this is the same person who is referred to in the Acts of the Apostles. It has been alleged by some that Simeon Niger is identical with Simon the Cyrenian, who carried the cross of Christ; but of this there is no evidence whatever, except that the names somewhat resemble each other. No names, however, occurred more frequently among the Jews than did Simon and Simeon.

NIGHT. In the reckoning of the ancient Hebrews, the day was considered as commencing, not as with us in the morning, but in the evening. Hence the statement in Gen. i., "The evening and the morning were the first day." "Before the captivity, the night was divided into three parts, called watches, because they were severally the periods of time which watchmen were required to spend in their nightly service before they could retire from their posts. They were named the first, the middle, and the morning watch. In the time of Christ, the Roman and Greek method of dividing the night into four watches was in use among the Jews. It was also, like the day, measured into twelve equal hours, from sunset to sunrise. The first watch, or evening, lasted till about nine o'clock of our time; the second, or midnight, from nine to twelve; the third, or cock-crowing, from twelve to three; the fourth, or morning, from three till it was day. All of them are mentioned in our Saviour's exhortation: 'Watch ye, therefore; for ye know not when the master of the house cometh, at even, or at midnight, or at the cock-crowing, or in the morning.' Mark xiii. 35. The Jews were accustomed to distinguish the last-mentioned period into the first, the second, and the third crowing. Thus it was foretold of Peter: 'Before the cock crow twice, thou shalt deny me thrice' (Mark xiv. 30); even as it accordingly happened; the cock crew directly after his first denial, and then crew a second time after the third. The other evangelists write: 'before the cock crow,' or, 'the cock shall not crow till thou hast denied me thrice.' They referred to the whole time of cock-crowing, meaning that this should not be over before this melancholy fall would all take place, as it did in fact before it was half over. Or it may have been so said because the second crowing was the one principally regarded in the course of that watch, and so was readily understood to be meant when one only, by way of distinction, was mentioned."

NIGHT-HAWK (techemem), Lev. xi. 16; Dent. xiv. 15. That this is a voracious bird, seems clear from the import of its name; and interpreters are generally agreed to describe it as flying by night. On the whole, it should seem to be the Strix Orientalis, which Hasselquist thus describes: "It is of the size of the common owl, and lodges in the large buildings or ruins of Egypt and Syria, and sometimes even in the dwelling-houses. The Arabs settled in Egypt call it 'Massasa,' and the Syrians 'Banu.' It is extremely voracious in Syria: to such a degree, that if care is not taken to shut the windows at the coming on of the night, he enters the houses and kills the children: the women, therefore, are very much afraid of him."

NILE, the great river which flows through the valley of Egypt, and falls into the Mediterranean Sea. It is to this noble river that Egypt owes its fertility, and even its existence; and, accordingly, in ancient times it was worshipped as a deity, and had its appointed priests, festivals, and sacrifices. Even at the present day it is termed by the Moslems, "The Most Holy River," and its benefits are still celebrated.

ed by a variety of religious rites. The Nile is described in Scripture by the name of "the river." Exod. vii. 15, 18. It is remarkable for an annual inundation, which is occasioned by the periodical rains that fall within the tropics. The fertility of the country depends on the waters reaching a certain height; for if they do not, famine is the result; and if they exceed this height, whole villages are in danger of being swept away.

The expression, "The River of Egypt," is not always to be understood of the Nile, for there is a small stream, the Sihor, which also bears that name.

NIMRAH, a city of Gad, or rather of Reuben, east of the Dead Sea. Numb. xxxii. 3. Calmet thinks that Nemra, Nimra, Nimrim, Nemrim, and Beth-nemra, are the same city. Jeremiah (xlviii. 34) speaks of Nimrim and its pleasant waters; Isaiah (xv. 6) also mentions the waters of Nimrim. Jerome says, that Nimrim is situated on the Dead Sea, and takes name from the bitterness of its waters.

NIMROD, supposed to be the son of Cush, and the founder of a mighty empire. "Out of that land," it is said (Gen. x. 11), meaning Babel, in the land of Shinar, "he went forth into Assyria," for such is the marginal reading, which by almost universal consent is to be preferred. Nimrod seems to have laid the foundation of two mighty empires—the Assyrian, whose seat was Nineveh, and the Babylonian, whose seat was Babylon. He is described by the sacred historian as "a mighty hunter before the Lord," which Professor Jahn thinks may refer to the celebrity which he had acquired from protecting the people against wild beasts. The Jerusalem paraphrast, however, explains the expression as denoting that he was a persecutor of the adherents of the true religion.

NINEVEH, the capital of the Assyrian empire. It was founded by Nimrod, or, as some translate Gen. x. 11, by Asshur, the son of Shem. It was for a long time doubtful on what precise spot Nineveh stood, but the recent researches of Layard and Botta have discovered its probable site on the east bank of the Tigris. Jonah describes it as having been "an exceeding great city." Diodorus states its walls to have been a hundred feet high, and so wide that three chariots could be driven upon them abreast. There were fifteen hundred towers upon the walls, all of them two hundred feet high. It was so strongly fortified that Sardanapalus made it his stronghold in his war with Arbaces the Mede. Finding himself vanquished, however, after three years' siege, he set fire to his palace, and perished amid his treasures. Nineveh again became a royal city, under Tiglath-Pileser, but it was utterly destroyed about B.C. 601. The prophets Nahum and Zephaniah foretold its destruction. Nothing now remains but a few shapeless mounds, which, by the indefatigable researches of Layard, have already yielded, and are still in course of yielding, valuable remains of the ancient grandeur and magnificence of Nineveh. The Rev. Dr Keith, in his valuable work on "Fulfilled Prophecy," thus illustrates the prophecies in reference to this remarkable city:—

The Book of Nahum was avowedly prophetic of the destruction of Nineveh; and it is there foretold that "the gates of the river shall be opened, and the palace shall be dissolved. Nineveh of old, like a pool of water, with an overflowing flood he will make an utter end of the place thereof." Nahum ii. 6, i. 8, 9.

The historian describes the facts by which the other predictions of the prophet were as literally fulfilled. He relates that the king of Assyria, elated with his former victories, and ignorant of the revolt of the Bactrians, had abandoned himself to scandalous inaction; had appointed a time of festivity, and supplied his soldiers with abundance of wine; and that the general of the enemy, apprized, by deserters, of their negligence and drunkenness, attacked the Assyrian army while the whole of them were fearlessly giving way to indulgence, destroyed great part of them, and drove the rest into the city. The words of the prophet were hereby verified: "While they be folden together as thorns, and while they are drunken as drunkards, they shall be devoured as stubble fully dry." Nahum i. 10. The prophet promised much spoil to the enemy: "Take the spoil of silver, take the spoil of gold; for there is none end of the store and glory out of all the pleasant furniture." Nahum ii. 9. And the historian affirms that many talents of gold and silver, preserved from the fire, were carried to Ecbatana. According to Nahum (iii. 15), the city was not only to be destroyed by an overflowing flood, but the fire, also, was to devour it; and, as Diodorus relates, partly by water, partly by fire, it was destroyed.

The utter and perpetual destruction and desolation of Nineveh were foretold: "The Lord will make an utter end of the place thereof. Affliction shall not rise up a second time; she is empty, void, and waste." Nahum i. 8, 9, ii. 10, iii. 17–19. And if now the only spot that bears its name, or that can be said to be the place where it was, be indeed the site of one of the most extensive cities on which the sun ever shone, and which continued for many centuries to be the capital of Assyria, the principal mounds, few in number, which show neither bricks, stones, nor other materials of building, but are in many places overgrown with grass, and resemble the mounds left by intrenchments and fortifications of ancient Roman camps, and the appearances of other mounds and ruins less marked than even these, extending for ten miles, and widely spread, and seeming to be the wreck of former buildings, show that Nineveh is left without one monument of royalty; without any token whatever of its splendour or wealth; that their place is not known where they were; and that it is indeed a desolation, "empty, void, and waste," its very ruins perished, and less than the wreck of what it was. Such an utter ruin, in every view, has been made of it; and such is the truth of the divine predictions.

NINUS, son of Belus the Assyrian, and founder of the Assyrian monarchy, A.M. 2737, about the time of the government of Deborah and Barak in Israel.

NISAN, anciently Abib, the seventh month of the civil year, but the first of the sacred among the Hebrews, because on the fifteenth day of that month they had departed out of Egypt. It began with the new moon that appeared immediately before harvest. This would take place generally in April of our time; but when the new moon of April did not occur till late in the month, the preceding one which appeared towards the end of March, would, we may suppose, be made the commencing point of the sacred year.

NISROCH, a god of the Assyrians. 2 Kings xix. 37.

NITRE (nether). Prov. xxv. 20; Jer. ii. 22. This is not the same that we call nitre, or saltpetre, but a native salt of a different kind, distinguished among naturalists by the name of natram. The natrum of the ancients was an earthy alkaline salt. It was found in abundance separated from the water of the Lake Natron, in Egypt. It rises from the bottom of the lake to the top of the water, and is there condensed by the heat of the sun into the hard and dry form in which it is sold. This salt thus scummed off is the same in all respects with the Smyrna soap earth. Pliny, Matthiolus, and Agricola, have described it to us; Hippocrates, Galen, Dioscorides, and others, mention its uses. It is found in great plenty in Scinde, a province in Hindustan, and in many other parts of the East; and might be had in any quantities. The learned Michaëlis plainly demonstrates, from the nature of the thing and the context, that this fossil and natural alkali must be that which the Hebrews called nether. Solomon must mean the same when he compares the effect which unseasonable mirth has upon a man in affliction to the action of vinegar upon nitre (Prov. xxv. 20); for vinegar has no effect upon what we call nitre, but upon the alkali in question has a great effect, making it rise up in bubbles with much effervescence. It is of a soapy nature, and was used to take spots from clothes, and even from the face. Jeremiah (ii. 22) alludes to this use of it.

NO, or NO-AMMON, a city of Egypt. See NOPH.

NOACHIDÆ, a name given to the children of Noah, and in general, to all men not of the chosen race of Abraham.

NOAH, the son of Lamech, born A.M. 1056. He was the grandson of Methuselah, and only the tenth in descent from Adam. In his day the earth had become so wicked, that the Lord repented that he had made man on the earth, and he resolved to destroy the whole world with a deluge. Noah alone was a just man and righteous before God, and he was accordingly commanded to build an ark, that he and his family might be saved. By faith he obeyed the divine warning, and he and his house survived the deluge. On leaving the ark, he built an altar, and offered a burnt-sacrifice to the Lord. The Lord accepted his sacrifice, and appointed the rainbow as a token of his covenant which he made with Noah, that he would no longer destroy the earth by a deluge. Noah survived the deluge three hundred and fifty years, and at his death left three sons, Shem, Ham, and Japheth, by whom the earth was peopled.

NOB, a sacerdotal city of Benjamin or Ephraim, not far from Jerusalem. When David was driven away by Saul he came to Nob, the priests of which city were slain by Saul. 1 Sam. xxii. 9, &c.; xxi. 1, &c.

NOBLEMAN. There has been no little difference of opinion respecting the sense of this word, which occurs in John iv. 46. The word, says Dr Campbell, "conveys the notion of hereditary rank and certain dignities, to which there was nothing in Palestine, or even in Syria, that corresponded." The ancient version of Tyndale has "ruler." Many judicious commentators interpret it "an officer of the royal court," and some have supposed it to refer to Chuza, Herod's steward.

NOD, LAND OF, a country which seems to have derived its name from Cain dwelling there, after having murdered his brother Abel. Nod is properly "the land of the murderer;" and the same word is used by David, in speaking of his own unsettled and wandering mode of life. "Thou tellest my wanderings." Ps. lvi. 8. The true situation of Nod is, not less than that of Eden, involved in much obscurity. Some suppose it to denote the parched and barren deserts of Arabia Petræa. This opinion, which is the most probable, was first broached by Grotius. Huët, however, fixes Nod in the south-east of Persia, Michaëlis towards China, and Calmet in Nysa. The only distinct information which Scripture gives as to its position is that it lay "on the east of Eden."

NOETIANS, Christian heretics in the third century, whose heresy consisted in affirming that there was but one person in the Godhead, and that the Word and the Holy Spirit were but external denominations given to God in consequence of different operations; that, as Creator, he is called Father; as incarnate, Son; and as descending on the apostles, Holy Ghost. See SABELLIANS.

"It is a characteristic fact," says Neander, "that when Noetus was cited before an assembly of presbyters, to answer for the erroneous doctrine of which he was accused, he alleged in his defence that his doctrine tended only to honour Christ. 'Of what evil am I guilty,' said he, 'when I glorify Christ?' The unity of God and Christ, this only God—was his motto. In proof of his doctrine, he referred to Rom. ix. 5, where Christ is called God over all; to the words of Christ, John x. 30, 'I and my Father are one;' perhaps also to the words, John xiv. 9, 'He that hath seen me, hath seen the Father.' It appears, from these examples, that Patripassianism appealed to the authority of St John's Gospel, as well as to others; and it is evident, how slight are the grounds furnished by the spread of such doctrines for presuming that this gospel was either not known to exist, or not received. If, in the case of Praxeas, we were still uncertain whether he made the distinction between God hidden within himself, and God in his self-manifestation, it is, on the other hand, clearly evident from the report of Theodoretus, that Noetus made a doctrine of this kind his very starting-point. There is one God, the Father, who is invisible when he pleases; and appears (manifests himself) when he pleases; but the same, whether visible or invisible, begotten or unbegotten. Theodoretus refers this last expression to the birth of Christ; but it may be doubted whether he has in this instance rightly taken the sense of the man; whether the latter had not in his mind the begetting of the Word; and by this he could have understood here nothing else than God's activity without himself. At all events, he must have so appropriated the Logos-doctrine of John as to understand by the Logos only a designation for God proceeding forth from his hidden essence—God revealing himself; the same God, denominated, in different relations, BEING and WORD."

NONCONFORMISTS, those who dissent from an Established Church, but generally applied to dissenters from the Church of England. It is the term most generally used when speaking of those ministers, to the number of nearly two thousand, who were ejected from their livings by the Act of Uniformity, in 1662. By this oppressive act these conscientious ministers were driven from their homes. An act had passed the year before, entitled the Corporation Act, which required as a test of adherence to the Established Church the receiving the communion in connection with that church, as a qualification for the acceptance of any public office in connection with a corporation. This, combined with the Act of Uniformity, bore hard upon the Non conformists; and their sufferings were aggravated by the Conventicle Act, which prohibited attendance at places of worship other than the Establishment, under penalties of fine and imprisonment, by the summary award of a magistrate. These hardships were followed by the Oxford Five Mile Act, by which all non-conforming ministers were prohibited from coming within five miles of any place where they had exercised their ministry, and from teaching any school. Some few took the oath; others who could not consequently suffered the penalty.

In the reign of George III. the Act for the Protection of Religious Worship superseded the Act of Toleration, by still more liberal provisions in favour of religious liberty; and in the reign of George IV. the Test and Corporation Acts were likewise repealed.

NONJURORS, those who refused to take the oaths to the House of Hanover, and were in consequence under certain incapacities, and liable to certain severe penalties. It can scarcely be said that there are any nonjurors now in the kingdom; and it is well known that, as well in Scotland as in England, all penalties have been removed both from Papists and Protestants formerly of that denomination.

NOON, the middle time of the day, when the sun is highest in his daily course; in modern language, when he is direct south, on the meridian of any place. 1 Kings xviii. 27; Ps. lv. 17. This time of the day being the brightest, is made a subject of comparison in several places of Scripture. Job v. 14; Ps. xxxvii. 6. The apostle Paul says the brightness in which he beheld the Lord Jesus was superior to that of the sun at noon. Acts xxvi. 13.

NOPH, an Egyptian city, referred to in Isa. xix. 13, and Jer. ii. 16. It is supposed to be the Noph of Hosea ix. 6, and the Memphis of profane writers. Its site was at that point of the Delta where the Nile separates into a variety of streams, and nearly opposite to the modern Cairo. It was the capital of ancient Egypt, the residence of the court of the Pharaohs, and the chief seat of Egyptian literature and worship. This city suffered from the Chaldeans under Nebuchadnezzar, and afterwards from the Persians under Cambyzes, who respectively accomplished the divine threatenings announced by Jeremiah (xliii. 8, 13), and Ezekiel (xxx. 13, 16). At a subsequent period it was rebuilt on a larger scale, and beautifully embellished, by the Ptolemies; and at the beginning of the Christian era it was, next to Alexandria, the most important and powerful city in Egypt. During the numerous revolutions to which that country was exposed, it continued to flourish till A.D. 640, when it was overthrown by the Saracens, and in its stead the modern city of Cairo rose on the opposite bank of the river. Of this ancient metropolis of Egypt, scarce a vestige now remains to mark the site. "We rode for miles," says Lord Lindsay, "through groves of palms and acacias, cultivated fields, and wastes of sand, over what we knew must be the site of Memphis, but Noph is indeed waste and desolate."

NORTH. The same word which, in Gen. xxviii. 14, denotes the north or regions of the north, is used in Song iv. 16 for the north wind. The Hebrews, when speaking of the cardinal points, invariably supposed a man to be standing with his face towards the east.

NOSE. When a bullock was intractable it was customary in the East to bore a hole in his nostrils, through which an iron or wooden ring was introduced, and attached to a rope, which, when pulled by the hand of the driver, gave him so complete a command over the most furious beast that he could turn it at will in any direction. A very beautiful allusion to this practice is found in Job xli. 2, "Canst thou put a hook into his nose?" The same figure is used in 2 Kings xix. 28, "Because thy rage against me and thy tumult is come up into mine ears, therefore I will put my hook in thy nose, and my bridle in thy lips, and I will turn thee back by the way by which thou camest."

NOSE-JEWELS. It is the custom in almost all Eastern countries for the women to wear rings in their noses, in some places in the right, in others in the left nostril, which is bored low down in the middle. These rings are of gold, and have commonly precious stones in them. It is to this custom probably that Abraham's servant refers, when he says in speaking of Rebekah, "And I put the ear-ring upon her face" (Gen. xxiv. 47), more properly, "I put the ring in her nose." Solomon probably refers to the same practice in Prov. xi. 22, "As a jewel of gold in a swine's snout, so is a fair woman which is without discretion." And Ezekiel also (xvi. 12), "And I put a jewel on thy forehead, and ear-rings in thine ears, and a beautiful crown upon thine head."

NOTHING. Idols are often called nothings, nonentities. "Ye which rejoice in a thing of nought." Amos vi. 13. Paul says: "We know that an idol is nothing in the world." 1 Cor. viii. 4.

NOURISH. (1.) To furnish with food. Gen. xlvii. 12; Acts xii. 20. (2.) Kindly to bring up. Acts vii. 21. (3.) To care for, or use all proper means to make to grow. Isa. xlv. 14. And to be nourished in the word of faith and good doctrine, is to be affectionately and carefully instructed in the true principles of the gospel, and well experienced in its power, for the edification, progress in holiness, and spiritual comfort of the soul. 1 Tim. iv. 6. Jesus Christ, and his fulness, as exhibited in the doctrines and promises of the Gospel, and applied by the Holy Ghost, are the nourishment by which the saints are delightfully instructed, comforted, and strengthened to every good word and work. Col. ii. 19.

NOVATIANS, a numerous body of zealous maintainers of orthodox doctrine, in the third century, who, notwithstanding the representations of their adversaries, have some just claims to be regarded as the pure, uncorrupted, and apostolic Church of Christ. They called themselves Cathari—that is, the pure; but they received their name of Novatians from their adversaries, after their distinguished leader, Novatian, who, in the year 251, was ordained the pastor of a church in the city of Rome, which maintained no fellowship with the (so-called) Catholic party.

The Novatians suffered severely by persecution, both from the Catholics on the one hand, and the Arians on the other, as each of the rival parties rose to power. Socrates, the historian, who seems to have been intimately acquainted with the affairs of the Novatians, says that the toleration which this class of Christians at length obtained of Valens, the Arian emperor, in 370, they owed, under Providence, to one Marcian, a presbyter of their Church in Constantinople, a man of learning and piety, who tutored two daughters of the emperor. This historian particularly mentions the liberality and kindness which the Novatians exercised towards such of the orthodox party as were the subjects of persecution, while they themselves were tolerated; a trait in their history which, even Milner is obliged to admit, "reflects an amiable lustre on the character of these Dissenters;" and for showing which benevolence, they actually incurred the displeasure of the reigning party. See WALDENSES.

NOVICE. See NEOPHYTE.

NOVITIATE, a year of probation appointed by the monastic orders for the trial of religious, whether or not they have a vocation, and the necessary qualities for living up to the rule, the observation whereof they are to bind themselves to by vow. The novitiate lasts a year at least, in some houses more. It is esteemed the bed of the civil death of the novice, who expires to the world by profession.

NUMBER. (1.) A reckoning of persons or things, whether they be few or many. Gen. xxxiv. 30. (2.) A society or company. Luke xxii. 3; Acts i. 17. So Matthias was numbered; that is, by suffrages he was added to the society of the apostles. Acts i. 26. The number of the Antichristian beast is six hundred and sixty-six. The numeral letters contained in his Greek name, Lateinos, Latin, or in his Hebrew one, Romiith, or Romish, or in Sethua, which signifies MYSTERY, when added together, amount to just six hundred and sixty-six. God numbered Belshazzar's kingdom, and finished it; allowed it to continue for the years he had determined, and not one day more. Dan. v. 26. He numbers men to the slaughter when he sets them apart by his providence to destruction and death, as a shepherd does his sheep to be slain. Isa. lxxv. 12. We number our days when we seriously consider how frail and short and uncertain our life is; how great the necessity and business of our souls; and what hindrances to it are in our way. Ps. xc. 12.

NUMBERS, BOOK OF, the fourth book of the Pentateuch, so called from its containing an account of the numbering of the children of Israel. It appears to have been written by Moses in the plains of Moab. The narrative contained in this book reaches from the beginning of the second year after the Exodus, to the eleventh month of the fiftieth year of the wanderings of the Israelites. The greater part of the book is historical, but it contains one prediction of the Messiah in chap. xxiv, 17, 19, "I shall see him, but not now; I shall behold him, but not nigh: there shall come a Star out of Jacob, and a Sceptre shall rise out of Israel, and shall smite the corners of Moab, and destroy all the children of Sheth. Out of Jacob shall come he that shall have dominion, and shall destroy him that remaineth of the city."

NUN, in Roman Catholic countries, a woman who devotes herself, in a cloister or nunnery, to a religious life. See MONK.

NUNCIO, an ambassador from the Pope to some prince or state. He is the Pope's ambassador as the internuncio is his envoy extraordinary. A nuncio has a jurisdiction, and may delegate judges in all the states where he resides, except in France, where he has no authority beyond that of a simple ambassador. Formerly nuncios were despatched to provincial synods, where they presided, and gave forth decisions in the name of the Pope in the most important ecclesiastical affairs.

NUNNERY. See MONASTERY.

NURSE. The utmost attention is paid in the east to the nurse, who is considered to this day as a kind of second parent, and treated with the utmost kindness. When an oriental bride sets out for the house of her husband, she is accompanied by her nurse, who resides with her as a companion and adviser. Hence Gen. xxiv. 59, "And they sent away Rebekah their sister, and her nurse, and Abraham's servant, and his men." In Hindostan the nurse is not looked upon as a stranger, but becomes one of the family, and passes the remainder of her life in the midst of the children she has suckled, by whom she is honoured and cherished as a second mother. In many parts of Hindostan are mosques and mausoleums, built by the Mohammedan princes, near the sepulchres of their nurses. They are excited by a grateful affection to erect these structures in memory of those who, with maternal anxiety, watched over their helpless infancy. Thus it has been from time immemorial. See MOTHER.

NUTS. In Gen. xliii. 11, we find nuts mentioned, which are generally supposed to be the pistachio nut, the fruit of the Pistacia vera of Linnæus, a kind of oblong nut, resembling hazel nuts, but in a double shell, and flat on one side. The word also occurs in Cant. vi. 11: "I went down into the garden of nuts to see the fruits of the valley, and to see whether the vine flourished, and the pomegranates budded." The word rendered nuts in our version, is rendered almonds in the Greek translation of the Seventy. Dr Shaw thinks it ought to be translated by the word walnuts.

NYMPHAS, the name of a Christian mentioned in Col. iv. 15. He had a church or congregation in his house, as we find in Rom. xvi. 5. Grotius thinks that the name is contracted for Nymphodorus, but this is not likely.

O.

OAK, one of the largest, most durable, and useful of forest trees. It has been renowned from remotest antiquity, and held in great veneration, particularly among idolatrous nations.

Celsius judges that the Hebrew words mentioned in some places signify the "terebinthus judaica," the terebinth; but that allon signifies an oak, and is derived from a root denoting strength. That different trees are meant by these different words is certain, from Gen. xxxv. 4, 8; Isa. vi. 16; and Hosea iii. 13; and probably they signify the trees he mentions.

The terebinth under which Abraham entertained three angels (Gen. xviii.) is very famous in antiquity. Josephus says that six furlongs from Hebron they showed a very large terebinth, which the inhabitants of the country thought to be as old as the world itself. Eusebius assures us that in his time the terebinth of Abraham was still to be seen, and that the people, both Christians and Gentiles, held it in great veneration, as well for the sake of Abraham as of the heavenly guests he entertained under it. St Jeromy says that this terebinth was two miles from Hebron. Sozomen places it fifteen stadia from this city; and an old itinerary puts it at two miles. These varieties might make one doubt whether the tree of which Josephus speaks were the same as that of Eusebius, Jerome, and Sozomen.

The terebinth of Jacob (Gen. xxxv. 4), where he buried the gods that his people had brought out of Mesopotamia, was behind the city of Shechem, and was very different from that where Abraham had set up his tent near Hebron, yet they have very absurdly been confounded together. It is thought to have been under the same terebinth that Joshua (xxiv. 5, 6) renewed the covenant with the Lord; and that Abimelech, the son of Gideon, was made king by the Shechemites. Judges ix. 6.

OATH, a solemn affirmation, wherein we appeal to God as a witness of the truth of what we say, and with an imprecation of his vengeance, or a renunciation of his favour, if what we affirm be false or what we promise be not performed.

"The forms of oaths," says Dr. Paley, "like other religious ceremonies, have in all ages been various; consisting, however, for the most part, of some bodily action, and of a prescribed form of words." Among the Jews, the juror held up his right hand towards heaven. Ps. cxliv. 8; Rev. x. 5. The same form is retained in Scotland still. Among the Jews, also, an oath of fidelity was taken by the servant's putting his hand under the thigh of his lord. Gen. xxiv. 2. Among the Greeks and Romans, the form varied with the subject and occasion of the oath. In private contracts, the parties took hold of each other's hands, while they swore to the performance; or they touched the altar of the god by whose divinity they swore: upon more solemn occasions, it was the custom to slay a victim; and the beast being struck down, with certain ceremonies and invocations, gave birth to the expression ferire pactum; and to our English phrase, translated from this, of "striking a bargain." The form of oaths in Christian countries is also very different.

The Quakers and Moravians refuse to take oaths in any circumstances, adducing in vindication of their conduct our Lord's exhortation in Matt. v. 34-36. "But I say unto you, Swear not at all; neither by heaven; for it is God's throne: nor by the earth; for it is his footstool: neither by Jerusalem; for it is the city of the great King. Neither shalt thou swear by thy head, because thou canst not make one hair white or black." These words have sometimes been regarded as absolutely prohibiting the use of oaths even on the most solemn occasions or in courts of law. And on the ground of this single passage, some sects, both in ancient and modern times, have denied the lawfulness of an oath, and have regarded it as sinful to swear upon any occasion. But it is quite plain from the illustrations which our Lord here uses that he is referring to profane swearing in ordinary conversation, and not to oaths for solemn and important purposes. Besides, he himself lent the force of his example in favour of the lawfulness of oaths in courts of law. Thus, when the high priest put him upon oath, using the solemn form, "I adjure thee by the living God that thou tell us whether thou be the Christ the Son of God;" though he had hitherto remained silent, he now acknowledges the power of the appeal, and instantly replies, "Thou hast said." There are many examples of oaths both in the Old and in the New Testament, and more especially the prophet Jeremiah (iv. 2) lays down the inward animating principles by which we ought to be regulated in taking an oath on solemn and important occasions. "And thou shalt swear, The Lord liveth, in truth, in judgment, and in righteousness; and the nations shall bless themselves in him; and in him shall they glory."

Our Lord must not therefore be understood, in using the apparently general command, "Swear not at all," as declaring it to be sinful on all occasions to resort to an oath, but he is obviously pointing out to the Jews that the third commandment, which had hitherto been limited by the scribes to false swearing by the name Jehovah, extended to all profane, needless, irreverent appeals to God, whether directly or indirectly. This command, as if he had said, reaches not only to the judicial crime of perjury, of which even human laws can take cognizance, but to the sin of profane swearing, of which human laws take no cognizance at all. Ye say, "Thou shalt not forswear thyself, but shalt perform unto the Lord thine oaths." But I say, Swear not at all, even by those oaths which are so current among you, and which, because the name of God is not directly included in them, you regard as comparatively innocent. Such a plea cannot be for a moment sustained. If you swear at all, whether you mention the name of God or not, you can only be understood as appealing for the truth of your statement to the great Searcher of Hearts, who alone can attest the truth and sincerity of what you affirm.

OBADIAH, one of the minor prophets. Various opinions have been entertained concerning his history. The ordinary Jewish idea, which is the same with that of Jerome, is that the prophet was identical with the governor of Ahab's house. Others think that he is the same person who is mentioned in 2 Chron. xxxiv. 12. Newcome alleges that he must have been contemporary with Jeremiah. The book of Obadiah consists of a single chapter, which treats of the destruction of the Edomites, and the future restoration and prosperity of the Jews.

OBAL, the name of one of the sons of Joktan. Gen. x. 28. Bochart thinks that an Arabian people was descended from him.

OBED-EDOM, son of Jeduthun, a Levite, in whose house the ark of the Lord abode, and brought a blessing with it. 1 Chron. xvi. 38. In 2 Sam. vi. 10, he is called the Gittite, probably because he was of Gath-rimmon, a city of the Levites beyond Jordan. Josh. xxi. 24, 25.

OBEDIENCE, the performance of the commands of a superior. In religion, it must be animated by love.

Obedience to God may be considered, (1.) As virtual, which consists in a belief of the Gospel, of the holiness and equity of its precepts, of the truth of its promises, and a true repentance of all our sins. (2.) Actual obedience, which is the practice and exercise of the several graces and duties of Christianity. (3.) Perfect obedience, which is the exact conformity of our hearts and lives to the law of God, without the least imperfection. This last is peculiar to a glorified state, though it should be our aim in this.

The obligation we are under to obedience arises, (1.) From the relation we stand in to God as creatures. Ps. xcv. 6. (2.) From the law he hath revealed to us in his Word. Ps. cxix. 3; 2 Pet. i. 5-7. (3.) From the blessings of his providence we are constantly receiving. Acts xiv. 17; Ps. cxlv. (4.) From the love and goodness of God in the grand work of redemption. 1 Cor. vi. 20.

As to the nature of this obedience, it must be, (1.) Active, not only avoiding what is prohibited, but performing what is commanded. Col. iii. 8-10. (2.) Personal, for though Christ has obeyed the law for us as a covenant of works, yet he hath not abrogated it as a rule of life. Rom. vii. 22, iii. 31. (3.) Sincere. Ps. li. 6; 1 Tim. i. 5. (4.) Affectionate, springing from love, and not from terror. 1 John v. 19, ii. 5; 2 Cor. v. 14. (5.) Diligent, not slothful. Gal. i. 16; Ps. xviii. 44; Rom. xii. 11. (6.) Conspicuous and open. Phil. ii. 15; Matt. v. 16. (7.) Universal; not one duty, but all must be performed. 2 Pet. i. 5-10. (8.) Perpetual, at all times, places, and occasions. Rom. ii. 7; Gal. vi. 9.

The advantages of obedience are these: (1.) It adorns the gospel. Tit. ii. 10. (2.) It is evidential of grace. 2 Cor. v. 17. (3.) It rejoices the hearts of the ministers and people of God. 3 John 3; 1 Thess. ii. 19, 20. (4.) It silences gainsayers. 2 Pet. i. 11, 12. (5.) Encourages the saints, while it reproves the lukewarm. Matt. v. 16. (6.) Affords peace to the subject of it. Ps. xxv. 12, 13; Acts xxiv. 16. (7.) It powerfully recommends religion, as that which is both delightful and practicable. Col. i. 10. (8.) It is the forerunner and evidence of eternal glory. Rom. vi. 22; Rev. xxii. 14. See HOLINESS—SANCTIFICATION.

OBEDIENCE OF CHRIST, is generally divided into active and passive. His active obedience implies what he did; his passive, what he suffered. Some divines distinguish these. They refer our pardon to his passive, and our title to glory to his active obedience: though Dr. Owen observes, that it cannot be clearly evinced that there is any such thing, in propriety of speech, as passive obedience: obeying is doing, to which passion or suffering doth not belong.

Of the active obedience of Christ, the Scriptures assure us that he took upon him the form of a servant, and really became one. Isa. xlix. 3; Phil. ii. 5-11; Heb. viii. He was subject to the law of God. "He was made under the law"—the judicial or civil law of the Jews, the ceremonial law, and the moral law. Matt. xvii. 24-27; Luke ii. 22; Ps. xl. 7, 8. He was obedient to the law of nature; he was in a state of subjection to his parents; and he fulfilled the commands of his heavenly Father as it respected the first and second table.

His obedience, (1.) Was voluntary. Ps. xl. 6. (2.) Complete. 1 Pet. ii. 22. (3.) Wrought out in the room and stead of his people. Rom. x. 4, v. 19. (4.) Well pleasing and acceptable in the sight of God. (5.) Followed by a glorious reward. Phil. ii. 9. See ATONEMENT.

OBLATION, an offering. See SACRIFICE.

OBLIGATION, is that by which we are bound to the performance of any action. (1.) Rational obligation is that which arises from reason, abstractedly taken, to do or forbear certain actions. (2.) Authoritative obligation is that which arises from the commands of a superior, or one who has a right or authority to prescribe rules to others. (3.) Moral obligation is that by which we are bound to perform that which is right, and to avoid that which is wrong. It is a moral necessity of doing actions or forbearing them; that is, such a necessity as whoever breaks through it, is, ipso facto, worthy of blame for so doing. (See MORAL OBLIGATION.) We find, however, that the generality of men are so far sunk in depravity, that a sense of moral obligation is nearly or quite lost. Still, however, their losing the sense of it does not render the obligation less strong. "Obligation to virtue is eternal and immutable, but the sense of it is lost by sin."

OBOOTH, one of the stations where the Israelites encamped in the wilderness. Numb. xxxiii. 43.

OBSERVATION. See MIND.

OFFENCE. The original word (skandalizo), in our version, usually rendered offend, literally signifies to cause to stumble, and by an easy metaphor, to occasion a fall into sin. Matt. v. 29. It may therefore apply to ourselves as well as to others. Matt. xviii. 6-14. Hence the noun, skandalon, signifies not only an offence, in our common use of that word, but also a stumbling-stone, a trap, a snare, or whatever impedes our path to heaven. Matt. xviii. 7; Rom. xiv. 13; 1 Cor. x. 32. Sometimes offence is taken unreasonably; men, as Peter says, stumble at the word, being disobedient. Hence we read of the offence of the cross. Gal. v. 11, vi. 12. To positive truth or duty we must adhere, even at the hazard of giving offence; but a woe is on us if we give it without necessity of this holy nature. Rom. xiv. 13-21; 1 Cor. viii. 9-13.

OFFERING, or OBLATION, denotes whatever is sacrificed or consumed in the worship of God. For an account of the various offerings under the law, the reader is referred to the Book of Leviticus. See SACRIFICE.

OFFICERS, CHURCH. See CHURCH—DEACON—ELDER—BISHOP.

OFFICES OF CHRIST are generally considered as threefold. (1.) A prophet to enlighten, warn, and instruct. John vi. 14, iii. 2. (2.) A priest to sympathize, intercede, and make atonement for his people. Isa. liii.; Heb. vii. (3.) A king to reign in, rule over, protect, deliver, and bless them. Zech. xiv. 9; Ps. ii. 6. See JESUS CHRIST—INTERCESSION—MEDIATOR, &c.

OG, a king of Bashan, who is described in the Old Testament as one of the Rephaim, or race of giants. To give an idea of his immense stature, his bedstead, which was of iron, is thus spoken of, Deut. iii. 11, "For only Og king of Bashan remained of the remnant of giants; behold, his bedstead was a bedstead of iron; is it not in Rabbath of the children of Ammon? nine cubits was the length thereof, and four cubits the breadth of it, after the cubit of a man." The measure here referred to shows that the bedstead of Og was thirteen feet six inches in length, and six feet in breadth. The bed was long preserved in Rabbath, the capital city of the Ammonites.

OIL. So much was the olive-tree cultivated in Palestine, even from the earliest times, that oil was an extensive article of commerce among the Jews. The best sort of oil was mixed with spices, and used for ointment; the inferior sort was used with food, or burnt in lamps, and also medicinally employed.

Luke x. 34. In sacrifices the use of oil was commanded. Lev. ii. 1, 5; vi. 15. As olive-trees were not generally cultivated in Egypt, we find the Jews sending presents of oil to the kings of that country. Hos. xii. 1. Large quantities of oil were used by the Israelites in the preparation of their food and in anointing their persons. Oil specially prepared was used in consecrating their prophets, their high-priests, and also their kings. Hence such officers are often spoken of as "the anointed." Thus 1 Sam. xxiv. 6, "And he said unto his men, The Lord forbid that I should do this thing unto my master, the Lord's anointed, to stretch forth mine hand against him, seeing he is the anointed of the Lord." More especially is Jesus Christ described as the Messiah and the Christ, both of which words signify "anointed." In speaking of the consecration of the Mediator to his threefold office of Prophet, Priest, and King, David says, Ps. xlv. 7, "Thou lovest righteousness, and hatest wickedness: therefore God, thy God, hath anointed thee with the oil of gladness above thy fellows." Oil is also used in Scripture as the symbol of abundance, fertility, and joy. The Apostle James says, v. 14, "Is any sick among you? let him call for the elders of the church; and let them pray over him, anointing him with oil in the name of the Lord." This passage is generally adduced by the Roman Catholics in support of the ceremony of extreme unction,—a rite, however, which was unknown in the church till towards the end of the twelfth century. The Greek Church use extreme unction also, appealing in its favour to oral tradition. The rite is administered, both by the Roman and Greek Churches, only when the party is judged beyond recovery, whereas it appears plain that the exhortation of James is designed for the recovery of the sick, and, accordingly, Solomon speaks of oil as rejoicing the heart.

OINTMENT. Perfumed ointments are frequently mentioned in Scripture, and in Exod. xxx. 23-25 we find express directions given for the preparation of a holy ointment, with which the tabernacle and all its vessels and furniture were to be anointed. Perfumed ointment was used also in Eastern countries for anointing guests at all entertainments. To this practice Solomon alludes, Prov. xxvii. 9, "Ointment and perfume rejoice the heart: so doth the sweetness of a man's friend by hearty counsel." And David, Ps. xxiii. 5, "Thou preparest a table before me in the presence of mine enemies: thou anointest my head with oil; my cup runneth over." We find also Mary Magdalene pouring precious ointment upon the head of Jesus as he sat at meat in the house of Simon the Pharisee. Nor is this custom even now discontinued in the East, but on all joyful occasions, as at marriages, and on festive occasions, the head is anointed with perfumed ointment, and it is still accounted, as it was in the days of our Lord, a mark of respect to pour oil upon the head.

OLD. Old is spoken of what is decaying (Isa. 1. 9; Heb. vii. 13); of what has been destroyed (2 Pet. ii. 5); of former times (Lam. i. 7).

The old man (Rom. vi. 6), the old Adam, in a moral sense, is our corrupted nature, which we ought to crucify with Christ, that the body of sin may die in us. In Col. iii. 9, 10, the apostle enjoins us "to put off the old man with his deeds, and to put on the new man, which is renewed in knowledge after the image of him that created him." And in Eph. iv. 22, we are instructed "to put off the old man, which is corrupt according to the deceitful lusts."

OLD TESTAMENT. See BIBLE—CANON—TESTAMENT.

OLIVES, MOUNT OF, is east of Jerusalem and valley of Jehoshaphat. Travellers tell us that from the brow of this mountain the view of Jerusalem is most complete and commanding. Hence the observation of the evangelist (Luke xix. 41), that Jesus beheld the city, and wept over it, acquires additional force. The following is the description given of the commanding view from the top of Mount Olivet, by Mr. Wylie, in his "Modern Judea:" "Let the traveller ascend the top of Mount Olivet, and look from thence; he gazes on scenes than which the world contains none more celebrated. Below him is the daughter of Zion still seated amidst those hills and valleys and streams which encompassed her of old; bereft of all beauty save of that nameless glory which they borrow from the past—a glory which the decorations of art cannot give, nor the destructive rage of barbarism take away. On such a spot the mind becomes utterly oblivious to the events of the present hour, and can think only of the men and scenes over which two thousand years have now rolled. We look down on the silent city, on the forms which are seen in its streets, on the bare and melancholy hills around, and we ask ourselves, with the poet, if these be indeed

—The towers that gleamed on high
So saintly in the morning sky,
Where power, and worth, and wisdom dwelt,
Where David sang and Samuel knelt.

"It would require a long history to recount the varied scenes of grandeur and misery over which this mount has looked. It saw the infant Jerusalem rise under the sway of Melchizedek, attain its glory under that of David and Solomon, and sink in ashes beneath the dark wings of the Roman eagle. It soon beheld another city, inheriting the name and the evil fortunes, but nothing of the splendour, of its illustrious predecessor, rise on the same site, to be scourged by turus by war, and famine, and pestilence. How often has it seen the heights around glitter with the arms of invading foes—the Persian, the Saracen, the Christian crusader, and the Turk; hosts mustering where prophets trod, and its valleys resounding the war-cry of the prophet! It now beholds a servile and alien race living in "the city where David dwelt," and an idolatrous shrine proudly seated on the mount where the Hebrew fathers worshipped. Amid all the changes which Jerusalem has undergone, Mount Olivet has watched faithfully beside it. When the city was in its splendour, Olivet too was gay with gardens and olives. But now that the city is desolate, the mountain wears a covering of sackcloth, and stands there to mourn, when dead, the city it loved to adorn and defend when living."

OLIVE-TREE. This tree is frequently mentioned in Scripture: thus in Judg. ix. 9; Matt. xxi. 1; Rom. xi. 17, 24. It is much valued in oriental countries on account of its oil. It is very commonly found in the countries bordering on the Mediterranean, but rarely attains any great size. Probably from this tree the mountain in the neighbourhood of Jerusalem, and commanding a view of the city from the east, was called the Mount of Olives, and the garden which lay at its foot Gethsemane, or the Press of Oil.

The cultivated olive-tree is of a moderate height, its trunk knotty, its bark smooth, and ash-coloured; its wood is solid and yellowish; the leaves are oblong, almost like those of the willow, of a green colour, dark on the upper side, and white on the under side. In the month of June it puts out white flowers that grow in bunches. Each flower is of one piece, widening upwards, and dividing into four parts—the fruit oblong and plump. It is first green, then pale, and when it is quite ripe, black. In the flesh of it is enclosed a hard stone, full of an oblong seed. The wild olive is smaller in its parts.

Canaan much abounded with olives. It seems almost every proprietor, whether king or subject, had his olive yard. The olive branch was, from most ancient times, used as the symbol of reconciliation and peace. The sacred writers often use similes taken from the olive.

OLYMPAS, the name of one of the brethren at Rome, to whom Paul (Rom. xvi. 15) sends his salutation.

OMEGA, the last letter of the Greek alphabet. See ALPHA.

OMEN is a word which, in its proper sense, signifies a sign or indication of some future event, especially of an alarming nature. Against the belief of omens it is observed, that it is contrary to every principle of sound philosophy; and whoever has studied the writings of Paul must be convinced that it is inconsistent with the spirit of genuine Christianity.

OMER, or GOMER, a measure of capacity among the Hebrews, little more than five pints English corn measure.

OMNIPOTENCE OF GOD is his almighty power. This is essential to his nature as an infinite, independent, and perfect being.

The power of God is divided into absolute and ordinate, or actual. Absolute, is that whereby God is able to do that which he will not do, but which is possible to be done. Ordinate is that whereby he doeth that which he hath decreed to do.

The power of God may be more especially seen—(1.) In creation. Rom. i. 20; Gen. i. (2.) In the preservation of his creatures. Heb. i. 3; Col. i. 16, 17; Job xxvi. (3.) In the redemption of men by Christ. Luke i. 65–69; Eph. i. 19. (4.) In the conversion of sinners. Ps. li. 13; 2 Cor. iv. 7–12; Rom. i. 16. (5.) In the continuation and success of the gospel in the world. Matt. xiii. 31, 32. (6.) In the final perseverance of the saints. 1 Pet. i. 5. (7.) In the resurrection of the dead. 1 Cor. xv. (8.) In making the righteous happy for ever, and punishing the wicked. Phil. iii. 21; Matt. xxv. 34–46.

OMNIPRESENCE OF GOD, is his ubiquity, or his being present in every place.

This may be argued from his infinity (Ps. cxxxix.), his power, which is everywhere (Heb. i. 3), his providence (Acts xvii. 27, 28), which supplies all. As he is a Spirit, he is so omnipresent as not to be mixed with the creatures or divided, part in one place, and part in another; nor is he multiplied or extended, but is essentially present every where. Dr Watson says:—

“Among metaphysicians, it has been matter of dispute whether God is present everywhere by an infinite extension of his essence. This is the opinion of Newton, Dr. S. Clarke, and their followers; others have objected to this notion, that it might then be said, God is neither in heaven nor in earth, but only a part of God in each. The former opinion, however, appears most in harmony with the Scriptures, though the term extension, through the inadequacy of language, conveys too material an idea. The objection just stated is wholly grounded on notions taken from material objects, and is therefore of little weight, because it is not applicable to an immaterial substance. That we cannot comprehend how God is fully, and completely, and undividedly present every where, need not surprise us, when we reflect that the manner in which our own minds are present with our bodies, is as incomprehensible as the manner in which the Supreme Mind is present with every thing in the universe.”

From the consideration of this attribute we should learn to fear and reverence God (Ps. lxxxix. 7), to derive consolation in the hour of distress (Isa. xliii. 2; Ps. xlv. 1), to be active and diligent in holy services (Ps. cxix. 168).

OMNISCIENCE OF GOD is that perfection by which he knows all things; and is, (1.) Infinite knowledge. Ps. cxlvii. 5. (2.) Eternal, generally called foreknowledge. Acts xv. 18; Isa. xlv. 10; Eph. i. 4; Acts ii. 23. (3.) Universal, extending to all persons, times, places, and things. Heb. iv. 13; Ps. l. 10–23. (4.) Perfect, relating to what is past, present, and to come. He knows all, independently, distinctly, infallibly, and perpetually. Jer. x. 6, 7; Rom. xi. 33. (5.) This knowledge is peculiar to himself (Mark xiii. 32; Job xxxvi. 4), and not communicable to any creature. (6.) It is incomprehensible to us how God knows all things, yet it is evident that he does; for to suppose otherwise is to suppose him an imperfect being, and directly contrary to the revelation he has given of himself. Ps. cxxxix. 6;

The following remarks are from the pen of Dr Watson:—

“This attribute of God is constantly connected in Scripture with his omnipresence, and forms a part of almost every description of that attribute; for, as God is a Spirit, and therefore intelligent, if he is everywhere, if nothing can exclude him, not even the most solid bodies, nor the minds of intelligent beings, then are all things naked and open to the eyes of Him with whom we have to do. Where he acts, he is; and where he is, he perceives. He understands and considers things absolutely, and as they are in their own natures, powers, properties, differences, together with all the circumstances belonging to them. “Known unto him are all his works from the beginning of the world” rather (ap’ aiōnos), from all eternity known, before they were made, in their possible, and known, now they are made, in their actual, existence.

OMRI, a general who succeeded Elah, king of Israel, when that monarch was assassinated by Zimri, at the siege of Gibbethon. 1 Kings xvi. 9–28. After a long reign, remarkable for wickedness, he died at Samaria, B.C. 914, and was succeeded by his equally wicked son Ahab.

ON, or AVEN. See AVEN.

ONAN, son of Judah, and grandson of the patriarch Jacob. He was given in marriage to Tamar, after the death of his brother Ur, but was destroyed by the Lord, for the criminal mode in which he evaded compliance with the law of the Levirate. (See MARRIAGE—LEVIRATE.)

ONE, (1.) one only, besides which there is no other of the kind; so God is one, and Christ is the one Mediator and Master; but in the phrase God is one (Gal. iii. 20), it may denote one of the parties to be reconciled. 1 Tim. ii. 5; Eccles. xii. 11. (2.) The same, either in substance, as the divine persons are one (1 John v. 7; John x. 30); or in number: thus all the world had one language after the flood (Gen. xi. 1); or in kind; thus one plague was on the Philistines and their lands (1 Sam. vi. 4); or in object; so Paul that planted the Churches, and Apollos that watered them, were one in their general office and aim as ministers of Christ. 1 Cor. iii. 8. (3.) United together; so Christ and his people are one; they are one by his representing them in the covenant of grace, and are united to him by his Spirit dwelling in them, and by their faith and love to him, their intimate fellowship with him, and their likeness to him; and they are one among themselves. They are all members of his one mystical body; have one Lord, one spirit, one faith, one baptism, one hope; love one another, possess the same privileges, have the same kind of views, aims, and works (John xvii. 21, 23; Rom. xii. 5; Eph. iv. 3-6); and they are of one heart, and mind, and mouth, when they ardently love one another as Christians, and have much the same views of divine truth, and much the same profession and manner of speech. Acts iv. 32; Rom. xv. 6. God made but one woman, though, having the residue of the Spirit, he had power to create multitudes, that he might seek a godly seed, have children lawfully produced, and religiously educated. Mal. ii. 15. To have one lot, and one purse, is to be joined in the closest fellowship. Prov. i. 14.

ONESIMUS, a slave belonging to Philemon, who ran away from his master. He was led providentially to proceed to Rome, where he enjoyed the instructions of the Apostle Paul, who was at that time a prisoner in Rome. Under the ministrations of Paul, Onesimus was converted to Christianity. The apostle sent him back to his master, embracing the opportunity of writing the beautiful epistle to Philemon, which forms one of the Apostolical Epistles of the New Testament. Philemon gladly welcomed Onesimus, no longer in the character of a mere slave, but rather as a friend, a brother beloved in Christ Jesus. This Christian slave appears to have enjoyed the confidence of Paul, who entrusted him, along with Tychicus, with the conveyance of his Epistles to the Ephesians and to the Colossians.

ONESIPHORUS, an Ephesian convert who is mentioned by Paul in terms of cordial affection and gratitude in 2 Tim. i. 16, and v. 19. He visited Rome during the second captivity of the apostle, and while all his other friends were keeping aloof from him, this Christian stranger sought him out, and had compassion on him in his bonds, ministering to his comfort, and encouraging him doubtless by his Christian conversation. The apostle was deeply affected with the remarkable kindness of Onesiphorus, praying that the Lord would have mercy upon his household in the great day.

ONION (batsal—Numb. xi. 5), a well-known garden plant with a bulbous root. Onions and garlic were highly esteemed in Egypt, and not without reason, this country being admirably adapted to their culture. The Allium cepa, called by the Arabs basal, Hasselquist thinks one of the species of onions for which the Israelites longed. He would infer this from the quantities still used in Egypt, and their goodness. "Whoever has tasted onions in Egypt," says he, "must allow that none can be had better in any part of the world. Here they are sweet; in other countries they are nauseous and strong. Here they are soft; whereas in the northern and other parts they are hard, and their coats so compact that they are difficult of digestion. Hence they cannot in any place be eaten with less prejudice, and more satisfaction, than in Egypt."

The Egyptians are reproached with swearing by the leeks and onions of their gardens. Juvenal, as well as Lucian, ridicules some of these superstitious people who did not dare to eat leeks, garlic, or onions, for fear of injuring their gods. Hence arises a question, how the Israelites durst venture to violate the national worship, by eating those sacred plants. We may answer, in the first place, that whatever might be the case of the Egyptians in later ages, it is not probable that they were arrived at such a pitch of superstition in the time of Moses; for we find no indications of this in Herodotus, the most ancient of the Greek historians; secondly, the writers here referred to appear to be mistaken in imagining these plants to have been generally the objects of religious worship. The priests, indeed, abstained from the use of them, and several other vegetables; and this might give rise to the opinion of their being revered as divinities; but the use of them was not prohibited to the people, as is plain from the testimonies of ancient authors, particularly of Diodorus Siculus.

ONKELOS, TARGUM OF. See TARGUMS.

ONO, a city of Benjamin. 1 Chron. viii. 12. In Neh. vi. 2, we have mention of "the valley of Ono," which probably was not far from the city.

ONYCHA, one of the articles used in the composition of the holy perfume, mentioned in Exod. xxx. 34. Its true nature is doubtful. Gesenius thinks that it was a perfume consisting of the shells of different kinds of mussels, which, when burned, produced a scent similar to that of the castoreum.

ONYX (sheham—Gen. ii. 12; Exod. xxv. 7, xxviii. 9, 20, xxxv. 27, xxxix. 6; 1 Chron. xxix. 2; Job xxviii. 16; Ezek. xxviii. 13), a precious stone, so called from the Greek onux, the nail, to the colour of which it nearly approaches. It is first mentioned with the gold and bdellium of the river Pison in Eden; but the meaning of the Hebrew word is not easily determined. The Septuagint renders it, in different places, the sardius, beryl, sapphire, emerald, &c. Such names are often ambiguous, even in Greek and Latin, and no wonder if they are more so in Hebrew. In 1 Chron. xxix. 2, onyx stones are among the things prepared by David for the temple. The author of "Scripture Illustrated" observes, upon this passage, that "the word onyx is equivocal; signifying, first, a precious stone or gem; and secondly, a marble called in Greek onychites, which Pliny mentions as a stone of Caramania. Antiquity gave both these stones this name, because of their resemblance to the nail of the fingers. The onyx of the high priest's pectoral was, no doubt, the gem onyx; the stone prepared by David was the marble onyx, or rather onychus; for one would hardly think that gems of any kind were used externally in such a building, but variegated marble may readily be admitted."

OPEN. God's eyes and ears being open denotes his exact observation of men's conduct, his regard to his people's case, and his readiness to answer their prayers. Neh. i. 6; Jer. xxxii. 19; 1 Pet. iii. 12. His hands and treasures are opened when, by his power and goodness, he liberally confers favours on his creatures. Ps. civ. 28; Deut. xxviii. 12. God opens his armoury when, in his providence, he raises armies, and furnishes them with weapons of war to execute his just wrath on sinners. Jer. i. 25. He opens his lips against men when, by his word and providence, he, in a plain and powerful manner, convinces them of their guilt. Job xi. 5. He opens the heart, when he enlightens the eye of the understanding to discern revealed truths, and thereby determines the will to receive Jesus and his salvation into the soul. Luke xxiv. 32-45; Acts xxvi. 18, xvi. 14. He opens men's ears, when he renders them attentive to his word and providence. Job xxxvi. 10-15. He opens their lips, when he gives them encouragement to pray, and reason to praise him; and by his Spirit gives a holy freedom in these exercises. Ps. li. 15. Under the gospel, men with open face behold the glory of the Lord; they see divine truths clearly, and stripped of ceremonial veils, even as the sight of objects in a glass is more distinct and clear than to see them only by their shadows. 2 Cor. iii. 18.

OPHEL, the name given to a part of Mount Zion, lower than Mount Moriah; at the eastern extremity, near to the temple, and a little to the south of it. 2 Chron. xxvii. 3; Neh. iii. 26, xi. 21. It is also mentioned Mic. iv. 8, though our translators have rendered the words, "Thou, O tower of the flock," literally "tower of Ophel." It was naturally strong by its situation, and had a wall of its own, by which it was separated from the rest of Zion.

OPHIR, a son of Joktan, whose descendants peopled the district between Mesha and Sephar a mountain of the East. Gen. x. 26-30.

OPHIR, the name of a country celebrated in Scripture for the abundance of its gold. There has been no little discussion among critics and commentators as to the situation of Ophir. From the circumstance that Solomon seems to have traded with the inhabitants of Ophir, many have sought it in Arabia. Others, however, have placed it in India, and others in Africa. The Chaldee, indeed, explains Ophir by Africa itself, and Bruce the Abyssinian traveller argues keenly in behalf of Zanguebar on the eastern coast of Africa.

OPHITES. See SERPENTINIANS.

OPHRAH, a city of Benjamin. Josh. xviii. 23; 1 Sam. xiii. 17. Dr Robinson, in his "Biblical Researches," thinks that he has found the site of Ophrah in a village named El-Taizibeh, built on a conical hill, having an old tower on the top of it, commanding a splendid view.

OPINION is that judgment which the mind forms of any proposition, for the truth or falsehood of which there is not sufficient evidence to produce absolute belief.

ORACLE, among the Heathens, was the answer which the gods were supposed to give to those who consulted them upon any affair of importance.

Among the Jews there were several sorts of real oracles. They had, first, oracles that were delivered viva voce; as when God spake to Moses face to face, and as one friend speaks to another. Numb. xii. 8. Secondly, Prophetical dreams sent by God; as the dreams which God sent to Joseph, and which foretold his future greatness. Gen. xxvii. 5, 6. Thirdly, Visions; as when a prophet in an ecstasy, being neither properly asleep nor awake, had supernatural revelations. Gen. xv. 1; xlv. 2. Fourthly, The oracle of the Urim and Thummim, which was accompanied with the ephod, or the pectoral worn by the high priest, and which God had endued with the gift of foretelling things to come. Numb. xii. 6; Joel ii. 28. This manner of inquiring of the Lord was often made use of, from Joshua's time to the erection of the temple at Jerusalem. Fifthly, After the building of the temple, they generally consulted the prophets, who were frequent in the kingdoms of Judah and Israel. From Haggai, Zechariah, and Malachi, who are the last of the prophets that have any of their writings remaining, the Jews pretend that God gave them what they call Bathkol, the Daughter of the Voice, which was a supernatural manifestation of the will of God, performed either by a strong inspiration or internal voice, or else by a sensible and external voice, which was heard by a number of persons sufficient to bear testimony of it. For example, such was the voice that was heard at the baptism of Jesus Christ. Matt. iii. 17.

The Scripture affords us examples likewise of profane oracles. Balaam, at the instigation of his own spirit, and urged on by his avarice, fearing to lose the recompense that he was promised by Balak, king of the Moabites, suggests a diabolical expedient to this prince of making the Israelites fall into idolatry and fornication (Numb. xxxi. 16), by which he assures him of a certain victory, at least of considerable advantage, against the people of God.

Micaiah, the son of Imlah, a prophet of the Lord, says (1 Kings xxii. 20, &c.) that he saw the Almighty sitting upon his throne, and all the hosts of heaven round about him; and the Lord said, Who shall tempt Ahab, king of Israel, that he may go to war with Ramoth-gilead, and fall in the battle? One answered after one manner, and another in another. At the same time an evil spirit presented himself before the Lord, and said, I will seduce him. And the Lord asked him, How? To which Satan answered, I will go and be a lying spirit in the mouth of his prophets. And the Lord said, Go, and thou shalt prevail. This dialogue clearly proves these two things: first, that the devil could do nothing by his own power; and, secondly, that, with the permission of God, he could inspire the false prophets, sorcerers, and magicians, and make them deliver false oracles.

ORAL, delivered by the mouth, not written. See TRADITION.

ORATORY, a name given by Christians to certain places of religious worship. See PROSEUCHÆ.

ORCHARD. This word, which occurs in Eccles. ii. 5, and Cant. iv. 13, implies a garden planted with fruit trees of different kinds. The corresponding Persian word, which indeed seems to have been transferred to the Hebrew, signifies a royal park. How many varieties of trees were cultivated by the Jews, we have no means of knowing; but the almond, apple or citron, chestnut, date, pomegranate, and fig, occupied an important place, in addition to the vine and olive. But, for the sake of a dense shade, the orchard often contained trees more valued for their foliage than their fruit—the oak, the sycamore, the myrtle, the box, and the mulberry.

ORDER, method, the regular process of performing a thing. Nothing can be more beautiful in religion and morals than order. The neglect of it exposes us to the inroads of vice, and often brings upon us the most perplexing events. Whether we consider it in reference to ourselves, our families, or the Church, it is of the greatest importance.

1. As to the first, order should be attended to as it respects our principles (Heb. xiii. 9; James i. 8); our tempers (Prov. xvii. 14; Eph. iv. 31); our conversation (Col. iv. 6); our business (Prov. xxii. 29); our time (Ps. xc. 12; Eccles. iii. 1); our recreations, and our general conduct (Phil. i. 27; 2 Pet. i. 5-7).

2. As it regards our families, there should be order as to the economy or management of their concerns (Matt. xii. 25); as to devotion, and the time of it (Josh. xxiv. 15); as to the instruction of them (Eph. vi. 1; Gen. xviii. 19; 2 Tim. i. 5).

3. In respect to the Church, order should be observed as to the admission of members (2 Cor. vi. 15); as to the administration of its ordinances (1 Cor. xiv. 33-40); as to the attendance on its worship (Ps. xxvii. 4); as to our behaviour therein. (Col. i. 10; Matt. v. 16.)

To excite us to the practice of this duty, we should consider that God is a God of order (1 Cor. xiv. 33); his works are all in the exactest order (Eph. i. 11; Ps. civ. 25; Eccles. iii. 11); heaven is a place of order. Rev. vii. 9. Jesus Christ was a beautiful example of regularity. The advantages of order are numerous. "The observance of it," says Dr. Blair, "serves to correct that negligence which makes us omit some duties, and that hurry and precipitancy which makes us perform others imperfectly. Our attention is thereby directed to its proper objects. We follow the straight path which Providence has pointed out to us; in the course of which all the different business of life presents itself regularly to us on every side."

ORDERS, by way of eminence, or holy orders, denote a character peculiar to ecclesiastics, whereby they are set apart for the ministry. This the Romanists make their sixth sacrament. In no Reformed Church are there more than three orders, viz., bishops, priests, and deacons. In the Romish Church there are seven inclusive of the episcopate; all which the Council of Trent enjoins to be received and believed on pain of anathema. They are distinguished into petty or secular orders, and major or sacred orders. Orders, the petty or minor, are four, viz., those of door-keepers, exorcist, reader, and acolyte. Sacred, or major, are deacon, priest, and bishop.

ORDINANCE, an institution established by lawful authority. Religious ordinances must be instituted by Christ himself, otherwise they are not binding; minor regulations are not properly ordinances. Ordinances once established are not to be varied by human caprice or mutability.

ORDINANCES OF THE GOSPEL, are institutions of divine authority relating to the worship of God; such as (1.) Baptism. Matt. xxviii. 19. (2.) The Lord's supper. 1 Cor. xi. 23-34. (3.) Public ministry, or preaching and reading the Word. Rom. x. 15; Eph. iv. 13; Mark xvi. 15. (4.) Hearing the gospel. Mark iv. 24; Rom. x. 17. (5.) Public prayer. 1 Cor. xiv. 15-19; Matt. vi. 6; Ps. v. 1-7. (6.) Singing of psalms. Col. iii. 16; Eph. v. 19. (7.) Fasting. James iv. 9; Matt. ix. 15; Joel ii. 12. (8.) Solemn thanksgiving. Ps. l. 14; 1 Thess. v. 18. See these different articles, also MEANS OF GRACE.

ORDINARY, the person who has ecclesiastical jurisdiction as of course and of common right, in opposition to persons who are extraordinarily appointed. In some acts of parliament we find the bishop called ordinary, and so he is taken at the common-law as having ordinary jurisdiction in causes ecclesiastical; but, in a more general acceptation, the word ordinary signifies any judge authorized to take cognizance of causes in his own proper right as a magistrate, and not by way of deputation or delegation. The Ordinary of Newgate is the chaplain who attends upon condemned culprits.

ORDINATION, the setting apart of a qualified person to the office of the holy ministry, by the laying on of the hands of the presbytery, and by prayer.

In the Church of England, ordination has always been esteemed the principal prerogative of bishops, and they still retain the function as a mark of their spiritual sovereignty in their diocese. Every person who applies to the bishop for ordination, must have what is called a title for orders, that is, he must have some certain place where he may "use his function." The usual title for orders is a curacy or a chaplaincy. It is usual for a bishop before admitting a candidate for orders to examination, to inquire in the first instance into his theological opinions and attainments. Should this private and personal examination prove satisfactory, he is allowed to produce the usual testimonials, and is handed over for the formal examination, which is usually conducted by the bishop's chaplain, and lasts for three or four days. The candidate then takes the oath of supremacy, promises to conform to the liturgy, and subscribes the articles, after which he is ordained in public either in the cathedral of the diocese or in some church or chapel. He thus becomes a deacon, competent to discharge any part of clerical duty, except consecrating the elements in the Lord's Supper, and reading the forms of absolution. After holding this office for a year generally, he is subjected to another and a severer examination, usually by the bishop's chaplain, after which he is publicly admitted to the order of priest or presbyter by the laying on of hands. Orders or ordination is in the Church of Rome regarded as one of the seven sacraments. According to the Council of Trent none can be ordained without a benefice, and this practice is usually observed in England. The times of ordination are the four Sundays immediately following the Ember weeks; being the second Sunday in Lent, Trinity Sunday, and the Sundays following the first Wednesday after 14th September and 13th December. These are the stated times; but ordination may take place at any other time, according to the discretion of the bishop, or circumstances of the case.

In opposition to Episcopal ordination, Presbyterians hold that a plurality of ministers are concerned in every case of ordination which is found in Scripture. Thus in the case of Timothy we find it said, 1 Tim. iv. 14, "Neglect not the gift that is in thee, which was given thee by prophecy, with the laying on of the hands of the presbytery;" and in the case of Paul and Barnabas, Acts xiii. 1-3, "Now there were in the church that was at Antioch certain prophets and teachers; as Barnabas, and Simeon that was called Niger, and Lucius of Cyrene, and Manaen, which had been brought up with Herod the tetrarch, and Saul. As they ministered to the Lord, and fasted, the Holy Ghost said, Separate me Barnabas and Saul for the work whereunto I have called them. And when they had fasted and prayed, and laid their hands on them, they sent them away." In defence of presbyterial ordination, it is also argued that bishops and presbyters are uniformly in Scripture the same; thus Phil. i. 1; Tit. i. 6, 7; Acts xx. 27, 28; 1 Pet. v. 1, 2. In accordance with these principles, the right of conferring ordination is among Presbyterians vested in the presbytery, and accompanied with imposition of hands. The Wesleyan Methodists only ordain ministers when met in Conference, and they dispense with the ceremony of the laying on of hands. Among the Independents and Baptists the power of ordination lies in the call of the people, accompanied by the solemn and public separation to office by prayer. This view proceeds upon the idea that in Scripture election and ordination are identical.

ORGAN. This musical instrument, of which the Pandian pipe is the simplest variety, may be described as a collection of tubes, varying in length and width of bore, and, consequently, emitting a diversity of notes when blown into by the musician. If the organ be the instrument denoted by the Hebrew word Hoogab, it is mentioned in Gen. iv. 21, as invented by Jubal. It is again referred to in the Book of Job, and is enumerated in Ps. cl. among the instruments employed in the praise of Jehovah. No similar contrivance seems to have been known to the Egyptians; and we have no means of ascertaining what improvements were made on it to adapt it to the service of the sanctuary.

ORIENTAL PHILOSOPHY. The system which endeavours to explain the nature and origin of all things by the principle of emanation from an eternal fountain of being. (See MAGI.)

From blending the doctrines of the Oriental philosophy with Christianity, the Gnostic sects, which were so numerous in the first centuries, derive their origin. Other denominations arose, which aimed to unite Judaism with Christianity. Many of the Pagan philosophers, who were converted to the Christian religion, exerted all their art and ingenuity to accommodate the doctrines of the Gospel to their own schemes of philosophy. In each age of the Church new systems were introduced, till, in process of time, we find the Christian world divided into that variety of heretical sentiment which is exhibited in the various strange, and often conflicting, sects which arose.

ORIGINAL SIN. See FALL—SIN.

ORIGIN OF EVIL. See SIN.

ORION, a constellation in the heavens just before the sign Taurus.

ORMUZD, the good principle of the Magi, whose symbol was light, and who was the author of all good. See MAGI.

ORPAH, a Moabitess, wife of Chilion, son of Eli-melech and Naomi. See RUTH.

ORPHAN. The customary acceptance of the word orphans, is well known to be that of "children deprived of their parents;" but the force of the Greek word orphanous (rendered comfortless in our translation, John xiv. 18), implies the case of those who have lost some dear protecting friend, some patron, though not strictly a father: and in this sense it is used 1 Thess. ii. 17: "We also, brethren, being taken from you."

OSSIFRAGE (peres). Lev. xi. 13; Deut. xiv. 12. The name peres, by which it is called in Hebrew, denotes "to crush, to break;" and this name agrees with our version, which implies "the bone-breaker," which name is given to a kind of eagle, from the circumstance of its habit of breaking the bones of its prey, after it has eaten the flesh: some say also, that he even swallows the bones thus broken. Onkelos uses a word which signifies "naked," and leads us to the vulture: indeed, if we were to take the classes of birds in any thing like a natural order in the passages here referred to, the vulture should follow the eagle as an unclean bird. The Septuagint interpreters also render vulture; and so do Munster, Schindler, and the Zurich versions.

OSTRICH, joneh, in Arabic neamah, in Greek strouthocamelos, "the camel-bird;" and still in the East, says Niebuhr, it is called thar edsjammel, "the camel-bird." Lev. xi. 16; Deut. xiv. 15; Job xxx. 29; Isa. xiii. 21, xxxiv. 13, xliii. 20; Jer. l. 39; Lam. iv. 3; Mic. i. 8—rennim, Job xxxix. 13. The first name in the places above quoted is, by our own translators, generally rendered "owls." But it should be recollected, says the author of "Scripture Illustrated," that the owl is not a desert bird, but rather resides in places not far from habitations, and that it is not the companion of serpents; whereas, in several of these passages, the joneh is associated with deserts, dry, extensive, thirsty deserts, and with serpents, which are their natural inhabitants. Our ignorance of the natural history of the countries which the ostrich inhabits has undoubtedly perverted the import of the above passages; but let any one peruse them afresh, and exchange the owl for the ostrich, and he will immediately discover a vigour of description and imagery much beyond what he had formerly perceived.

OWEN, JOHN, D.D., a distinguished Puritan divine, who flourished in the times of the Commonwealth, and whose theological writings occupy a very high place in the estimation of all who can appreciate fervent piety, profound thinking, consummate ability, and extensive erudition. For the materials of the present short sketch we are indebted to the elegant "Life of Owen," from the accomplished pen of the Rev. Dr Andrew Thomson, prefixed to the accurate, beautiful, and in all respects, valuable edition of the Works of Owen, which has recently issued from the press of the publishers of this Cyclopædia, under the able editorial revision of Dr Goold.

John Owen, born in 1616, was the son of a pious and devoted minister of the Church of England, who held the vicarage of Stadham, in Oxfordshire. Little is known concerning the early years of the Puritan divine, but one thing is certain, that his youthful studies must have been prosecuted with no common ardour and assiduity to have prepared him for entering college at the unusually early age of twelve. Nor did he relax in his diligence when he found himself enrolled in the university. For several years he allowed himself only four hours' sleep during the night, a practice which, from the injurious influence it had upon his health, he bitterly regretted in his after years. Earthly ambition alone seems to have been the prevailing motive at this period of his life. Ere long, however, Owen underwent a marked spiritual change, and before he had left the university he had become strongly imbued with the principles of a living Christianity. Animated by such a spirit, he refused to submit to the popish innovations introduced by Laud, who was then chancellor of Oxford, preferring to forego all the advantages, both present and prospective, of a university life rather than violate his sense of duty. It was providential that before his college career had thus been prematurely brought to a close, he had been admitted to orders by Bishop Bancroft, and was thus prepared to accept an invitation which was given him to become chaplain in the family of Sir Robert Dormer of Ascot, and tutor to his eldest son. After some time he became chaplain to Lord Lovelace of Hurly, in Berkshire, a situation in which he seems to have enjoyed much kindness and comfort, until at length differing with his lordship in his political opinions, he resigned his chaplaincy and removed to London.

After Mr Owen had taken up his residence in the metropolis, he was for some time visited with deep mental anxiety in reference to his state with God. To this spiritual depression he had been long subject, and was only relieved from it by the instrumentality of a preacher whose name he could never ascertain. No sooner did he obtain true spiritual peace, than he gave himself up to active literary labour, and in March 1642 he published his first work, entitled, "The Display of Arminianism." This able production was a seasonable exposure of the prevailing opinions of the time. Being thus favourably known, he was early introduced to a pastoral charge, having been invited to assist the incumbent of Fordham, a retired village in Essex. Here he laboured with great comfort and acceptance until the death of his superior, when the living was presented by the patron to another. His brief pastorate at Fordham, Owen was wont to regard as the happiest period of his life. His labours both from the pulpit and the press were highly appreciated, and such was the high estimation in which his talents and learning, even at this early portion of his history, were held, that on April 29, 1646, he was appointed to preach before Parliament on the occasion of its monthly fast, when the thanks of the House were voted to him, and his discourse was ordered to be printed.

On leaving Fordham, Mr Owen was called to occupy a much larger and more important sphere of usefulness at Coggeshall, a considerable market town of Essex. It was at this period of his life that he seems to have renounced Presbyterian, and adopted Independent principles of church government, although in a considerably modified form. The times were now alarming and critical. Charles I. had been tried, condemned, and executed. On the day following this painful tragedy Owen preached before Parliament, and notwithstanding the awful transaction, he makes scarcely a single allusion throughout the whole discourse. This has often been adduced as forming a grave charge against the Puritan divine, as implying a want of moral courage and of Christian faithfulness. But it is no slight evidence surely that Owen was animated by no unworthy fear of men, that his "Discourse on Toleration" was presented to Parliament at this very time, a discourse full of the most enlarged and liberal sentiments, far in advance of the age in which they were thus openly promulgated.

Cromwell, who had recently reached the zenith of his power and popularity, was sufficiently discerning to prize highly the talents of Owen, and accordingly he urgently pressed him to accompany the army to Ireland in the capacity of his chaplain. In that country Owen lived nine months, when the campaign being ended, he returned to England and resumed his labours among his attached flock at Coggeshall. Here, however, he was not long permitted to prosecute in quietness his pastoral duties. Again Owen was summoned, along with Joseph Caryl, to accompany Cromwell and his troops to Scotland, where he continued for a time, but long before the campaign was ended he returned to his studies and the laborious discharge of his pastoral work. In a short time, however, the ministerial tie between him and his beloved people was broken, Parliament having appointed him to the deanery of Christ Church, Oxford, and Cromwell having followed up this appointment by nominating him to the high and responsible office of vice-chancellor of the university. The latter office, particularly, he entered upon with the greatest diffidence, but looking for direction to a higher than any earthly source, he was made instrumental in introducing great improvement into the discipline of the university, and in diffusing among the students a spirit of earnest and enlightened piety. While thus conscientiously and diligently watching over the interests of the university, Dr Owen found leisure to write various learned and profound theological works, which have called forth the admiration of the Christian world in all succeeding ages down to the present hour.

The high respect which was entertained for Dr Owen as vice-chancellor of Oxford led to his election as member of Parliament for that university. That he was not unwilling to undertake this new office is plain from the circumstance that he immediately took his seat in the House, and continued to sit until the Committee of Privileges declared his election annulled in consequence of his being a minister of the gospel. But though prevented from taking part in the discussions of the legislature, he was frequently appointed by Cromwell and the Parliament to sit on committees connected with matters of religion, particularly on the commission nominated for the trial of candidates for ordination.

The time now came, however, when Dr Owen lost the favour of Cromwell. Faithful to his honest convictions, he steadfastly resisted the ambitious plans of the Protector, when these appeared to be dangerous to the liberties of the country. The consequence was that the conscientious Puritan divine was displaced from the high office which he held in Oxford. He now retired to his native village of Stadham, where he had become the proprietor of a small estate. Here he prepared one of his most elaborate works entitled, "Theologoumena; or, Six Books on the Nature, Rise, Progress, and Study of True Theology." For some time, also, he laboured as pastor of a small congregation in Stadham, but an act passed in these days of intolerance led to his expulsion from his charge and the dispersion of his little flock. In a short time Owen had many companions in tribulation, the well-known ACT OF UNIFORMITY (which see) having driven nearly two thousand ministers from their churches, exposing them to persecution and poverty. Notwithstanding this act, Dr Owen still continued to preach in London and elsewhere, both secretly and in public, as he had opportunity. His leisure time he devoted to a work of great ability on the Popish controversy. In vain did men in power try to tempt him to abandon his Nonconformist principles and to enter the Church of England, holding out to him the offer of a bishopric. No worldly honour or advantage could prevail upon him to surrender his conscientious opinions. The visitation of the plague, followed by the fire, were instrumental in the hand of God in checking the violence of persecution, and the greater number of the churches in London having been consumed by the conflagration, large wooden houses called tabernacles were quickly reared in which Owen and the other leading Nonconformist ministers preached the gospel to congregated thousands. At length Owen became settled pastor of a church in Leadenhall Street, where he continued to minister until increasing infirmities compelled him to retire from the scenes of active life to the privacy of the country. Here he prepared some of the most valuable of his numerous theological works. At length, after a life of unwearied activity in the Redeemer's cause, this illustrious divine passed to his reward on the 24th of August 1683, leaving behind him an imperishable fame as a theologian and a man of learning and the most extensive usefulness.

OX (bequer), the male of horned cattle of the beeve kind, at full age, when fit for the plough. Younger ones are called bullocks. The rural economy of the Israelites led them to value the ox as by far the most important of domestic animals, from the consideration of his great use in all the operations of farming. In the patriarchal ages, the ox constituted no inconsiderable portion of their wealth. Thus Abraham is said to be very rich in cattle. Gen. xxiv. 35. Men of every age and country have been much indebted to the labours of this animal. For many ages the hopes of Oriental husbandmen depended entirely on their labours. This was so much the case in the time of Solomon, that he observes in one of his proverbs, "Where no oxen are, the crib is clean," or rather empty; "but much increase is by the strength of the ox." Prov. xiv. 4. The ass, in the course of ages, was compelled to bend his stubborn neck to the yoke, and share the labours of the ox; but still the preparation of the ground in the time of spring depended chiefly on the more powerful exertions of the latter.

The wild-ox (tau, Deut. xiv. 5) is supposed to be the oryx of the Greeks,—a species of antelope inhabiting the solitudes of Africa, on the confines of Egypt.

PÆDOBAPTISM (from pais, a child, and baptizo, to immerse), the baptism of children. See BAPTISM.

PÆDOBAPTISTS, those who practise the baptism of children. See BAPTISM.

PAGANISM, the religious worship and discipline of Pagans, or the adoration of idols and false gods. (See PAGANS.) The theology of the Pagans, according to themselves, as Scævola and Varro, was of three sorts.

The first of these may well be called mythological, or fabulous, as treating of the theology and genealogy of their deities, in which they say such things as are unworthy of deity; ascribing to them thefts, murders, adulteries, and all manner of crimes; and therefore, this kind of theology is condemned by the wiser sort of heathens as nugatory and scandalous. The writers of this sort of theology were Sanchoniatho, the Phœnician; and of the Grecians, Orpheus, Hesiod, Pherecydes.

The second sort, called physical, or natural, was studied and taught by the philosophers, who, rejecting the multiplicity of gods, introduced by the poets, brought their theology to a more natural and rational form, and supposed that there was but one Supreme God, which they commonly make to be the sun; at least, an emblem of him, but at too great a distance to mind the affairs of the world; and therefore devised certain demons, which they considered as mediators between the Supreme God and man; and the doctrines of these demons, to which the apostle is thought to allude in 1 Tim. iv. 1, were what the philosophers had a concern with, who treat of their nature, office, and regard to men; as did Thales, Pythagoras, Plato, and the Stoics.

The third sort, called political, or civil, was instituted by legislators, statesmen, and politicians—the first among the Romans was Numa Pompilius—this chiefly respected their gods, temples, altars, sacrifices, and rites of worship, and was properly their idolatry, the care of which belonged to the priests; and this was enjoined on the common people, to keep them in obedience to the civil state.

Thus things continued in the Gentile world until the light of the gospel was sent among them; the times before were times of ignorance, as the apostle calls them. They were ignorant of the true God, and of the worship of him; and of the Messiah, and salvation by him. Their state is truly described in Eph. ii. 12, that they were then "without Christ; aliens from the commonwealth of Israel; strangers from the covenants of promise; having no hope, and without God in the world;" and, consequently, their theology was insufficient for their salvation.

The rites of Paganism were as various and absurd as the objects of their worship. In general, they had some idea of the necessity of an atonement for their sins; and that "without shedding of blood there is no remission." In many cases, and on all emergencies, they were apprehensive that the sacrifice must be, at least, of equal dignity with the sinner; and hence, among many nations, both ancient and modern, from the worshippers of Moloch to the South Sea Islanders, the practice (sometimes carried to great enormity) of human sacrifices, which have stained the altars of almost all the nations upon earth.

One thing is very remarkable, that as the heathen became more refined, they became more idolatrous. Paul says, "The world by wisdom knew not God" (1 Cor. i. 21); and it is most certain that their science never led to the unity of God, much less to rational notions of our duty to God, or love to our fellow-creatures, as such considered. So soon as they began to entertain reverential ideas of the Divine Majesty, they supposed him too great to notice us, or for us to notice him; and as to our fellow-creatures, they always confined their love to family, tribe, or country. They "neither feared God nor regarded man." See HEATHEN—IDOLATRY—POLYTHEISM—GODS.

PAGANS, the heathen; so called by the early Christians, because, when Constantine and his successors forbade the worship of heathen deities in the cities, its adherents retired to the villages (pagi, hence pagani, villagers or countrymen), where they could practise their rites in security.

PAGODA, or PAGOD, a name given in India to the temples where the heathen worship their gods.

PALESTINE, one of the names of the Holy Land. It was so called in the days of Moses. Exod. xv. 14, "The people shall hear, and be afraid: sorrow shall take hold on the inhabitants of Palestina." This name is probably derived from the Philistines, who although they occupied only a part of the country, were perhaps the most determined and obstinate of all the enemies of the Israelites. The name Palestine is sometimes limited to the country inhabited by the Philistines, which lay on the south-west of Canaan, on the coast of the Mediterranean sea, but most generally it denotes the whole of the promised land. In later periods of the Jewish history, Judea and Palestine were considered as synonymous words. Herodotus speaks of Syria Palestina.

PALMER-WORM, an insect mentioned in Joel i. 4: "That which the palmerworm hath left hath the locust eaten; and that which the locust hath left hath the cankerworm eaten; and that which the cankerworm hath left hath the caterpillar eaten." The Septuagint and the Vulgate render the Hebrew word here translated palmerworm, by the word caterpillar, but the Chaldee and Syriac versions regard it as a young unfledged locust,—an opinion in which Bochart seems to coincide.

PALM SUNDAY, the Sunday next before Easter; so called from palm branches being strewed on the road by the multitude, when our Saviour made his triumphal entry into Jerusalem.

PALM TREE. This tree is called tamar, from its straight, upright growth, for which it seems more remarkable than any other tree: it sometimes rises to the height of a hundred feet.

This tree was formerly of great value and esteem among the Israelites, and so very much cultivated in Judea, that, in after times, it became the emblem of that country, as may be seen in a medal of the Emperor Vespasian upon the conquest of Judea. It represents a captive woman sitting under a palm tree, with this inscription, "Judea capta;" and upon a Greek coin, likewise, of his son Titus, struck upon the like occasion, we see a shield suspended upon a palm tree. Pliny also calls Judea palmis incluta, "renowned for palms." Jericho, in particular, was called "the city of palms" (Deut. xxxiv. 3; 2 Chron. xxviii. 15), because, as Josephus, Strabo, and Pliny have remarked, it anciently abounded in palm trees.

As the Greek name for this tree signifies also the fabulous bird called the phoenix, some of the fathers have supposed that the Psalmist (Ps. xcii. 12) alludes to the latter, and on his authority have made the phoenix an emblem of a resurrection. Tertullian calls it a full and striking emblem of this hope. But the tree, also, seems to have been considered as emblematic of the revivification of the human body, from its being found in some burial-places in the East. In the colder climate of England, the yew tree is substituted in its place.

PALSY, a disorder which deprives the limbs of sensation or motion, or both, and makes them useless to the patient. When one entire side of the body is affected, it is called hemiplegia. If one half of the body, the upper or lower, it is called paraplegia. If confined to a single limb or set of muscles, it is called simply paralysis. Our Saviour cured several paralytics by his word alone. Matt. iv. 24, viii. 6, ix. 2; Mark ii. 3, 4; Luke v. 18. The sick man who was lying near the pool at the sheep-market for thirty-eight years was a paralytic. John v. 5.

PAMPHYLIA, a province of Asia Minor, having Cilicia east, Lycia west, Pisidia north, and the Mediterranean south. It is opposite to Cyprus, and the sea between the coast and the island is called the Sea of Pamphylia. The chief city of Pamphylia was Perga, where Paul and Barnabas preached. Acts xiii. 13, xiv. 24.

PAN. See CALDRON.

PANNAG. This word, which occurs only in Ezek. xxvii. 17, has never been satisfactorily explained. Gesenius supposes it to have been a kind of pastry; others think it to have been a kind of balsam; and others still, the name of a place. But nothing certain is known upon the subject.

PANTHEISM, a sort of philosophical atheism, which considers the universe as an immense animal,

"Whose body nature is, and God the soul."

This, according to the learned Cudworth, was the system of Orpheus and other early Greeks; for he calls the material world "the body of Jupiter." As, however, this is said in verse, and more especially as considerable doubts rest upon the authenticity of the verses ascribed to him, others deny the charge. But certain it is, that the mysteries of Paganism, and the secret doctrines of the philosophers, all leaned this way. From this notion, also, probably arose the doctrine of two first principles in the Oriental philosophy; and from thence the error of the Manichæans and other early heretics; also the notions of the Indian Brahmins and Chinese literati. The system has, in modern times, been taken up by Spinoza and Thomas Hobbes; and in Germany various modern philosophical systems proceed upon the idea that the universe is God.

PAPAS (the ancient Greek pappas, papa, father), the name at present given to the priests of the Greek Church: in Russia, they are called popes. In the third and fourth centuries, the name was given to all the bishops; but in the ninth, it was appropriated exclusively to the four Eastern patriarchs. In the West, however, the Bishop of Rome determined to have the exclusive use of the title; but it required the iron hand of Gregory VII. to carry the plan into effect. He assembled some Italian bishops at Rome, in 1073, and formed them into a council, which excommunicated the Emperor Henry, and declared that no one had any right to the title of pope but the Roman pontiff.

PAPER-REED. Exod. ii. 3; Job viii. 11, Isa. xix. 7, xxxv. 7. This is the Cyperus papyrus. When the outer skin, or bark, is taken off, there are several films, or inner pellicles, one within another. These, when separated from the stalk, were laid on a table artfully matched and flatted together, and moistened with the water of the Nile, which, dissolving the glutinous juices of the plant, caused them to adhere closely together. They were afterwards pressed, and then dried in the sun, and thus were prepared sheets or leaves for writing upon in characters marked by a coloured liquid passing through a hollow reed. The best papyrus was called hieratikē, or paper of the priests. On this the sacred documents of Egypt were written. Ancient books were written on papyrus, and those of the New Testament among the rest. In the fourth century, however, these sacred writings are found on skins. This was preferred for durability; and many decayed copies of the New Testament, belonging to libraries, were early transferred to parchment. Finally came paper, the name of which was taken from the Egyptian reed; but the materials of which it was fabricated were cotton and linen. See BULRUSH—BOOK.

PAPHOS, a celebrated city of Cyprus, lying on the western coast of the island, where Venus (who hence took the name of Paphia) had her most ancient and most famous temple; and here the Roman pro-consul, Sergius Paulus, resided, whom Paul was the means of converting to Christianity. Acts xiii. 6.

PAPIST, one who adheres to the communion of the Pope and Church of Rome. See POPE—POPERY.

PARABLE, a figure taken from natural objects to instruct us in things spiritual. Such a mode of instruction has been always prevalent in rude ages and nations, and its origin, therefore, is probably to be sought in those general habits of mind to which the peculiar circumstances of uncivilized life have given rise. The earliest parable on record is that of Jotham. Judg. ix. 7-15. A very beautiful instance of this mode of teaching is also found in the well-known parable of Nathan. 2 Sam. xii. 1-4. It has been often remarked that, under eastern climes, the imaginative greatly preponderates over the reasoning powers. Hence in conveying intellectual, but especially moral instruction, fables and allegorical descriptions are in these countries almost universally employed. Our blessed Lord, therefore, when he wished to impress upon his hearers salutary doctrines and duties, did so by means of allegorical paintings presented to their imaginations, which both enlightened their understandings and captivated their hearts. The parables of Christ are so framed also as to refer to subjects, manners, and customs with which the audience was familiar. Besides, when our Lord appeared on earth to introduce a new dispensation, there was a beautiful propriety in his adopting a mode of teaching which combined somewhat of the material nature of the old with the spirituality of the new scheme. On some occasions he employed parabolic instruction to screen himself from his bitter enemies, the Scribes and Pharisees. The success which attended the parable of the Samaritan may be adduced as a remarkable instance of the efficacy of such a mode of instruction in silencing objectors. The principal reason, however, why our Lord taught in parables is to be found in his own explanation, Luke viii. 10, "And he said, Unto you it is given to know the mysteries of the kingdom of God: but to others in parables; that seeing they might not see, and hearing they might not understand."

In offering these remarks on the advantages attendant on parabolic instruction, we cannot refrain from briefly adverting to the striking proof which even this slight and superficial view of the subject affords of the excellence of our Lord's character as a Teacher sent from God. Intimately conversant with the secret springs which regulate our intellectual and moral nature, well aware of the many prejudices which ever beset our minds, tending in a great measure to defeat the best directed human efforts to enlighten and convince, he adopted a mode of instruction in admirable consistency with our ordinary associations in thought and feeling, and calculated imperceptibly to overcome those deep-rooted prejudices which might have obstructed the avenue to the hearts of his hearers. But while the great framework of parabolic instruction was accommodated to mankind in general, and thus, with the strictest propriety, made the vehicle of truths which were destined to be taught among all nations, our Lord so arranged the subordinate circumstances of the parables as to suit the people to whom they were more immediately addressed. Minutely acquainted with the manners, and customs, and local peculiarities of the country, he took advantage of national partiality to recommend his doctrines to their attention; and, by a beautiful coincidence in his pictures with the objects of their everyday observation and experience, he enshrined these narratives in the minds and hearts of the Jews, and rendered their transference from the literal to the spiritual meaning comparatively easy. The ultimate object, finally, with which our Lord resorted to parables, as forming a part, viz., of a probationary system, was admirably accomplished. He who could say, "Before Abraham was, I am," knew the exact point in the Jewish history when such a mode of instruction could be most properly introduced. His opportunities of teaching were carefully watched, and their full effect foreseen by the eye of "Him who searcheth the hearts, and trieth the reins of the children of men." Let us, therefore, adore the infinite wisdom and amazing condescension of this Divine Teacher, who "spake as never man spake," and of this Divine Mediator, by whom is imparted "repentance unto Israel and the remission of sins."

PARACLETE, an advocate or comforter, generally applied to the third person in the Trinity. John xv. 26. See ADVOCATE—HOLY GHOST.

PARADISE, the garden of Eden, in which Adam and Eve were placed. It is also used to denote heaven. Luke xxiii. 44. As to the terrestrial paradise, there have been many inquiries about its situation. The learned Huetius places it upon the river that is produced by the conjunction of the Tigris and Euphrates, now called the river of the Arabs, between this conjunction and the division made by the same river before it falls into the Persian sea. Other geographers have placed it in Armenia, between the sources of the Tigris, the Euphrates, the Araxes, and the Phasis, which they suppose to be the four rivers described by Moses. But concerning the exact place we must necessarily be very uncertain, if, indeed, it can be thought at all to exist at present, considering the many changes which have taken place on the surface of the earth since the creation. See EDEN—ADAM.

PARAN, a desert in which the Israelites wandered after the exodus for thirty-eight years. It is termed "a great and terrible wilderness." Burckhardt describes it as a dreary expanse of calcareous soil, covered with black flints. The desert extends from Mount Sinai to the southern border of the land of Canaan. It formed the settlement of various powerful tribes, the chief of whom were the Ishmaelites and Nabathaeans, both of whom traced their descent from Abraham, the Amalekites and the Midianites. In this desert the law of God was promulgated from Mount Sinai.

PARAPHRASE, an explanation of some text in clearer and more ample terms, wherein more regard is had to an author's meaning than his words. See COMMENTARY.

PARCHMENTS. The Apostle Paul, in 2 Tim. iv. 13, directs Timothy to bring with him to Rome "especially the parchments." What these parchments were, it is impossible to ascertain.

PARDON, the act of forgiving an offender, or removing the guilt of sin, that the punishment due to it may not be inflicted.

Of the nature of pardon, it may be observed, that the Scripture represents it by various phrases: a lifting up, or taking away sin (Ps. xxxii. 1); a covering of it (Ps. lxxxv. 2); a non-imputation of it (Ps. xxxii. 2); a blotting it out (Ps. lxxix. 28); a non-remembrance of it. Heb. viii. 12; Isa. xliii. 25. (1.) It is an act of free grace. Ps. li. 1; Isa. xliii. 25. (2.) A point of justice, God having received satisfaction by the blood of Christ. 1 John i. 9. (3.) A complete act, a forgiveness of all the sins of his people. 1 John i. 7; Ps. ciii. 2, 3. (4.) An act that will never be repealed. Mic. vii. 19.

The author or cause of pardon is not any creature, angel, or man, but God. Ministers preach and declare that there is remission of sins in Christ; but to pretend to absolve men is the height of blasphemy. 1 Thess. ii. 4; Rev. xiii. 5, 6. (See ABSOLUTION—INDULGENCES.) There is nothing that man has, or can do, by which pardon can be procured. Wealth cannot buy pardon (Prov. xi. 4); human works or righteousness cannot merit it (Rom. xi. 6); nor can baptism wash away sin. It is the prerogative of God alone to forgive (Mark ii. 7), the first cause of which is his own sovereign grace and mercy. Eph. i. 7. The meritorious cause is the blood of Christ. Heb. ix. 14; 1 John i. 7. It is to be sought by prayer.

Pardon of sin and justification are considered by some as the same thing; and it must be confessed that there is a close connection, in many parts they agree, and it is without doubt that every sinner who shall be found pardoned at the great day, will likewise be justified; yet they have been distinguished thus:—(1.) An innocent person, when falsely accused and acquitted, is justified, but not pardoned; and a criminal may be pardoned, though he cannot be justified or declared innocent. Pardon is of men that are sinners, and who remain such, though pardoned sinners; but justification is a pronouncing persons righteous, as if they had never sinned. (2.) Pardon frees from punishment, but does not entitle to everlasting life; but justification does. Rom. v. If we were only pardoned, we should, indeed, escape the pains of hell, but could have no claim to the joys of heaven; for these are more than the most perfect works of man could merit; therefore they must be what the Scripture declares—"the gift of God."

After all, however, though these two may be distinguished, yet they cannot be separated; and, in reality, one is not prior to the other; for he that is pardoned by the death of Christ, is at the same time justified by his life. Rom. v. 10; Acts xiii. 38, 39. See GRACE—MERCY—ATONEMENT—JUSTIFICATION.

PARENTS, a name appropriated to immediate progenitors, as father and mother.

PARLOUR. The word in Judg. iii. 20 rendered "a summer parlour," is translated by Mr. Harmer, the "chamber of cooling." The extreme heat of the climate obliged the Orientals to adopt various devices for cooling and ventilating their apartments. For this purpose they made their doors large, and their chambers spacious; but they soon found that such simple processes were insufficient, and that other methods of cooling their habitations were necessary. At Aleppo, according to Russell, this was effected by means of kiosks, which are a sort of wooden divans or stages, which project a little way from their other buildings, and hang over the street. They are raised about a foot and a half higher than the floor of the room, to which they are quite open; and by having windows in front and on each side, a great draught of air is produced, causing a refreshing coolness in the sultry heat of summer. Another method of compassing the same end, is by ventilators. The houses in Persia are ventilated by means of a triangular building, which rises far above the terrace roof, and is open at top, so as to receive the wind in whatever direction it blows. The summer parlour of Eglon was undoubtedly cooled by some of these contrivances; which proves that expedients for mitigating the extreme heat of the climate are of great antiquity.

PARMENAS, one of the first deacons of the Church of Jerusalem. Acts vi. 5. The Greek Church claim him as a bishop and saint; but nothing certain is known about him.

PARSIMONY. See COVETOUSNESS.

PARSON (persona ecclesiae), one that hath full possession of all the rights of a parochial church in England. He is called parson (persona), because by his person the Church, which is an invisible body, is represented, and he is in himself a body corporate, in order to protect and defend the rights of the Church, which he personates. There are in the Church of England three ranks of clergymen below that of a dignitary, viz., parson, vicar, and curate. Parson is the first, meaning a rector, or he who receives the great tithes of a benefice. Clergyman may imply any person ordained to serve at the altar. Parsons are always priests, whereas clergymen are often only deacons. See CLERGY—CURATE.

PART, or PORTION, frequently signifies the source of satisfaction, or happiness. "The Lord is the portion of mine inheritance." Ps. xvi. 5, cxlii. 5. "The Lord's portion is his people; Jacob is the lot of his inheritance." Deut. xxxii. 9. But with this difference: God makes and constitutes the happiness of his people, but his people cannot augment God's happiness or glory. Part or portion also signifies recompense, or punishment: "This is the portion of a wicked man from God, and the heritage appointed unto him by God." Job xx. 29; Ps. lxxiii. 10, xi. 6. The Lord shall "appoint him his portion with the hypocrites." Matt. xxiv. 51. "What part hath he that believeth with an infidel?" 2 Cor. vi. 15. (See next article.)

PARTAKE, to receive a share. The saints are partakers of Christ and of the heavenly calling. By receiving Jesus Christ and his Spirit into their hearts, they possess them and their blessings and influences as their own, and are effectually called to the heavenly glory. Heb. iii. 1, 14, vi. 4. They are partakers of God's promises and benefits; they have an interest in all the promises, and shall receive every blessing therein contained. Eph. iii. 6; 1 Tim. vi. 2. They are partakers of the divine nature, and of Christ's holiness, when, through union to Christ and fellowship with him in his righteousness and Spirit, their nature is conformed to Christ. 2 Pet. i. 4. They partake of Christ's sufferings, and of the afflictions of the gospel, when they are persecuted for their adherence to the truth and example of Christ. 1 Pet. iv. 13; 2 Cor. i. 7; 2 Tim. i. 8. They partake of the grace of Paul, and other ministers, when they receive spiritual edification from their ministry. Phil. i. 7. Hypocrites are partakers of the Holy Ghost. Some of them in the apostolic age enjoyed his miraculous gifts and operations; and in every age they receive such convictions, or other influences, as are separable from a state of grace. Heb. vi. 4. Men become partakers in other men's sins, by contriving, consenting, inclining to, rejoicing in, assisting to commit, or sharing the profits or pleasures of their sin; or by occasioning them by an evil example, or offensive use of things indifferent; by provoking or tempting to, or not doing all we can to hinder their sin; or by commanding, exciting, or hiring men to sin; or by defending, extenuating, or commending their sin; by neglecting to reprove and promote the proper punishment of sin; and by not mourning over and praying against sin. Rev. xviii. 4; Eph. v. 11.

PARTHIA, a district of country on the north-east of Media, afterwards raised into a distinct kingdom by Arsaces, B.C. 256. This kingdom became very powerful, and spread over the greater part of the Persian empire, and was divided into eighteen provinces. The Romans, who had conquered many nations, were never able to subdue the Parthians, who continued to defend themselves against all enemies, until at length, in A.D. 226, Artaxerxes brought them under his government, thus founding a new Persian empire which included Parthia, and was ruled over by the Sassanidæ. Jews from Parthia are mentioned (Acts ii. 9) as having been present on the day of Pentecost at Jerusalem. Justin says that the Parthians were exiles from the Scythian nations.

PARTRIDGE (kra—1 Sam. xxvi. 20; Jer. xvii. 11; perdix—Ecclus. xi. 30). In the first of these places David says: "The king of Israel is come out to hunt a partridge on the mountains;" and in the second, "The partridge sitteth" on eggs, "and produceth," or hatcheth, "not; so he that getteth riches, and not by right, shall leave them in the midst of his days, and at his end shall be contemptible." This passage does not necessarily imply that the partridge hatches the eggs of a stranger, but only that she often fails in her attempts to bring forth her young. To such disappointments she is greatly exposed from the position of her nest on the ground, where her eggs are often spoiled by the wet, or crushed by the foot. So he that broods over his ill-gotten gains will often find them unproductive; or, if he leaves them, as a bird occasionally driven from her nest, may be despoiled of their possession. As to the hunting of the partridge, which, Dr. Shaw observes, is the greater or red-legged kind, the traveller says: "The Arabs have another, though a more laborious, method of catching these birds; for, observing that they become languid and fatigued after they have been hastily put up twice or thrice, they immediately run in upon them, and knock them down with their zerwattys, or bludgeons, as we should call them." Precisely in this manner Saul hunted David, coming hastily upon him, putting him up incessantly, in hopes that at length his strength and resources would fail, and he would become an easy prey to his pursuer. Forskal mentions a partridge whose name in Arabic is kurr; and Latham says that, in the province of Andalusia in Spain, the name of the partridge is churr: both taken, no doubt, like the Hebrew, from its note.

PARVAIM, the name of a region (2 Chron. iii. 6), thought by Bochart to be the same as Ophir.

PASHUR, the name of a priest or overseer of the temple in the time of Jeremiah. Jer. xx. 3, xxxviii. 1.

PASSION. This word has several very different significations. (1.) It signifies the passion or suffering of Christ: "To whom also he showed himself alive after his passion." Acts i. 3. (2.) It signifies shameful passions (Rom. i. 26), to which those are given up whom God abandons to their desires. Rom. vii. 5; 1 Thess. iv. 5. (3.) Passion, in its general import, signifies every feeling of the mind occasioned by an extrinsic cause. It is used to describe a violent commotion or agitation of the mind. See AFFECTIONS.

PASSIVE OBEDIENCE OF CHRIST. See OBEDIENCE and SUFFERINGS OF CHRIST.

PASSOVER (Heb. pesach, Gr. pascha), a solemn festival of the Jews, instituted in commemoration of their coming out of Egypt. The night before their departure, the destroying angel, who put to death the first-born of the Egyptians, passed over the houses of the Hebrews, without entering therein; because they were marked with the blood of the lamb, which was killed the evening before, and which, for this reason, was called the paschal lamb.

The manner of celebrating the passover has been thus described in a most accurate and concise manner:—

"The males of the family or company, consisting of not less than ten, and sometimes twenty, met together in the evening, when they washed their hands and feet, and placed themselves at table in the reclining posture then customary. In earlier times they ate the passover standing, with their staves in their hands, as about to begin a journey, Exod. xii. 11, but latterly they reclined at this, as at other meals, to indicate that they had been brought into the promised land of their rest. A cup of wine, mixed with water, was presented to each guest, over which a blessing was pronounced, 'Blessed be He that created the fruit of the vine!' The lamb, some unleavened bread, and bitter herbs, were then placed on the table as appointed by the law, also other articles of food. The principal person distributed pieces of the paschal lamb with unleavened bread, until all the lamb was eaten. The paschal lambs had been killed in the temple, with observances instituted for the occasion, and then being taken to the respective houses, were roasted on spits made of pomegranate wood. Every person present was bound to eat to the size of an olive at least. After this first repast they again washed their feet, and replaced themselves at table, to eat the second course or repast, consisting of bitter herbs, with a kind of sauce made of bruised palm branches, and berries or raisins, mixed with vinegar. This sauce was thick; it was called 'haroseth,' and was considered to represent the tempered clay from which their forefathers made bricks during their bondage in Egypt. Another cup of wine was taken. The master also divided the bread into two parts, and laying one part aside, covered with a napkin, he then blessed the other and distributed it, saying, 'Blessed be thou, O Lord our God, the King of the whole world, in the eating of unleavened bread.' He next took the reserved part from the napkin, and divided it into as many portions as there were guests. At that time, or as some think at an earlier period, one of the youngest of the company asked the meaning of this rite, Exod. xii. 26. 'And it shall come to pass when your children shall say unto you, What mean you by this service? then ye shall say, It is the sacrifice of the Lord's passover, who passed over the houses of the children of Israel in Egypt, when he smote the Egyptians, and delivered our houses.' The master answered by repeating the hagadah or showing forth. 'This is the bread of affliction, which our fathers ate in the land of affliction. Let him that is hungry come and eat the passover; let him that hath need come and eat the passover; for this passover is our Saviour and our refuge.' Or, he explained the symbolical meaning of the different dishes and observances, expounding from Deut. xxvi. 5, 'A Syrian ready to perish was my father,' &c. Then taking the cup, he first tasted it himself, and presented it to each, saying, 'Blessed be thou, O Lord, our God, King of the world, who hast created the fruit of the vine!’ This third cup was usually called the cup of blessing. The apostle refers to it, 1 Cor. x. 16, ‘The cup of blessing which we bless, is it not the communion of the blood of Christ?’ See also Ps. cxvi. 13. The whole ended with taking a fourth cup of wine, and singing the 113th and five following psalms of praise and thanksgiving, of which the 118th, the last, was peculiarly significant of the coming of Christ. These were called the great Hallel or Hallelujah.”

The passover has been uniformly viewed by theologians as an eminent type of Christ, and the very language of the inspired apostle sanctions the idea, 1 Cor. v. 7, “For even Christ our passover is sacrificed for us.” It were very easy to point out many striking points of resemblance between the paschal lamb and Christ the Lamb of God who taketh away the sins of the world. We might advert to the singular propriety of the animal selected, the lamb being so characterised by the meekness and unoffending mildness of its nature, as to afford a most appropriate type of the Saviour. The lamb was to be killed between the two evenings, the very time when our Saviour was crucified. It was to be roasted with fire, indicative of the severity of our Lord’s sufferings. Many other points of resemblance might be specified, but it is enough to refer the reader to such works as M’Ewan on the Types, and Professor Fairbairn’s admirable work on Typology.

PASTOR, literally a shepherd; figuratively a stated minister appointed to watch over and instruct a congregation.

Jesus Christ’s description of an evangelical pastor (Matt. xxiv. 45) includes two things—faithfulness and prudence. “If a minister be faithful, he deceives not others; and if he be prudent, he is not apt to deceive himself. His prudence suffers not deceivers easily to impose upon him; and his faithfulness will not suffer him knowingly to impose upon his people. His prudence will enable him to discern, and his faithfulness oblige him to distribute, wholesome food to his flock. But more particularly:—

“(1.) Ministerial faithfulness includes pure and spiritual aims and intentions for God. Phil. ii. 20, 21. (2.) Personal sincerity, or integrity of heart. Neh. ix. 8; 1 Cor. ii. 12. (3.) Diligence in the discharge of duty. Matt. xxv. 21; 2 Tim. iv. 2. (4.) Impartiality in the administrations of Christ’s house. 1 Tim. v. 21. (5.) An unshaken constancy and perseverance to the end. Rev. ii. 10. But the Lord’s servants must not only be faithful, but prudent, discreet, and wise. Fidelity and honesty make a good Christian; but the addition of prudence to fidelity makes a good steward. Faithfulness will fix the eye upon the right end; but it is prudence must direct to the proper means of attaining it. The use of prudence to a minister is unspeakably great; it not only gives clearness and perspicacity to the mind, by freeing it from passions and corporeal impressions, enabling it thereby to apprehend what is best to be done, but enables it, in its deliberation about the means, to make choice of the most apt and proper; and directs the application of them in the fittest season, without precipitation by too much haste, or hazard by too tedious delay.

“(1.) Prudence will direct us to lay a good foundation or knowledge in people’s souls, by catechising and instructing them in the principles of Christianity, without which we labour in vain. (2.) Ministerial prudence discovers itself in the choice of such subjects as the need of our people’s souls most require. (3.) It will not only direct us in the choice of our subjects, but of the language, too, in which we dress and deliver them to the people. (4.) It will show us of what great use our own affections are for the moving of others; and will therefore advise us, that, if ever we expect the truths we preach should operate upon the hearts of others, we must first have them impressed on our own hearts. Phil. iii. 18. (5.) It will direct us to be careful, by the strictness and gravity of our deportment, to maintain our esteem in the consciences of our people. (6.) It will excite us to seek a blessing from God upon our studies and labours, as knowing all our ministerial success entirely depends thereupon. 1 Cor. iii. 7.”

PATARA, a maritime city of Lycia, where Paul, going from Philippi to Jerusalem, found a ship bound for Phœnicia, in which he sailed (Acts xxi. 1), A.D. 58. It was celebrated for a temple of Apollo, and hence he was called Patarens Apollo.

PATERNOSTER, the name given by Roman Catholics to the Lord’s Prayer, obviously from the two opening words of the Latin version of it. In the rosary which they frequently use in their devotions, they repeat the Paternoster at every tenth bead, but at each of the intervening nine beads they repeat an Ave Maria or Hail Mary, thus manifesting in a very striking manner the idolatrous nature of their worship, there being nine prayers repeated to the Virgin for each one addressed to our Lord.

PATHROS (Jer. xlv. 1, 15; Ezek. xxix. 14, xxx. 14), one of three ancient divisions of Egypt, which answered to the Greek Thebais, and now Sais or Upper Egypt.

PATIENCE, that calm and unruffled temper with which a good man bears the evils of life.

“Patience,” says an eminent writer, “is apt to be ranked by many among the more humble and obscure virtues, belonging chiefly to those who groan on a sick bed, or who languish in a prison; but in every circumstance of life, no virtue is more important both to duty and to happiness. It is not confined to a situation of continued adversity: it principally, indeed, regards the disagreeable circumstances which are apt to occur; but prosperity cannot be enjoyed, any more than adversity supported, without it. It must enter into the temper, and form the habit of the soul, if we would pass through the world with tranquillity and honour.”

We have in Scripture the most powerful motives to excite us to the attainment of this grace. (1.) God is a God of patience. Rom. xv. 5. (2.) It is enjoined by the Gospel. Rom. xii. 12; Luke xxi. 19. (3.) The present state of man renders the practice of it absolutely necessary. Heb. x. 36. (4.) The manifold inconveniences of impatience is a strong motive. Ps. cvi. (5.) Eminent examples of it. Heb. xii. 2, vi. 12; Job i. 22. (6.) Reflect that all our trials will terminate in triumph. James v. 7, 8; Rom. ii. 7.

PATIENCE OF GOD, is his long-suffering or forbearance. He is called the God of patience, not only because he is the author and object of the grace of patience, but because he is patient or long-suffering in himself, and towards his creatures. It is not, indeed, to be considered as a quality, accident, passion, or affection in God, as in creatures, but belongs to the very nature and essence of God, and springs from his goodness and mercy. Rom. ii. 4. It is said to be exercised towards his chosen people (2 Pet.

iii. 9; Rom. iii. 25; Isa. xxx. 18; 1 Tim. i. 16); and towards the ungodly. Rom. ii. 4; Eccles. viii. 11. The end of his forbearance to the wicked, is, that they may be without excuse; to make his power and goodness visible; and partly for the sake of his own people. Gen. xviii. 32; Rev. vi. 11; 2 Pet. iii. 9. His patience is manifested by giving warnings of judgments before he executes them. Hos. vi. 5; Amos i. 1; 2 Pet. ii. 5. In long delaying his judgments. Eccles. viii. 11. In often mixing mercy with them. There are many instances of his patience recorded in the Scriptures—with the old world (Gen. vi. 3), the inhabitants of Sodom (Gen. xviii. 17–33), in Pharaoh (Exod. v.), in the people of Israel in the wilderness (Acts xiii. 18), in the Amorites and Canaanites (Gen. xv. 15; Lev. xviii. 28), in the Gentile world (Acts xvii. 30), in fruitless professors (Luke xiii. 6–9), in Antichrist (Rev. ii. 21, xiii. 6, xviii. 8).

PATMOS, an island in the Ægean Sea, now called Patino. It is thus described by Dr Wilson: "The island is irregular in its form, projecting in many parts into the sea. It is about twelve miles in length, six in breadth, and twenty-eight in circumference. It is in general bleak, bare, and barren; and has by no means such natural interest as some of the other Grecian isles which we saw. A paradise would not be chosen as a place of banishment; but there the venerable and beloved apostle John had visions of more than an earthly paradise, and such wondrous communion with the Saviour arrayed in majesty, dignity, and grace, as would amply compensate for his seclusion from the endeared communion of his fellow-believers." See APOCALYPSE.

PATRIARCHS (from the Greek patria, family, and archōn, head, or ruler), heads of families; a name applied chiefly to those who lived before Moses, who were both priests and princes, without peculiar places fitted for worship. Acts ii. 29, vii. 8, 9; Heb. vii. 4.

Patriarchs in the history of the church are ecclesiastical dignitaries, or bishops, so called from their paternal authority in the church. The office is said to have originated among the Jews, the president of the Sanhedrim being so called after the destruction of Jerusalem. The patriarchate seems to have been twofold: that over the western and that over the eastern Jews. The former, whose seat was at Tiberias, came speedily to a close, but the latter, whose seat was at Babylon, continued till 1038. The office was introduced into the Christian church, but the power of patriarchs was not the same in all, but differed according to the different customs of countries, or the pleasure of kings and councils. Thus the patriarch of Constantinople grew to be a patriarch over the patriarchs of Ephesus and Cæsarea, and was called the ecumenical and universal patriarch; and the patriarch of Alexandria had some prerogatives which no other patriarch but himself enjoyed, such as the right of consecrating and approving of every single bishop under his jurisdiction.

The patriarchate has ever been esteemed the supreme dignity in the Church: the bishop had only under him the territory of the city of which he was bishop; the metropolitan superintended a province, and had for suffragans the bishops of his province; the primate was the chief of what was then called a diocese, and had several metropolitans under him; and the patriarch had under him several dioceses, composing one exarchate, and the primates themselves were under him. See CHURCH, GREEK.

PATRIPASSIANS, or PATROPASSIANS, a name applied to the Monarchians, Noetians, Praxeans, Sabelians, and all others who, believing the Father and Son to be one person, and believing also that the latter suffered and died, are charged with maintaining that the Father himself suffered. For the Trinitarians thus reasoned: "If the Son suffered, and he was the same person as the Father, then must the Father have also suffered." But their opponents did not admit this: they confined the sufferings of Christ to his human nature, and admitted only that the Father (or divine nature) suffered by sympathy with the humanity of Jesus. It does not appear, however, that this sentiment created any schism in the Church. See PRAXEANS.

PATROBAS, the name of a Christian who resided at Rome, and to whom Paul sends his salutation. Rom. xvi. 14.

PATRONAGE, or ADVOWSON, a sort of incorporeal hereditament, consisting in the right of presentation to a church or ecclesiastical benefice. Advowson signifies the taking into protection, and therefore is synonymous with patronage; and he who has the right of advowson is called the patron of the church.

PAUL, an eminent apostle of the Lord Jesus Christ. Saul, or Paul, the former the original Hebrew, the latter the Hellenistic form of his name, was a native of Tarsus in Cilicia. His early history, and its effect upon his future life, are thus noticed by Neander:—"As we do not know how long he remained under the paternal roof, it is impossible to determine what influence his education in the metropolis of Cilicia (which as a seat of literature vied with Athens and Alexandria) had on the formation of his character. Certainly his early acquaintance with the language and national peculiarities of the Greeks was of some advantage in preparing him to be a teacher of Christianity among nations of Grecian origin. Yet the few passages from the Greek poets which we meet with in his discourse at Athens, and in his epistles, do not prove that his education had made him familiar with Grecian literature; nor is it probable that such would be the case. As his parents designed him to be a teacher of the law, or Jewish theologian, his studies must have been confined in his early years to the Old Testament, and about the age of twelve or thirteen he must have entered the school of Gamaliel. It is possible, though, considering Paul's pharisaic zeal, not probable, that the more liberal views of his tolerant-minded teacher Gamaliel might induce him to turn his attention to Grecian literature. A man of his mental energy, whose zeal overcame all difficulties in his career, and whose love prompted him to make himself familiar with all the mental habitudes of the men among whom he laboured, that he might sympathise more completely with their wants and infirmities, might be induced, while among people of Grecian culture, to acquire some knowledge of the principal writers. But in the style of his representations, the Jewish element evidently predominates. His peculiar mode of argumentation was not formed in the Grecian but in the Jewish school. The name Saul, the desired one, the one prayed for, perhaps indicates that he was the first-born of his parents, granted in answer to their earnest prayers; and hence it may be inferred, that he was devoted by his father, a Pharisee, to the service of religion, and sent in early youth to Jerusalem, that he might be trained to become a learned expounder of the law and of tradition; not to add, that it was usual for the youth of Tarsus to complete their education at some foreign school. Most advantageously for him, he acquired in the pharisaic schools at Jerusalem that systematic form of intellect which afterwards rendered him such good service in developing the contents of the Christian doctrine; so that, like Luther, he became thoroughly conversant with the theological system, which afterwards, by the power of the gospel, he uprooted and destroyed. A youth so ardent and energetic as Paul would throw his whole soul into whatever he undertook; his natural temperament would dispose him to an overflowing impetuous zeal, and for such a propensity Pharisaism supplied abundant aliment. We may also infer from his peculiar disposition, as well as from various hints he gives of himself, that in legal piety, according to the notions of the strictest Pharisaism, he strove to go beyond all his companions. But in proportion to the earnestness of his striving after holiness—the more he combated the refractory impulses of an ardent and powerful nature, which refused to be held in by the reins of the law—so much more ample were his opportunities for understanding from his own experience the woful discord in human nature which arises when the moral consciousness asserts its claims as a controlling law, while the man feels himself constantly carried away in defiance of his better longing and willing by the force of ungodly inclination. Paul could not have depicted this condition so strikingly and to the life, in the seventh chapter of the Epistle to the Romans, if he had not gained the knowledge of it from personal experience. After the martyrdom of Stephen, when many adherents of the gospel sought for safety by flight, Paul felt himself called to counterwork them in the famed city of Damascus, where the new sect was gaining ground. And he hastened thither, after receiving full powers for committing all the Christians to prison from the Sanhedrim, who, as the highest ecclesiastical authority among the Jews, were allowed by the Romans to inflict all disciplinary punishment against the violators of the law."

The remarkable change which was miraculously effected on his journey to Damascus, in his whole sentiments and character, is thus described and explained by Professor Buchanan in his interesting and instructive work on the Holy Spirit:—

"If we consider the circumstances which accompanied, and the means which effected his conversion, we shall find that, while it was brought about in a miraculous way, it was the result of the truth which was made known to him by the vision and the voice of the Saviour, and which was carried home to his heart by demonstration of the Spirit and by power from on high. It is said, that 'as he journeyed, he came near Damascus: and suddenly there shined round about him a light from heaven: and he fell to the earth, and heard a voice saying unto him, Saul, Saul, why persecutest thou me?' The miraculous accompaniments of his conversion, were the shining light—a 'light above the brightness of the sun'—the supernatural voice, and the sudden infliction of blindness, which was afterwards miraculously cured, when there 'fell from his eyes as it had been scales;' but while these and similar circumstances were useful as subordinate means, in the way of arresting his attention, and impressing his conscience, and affording evidence for the truth, it was the truth itself—the simple truth as it is in Jesus, which effected the conversion of Paul; and herein it resembles the case of every other sinner.

"That truth was presented to him in three distinct ways:—1. It was embodied, as it were, and exhibited in the vision of Christ. And that you may understand the suitableness of this manifestation, and what a flood of light it was fitted to pour into his mind, I request you to remember, that as Saul did not at that time believe in Jesus, he must have regarded him as an impostor, who had been justly condemned and put to death; and that his unbelief, which had probably been founded on the extreme humiliation of Christ, when he appeared as a 'man of sorrows and acquainted with grief,' was doubtless confirmed by his death and burial, when his enemies seemed to have triumphed over him. And what, then, could be better fitted to undeceive him—to convince him of his former error, and to unfold to him the glorious truth—than the personal appearance of the same Man of Sorrows, after he had been crucified, in the brightness of his resurrection glory, and in the dignity of his exaltation? The mere appearance of the Saviour in such a form contained in it the whole gospel; it proved as well as exhibited the truth; it showed that he had risen from the dead—that he had ascended up on high—that he had been exalted by the right hand of God, and if exalted, then he was what he professed to be—the Son of God, the Christ, the Messiah that had been promised to the fathers; nay, that he had finished the work which the Father had given him to do—that his work had been accepted, and his reward earned—insomuch, that now 'all power was given to him in heaven and on earth;' and from the cross he had passed to the throne! All this must have flashed at once on the mind of Saul, as soon as he was made acquainted with the Person who spake to him from amidst that shining light!

"While the truth was embodied and exhibited in the vision of Christ, it was farther explained by his voice. We find no formal discourse, no full exposition, no systematic statement of the truth, but a few intimations which, when combined with what he then witnessed, and what he afterwards learned, were enough to produce in his mind the faith which is unto salvation. When he said, 'Who art thou, Lord?' the Lord said, 'I am Jesus, whom thou persecutest: it is hard for thee to kick against the pricks. And he, trembling and astonished, said, Lord, what wilt thou have me to do? And the Lord said unto him, Arise, go into the city, and it shall be told thee what thou must do.' When the voice asked him, 'Saul, Saul, why persecutest thou me?' he must have had some indistinct impression that it was Jesus who spoke to him, for he knew in his conscience that he was persecuting his disciples, and the miraculous vision convinced him that he was in the Divine presence, for he called him Lord; but when, in answer to his question, 'Who art thou?' he received that express declaration, 'I am Jesus,' or as it is in the 22d chapter, 'I am Jesus of Nazareth,'—oh! what deep convictions and emotions must, at that instant, have rushed into his soul! If Jesus was indeed alive; if he had really risen from the dead; if he had ascended into heaven; and if he now stood in his immediate presence,—then Saul must have felt, with all the quickness and certainty of intuition, that, in opposing the gospel, he was fighting against God; and no wonder that he lay on the earth 'trembling and astonished,' when he knew that the same Jesus who was crucified in weakness had been raised in power, and had now come down,—might it not be to judge and destroy? There was, indeed, no word of threatening, but a pointed question, a touching expostulation,—demanding the reason of his present conduct, in such a way as must have awakened his conscience to reprove him of sin. That he felt the reproof, and was alarmed on account of his guilt and danger, appears from his ‘trembling;’ but fear is not faith; remorse is not repentance; nor is there sufficient power in mere terror to effect the conversion of the heart. The heart is turned by the attraction of the Saviour’s love; and if, on the one hand, the words of Christ served to impress his mind with a very awful sense of his guilt, seeing that they represented his persecution of the Church as equivalent to the persecution of Christ himself; they were also fitted, on the other hand, to convey to his mind a very vivid idea of the tenderness of his compassion, and the riches of his grace. For when the Saviour said, ‘I am Jesus, whom thou persecutest,’ what a discovery was made of his love to his own people! Saul was not consciously persecuting Christ, he was only pursuing his poor followers; he was in quest of certain men and women at Damascus, that he might bring them bound to Jerusalem; but when Jesus met him by the way, he did not say to him, Saul, Saul, why persecutest thou them? but, Why persecutest thou ME?—intimating thereby that he identifies himself with his people,—that in all their affliction he is afflicted, that they were ‘members of his body, of his flesh, and of his bones;’—that if any one member suffered, the Head sympathised and suffered too, according to his own language in another place: ‘Inasmuch as ye did it unto one of the least of these my brethren, ye did it unto me!’ But full as it was of love for his people, this language might have only terrified the trembling persecutor, and driven him to the verge of despair, had there been no manifestation of tenderness and compassion to himself: he might have thought, if, in pursuing these men and women, I have been persecuting Christ, the Lord of glory, there is no hope for me; but immediately Jesus drops a word of kindness which was as a cordial to his sinking spirit; his very expostulation breathes a spirit of tenderness, and shows that the persecutor had a place in the Saviour’s heart,—for mark the gracious words, ‘It is hard for thee to kick against the pricks:’ it is hard—not for me, whom thou persecutest,—not for my poor followers, the men and women whom thou art haling to prison; but, ‘it is hard for THEE.’ Oh! then, the Saviour had a sympathy even for this sinner; the Prince of peace was concerned for this persecutor, and spake of the hardship, the injury, he was doing to himself; and how must this tenderness have touched his heart, at a time when he was self-convicted, and self-condemned, especially if, by ‘kicking against the pricks,’ he understood the Lord to mean his resisting the convictions of his own conscience, and setting himself in opposition to the truths which he had now been taught! By such means he was at once convinced of his sin, and instructed in the relation which Christ bears to his people, and the compassion which he felt for himself; and to these means he refers afterwards as having been instrumental in God’s hand in bringing him to a knowledge of the truth: ‘I certify you, brethren, that the gospel which was preached of me is not after man. For I neither received it of man, neither was I taught it, but by the revelation of Jesus Christ.’

“While Saul was first brought to the knowledge and belief of the truth, by the vision and voice of the Saviour himself, God was pleased, even in this remarkable case, to put honour on his own ordinance, by employing the ministry of Ananias to instruct and confirm him in the faith: ver. 6—‘The Lord said unto him, Arise, and go into the city, and it shall be told thee what thou must do.’ Ver. 10—“And there was a certain disciple, named Ananias, and to him said the Lord in a vision, Ananias. And he said, Behold, I am here, Lord. And the Lord said unto him, Arise, and go into the street which is called Straight, and inquire in the house of Judas for one called Saul of Tarsus: for, behold, he prayeth, and hath seen in a vision a man named Ananias coming in, and putting his hand on him, that he might receive his sight. Then Ananias answered, Lord, I have heard by many of this man, how much evil he hath done to thy saints at Jerusalem: and here he hath authority from the chief priests to bind all that call on thy name. But the Lord said unto him, Go thy way: for he is a chosen vessel unto me, to bear my name before the Gentiles, and kings, and the children of Israel: for I will show him how great things he must suffer for my name’s sake. And Ananias went his way, and entered into the house; and putting his hand on him, said, Brother Saul, the Lord, even Jesus, that appeared unto thee in the way as thou camest, hath sent me, that thou mightest receive thy sight, and be filled with the Holy Ghost. And immediately there fell from his eyes as it had been scales: and he received sight forthwith, and arose, and was baptized.’

The following remarks of Hug on the character of Paul, both before and after his conversion, are singularly judicious:—“This most violent man, having such terrible propensities, whose turbulent impulses rendered him of a most enterprising character, would have become nothing better than a John of Gishala, a blood-intoxicated zealot (empneōn apailēs kai phonou) breathing out threatenings and slaughter (Acts ix. 1), had not his whole soul been changed. The harsh tone of his mind inclined him to the principles of Pharisaism, which had all the appearance of severity, and was the predominant party among the Jews. Nature had not withholden from him the external endowments of eloquence, although he afterwards spoke very modestly of them. Longinus reckons him among the greatest orators of antiquity. At Lystra he was deemed the tutelar god of eloquence. This character qualified for great things; but not master of himself, from excess of internal power, his was an extreme of human dispositions, and, according to the natural course, he was prone to absolute extremities. His religion was a destructive zeal, his anger was fierceness, his fury required victims. A ferocity so boisterous did not naturally qualify him for a Christian, nor for a philanthropist; but least of all for a quietly enduring man. He, nevertheless, became all this on his conversion to Christianity, and each bursting emotion of his mind subsided directly into a well-regulated and noble character. Formerly hasty and irritable, now spirited and resolved; formerly violent, now full of energy and enterprising; once ungovernably refractory against every thing which obstructed him, now only persevering; once fanatical and morose, now only serious; once cruel, now only firm; once a harsh zealot, now fearing God; formerly unrelenting, deaf to sympathy and commiseration, now himself acquainted with tears, which he had seen without effect in others. Formerly the friend of none, now the brother of mankind, benevolent, compassionate, sympathizing; yet never weak, always great; in the midst of sadness and sorrow, manly and noble; so he showed himself at his deeply moving departure from Miletus (Acts xx. 17-38): it is like the departure of Moses, like the resignation of Samuel, sincere and heartfelt, full of self-recollection, and in the midst of pain full of dignity.

"His writings are a true expression of this character, with regard to the tone predominant in them. Severity, manly seriousness, and sentiments which ennoble the heart, are interchanged with mildness, affability, and sympathy; and their transitions are such as nature begets in the heart of a man penetrated by his subject, noble and discerning. He exhorts, reproaches, and consoles again; he attacks with energy, urges with impetuosity, then again he speaks kindly to the soul; he displays his finer feelings for the welfare of others, his forbearance and his fear of afflicting any body: all as the subject, time, opposite dispositions, and circumstances require. There prevails throughout in them an importuning language, an earnest and lively communication. Rom. i. 26-32, is a comprehensive and vigorous description of morals. His antitheses (Rom. ii. 21-24; 2 Cor. iv. 8-12, vi. 9-11, xi. 22-30), his enumerations (1 Cor. xiii. 4-10; 2 Cor. vi. 4-10; 2 Tim. iii. 1-5; Eph. iv. 4-7, v. 3-6), his gradations (Rom. viii. 29, 30; Tit. iii. 3, 4), the interrogations, exclamations, and comparisons, sometimes animate his language even so as to give a visible existence to it.

"That, however, which we principally perceive in Paul, and from which his whole actions and operations become intelligible, is the peculiar impression which the idea of a universal religion has wrought upon his mind. This idea of establishing a religion for the world had not so profoundly engrossed any soul, nowhere kindled so much vigour, and projected it into such a constant energy. In this he was no man's scholar; this he had immediately received from the Spirit of his Master; it was a spark of the divine light which enkindled him. It was this which never allowed him to remain in Palestine and in Syria, which so powerfully impelled him to foreign parts. The portion of some others was Judea and its environs; but his mission was directed to the nations, and his allotment was the whole of the heathen world. Thus he began his career among the different nations of Asia Minor; and when this limit also became too confined for him, he went with equal confidence to Europe, among other nations, ordinances, sciences, and customs; and here likewise he finally, with the same indefatigable spirit, circulated his plans, even to the Pillars of Hercules. In this manner Paul prepared the overthrow of two religions—that of his ancestors, and that of the heathens."

No sooner had Paul become a convert to the Christian faith, than he commenced the work assigned him, as a faithful and devoted missionary of the cross. His labours, and the narrative of his three missionary journeys, are fully detailed in the Acts of the Apostles, and in reviewing the history of Paul, Dr Welsh remarks:—

"The extent of the labours of St Paul, and the astonishing success with which they were accompanied, must always give to the apostle the most distinguished place among the instruments employed by divine Providence for the propagation of the gospel. Even before he was carried a prisoner to Rome, he could say 'that from Jerusalem and round about unto Illyricum, he had fully preached the gospel of Christ,' (Rom. xv. 19), and after that period, the field of his operations was still further enlarged. In particular, he so confirmed the Church at Rome, during the two years that he was a prisoner in that city, as to make it the great central point for the diffusion of Christianity in the West. We have seen how much the progress of the gospel was promoted by its deliverance from the bonds of Judaism, which, under the direction of the great Head of the Church, was practically to be ascribed to his enlightened views, and his decision of character; and the doctrine set forth in his epistolary writings has proved in all succeeding ages 'the power of God unto salvation.' In the various churches planted by him, he established a system of government admirably calculated for preserving and extending the new faith; and while, by his care of them all, he formed them into his own views, he imparted to not a few of his more attached disciples, a portion of his own missionary zeal, employing them as active agents towards evangelizing the world. Among these may be mentioned Timothy and Titus, and also Luke, to whose friendship for the apostle we are indebted for the ample information respecting him contained in the Acts of the Apostles."

There is a passage in Peter which is commonly understood to imply that some parts of Paul's epistles are hard to be understood; and this has been advanced again and again, as if every thing he wrote were of dangerous tendency, unless guarded by interpretations and comments. We concede cheerfully that there are difficulties in the writings of Paul peculiar to himself; but we must beg leave to affirm that the assertion commonly attributed to Peter never was made by Peter. The usual error on this subject arises solely from the want of grammatical accuracy in the translation. The passage correctly translated runs thus: "Even as our beloved brother Paul, also, according to the wisdom given unto him, hath written unto you; as also in all his epistles, speaking in them of these things (that is, the coming of the last day, the dissolution of the elements, the judgment of the quick and dead, &c.); among which things (en tois, not en hais) are some hard to be understood." The difficulty consists not in Paul's manner of treating the subjects (1 Cor. ii. 13), but in the subjects themselves, when compared with the limits of the human understanding.

Paul's powerful and diversified character of mind seems to have combined the separate excellencies of all the other sacred authors: the loftiness of Isaiah; the devotion of David; the pathos of Jeremiah; the vehemence of Ezekiel; the didactic gravity of Moses; the elevated morality and practical good sense, though somewhat more highly coloured, of James; the sublime conceptions and deep views of John; the noble energies and burning zeal of Peter. To all these he added his own strong argumentative powers, depth of thought, and intensity of feeling. Yet his style is often abrupt, and sometimes obscure: his reasoning, though generally clear, is, as the best critics allow, sometimes involved, perhaps owing to the suddenness of his transitions, the rapidity of his ideas, the sensibility of his soul. The apostle is often carried away by the impetuous fervour and loftiness of his mind. On such occasions, to confine his excursive spirit within the limits of regular argumentation, would be to chain down the ocean in the proudest swelling and grandeur of its waves. But we can scarcely consider this as a defect. It may deter the idle, it may supply an excuse for indolence; but if it invite the more studious to a serious examination of his writings, the result will be beneficial: many passages, apparently involved, will be clearly comprehended, and the order of the reasoning distinctly seen. It was the opinion of Epiphanius, that the alleged complication of Paul's discourses was only in appearance; and we will venture to add with our author, that if any of them should remain after all obscure and intricate, yet some lesson of practical wisdom will be the reward of examination; some position of piety, some aphorism of virtue, easy from its brevity, intelligible from its clearness, and valuable from its weight. No person ever yet repented of consulting the pages of Paul. They are, as has been justly stated, "a golden mine, in which the diligent workman, the deeper he digs, the more he will discover; the farther he examines, the more he will find."

PAULIANISTS, a sect so called from their founder, Paulus Samosateus, a native of Samosata, elected bishop of Antioch in 262. His doctrine seems to have amounted to this: that the Son and Holy Ghost exist in God in the same manner as the faculties of reason and activity do in man; that Christ was born a mere man, but that the reason or wisdom of the Father descended into him, and by him wrought miracles upon earth, and instructed the nations; and, finally, that on account of this union of the divine Word with the man Jesus, Christ might, though improperly, be called God. It is also said that he did not baptize in the name of the Father and the Son, &c.; for which reason the Council of Nice ordered those baptized by him to be rebaptized. Being condemned by Dionysius Alexandrinus in a council, he abjured his errors to avoid deposition; but soon after he resumed them, and was actually deposed by another council, A.D. 369. He may be considered as the father of the modern Socinians; and his errors are severely condemned by the Council of Nice, whose creed differs a little from that now used under the same name in the Church of England. The creed agreed upon by the Nicene fathers, with a view to the errors of Paulus Samosateus, concludes thus: "But those who say there was a time when he was not, and that he was not before he was born, the Catholic and Apostolic Church anathematize."

PAVEMENT. In 2 Kings xvi. 17, we read that King Ahab substituted for the brazen oxen, on which the laver of the temple rested, a pavement of stones. The floors of the splendid apartments in the houses of Eastern nobles were often laid with painted tiles or slabs of the most beautiful marble. A pavement of this kind is mentioned in the Book of Esther. At the sumptuous entertainment which Ahasuerus made for the princes and nobles of his vast empire, the beds or couches upon which they reclined were of gold and silver, upon a pavement of red and blue, and white and black marble. Plaster of terrace is often used for the same purpose, and the floor is always covered with carpets, which are for the most part of the richest materials. Moses, to describe the pavement under the feet of the God of Israel with due majesty, represents it as like the floors of painted tile he had seen in Egypt, but transparent as the body of heaven. "And they saw the God of Israel: and there was under his feet as it were a paved work of a sapphire stone, and as it were the body of heaven in his clearness." Exod. xxiv. 10. We find Pilate's judgment-seat to have been "in a place called the Pavement," probably as being a platform or elevated stage, composed of marble or variegated stones, cut into square or triangular pieces, so as to resemble a tessellated pavement of the utmost grandeur and elegance. Dr. Robinson tells us that there are still found on the side of Jerusalem where the Roman governors generally erected their tribunals, "fragments of polished marble, and especially the small cubes of marble, of different colours, not much larger than dice, which were employed in the construction of the ancient tessellated pavements."

PAVILION. The word thus translated in 1 Kings xx. 12, 16, refers to a temporary hut or tabernacle, composed of branches of trees. Such slight defences from the heat are often used in Eastern countries.

PEACE, that state in which persons are exposed to no sort of violence to interrupt their tranquillity. (1.) Social peace is mutual agreement one with another, whereby we forbear injuring one another. Ps. xxxiv. 14, cxxxii. (2.) Ecclesiastical peace is freedom from contentions, and rest from persecutions. Isa. xi. 13, xxxii. 17; Rev. xii. 14. (3.) Spiritual peace is deliverance from sin, by which we were at enmity with God (Rom. v. 1); the result of which is peace in the conscience. Heb. x. 22. This peace is the gift of God through Jesus Christ. 2 Thess. iii. 16. It is a blessing of great importance. Ps. cxix. 165. It is denominated perfect (Isa. xxvi. 3); inexpressible (Phil. iv. 7); permanent (Job xxxiv. 29; John xvi. 22); eternal (Isa. lvii. 2; Heb. iv. 9). (See HAPPINESS.)

Peace is a word used in Scripture generally for quiet and tranquillity, public or private; but often for every kind and degree of prosperity and happiness; as to "go in peace;" to "die in peace;" "God give you peace;" "Peace be within this house;" "Pray for the peace of Jerusalem." Paul, in the introduction of his Epistles, generally wishes grace and peace to the faithful to whom he writes. Our Saviour recommends to his disciples to have peace with all men, and with each other. God promises his people to water them as with a river of peace (Isa. lxvi. 12), and to make with them a covenant of peace. Ezek. xxxiv. 25. See also Isa. ix. 7.

PEACOCK (tacacium—1 Kings x. 22; 2 Chron. ix. 21), a bird distinguished by the length of its tail, and the brilliant spots with which it is adorned; which display all that dazzles in the sparkling lustre of gems, and all that astonishes in the rainbow. Yet its cry is so harsh and disagreeable, that it has been said to have "the head of a serpent, the train of an angel, and the voice of a devil."

The peacock is a bird originally from India; thence brought into Persia and Media. Aristophanes mentions Persian peacocks; and Suidas calls the peacock the Median bird. From Persia it was gradually dispersed into Judea, Egypt, Greece, and Europe. If the fleet of Solomon visited India, they might easily procure this bird, whether from India itself, or from Persia; and certainly the bird, by its beauty, was likely to attract attention, and to be brought among other rarities of natural history by Solomon's servants, who would be instructed to collect every curiosity in the countries they visited.

PEARL, a hard, white, shining body, usually roundish, found in a shell-fish resembling an oyster. The Oriental pearls have a fine polished gloss, and are tinged with an elegant blush of red. They are esteemed in the East beyond all other jewels.

The Arabians, Persians, and Turks, use the word merotariid, to signify pearls, from which the word margarites, or margarita, used by the Greeks and Latins, seems to be derived. The finest pearls are fished up in the Persian Gulf, and on the coast of Bahrein, so called from the city of that name, on the borders of Arabia; and Idumea and Palestine being not far distant, it is not to be wondered at that pearls were well known to Job and the Hebrews. They are also found in other places; many in America.

Pearls are certainly very different things from precious stones; yet the Greek term, margarites, seems to be used, in a more general sense, for jewels or splendid gems. So, in Matt. vii. 6, "Cast not your pearls." Jewels—diamonds—if known to the ancients, would answer the import of the passage as well as pearls. So, the parts of a building, pearls; but pearls are unfit things for walls and gates (Rev. xxi. 11–21); many kinds of precious stones are more suitable; and perhaps the parable of the merchant seeking goodly pearls (Matt. xiii. 45, 46), might be understood in a more extensive sense, as importing valuable jewels of whatever kind. Such appears to be the application of the Chaldee and Arabic words, which yet properly signify pearls.

PEKAH, an officer of the guards under Pekahiah, king of Israel, who murdered his master, and succeeded him on the throne. He reigned about twenty years, at the end of which time he was assassinated by Hoshea. 2 Kings xv. 29, 30. Towards the end of his reign, Tiglath-pileser carried many of his subjects into Assyria.

PEKAHIAH, the seventeenth king of Israel, who succeeded his father, Menahem. He reigned about two years, when he was assassinated by Pekah, one of his officers at Samaria. 2 Kings xv. 23–25.

PELAGIANS, a sect which arose in the fifth century, and opposed with warmth certain received notions respecting original sin, and the necessity of divine grace. They maintained, it is said, the following doctrines:—1. That Adam was by nature mortal; and, whether he had sinned or not, would certainly have died. 2. That the consequences of Adam's sin were confined to his own person. 3. That newborn infants are in the same situation with Adam before the fall. 4. That the law qualified men for the kingdom of heaven, and was founded upon equal promises with the gospel. 5. That the general resurrection of the dead does not follow in virtue of our Saviour's resurrection. 6. That the grace of God is given according to our merits. 7. That this grace is not granted for the performance of every moral act—the liberty of the will and information on points of duty being sufficient. 8. That faith is not an effect, but the cause of election to salvation.

Pelagius was a British monk, of some rank and very exalted reputation. He, with his friend, Celestius, travelled to Rome, where they resided very early in the fifth century. On the approach of the Goths, they retired to Africa, where Celestius remained, with a view of gaining admittance as a presbyter into the Church of Carthage. Pelagius proceeded to Palestine, where he enjoyed the favour and protection of John, bishop of Jerusalem.

The Pelagian controversy, which began with the doctrines of grace and original sin, was extended to predestination, and excited continual discord and division in the Church. It must, however, be recollected, that we are acquainted with the sentiments of Pelagius only through the medium of his opponents; and that it is possible they were much misrepresented. (See AUGUSTINE.)

Isidore, Chrysostom, and Augustine strenuously opposed these opinions; and the latter procured their condemnation in a synod held at Carthage in 412. They were, however, favourably received at Rome; and Pope Zozimus was at the head of the Pelagian party; but his decision against the African bishops, who had opposed Pelagianism, was disregarded by them, and the pontiff yielded at length to their reasonings and remonstrances, and condemned the men whom he had before honoured with his approbation. The Council of Ephesus likewise condemned the opinions of Pelagius and Celestius; and the emperor Honorius, in 418, published an edict, which ordained that the leaders of the sect should be expelled from Rome, and their followers exiled.

Arminians are often charged with holding Pelagian errors, either in their gross form, or in the still more modified form of semi-Pelagianism; and while they resolutely deny the charge, the tenets of the two systems undoubtedly meet at various points.

PELEG, son of Eber, was born A.M. 1757. His father named him Peleg (division), because in his time the earth was divided. Gen. x. 25, xi. 16. Whether Noah had begun to distribute the earth among his descendants, some years before the building of Babel; or, that Peleg was born the year that Babel was begun; or, that Eber, by a spirit of prophecy, named his son Peleg some years before this time; or, that the name was given to him at a later period of his life, as a commemorative appellation, on recollection, is not certainly known; though it seems most likely that he was not born at the time of the dispersion.

PELETHITES. See CHERETHIM.

PELICAN (kaath, a vomiter—Lev. xi. 18; Deut. xiv. 17; Ps. cii. 6; Isa. xxxiv. 11; Zeph. ii. 14), a very remarkable aquatic bird, of the size of a large goose. Its colour is a greyish white, except that the neck looks a little yellowish, and the middle of the back feathers are blackish. The bill is long, and hooked at the end, and has under it a lax membrane, extended to the throat, which makes a bag or sack, capable of holding a very large quantity. Feeding her young from this bag has so much the appearance of feeding them with her own blood, that it caused this fabulous opinion to be propagated, and made the pelican an emblem of paternal, as the stork had been before regarded, more justly, of filial, affection. The voice of this bird is harsh and dissonant, which some say resembles that of a man grievously complaining. David compares his groaning to it. Ps. cii. 6.

PELLA, one of the ten cities considered by Josephus, the Jewish historian, as included in the region beyond Jordan termed Decapolis. Pliny agrees with Josephus as to the situation of this place. Others again place it in Perea, in Batanea, and in Bashan. It appears plain, therefore, that the precise locality of Pella cannot be considered as ascertained. Dr Wilson conjectures that it may be the modern Kafr-Bil. Josephus relates, that under the reign of Alexander Jannæus, the Jews were masters of Pella, and destroyed it, because the inhabitants would not embrace Judaism. The first Christians, having been forewarned by our Saviour that Jerusalem should be demolished, took refuge at Pella, as related by Eusebius, as soon as they saw the fire of war against the Romans kindled.

PEN, a well-known instrument used in writing. Reeds were formerly employed for this purpose, instead of quills. The Arabians, Persians, Turks, Greeks, and other Orientals, still write with reeds.

Our translators have adopted a rendering in Judg. v. 14 which scarcely seems to be warranted: "Out of Machir came down governors, and out of Zebulun they that handle the pen of the writer." The Hebrew word here translated "pen" has nowhere else that signification throughout the Scriptures. Its genuine meaning is a rod, staff, or wand, and instead of the "pen of the writer," the correct version, as Bush thinks, is "the rod of the numberer," a metaphor taken from the custom of shepherds in numbering, separating, or selecting their sheep by means of a rod besmeared with paint, with which they marked every fifth, tenth, or twentieth, as the case might be, as they came out of their enclosure. Among the ancients styles or bodkins were used instead of pens, with which they wrote on tablets covered with wax. The style was made of iron, brass, or bone, sharp at one end, while the other end was formed like a spoon, and employed for erasing. Scripture refers to this custom in 2 Kings xxi. 13: "I will wipe Jerusalem as a man wipeth a dish, wiping it, and turning it upside down."

Jeremiah says, "The sin of Judah is written with a pen of iron and with the point of a diamond. It is graven upon the table of their heart;" or, engraven on their heart, as on writing tablets.

PENANCE, a punishment, either voluntary or imposed by authority, for the faults a person has committed. Penance is one of the seven sacraments of the Romish Church. Besides fasting, alms, abstinence, and the like, which are the general conditions of penance, there are others of a more particular kind; as the repeating a certain number of ave-marias, paternosters, and credos, wearing a hair shirt, and giving one's self a certain number of stripes. In Italy and Spain, and indeed in all strictly Roman Catholic countries, penances of the most painful and revolting description are frequently imposed. (See POPERY.)

PENIEL, or PENUEL, a city beyond Jordan, near the ford on the brook Jabbok, where Jacob, on his return from Mesopotamia, rested, and wrestled with an angel. Gen. xxxii. 30. See JABBOK.

PENITENCE is sometimes used for a state of repentance, and sometimes for the act of repenting. (See REPENTANCE.) It is also used for a discipline or punishment attending repentance, more usually called penance. It also gives title to several religious orders, consisting either of converted debauchees and reformed prostitutes, or of persons who devote themselves to the office of reclaiming them. See article PENITENTS.

PENITENTIAL, an ecclesiastical book retained among the Romanists, in which is prescribed what relates to the imposition of penance, and the reconciliation of penitents. There are various penitentials; as the Roman penitential, that of the venerable Bede, that of Pope Gregory III., &c.

PENITENTIARY, in the ancient Christian Church, a name given to certain presbyters or priests, appointed in every Church to receive the private confessions of the people, in order to facilitate public discipline, by informing them what sins were to be expiated by public penance, and to appoint private penance for such private crimes as were not proper to be publicly censured.

Penitentiary, also, in the court of Rome, is an office in which are examined and delivered out the secret bulls, dispensations, &c. Penitentiary is also an officer in some cathedrals vested with power from the bishop to absolve in cases referred to him. The term is also applied among Protestants to such houses as have been established for the reception and reformation of females who have been seduced from the path of virtue.

PENITENTS, certain fraternities of religious of both sexes among the Roman Catholics. The Male Penitents are distinguished by the colour of their garments, white, black, blue, &c. The Black Penitents (called the Brethren of Mercy, instituted 1488) attended criminals to their execution. The Female Penitents are chiefly reformed prostitutes, as the Penitents of St. Magdalen, at Paris and Marseilles, the Converts of the Name of Jesus at Seville, &c.

PEN-KNIFE. This word occurs in Jer. xxxvi. 23, and is intended to denote the instrument with which the writer sharpened the reed with which he wrote.

PENNY (denarius), a Roman coin, equal in value to sevenpence three farthings, sterling. It is mentioned in Matt. xviii. 28, xx. 9.

PENTATEUCH (from pente, five, and teuchos, an instrument or volume), signifies the collection of the five instruments or books of Moses, which are Genesis, Exodus, Leviticus, Numbers, and Deuteronomy. (See MOSES.)

Some modern writers, among whom is Gesenius, have asserted that Moses did not compose the Pentateuch, because the author always speaks in the third person; abridges his narration, like a writer who collected from ancient memoirs; sometimes interrupts the thread of his discourse (for example, Gen. iv. 23); and gives an account of the death of Moses at the end, &c. It is alleged, also, of the text of the Pentateuch, that there are some places that are defective; for example, in Exod. xii. 8. Lastly, they think they observe certain strokes in the Pentateuch which can hardly agree with Moses, who was born and bred in Egypt; as what he says of the earthly paradise, of the rivers that watered it and ran through it; of the cities of Babylon, Erech, Resen, and Calneh; of the gold of Pison; of the bdellium, of the stone of Sohem, or onyx-stone, which was to be found in that country. Add to these what he says concerning the ark of Noah, of its construction, of the place where it rested, of the wood where-with it was built, of the bitumen of Babylon, &c. These particulars, observed with such curiosity, seem to them to prove that the author of the Pentateuch lived beyond the Euphrates. They therefore would allow it no higher date than about the time of the Babylonian captivity; thus denying not only its divine inspiration, but even its authenticity.

But in answer to these objections, it is justly observed, that these books are, by the most ancient writers, ascribed to Moses, and it is confirmed by the authority of heathen writers themselves, that they are his writings; besides this, we have the unanimous testimony of the whole Jewish nation ever since Moses' time. Innumerable texts of the Pentateuch imply that it was written by him; and the Book of Joshua, and the other succeeding parts of Scripture, furnish the fullest corroboration, especially the positive testimony of our Lord. It is probable, however, that Ezra published a new edition of the Books of Moses, in which he added those passages, that Moses did not write. See BIBLE—MOSES, BOOKS OF—INSPIRATION.

PENTECOST, a Greek word signifying fiftieth, from the so-called feast being kept on the fiftieth day after the first day of unleavened bread. In the Bible it is called by several names. Thus it is termed the feast of weeks, Exod. xxxiv. 22; Dent. xvi. 10-17; the feast of harvest, Exod. xxiii. 16; the day of first-fruits, Numb. xxviii. 26. It was celebrated during the seventh week or a week of weeks after the first day of the passover, and because on this day the first fruits of the wheat harvest were presented with thanksgiving to God for his bounties. On this day also the giving of the law from Mount Sinai was commemorated. The number of the Jews who attended at the festival was very great, as we find in Acts ii. It was on the first Pentecost after our Lord's crucifixion and ascension that the Holy Spirit came miraculously upon the apostles, and great multitudes were converted to God. On the occasion of this festival the people went up to Jerusalem, carrying their offerings of first-fruits, many of them in baskets richly wrought and ornamented with flowers, which were solemnly presented in the temple. The sacrifices at this festival were numerous. In Dent. xxvi. 5-10 is a beautiful form of thanksgiving to be used in presenting the first-fruits, which reminded the Jews of their origin from "a Syrian ready to perish," and recapitulated the Lord's merciful dealings towards them.

PEOR, the name of an idol, also called Baal-Peor (which see). It was also the name of a mountain, situated beyond Jordan, in the land of Moab. It seems to have been a part of that chain of mountains to which Nebo and Pisgah belonged. In the neighbourhood of this mountain, as we are informed in Numb. xxiii. 28, the Israelites fell into sin.

PEREA, a district which lay beyond Jordan, in the territories of Reuben and Gad. It was a fruitful, well-watered country. The principal place in it was the fortress of Macherus, where John the Baptist was put to death.

PEREZ-UZZA (the breach of Uzzah.) 2 Sam vi. 8; 1 Chron. xiii. 11.

PERFECTION, that state or quality of a thing in which it is free from defect or redundancy. According to some, it is divided into physical or natural, whereby a thing has all its powers and faculties; and moral, or an eminent degree of goodness and piety.

The term perfection, says the great Witsius, is not always used in the same sense in the Scriptures. (1.) There is a perfection of sincerity, whereby a man serves God without hypocrisy. Job i. 1; Isa. xxxviii. 3. (2.) There is a perfection of parts, subjective with respect to the whole man (1 Thess. v. 23), and objective with respect to the whole law, when all the duties prescribed by God are observed. Ps. cxix. 128; Luke i. 6. (3.) There is a comparative perfection ascribed to those who are advanced in knowledge, faith, and sanctification, in comparison of those who are still infants and untaught. 1 John ii. 13; 1 Cor. ii. 6; Phil. iii. 15. (4.) There is an evangelical perfection. The righteousness of Christ being imputed to the believer, he is complete in him, and accepted of God as perfect through Christ. Col. ii. 10; Eph. v. 27; 2 Cor. v. 21. (5.) There is also a perfection of degree, by which a person performs all the commands of God, with the full exertion of all his powers, without the least defect. This is what the law of God requires, but what the saints do not attain to in this life, though we willingly allow them all the other kinds above mentioned. Rom. vii. 24; Phil. iii. 12; 1 John i. 8.

The Son of God commands his disciples (Matt. v.

48) to be perfect, even as their Father in heaven is perfect. Not that we can ever attain his perfection, but we ought constantly to be making advances towards it: we ought always to propose it to ourselves as our pattern, in the exercise of all virtue, and especially his mercy and charity. Hence Luke says in the parallel passage: "Be ye therefore merciful, as your Father also is merciful." Luke vi. 36. In Matt. xix. 21, our Saviour says, that he who would be perfect, must forsake all and follow him; and in Luke vi. 40, that the disciple who would arrive at perfection must become like his Master. Paul often exhorts his disciples to be perfect; that is to acquire the perfection of Christianity, both in theory and practice, to be convinced of the excellence of it, and to press on toward its attainment. 1 Cor. i. 10; 2 Cor. xiii. 11.

PERFECTIONISTS, a term sometimes applied to those followers of Mr. Wesley who hold it possible to attain perfection, in a certain sense, in the present life. See METHODISTS.

PERFECTIONS OF GOD. See ATTRIBUTES OF GOD.

PERFUMES. Both in ancient and in modern times perfumes have been held in great estimation in eastern countries, and Moses speaks of the art of making perfumes as known and practised in Egypt. Special regulations are laid down for making the perfumed incense of the sanctuary. Exod. xxx. 34-36. Perfumes were much used, as indeed they still are, at the courts of eastern monarchs. An allusion to such perfumes occurs in Song iv. 10, 11, "How fair is thy love, my sister, my spouse! how much better is thy love than wine! and the smell of thine ointments than all spices! Thy lips, O my spouse, drop as the honeycomb: honey and milk are under thy tongue; and the smell of thy garments is like the smell of Lebanon." The Jews used perfumes also in embalming the dead, having derived the art probably from the Egyptians. The "tablets" mentioned in Isa. iii. 20, among female ornaments, or "houses of the soul," as it is rendered in the margin, were probably perfume boxes, which were suspended from their necklaces. In Gen. xxvii. 27, where it is said of Isaac, "And he smelled the smell of his raiment," the allusion appears to be to the perfumed robe which was carefully reserved for the use of the first-born son, and worn only on special occasions. It was, and indeed still is, customary in the East, on the arrival of a guest to pour perfume upon him. To this there is an obvious allusion in Ps. xxiii. 5: "Thou preparest a table before me in the presence of mine enemies: thou anointest my head with oil; my cup runneth over." When the company were ready to separate on the occasion of a feast, a servant entered and sprinkled them profusely with rose-water, as a parting mark of his master's regard. Mr. Bruce tells us that when he rose to take his leave of an Eastern family, he "was presently wet to the skin by deluges of orange-flower water." The prophet Isaiah seems to refer to this custom in a passage where, describing the character and functions of the Messiah, he says: "So shall he sprinkle many nations." The use of perfumes at Eastern marriages is common, and upon great occasions very profuse. Not only are the garments scented till, in the Psalmist's language, they smell of myrrh, aloes, and cassia: it is also customary for virgins to meet and lead the procession with silver-gilt pots of perfumes; and sometimes aromatics are burned in the windows of all the houses in the streets through which the procession is to pass, till the air becomes loaded with fragrant odours. In allusion to this practice it is asked, "Who is this that cometh out of the wilderness like pillars of smoke, perfumed with myrrh and frankincense, with all powders of the merchant?" Cant. iii. 6. The custom of burning perfumes on these occasions still continues in the East. See SAVOUR—TRIUMPH.

PERGA, a city of Pamphylia, originally its capital, famed for a celebrated temple dedicated to Diana, in whose honour a festival was held every year. Paul and Barnabas visited this city on two different occasions in the course of their journeys, and preached the gospel. Acts xiii. 13, 14; xiv. 25. Perga was situated on the river Cestrus, at a considerable distance from the sea.

PERGAMOS, now called Bergamo, the capital of ancient Mysia, and the seat of one of the seven churches of Asia. It was famed for a splendid temple of Esculapius, and as being the birth-place of the celebrated Galen. The population at present amounts to nearly fifteen thousand, of whom only three thousand are Christians, belonging to the Armenian and Greek Churches. There are a few Jews, not exceeding one hundred, but they have a synagogue. The town consists of small and mean wooden houses, among which appear the remains of early Christian churches, showing "like vast fortresses amidst barracks of wood."

PERIPATETICS. See ARISTOTELIANS.

PERIZZITES, a portion of the ancient inhabitants of Canaan inhabiting the hill-country of Judea, which was afterwards occupied by the tribes of Ephraim and Judah. In several passages of Scripture the Perizzites are spoken of along with the Canaanites, as the principal inhabitants of Palestine. Thus it is said that in the days of Abraham and Lot "the Canaanite and the Perizzite were in the land." There appears to have been a remnant of the Perizzites in the time of Solomon, which he subdued and compelled to pay tribute. Nay, even so late as the time of Ezra they are mentioned as still existing. Ezra x. 1.

PERJURY is the taking of an oath in order to tell or confirm a falsehood. This is a very heinous crime, as it is treating the Almighty with open irreverence; denying, or at least discarding, his omniscience; profaning his name, and violating truth. It has always been esteemed a very detestable thing, and those who have been proved guilty of it, have been looked upon as the pests of society. See OATH.

PERMISSION OF SIN. See SIN—PATIENCE OF GOD.

PERSECUTION, is any pain or affliction which a person designedly inflicts upon another; and, in a more restrained sense, the sufferings of Christians on account of their religion.

Persecution is threefold. 1. Mental, when the spirit of a man rises up and malignantly opposes another. 2. Verbal, when men give hard words and deal in uncharitable censures. 3. Actual or open, by the hand; such as the dragging of innocent persons before the tribunal of justice. Matt. x. 18. The unlawfulness of persecution for conscience' sake must appear plain to every one that possesses the least degree of thought or of feeling. "To banish, imprison, plunder, starve, hang, and burn men for religion," says the shrewd Jortin, "is not the gospel of Christ; it is the gospel of the devil. Where persecution begins, Christianity ends. Christ never used anything that looked like force or violence except once, and that was to drive bad men out of the temple, and not to drive them in."

We know the origin of it to be from the prince of darkness, who began the dreadful practice in the first family on earth, and who, more or less, has been carrying on the same work ever since, and that almost among all parties.

"Persecution for conscience' sake," says Dr. Doddridge, "is every way inconsistent; because—1. It is founded on an absurd supposition, that one man has a right to judge for another in matters of religion. 2. It is evidently opposite to that fundamental principle of morality, that we should do to others as we could reasonably desire they should do to us. 3. It is by no means calculated to answer the end which its patrons profess to intend by it. 4. It evidently tends to produce a great deal of mischief and confusion in the world. 5. The Christian religion must, humanly speaking, be not only obstructed, but destroyed, should persecuting principles universally prevail. 6. Persecution is so far from being required or encouraged by the Gospel, that it is most directly contrary to many of its precepts, and indeed to the whole of it."

PERSEVERANCE, is the continuance in any design, state, opinion, or course of action. The perseverance of the saints is their continuance in a state of grace to a state of glory. This doctrine has afforded considerable matter for controversy between the Calvinists and Arminians. We shall here briefly state the arguments and objections:—

1. And, first, the perfections of God are considered as strong arguments to prove this doctrine. God, as a being possessed of infinite love, faithfulness, wisdom, and power, can hardly be supposed to suffer any of his people finally to fall into perdition. This would be a reflection on his attributes, which are all pledged for their good, as a father of his family. His love to his people is unchangeable, and, therefore, they cannot be the objects of it at one time and not at another. John xiii. 1; Zeph. iii. 17; Jer. xxxi. 3. His faithfulness to them and to his promise is not founded upon their merit, but his own will and goodness; this, therefore, cannot be violated. Mal. iii. 6; Numb. xxiii. 19. His wisdom foresees every obstacle in the way, and is capable of removing it, and directing them into the right path. It would be a reflection on his wisdom, after choosing a right end, not to choose right means in accomplishing the same. Jer. x. 6, 7. His power is insuperable, and is absolutely and perpetually displayed in their preservation and protection. 1 Pet. i. 5.

2. Another argument to prove this doctrine, is their union to Christ, and what he has done for them. They are said to be chosen in him (Eph. i. 4), united to him (Eph. i. 23), the purchase of his death (Rom. viii. 34; Tit. ii. 14), the objects of his intercession. Rom. v. 10, viii. 34; 1 John ii. 1, 2. Now, if there be a possibility of their finally falling, then this choice, this union, his death and intercession, may all be in vain, and rendered abortive; an idea as derogatory to the divine glory, and as dishonourable to Jesus Christ, as possibly can be.

3. It is argued from the work of the Spirit, which is to communicate grace and strength equal to the day. Phil. i. 6; 2 Cor. i. 21, 22. If, indeed, divine grace were dependent on the will of man, if by his own power he had brought himself into a state of grace, then it might follow that he might relapse into an opposite state, when that power at any time was weakened; but as the perseverance of the saints is not produced by any native principles in themselves, but by the agency of the Holy Spirit, enlightening, confirming, and establishing them, of course, they must persevere, otherwise it would be a reflection on this Divine Agent. Rom. viii. 9; 1 Cor. vi. 11; John iv. 14, xvi. 14.

4. Lastly, the declarations and promises of Scripture are very numerous in favour of this doctrine (Job xvii. 9; Ps. xciv. 14, cxxv.; Jer. xxxii. 40; John x. 28, xvii. 12; 1 Cor. i. 8, 9; 1 Pet. i. 5; Prov. iv. 18), all which could not be true, if this doctrine were false.

There are objections, however, to this doctrine, which we must state. 1. There are various threatenings denounced against those who apostatize. Ezek. iii. 20; Heb. vi. 3-6; Ps. cxxv. 3-5; Ezek. xviii. 24. To this it is answered, that some of these texts do not so much as suppose the falling away of a truly good man; and to all of them it is said, that they only show what would be the consequence if such should fall away, but cannot prove that it ever in fact happens.

2. It is foretold as a future event that some should fall away. Matt. xxiv. 12, 13; John xv. 6; Matt. xiii. 20, 21. To the first of these passages it is answered, that their love might be said to wax cold without totally ceasing; or there might have been an outward zeal and show of love where there never was a true faith. To the second it is answered, that persons may be said to be in Christ only by an external profession, or mere members of the visible Church. John xv. 2; Matt. xiii. 47, 48. As to Matt. xiii. 20, 21, it is replied, that this may refer to the joy with which some may entertain the offers of pardon, who never, after all, attentively considered them.

3. It is objected that many have in fact fallen away, as David, Solomon, Peter, Alexander, Hymenæus, &c. To which it is answered, that David, Solomon, and Peter's fall, were not total; and as to the others, there is no proof of their ever being true Christians.

4. It is urged that this doctrine supersedes the use of means, and renders exhortations unnecessary. To which it may be answered, that perseverance itself implies the use of means, and that the means are equally appointed as well as the end; nor has it ever been found that true Christians have rejected them. They consider exhortations and admonitions to be some of the means they are to attend to in order to promote their holiness: Christ and his apostles, though they often asserted this doctrine, yet reprov'd, exhorted, and made use of means. See EXHORTATION—MEANS.

5. Lastly, it is objected that this doctrine gives great encouragement to carnal security and presumptuous sin. To which it is answered, that this doctrine, like many others, may be abused by hypocrites, but cannot be so by those who are truly saints, it being the very nature of grace to lead to righteousness. Tit. ii. 10-12. Their knowledge leads to veneration; their love animates to duty; their faith purifies the heart; their gratitude excites to obedience; yea, all their principles have a tendency to set before them the evil of sin, and the beauty of holiness.

PERSIA, an ancient kingdom of Middle Asia, which never rose to importance until the time of Cyrus, when he succeeded to the Median empire. From that date the Medes and Persians became conjoined, Cyrus being the founder of the Persian monarchy. The Persians were anciently known by the name of Elamites (which see). In the time of the Roman emperors they received the name of Parthians. Originally they seem to have been fire-worshippers.

PERSIAN CHRISTIANS. That the gospel was early planted in Persia, we have the most unequivocal evidence in the terrible persecution of Christians which began there in A.D. 330, whereby, in forty years, about two hundred and fifty of the clergy, and sixteen thousand others, of both sexes, were martyred in the cause of Christ, though many of them have been considered as heretics by the Church of Rome, being of the Nestorian and Jacobite communions. In the seventh century, they fell under the scourge of Mohammedan tyranny and persecution, whereby many were driven to seek a refuge in India, particularly on the coasts of Travancore, while the great mass of the population apostatized to Mohammed; a circumstance that Mr. Yeates very naturally attributes to their not having the Scriptures in their own language till very recently.

In the middle of the last century, a version of the Gospels was made by order of Nadir Shah, who, when it was read to him, treated it with contempt and ridicule; but since the commencement of the present century, the Rev. H. Martyn has translated the whole New Testament. It was completed in the year in which he died (1812); and has been presented to the king of Persia by the British ambassador, and favourably received. Notwithstanding both persecution and apostasy, the number of Christians in Persia is said to be still very considerable, and to comprise Georgians, Armenians, Nestorians, Jacobites, and Romish Christians.

PERSIS, the name of a female Christian mentioned by the Apostle Paul in Rom. xvi. 12.

PERSON, one who exercises the functions of a rational, intelligent nature. Some have been offended at the term, applied to the Trinity, as unwarrantable. The term person, when applied to Deity, is certainly used in a sense somewhat different from that in which we apply it to one another; but when it is considered that the Greek words hypostasis and prosōpon, to which it answers, are, in the New Testament, applied to the Father and Son (Heb. i. 3; 2 Cor. iv. 6), and that the personal pronouns are used by our Lord (John xiv. 26), it can hardly be condemned as unscriptural and improper. There have been warm debates between the Greek and the Latin Churches about the words hypostasis and persona: the Latin, concluding that the word hypostasis signified substance or essence, though to assert that there were three divine hypostases, was to say that there were three Gods. On the other hand, the Greek Church thought that the word person did not sufficiently guard against the Sabellian notion of the same individual Being sustaining three relations; whereupon each part of the Church was ready to brand the other with heresy, till, by a free and mutual conference in a Synod at Alexandria, A.D. 362, they made it appear that it was but a mere contention about the grammatical sense of a word; and then it was allowed by men of temper on both sides, that either of the two words might be indifferently used. See TRINITY.

PERSUASION, the act of influencing the judgment and passions by arguments or motives. It is different from conviction. Conviction affects the understanding only; persuasion the will and prac-

tee. It is more extensively used than conviction, which last is founded on demonstration, natural or supernatural. But all things of which we may be persuaded are not capable of demonstration. Eloquence is but the art of persuasion. See ELOQUENCE.

PESTILENCE, or plague, is generally used by the Hebrews for all epidemic or contagious diseases. The prophets usually connect together sword, pestilence, and famine, being three of the most grievous inflictions of the Almighty upon a guilty people. 2 Sam. xxiv. 12. See DISEASES—PLAGUE.

PESTLE. In Prov. xxvii. 22, we find it stated, "Though thou shouldest bray a fool in a mortar among wheat with a pestle, yet will not his foolishness depart from him." It has been supposed from this passage that the wheat was pounded to be separated from the husk. See MORTAR.

PETER, SIMON. This great apostle of the circumcision was the son of Jona, a fisherman, who resided at Bethsaida, a town on the western coast of the sea of Galilee. He is believed to have been at least ten years older than his Master. At his circumcision, according to the Jewish law, he received the name of Simon or Simeon, to which, when he was called to the apostleship, Jesus added the name of Cephas, which in the Syriac language means a stone or a rock, corresponding to the name Peter, which in Latin also signifies a rock.

Simon Peter was a married man, and he seems to have followed the trade of a fisherman at Capernaum. His younger brother Andrew, who had been a disciple of John the Baptist, was present on that memorable occasion when John pointed to Jesus, saying, "Behold the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sins of the world." On hearing the joyful tidings, he hastened to make them known to Peter, exclaiming with gladness, "We have found the Messiah." What a blessing, when brothers by blood are brothers in the grace that is in Christ Jesus; and how eager should every Christian be, that those who are dear to him may be dear also to the Redeemer! Andrew brings Peter to Jesus, and together the brothers, now united in the Lord, sit at the feet of Jesus, and learn the law at his mouth. The interview was, no doubt, a blessed one. Peter and Andrew returned to their occupation, and day after day did they continue to be "diligent in business, fervent in spirit, serving the Lord."

Months passed away, and the work of grace had been rapidly advancing in their souls, when one day, as they were busied as usual in their humble trade, Jesus, standing on the shore, issued forth the authoritative command, "Follow me, and I will make you fishers of men." It was a word of power, and the brothers, straightway forsaking their nets, and their aged father, followed Jesus. From this moment Peter becomes remarkable for his faith, and his energy, and his zeal.

The faith of Peter received the marked approbation of his Master, when, on asking his disciples, "Whom think ye that I am?" Peter instantly replies with unhesitating confidence, "Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God." "Jesus answered and said unto him, Blessed art thou, Simon Barjona, for flesh and blood hath not revealed it unto thee, but my Father which is in heaven." When many were offended at the faithfulness of Christ, and walked no more with him, Jesus, turning to the apostles, said, "Will ye also go away?" it was Peter who nobly replied, "Lord, to whom shall we go? thou hast the words of eternal life. We believe and are sure that thou art that Christ, the Son of the living God."

Peter was one of the three favoured disciples who were privileged to be present at the raising of Jairus' daughter, at the transfiguration on the Mount, and the agony in the garden. And such was the ardent affection which glowed in his heart towards Christ, that on our Lord referring to his own death, Peter breaks forth in these well-meant but unguarded expressions, "Be it far from thee Lord, this shall not be unto thee." "Though all men should be offended because of thee, yet will not I." "I will follow thee both into prison and to death." Ah! little did the boasting, self-confident Peter know the deceitfulness of his own heart, and the hard and hazardous conflict which he was doomed to maintain with the great enemy of souls. The day of trial came, and thrice did Peter deny his Lord, "I know not the man!" What a striking warning! "Let him that thinketh he standeth, take heed lest he fall."

But if the fall of Peter was great and humiliating, his repentance was deep, sincere, and abiding, and Jesus seems to have hastened, after his resurrection, to bind up the broken spirit of the fallen disciple. "He was seen of Cephas, then of the twelve." "Go and tell my brethren, and Peter, that I go into Galilee, and there shall they see me." Thrice had Peter fallen, and thrice did his compassionate Saviour afford him an opportunity of openly avowing his attachment to him. "Simon, son of Jonas, lovest thou me?" to which Peter replies, with an humble and a subdued spirit, "Lord, thou knowest all things; thou knowest that I love thee;" and our Lord, in token of the restoration of his confidence, commands, "Feed my sheep, feed my lambs."

In his personal labours and sufferings as an apostle of the Lord Jesus, how remarkably did Peter show that the Lord had healed his backslidings! It was Peter who proposed the election of a new apostle in place of Judas. It was under the preaching of Peter that, in consequence of the out-pouring of the Spirit, three thousand were converted on the day of Pentecost. It was Peter who was the first to introduce the gospel among the Gentiles. In his Master's cause he was bold, indefatigable, and unwearied. He endured disgrace, scourging, and imprisonment; but nothing daunted, he went from place to place, fearlessly proclaiming the truth of God.

And not only by his preaching, but by his writings, did he fulfil the command of Christ. "When thou art converted, strengthen the brethren." He wrote two Epistles, which, particularly the first, have ever held a high place in the estimation of spiritually-minded men. The first is addressed to believing strangers who had been scattered by a sore persecution, and the second to all who had obtained like precious faith. This last bears evident marks of having been written in the near expectation of his death: "Yea, I think it meet, as long as I am in this tabernacle, to stir you up by putting you in remembrance." 2 Pet. i. 13. It had been foretold very plainly by Jesus that this faithful and eminent apostle should be honoured to wear the crown of martyrdom. We learn, accordingly, that after labouring to an advanced age in the promotion of his Master's cause, Peter suffered death at or in the neighbourhood of Rome, by crucifixion, not, however, in the usual way, but at his own earnest request, with his head downwards, as regarding himself unworthy to die in the same posture as his blessed Lord.

Such is a short sketch of the life of the most remarkable of the twelve apostles. He lived a most zealous and devoted and self-denying ambassador of the Lord Jesus, and he died a martyr to his cause.

PETHOR, a city of Mesopotamia, of which the prophet Balaam was a native. The Hebrews call this city Pethura; Ptolemy calls it Pachora; and Eusebius, Pathara. He places it in the Upper Mesopotamia.

PETITION, according to Dr. Watts, is the fourth part of prayer, and includes a desire of deliverance from evil, and a request of good things to be bestowed. On both these accounts petitions are to be offered up to God, not only for ourselves, but for our fellow-creatures also. This part of prayer is frequently called intercession. See PRAYER.

PHARAOH, a title applied to the kings of Egypt. Josephus says its true import is that of "king." Sir John Gardner Wilkinson tells us that the Hebrew word used to denote Pharaoh, and which occurs so early as the time of Abraham, Gen. xii. 15, is no other than the Memphitic name of the sun. It is applied in the Scriptures to at least eight different individuals who filled the throne of Egypt.

PHARISEES, the most celebrated of all the Jewish sects, which is supposed to have subsisted above a century before the appearance of our Saviour. They derived the name of their sect from the Hebrew pharash, which means separated, because they separated themselves, not only from the Gentiles, but from all other Jews; but their separation consisted chiefly in certain distinctions respecting food and religious ceremonies, and does not appear to have interrupted the uniformity of religious worship in which the Jews of every sect united. The dissensions between the schools of Hillel and Shammai, a little before the Christian era, increased the number and power of the Pharisees. Hillel and Shammai were two great and eminent teachers in the Jewish schools. Hillel was born 112 years before Christ. Having acquired profound knowledge of the most difficult points of the law, he became master of the chief school in Jerusalem, and laid the foundation of the Talmud. Shammai, one of the disciples of Hillel, deserted his school, and formed a college, in which he taught doctrines contrary to his master. He rejected the oral law, and followed the written law only in its literal sense. (See CARAITES.) These schools long disturbed the Jewish Church by violent contests: the party of Hillel was at last victorious.

The Pharisees, by their apparent sanctity of manners, had rendered themselves extremely popular among the multitude; and the great, who feared their artifice, were obliged to court their favour. Hence they obtained the highest offices, both in the state and priesthood, and had great weight, both in public and private affairs. It appears, from the frequent mention which is made by the evangelists of the Scribes and Pharisees in conjunction, that the greater number of Jewish teachers (for they were the scribes) were at that time of this sect.

The principal doctrines of the Pharisees are as follow:—That the oral law, which they suppose God delivered to Moses by an angel on Mount Sinai, and which was preserved by tradition, is of equal authority with the written law. (See RABBINISTS.) That by observing both these laws, a man may not only obtain justification with God, but perform meritorious works of supererogation. That fasting, almsgiving, ablutions, and confessions, are a sufficient atonement for sin. That thoughts and desires are not sinful, unless they are carried into action. They believed in predestination, acknowledged the immortality of the soul, future rewards and punishments, the existence of good and evil angels, and the resurrection of the body. (See METEMPSYCHOSIS.)

It is a well known fact, that the resurrection of the body was commonly believed among the Jews, even in the most degenerate period of their history. This is manifest from the story of the seven brethren, who, with their mother, were put to death by Antiochus Epiphanes in one day (2 Mac. vii., xii. 43, 44); to which story the writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews (xi. 35), has been supposed to allude, saying, "Others were tortured, not accepting deliverance, that they might obtain a better resurrection." And when Martha, the sister of Lazarus, was told that her brother should rise again, she answered, "I know that he shall rise again in the resurrection at the last day" (John xi. 23, 24), which implies, that this doctrine was at that time a well-known and acknowledged truth. Luke also says expressly, that the Pharisees confess the resurrection. Acts xxiii. 6. And Paul, speaking before Felix of his hope towards God, says, "Which they themselves (the Pharisees) also allow, that there shall be a resurrection of the dead, both of the just and unjust." Acts xxiv. 15. If the doctrine of the resurrection, as held by the Pharisees, had been nothing more than the Pythagorean transmigration, it is beyond all credibility that such testimony would have been borne of it.

The state of future felicity in which the Pharisees believed, however, was very gross; they imagined that men in the next world, as well as in the present, were to eat and drink, and enjoy the pleasures of love, each being reunited to his former wife. Hence the Sadducees, who believed in no resurrection, and supposed our Saviour to teach it as a Pharisee, very shrewdly urged the difficulty of disposing of the woman who in this world had been the wife of seven husbands. Had the resurrection of Christianity been the Pharisaical resurrection, this difficulty would have been insurmountable; and accordingly we find the people, and even some of the Pharisees themselves, struck with the manner in which Christ removed it.

The peculiar manners of this sect are strongly marked in the writings of the evangelists, and confirmed by the testimony of the Jewish authors. According to the latter, they fasted the second and fifth days of the week, and put thorns at the bottom of their robes, that they might prick their legs as they walked. They lay upon boards covered with flint-stones, and tied thick cords about their waists. They paid tithes as the law prescribed, and gave the thirtieth and fiftieth part of their fruits; adding voluntary sacrifices to those which were commanded. They were very exact in performing their vows. The Talmudic books mention several distinct classes of Pharisees, among whom was the Truncated Pharisee, who, that he might appear in profound meditation, as if destitute of feet, scarcely lifted them from the ground; and the Mortar Pharisee, who, that his contemplations might not be disturbed, wore a deep cap in the shape of a mortar, which would only permit him to look upon the ground at his feet. Thus did they study to captivate the admiration of the vulgar; but under the veil of singular piety, they often disguised the most licentious manners.

PHIARPAR. See ABANA.

PHEBE, a Christian female of the port of Corinth called Cenchrea. Rom. xvi. 1, 2. It is thought that, in quality of deaconess, she was employed by the Church in some ministrations suitable to her sex and condition; as to visit and instruct the Christian women, and attend them in their sickness, and distribute alms to them in their necessities.

PHENICIA, a large and fertile province of Syria, extending to the Gulf of Issus and Ptolemais in length, and from Western Libanus to the sea in breadth. It early extended its colonics to the very extremity of the Mediterranean Sea, and the Phœnicians were the most mercantile and trading nations of antiquity. The chief cities of Phenicia were Ptolemais, Tyre, and Sidon. The temple of Solomon was built by Phœnician workmen, and his ships were manned by Phœnician sailors. Part of the Phœnicians became proselytes to the Jewish religion, and many flocked to Jesus from these quarters. It was to a Syro-Phœnician woman that he said, "Great is thy faith." The gospel was early preached in the neighbourhood of Tyre and Sidon, and for many ages Christian churches were found in this district. Paul remained for a time with the Christians of Tyre and Sidon. Acts xxi. 2, 4, "And finding a ship sailing over unto Phœnicia, we went aboard, and set forth. And finding disciples, we tarried there seven days: who said to Paul through the Spirit, that he should not go up to Jerusalem."

PHILADELPHIA, a city of Asia Minor, and the seat of one of the seven churches mentioned in the Book of Revelation. It is situated at the foot of Mount Tmolus, and is now called Allah Scheyer, that is, the city of God. Pliny Fisk represents it as nearly in the form of a parallelogram, and surrounded by walls now in decay. He estimated the number of houses at three thousand, of which two hundred and fifty were inhabited by Greeks, the rest by Turks. The city suffered severely from an earthquake in the reign of Tiberius; but notwithstanding all the changes it has undergone, it is still a place of some note, chiefly supported by trade, as being on the route of the caravans to Smyrna.

PHILANTHROPY, compounded of philos and anthrōpos, which signify the love of mankind. It differs from benevolence only in this, that benevolence extends to every being that has life and sense, and is, of course, susceptible of pain and pleasure; whereas philanthropy cannot comprehend more than the human race. It differs from friendship, as this affection subsists only between a few individuals; whilst philanthropy comprehends the whole human species. It is a calm sentiment, which in most men hardly ever rises to the warmth of affection, and certainly not to the heat of passion. See LOVE.

PHILEMON, a rich citizen of Colosse, whose slave, Onesimus, fled from him to Rome, and was converted through the instrumentality of the apostle Paul. The converted slave was sent back to his master, with the beautiful letter which forms the Epistle to Philemon in the New Testament. That Philemon was himself a Christian appears from Paul styling him his fellow-labourer, and some accordingly have supposed, though we fear without sufficient grounds, that he also was one of the apostle's converts. Very little is known with certainty about the history of Philemon, but many conjectures have been hazarded on the subject; some, among whom is Dr Doddridge, supposing him to have been one of the ministers of the Christian church at Colosse, and others, among whom is Michaelis, believing him to have been a deacon of that church.

PHILEMON, EPISTLE TO. This short but admirable Epistle appears evidently, from internal evidence, to have been written during the first imprisonment of Paul at Rome. Though brief, it contains many valuable doctrines of Christianity, particularly in reference to the bearing of the Christian religion upon the civil arrangements of society, showing that by becoming a Christian, and by baptism a member of the Christian church, a slave did not thereby become a freedman.

PHILETUS, the name of a person mentioned in 2 Tim. ii. 17, who asserted that the resurrection was already past.

PHILIP, or HEROD-PHILIP (Mark vi. 17; Luke iii. 19; Matt. xiv. 3), son of Herod the Great. See AGRIPPA—HEROD—HERODIAS.

PHILIP, one of the apostles of our blessed Lord. He was a native of Bethsaida, in Galilee. He was the first who was directly called by Jesus to follow him; for it is said, "He findeth Philip, and saith unto him, Follow me." Andrew had been directed to Jesus by John the Baptist, and Peter by Andrew; but Philip was called, without any intermediate instructor, by Jesus himself. And no sooner did he become a follower of Jesus than he hastens to invite others to become partakers of like precious faith. "Philip findeth Nathanael, and saith unto him, We have found him of whom Moses in the law and the prophets did write, Jesus of Nazareth, the son of Joseph." The very mention of Nazareth awakened the prejudices of Nathanael, and he exclaimed, "Can any good thing come out of Nazareth?" to which Philip instantly replied, "Come and see." Nathanael followed this excellent advice. He came and saw; and enlightened by the Spirit of Christ, he declared, "Rabbi, thou art the Son of God, thou art the King of Israel."

An instance of the weakness of Philip's faith is recorded by John, to whom indeed we are chiefly indebted for the particulars of Philip's history, in so far as they are related in the Word of God. The incident to which we refer is to be found in John vi. 5-7: "When Jesus then lifted up his eyes, and saw a great company come unto him, he saith unto Philip, Whence shall we buy bread, that these may eat? And this he said to prove him: for he himself knew what he would do. Philip answered him, Two hundred pennyworth of bread is not sufficient for them, that every one of them may take a little." In giving such a reply, Philip seems to have forgotten the many wonders which Christ had already wrought, and how easily he could supply the wants of even a larger multitude than at present surrounded him.

Another event in which Philip was concerned is mentioned in John xiv. 7-9: "If ye had known me, ye should have known my Father also: and from henceforth ye know him, and have seen him. Philip saith unto him, Lord, show us the Father, and it sufficeth us. Jesus saith unto him, Have I been so long time with you, and yet hast thou not known me, Philip? he that hath seen me hath seen the Father; and how sayest thou then, Show us the Father?" It was, no doubt, praiseworthy in Philip to long for a clearer manifestation of God than he had yet experienced; but it is plain, from the reply of Jesus, that this apostle had been desiring a different manifestation from what Christ gave. He seemed to have lost sight for a moment of the great truth that "no man hath seen God at any time; but he who dwelt from eternity in the bosom of the Father, he hath revealed him."

After the ascension of our blessed Lord, we find no further mention of Philip, except in the list of the apostles given in the first chapter of the Acts, for we must beware of confounding Philip the apostle with Philip the deacon and evangelist. From ancient history, we learn that the scene of Philip's apostolic labours was in Upper Asia; and that in consequence of his bold and intrepid proclamation of the gospel, he was imprisoned, scourged, and put to death, some say by crucifixion, and others by being hung up against a pillar.

Philip has left no writings behind him, but his record is on high, for he lived and laboured, he suffered and died, as a faithful ambassador of the Lord Jesus, who, having been faithful unto the death, hath been privileged to receive a crown of life.

PHILIP THE EVANGELIST, one of the seven deacons of the church at Jerusalem. He was honoured to preach the gospel in Samaria with much success. In the midst of his labours there, he was commanded by God to go down to the road leading from Gaza to Jerusalem, where he providentially met with the Ethiopian treasurer, whom he instructed in the truth (Acts viii. 5-38), and baptized him. After this he remained for a time at Azotus, and passing through, he preached in all the cities until he came to Cæsarea. He had four daughters who possessed the gift of prophecy.—Philip was the name of a son of Herod the Great, by his wife Cleopatra. When his father's kingdom was divided among the family, Philip was made tetrarch of Batanæa, Trachonitis, and Iturea. Another son of Herod the Great was called Philip Herod. He was the first husband of Herodias, who was unlawfully taken from him by his brother Herod Antipas.

PHILIPPI, a city of Macedonia Prima, which received its name from Philip, king of Macedon. Its original name was Datos, and afterwards Crenidas. It received the privileges of a Roman colony from Julius Cæsar. It was at Philippi that Lydia was converted by the preaching of Paul, and here also the jailer and his household were miraculously turned to God. The apostle seems to have received much kindness from the members of the church at this place, and he addressed to them an epistle, which is found in the New Testament. The place which stands on the site of the ancient Philippi is now called Filibah.

PHILIPPIANS, EPISTLE TO THE. This Epistle appears to have been written towards the close of Paul's first imprisonment at Rome, in acknowledgment of some contributions which they had kindly sent for his support. It is somewhat remarkable that this is the only epistle in which the apostle uses not a single word of censure against the persons addressed. The church at Philippi had preserved a purity of doctrine and worship far beyond all the contemporary churches.

PHILISTINES, a people who occupied a district in the south-west of Canaan, once inhabited by the Avites, whom they dispossessed. They are supposed to have been descended from Mizraim, the second son of Ham. In the time of Joshua the country was divided into five lordships, Gaza, Ashkelon, Ekron, Gath, and Ashdod. The Philistines were the most formidable enemies which the Israelites were called to encounter. So powerful, indeed, did they become that the whole land of Canaan received from them the name of Palestine. They were subdued by David, and continued for about one hundred and fifty years subject to the Jews. Again and again did they revolt, but as often were they brought into subjection. They suffered much from Hezekiah, but far more from the Assyrians. They then became subject to the Persians, and afterwards to the Macedonians under Alexander the Great. The Asmoneans took several of their cities, and Alexander Jannæus reduced the whole country, compelling the inhabitants to submit to the Jewish religion. But long after the Christian era, the land of the Philistines still possessed a numerous population and strongly fortified cities. "No human probability," says Keith, "could have existed in the time of the prophets, or at a much more recent date, of its eventual desolation. But it has belied, for many ages, every promise which the fertility of its soil, and the excellence both of its climate and situation, gave for many preceding centuries of its permanency as a rich and well-cultivated region. And the voice of prophecy, which was not silent respecting it, proclaimed the fate that awaited it, in terms as contradictory, at the time, to every natural suggestion, as they are descriptive of what Philistia now actually is. 'I will stretch out my hand upon the Philistines, and destroy the remnant of the sea-coasts.' Ezek. xxv. 16; Jer. xlvii. 5. 'Thus saith the Lord, For three transgressions of Gaza, and for four, I will not turn away the punishment thereof. I will send a fire upon the wall of Gaza, which shall devour the palaces thereof: and I will cut off the inhabitant from Ashdod, and him that holdeth the sceptre from Ashkelon, and I will turn my hand against Ekron: and the remnant of the Philistines shall perish, saith the Lord God.' Amos i. 6-8; Zeph. ii. 4-7; Zech. ix. 5, 6.

"The land of the Philistines partakes of the general desolation common to it with Judea and other neighbouring states. But its aspect presents some existing peculiarities, which travellers fail not to particularize, and which, in reference both to the state of the country and the fate of its different cities, the prophets fail not to discriminate as justly as if their description had been drawn both with all the accuracy which ocular observation, and all the certainty which authenticated history, could give. Volney (though, like one who in ancient times was instrumental to the fulfilment of a special prediction, 'he meant not so, neither did his heart think so'), from the manner in which he generalizes his observations, and marks the peculiar features of the different districts of Syria, with greater acuteness and perspicuity than any other traveller whatever, is the ever ready purveyor of evidence in all the cases which come within the range of his topographical description of the wide field of prophecy: while, at the same time, from his known open and zealous hostility to the Christian cause, his testimony is alike decisive and unquestionable, and the vindication of the truth of the scriptural predictions may safely be committed to this redoubted champion of infidelity. 'The ruins of white marble, sometimes found at Gaza, prove that it was formerly the abode of luxury and opulence. It has shared in the general destruction; and, notwithstanding its proud title of the capital of Palestine, it is now no more than a defenceless village, peopled by, at most, only two thousand inhabitants. The sea-coast, by which it was formerly washed, is every day removing farther from the deserted ruins of Ashkelon. Amidst the various successive ruins, those of Edzoud, Ashdod, 'so powerful under the Philistines, are now remarkable for their scorpions." Mr Watson adds,—

"There is yet another city which was noted by the prophets, the very want of any information respecting which, and the absence of its name from several modern maps of Palestine, while the sites of other ruined cities are marked, are really the best confirmation of the truth of the prophecy that could possibly be given. 'Ekron shall be rooted up.' Zeph. ii. 4-6. It is rooted up. It was one of the chief cities of the Philistines; but, though Gaza still exists, and while Askelon and Ashdod retain their names in their ruins, the very name of Ekron is missing."

PHILOLOGUS, the name of a Christian at Rome, to whom Paul sends his salutations. Rom. xvi. 15. Nothing is known concerning him.

PHILOSOPHY (from philos and sophia) properly denotes the love or desire of wisdom. Pythagoras was the first who devised this name, because he thought no man was wise, but God only; and that learned men ought rather to be considered as lovers of wisdom, than really wise. (1.) Natural philosophy is that science which leads us to contemplate the nature, causes, and effects, of the material works of God. (Sec MAN.) (2.) Moral philosophy is the science of manners, the knowledge of our duty and felicity. The various articles included in the latter are explained in their places in this work. (3.) Mental philosophy is the science of mind, or of the different mental powers, affections, and associations. (4.) Divine philosophy is the higher science of theology; especially the divine plan of salvation by Christ. 1 Cor. ii. 6-16; 1 Pet. i. 10-12. Milton has eloquently described the nature and influence of the latter study:

How charming is DIVINE PHILOSOPHY!
Not harsh and crabbed as dull fools suppose,
But musical as is Apollo's lute,
And a perpetual feast of nectared sweets,
Where no crude surfeit reigns.

Of false philosophy there are abundant examples in the Talmud.

Paul bids the Colossians beware lest any man should spoil them "through philosophy and vain deceit;" that is, a vain and deceitful philosophy, such as was popular in that day, and had been compounded out of all preceding systems, Grecian and Oriental. An explanation of this philosophy is given under CABALA and GNOSTICS.

But popular as this sort of philosophy may have been, we may say with truth, that the scheme which flattered the vanity of human wisdom, and which strove to conciliate all opinions, has died away, and is forgotten; while the gospel, the unpresuming, the uncompromising doctrine of the gospel, aided by no human wisdom, and addressing itself not merely to the head, but to the heart, has triumphed over all systems and all philosophers; and still leads its followers to that true knowledge which some have endeavoured to teach "after the tradition of men, after the rudiments of the world, and not after Christ."

It ought to be remarked, however, that the progress of true science, on the principles of the Baconian philosophy, by observation, experiment, and induction, is found in the end always to correspond with, and corroborate the truth of, the Scriptures. One philosophical objection after another, raised during the crude state of the several sciences, has in turn disappeared as the science became perfected, and its crudities purged away. Between true science and true Christianity the harmony is perfect.

PHINEHAS, the third high-priest of the Jews, being the son of Eleazar, and grandson of Aaron. Zealous for the honour and glory of God, and earnestly desirous to maintain the purity of the Israelites as the chosen people of God, he signalized himself by an act recorded in Num. xxv. 6-8, which, hasty though it was, manifested on the part of Phinehas a holy indignation against sin, and met with such marked approval from the Lord that the priesthood was promised to Phinehas and his descendants by a perpetual covenant. The priesthood accordingly continued in his family for nearly three hundred and thirty-five years, when, in the time of Eli, it passed into the family of Ithamar; and again reverted to the family of Eleazar under the reign of Saul, who, having put to death Ahimelech and the other priests of Nob, gave the high priesthood to Zadok of the race of Phinehas. The priesthood continued in his family until after the captivity of Babylon, and even to the destruction of the temple.

PHLEGON, a Christian at Rome mentioned by Paul, Rom. xvi. 14. In the Greek Church he is esteemed a saint, and is said to have been bishop of Marathon, near Athens.

PHOTINIANS, a sect in the fourth century, who denied the divinity of our Lord. They derive their name from Photinus, their founder, who was bishop of Serminum, and a disciple of Marcellus. Photinus published, in the year 343, his notions respecting the Deity, which were repugnant both to the orthodox and Arian systems. He asserted that Jesus Christ was born of the Holy Ghost and the Virgin Mary; that a certain divine emanation, which he called the Word, descended upon him; and that, because of the union of the divine Word with his human nature, he was called the Son of God, and even God himself; and that the Holy Ghost was not a person, but merely a celestial virtue proceeding from the Deity.

PHRYGIA was the largest kingdom of Asia Minor. It had Bithynia north, Pisidia and Lycia south, Galatia and Cappadocia east, and Lydia and Mysia west. Christianity was planted in this country by Paul. Acts xvi. 6, xviii. 23.

PHUT, the third son of Ham (Gen. x. 6), is thought to have peopled Libya; Josephus says, Manritania. The prophets often speak of Phut. In the time of Jeremiah (xli. 9) this province was subject to Necho, king of Egypt; and Nahum (iii. 9) reckons them among those who ought to come to the assistance of No-ammon.

PHYLACTERY, in general, was a name given by the ancients to all kinds of charms, spells, or characters which they wore about them as amulets, to preserve them from dangers or diseases.

Phylactery particularly denoted a slip of parchment, whereon was written some text of Holy Scripture, particularly of the decalogue, which the more devout people among the Jews wore on the forehead, the breast, or the neck, as a mark of their religion.

The primitive Christians also gave the name phylacteries to the cases wherein they enclosed the relics of their dead. Phylacteries are mentioned in the New Testament, and appear to have been very common among the Pharisees in our Lord's time.

The phylacteries used by the modern Jews are of three kinds. They are used for the head, the arm, and attached to the door-post. They consist of portions of Scripture, taken from the Pentateuch, selected according to the situation for which they are destined, written upon very fine vellum, in a very small square character, and with a particular kind of ink. See FRONTLETS—MEZUZIM.

It seems the Pharisees used to "make broad their phylacteries." This some understand of the knots of the thongs by which they were fastened, which were tied very artificially in the form of Hebrew letters; and that the pride of the Pharisees induced them to have these knots larger than ordinary, as a peculiar ornament. The Pharisees are further said to "enlarge the borders of their garments." Matt. xxiii. 5. These kraspeda were the fringes which the Jews were commanded to wear upon the borders of their garments. Numb. xv. 38, 39. These were worn by our Saviour, as appears from the following passage: "Behold, a woman, which was diseased with an issue of blood twelve years, came behind him, and touched the hem of his garment." Matt. ix. 20, xiv. 36. It should have been rendered "the fringe." The Pharisees are censured by our Saviour for enlarging these fringes of their garments, which we may suppose they did partly from pride and partly from hypocrisy, as pretending thereby an extraordinary regard for the precepts of the law. It is reported by Jerome, as quoted by Godwin, that they used to have fringes extravagantly long; sticking thorns in them, that, by pricking their legs as they walked, they might put them in mind of the law.

PHYSICIAN—(1.) One who practises medicine. Mark v. 26. (2.) An embalmer of dead bodies. Gen. l. 2. (3.) Such as comfort and relieve from distress by their advice and counsel. Job xiii. 4. Jesus Christ is called a physician; by the application of his word, his blood, and his Spirit, he removes the guilt, the ignorance, hardness, and other spiritual diseases of men's souls. Matt. ix. 12. Among the Assyrians, Chaldeans, Egyptians, Libyans, and Greeks, we have hints of skilful physicians; but till Hippocrates the Coan, about A.M. 3540, digested medicine into a kind of system, it was very little considered. Aretæus the Cappadocian long afterward further improved it. Galen, who lived in the second century of the Christian era, put the art into a still clearer order; but, by pretending to found every thing on the four elements, and the humours, and by his cardinal qualities, and the like, he embarrassed it with unintelligible jargon. Between the sixth and ninth centuries of Christianity, the art of medicine was in a manner lost; but from that to the thirteenth the Arabs cultivated it with a great deal of pomp. It was not, however, until within these two centuries past that it was handled in a proper manner; nor is it so even now, except among the Europeans of the Christian name.

PI-BESETH, a town of Egypt. Ezek. xxx. 17. The Seventy call it Bubastus, which was situated on the Pelusiatic branch of the Nile.

PIETY, or godliness, another name for personal religion. It consists in a firm belief and in right conceptions of the being, perfections, and providence of God; with suitable affections to him, resemblance of his moral perfections, and a constant obedience to his will. The different articles included in this definition, such as knowledge, veneration, love, resignation, &c., are explained in their proper places in this work.

PIETY, EARLY. Youth, says Mr Jay, is a period which presents the fewest obstacles to the practice of godliness, whether we consider our external circumstances, our nature, powers, or our moral habits. In that season we are most free from those troubles which embitter, those schemes which engross, those engagements which hinder us in more advanced life. Then the body possesses health and strength; the memory is receptive and tenacious; the fancy glows; the mind is lively and vigorous; the understanding is more docile; the affections are more easily touched and moved; we are more accessible to the influence of joy and sorrow, hope and fear; we engage in an enterprise with more expectation and ardour and zeal. Under the legal economy, the first was to be chosen for God—the first-born of man, the first-born of beasts, the first-fruits of the field. It was an honour becoming the God they worshipped, to serve him first. This duty the young alone can spiritualize and fulfil, by giving Him, who deserves all their lives, the first-born of their days, and the first-fruits of their reason and their affection. Early piety will have a beneficial influence in forming our connections and establishing our plans for life. It will teach us to ask counsel of the Lord, and arrange all under the superintendency of Scripture. Those changes which a person who becomes religious in manhood is obliged to make, are always very embarrassing. With what difficulty do some good men establish family worship, after living, in the view of children and servants, so long in the neglect of it! But this would have been avoided, had they early followed the example of Joshua: "As for me and my house, we will serve the Lord." How hard is it to disentangle ourselves from associates with whom we have been long familiar, and who have proved a snare to our souls! Some evils, indeed, are remediless; persons have formed alliances which they cannot dissolve: but they did not walk by the rule, "Be ye not unequally yoked together with unbelievers;" they are now wedded to misery all their days, and repentance, instead of visiting them like a faithful friend, to chide them when they do wrong, and withdraw, is quartered upon them for life. An early dedication to God, therefore, renders a religious life more easy, pleasant, and safe. It is of unspeakable advantage, also, under the calamities of life. It turns the curse into a blessing; it enters the house of mourning, and soothes the troubled mind; it prepares us for all, sustains us in all, sanctifies us by all, and delivers us from all. Finally, it will bless old age: we shall look back with pleasure on some instances of usefulness—to some poor traveller to whom we have been as a refreshing stream—some deluded wanderer we guided into the path of peace. We shall look forward, and see the God who has guided us with his counsel, and be enabled to say: "Henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness, which the Lord, the righteous Judge, shall give me at that day; and not to me only, but unto all them that love his appearing."

PIGEON. See DOVE.

PI-HAHIROTH, the second encampment of the Israelites after they left Egypt, and on the borders of the Red Sea, not far from the Gulf of Suez. Hiroth in Hebrew means a valley, a confined pass, a defile among mountains; pi denotes mouth or entrance; ha is merely the article the; so that the whole word may be rendered "the entrance of the valley or pass." It is worthy of being noticed, that the mountains which confine the valley at its entrance bear at present the name of Addagi or deliverance, probably in commemoration of the deliverance of the Israelites at the Red Sea.

PILATE, PONTIUS, a governor of Judea in the reign of Tiberius, A.D. 27. Pilate seems to have been the first of the governors who took up his residence at Jerusalem, those who preceded him having dwelt at Cæsarea. He held this important office for eleven years, according to Philo, and during the whole of that period he seems to have been habitually addicted to extortion and injustice, which of course rendered his rule very unpopular. On various occasions he shamefully outraged the religious feelings of the Jews, and frequent commotions took place among the people. To one of these Luke refers in his Gospel, xiii. 1-3, as having actually happened among a party of Galileans, who were engaged in the services of the temple. It was during the government of Pilate that our blessed Lord was crucified at Jerusalem. Pilate was deeply implicated in that solemn event. Not being actuated by any deep-rooted principles of religion, he seems rather to have given himself up to be guided by motives of expediency. At one time he seemed to wish to deliver Jesus out of the hands of the Jews, and when that failed, he attempted to appease their wrath by scourging him. Then, availing himself of a Jewish custom, he put it to them whether they would choose Jesus or Barabbas to be set free on the day of the passover. Lastly, to discharge himself of the responsibility of pronouncing judgment against him, he proposed to send him to Herod king of Galilee. When all was unavailing, and the Jews refused to be satisfied with any thing short of the death of Jesus, Pilate caused water to be brought, and, washing his hands before all the people, publicly declared himself innocent of the blood of this just person; yet at the same time he delivered him to the soldiers to be crucified. By the orders of Pilate, an inscription was placed over the head of the Saviour, in Hebrew, Greek, and Latin. He also gave permission for the removal of our Lord's body, and to place a guard over the sepulchre. At this point in the history of Pilate, we cease to have any further information from the sacred writings. Profane writers, however, inform us, that after he had held his office for ten years, he was ordered to Rome to give an account of his administration to the emperor. The charges alleged against him having been proved, he was banished to Gaul, where he is said to have committed suicide, A.D. 41.

PILATE, ACTS OF. Eusebius mentions that Pontius Pilate, after the crucifixion of our Lord, wrote such an account of his character and miracles to the Emperor Tiberius, as induced that prince to propose to the senate that a place should be assigned to Jesus among the deities worshipped by the Romans, but that the senate opposed the wishes of the emperor. It was certainly the custom of the governors of provinces to write memoirs of the remarkable occurrences of the places where they presided; and there is nothing improbable in the idea that Pilate, who was convinced of the innocence of Christ, should send an account of him to Tiberius. It is certain also that Justin Martyr, in his Apology for the Christians, presented to the Emperor Antoninus Pius, refers to the Acts of Pilate, as containing an account of the circumstances connected with the crucifixion; and Tertullian, towards the end of the century, appeals to the same records. Still, however, the evidence for the existence of these acts appears defective; and the proposal alluded to by Tiberius to the Roman senate is irreconcilable with the character of that prince, and the state of the Roman empire during his reign. At a later period, a spurious work, entitled The Acts of Pilate, was circulated by the Jews, containing many slanders against Jesus; and it appears that acts of a contrary nature were fabricated by certain Christians, to do away the impression.

PILGRIM, in an ecclesiastical sense, one who travels through foreign countries to visit holy places, and to pay his devotion to the relics of dead saints. The word is formed from the Flemish pelgrim, or Italian pelegrino, which signifies the same; and those originally from the Latin peregrinus, a stranger or traveller.

PILGRIMAGE, a kind of religious discipline, which consists in taking a journey to some holy place, in order to adore the relics of some deceased saint. Pilgrimages began to be made about the middle ages of the Church; but they were most in vogue after the end of the eleventh century, when every one was for visiting places of devotion, not excepting kings and princes; and even bishops made no difficulty of being absent from their churches on the same account. The places most visited were Jerusalem, Rome, Tours, and Compostella.

In almost every country where Popery has been established, pilgrimages have been common. Pilgrimage is not peculiar to Roman Catholic countries. The Mohammedans place a great part of their religion in it. Mecca is the chief place to which they go; and this pilgrimage is so necessary a point of practice, that, according to a tradition of Mohammed, he who dies without performing it may as well die a Jew or a Christian; and the same is expressly commanded in the Koran.

In heathen countries, the two most memorable places of resort are the temple of the Grand Lama, in Thibet, and the temple of Juggernaut at Orissa, in Bengal. See LAMAISM—HINDUISM.

PILLAR properly means a column raised to support a building; but in Scripture the term mostly occurs in a metaphorical or figurative sense. Thus we have a pillar of cloud, a pillar of fire, a pillar of smoke, &c.; signifying a cloud, a fire, a smoke raised up towards heaven in the form or shape of a pillar. Exod. xiii. 21; Judg. xx. 40. Job (ix. 6, xxvi. 11) speaks of the pillars of heaven and the pillars of the earth; which are strong metaphorical expressions, that suppose the heavens and the earth to be an edifice raised by the hand of the Almighty Creator, and founded upon its basis. Paul speaks of the Christian Church under the similitude of a pillar or column, on which the truth or doctrine of the glorious gospel is inscribed. 1 Tim. iii. 15.

PILLOWS. See ARM-HOLES—BOLSTER.

PILOT. The same which in Ezek. xxvii. 8, 28, is rendered pilot, is translated ship-master in Jonah i. 6. It literally means a steersman.

PIN. The pins mentioned in the account of the tabernacle, are probably to be considered as nails. (See NAIL.) Pins for fastening the dress, among the Hebrews, were often made of bone or wood.

PINE TREE. The pine appears in our translation three times: Neh. viii. 15; Isa. xli. 19, lx. 13. Nehemiah (viii. 15), giving directions for observing the feast of tabernacles, says: "Fetch olive branches, pine branches, myrtle branches, and branches of thick trees, to make booths." The Hebrew phrase means literally, "branches of oily or gummy plants." The Septuagint say cypress. Scheuchzer says the Turks call the cypress zemin. The author of "Scripture Illustrated" says: "I should prefer the whole species called jasmin, on account of its verdure, its fragrance, and its flowers, which are highly esteemed. The word jasmin and jasemin of the Turks resembles strongly the shemen of the Hebrew original here. The Persians also name this plant semen and simsyk." The authority, however, of the Septuagint must prevail. In Isaiah (xli. 19, lx. 13) the Hebrew word is thedher, a tree, says Parkhurst, so called from the springiness or elasticity of its wood. Luther thought it the elm, which is a lofty and spreading tree; and Dr. Stock renders it the ash. After all, it may be thought advisable to retain the pine.

PINNACLE OF THE TEMPLE. On the interpretation of this expression, which occurs in Matt. iv. 5, commentators are by no means agreed. Grotius, Hammond, Doddridge, and others, take it in the sense of balustrade or pinnated battlement. This seems to have been the opinion of Calmet, who explains it as referring to the gallery or parapet on the top of the buttresses which surrounded the roof of the temple. Wetstein understands it as denoting what was called the king's portico. The same explanation is given by Rosenmüller, Kuinoel, Parkhurst, and long ago Euthymius. Krebs, however, followed by Schleusner, maintains that it signifies the ridge of the roof of the temple. This is strongly confirmed by Josephus. But to this it is objected that there were iron spikes fixed all over the roof of the temple lest the birds should settle upon and defile it. The word in the original properly denotes a small wing.

PIOUS FRAUDS. See FRAUDS.

PIPE. This musical instrument was commonly used by the Jews in the dance. Among the Egyptians it was similarly employed, and was sometimes made double, one branch being intended for the tenor, and the other for the bass; generally, however, like our own, it was single. The flute, which was merely a larger variety, is mentioned in the Book of Daniel, and was longer than those now in use.

PIRATHON, a town belonging to the tribe of Ephraim, where Abdon, one of the judges, was buried. Judg. xii. 15.

PISGAH, a part of mount Nebo; so called, being, in all probability, a distinct, and most likely the highest, summit of that mountain. Here Moses climbed to view the land of Canaan; and here he died. See NEBO.

PISIDIA, a province of Asia Minor, having Lycania north, Pamphylia south, Cilicia and Cappadocia east, and the province of Asia west. Paul preached at Antioch, its capital (Acts xiii. 14), and throughout Pisidia (Acts xiv. 24).

PISON, or PHISON, one of the four great rivers that watered Paradise. Gen. ii. 11, 12. See EDEN.

PIT. It was a not uncommon species of punishment in Eastern countries to cast condemned persons into a pit, or dark noisome hole, which had sharp spikes at the top, that no criminal might escape, and others at the bottom, to pierce and torment those unhappy persons that were cast in. To this punishment there are frequent allusions in the Sacred Writings. Thus Job xxxiii. 18, 24, 28: "He keepeth back his soul from the pit, and his life from perishing by the sword.—Then he is gracious unto him, and saith, Deliver him from going down to the pit: I have found a ransom.—He will deliver his soul from going into the pit, and his life shall see the light." The Psalmist prays: "Unto thee will I cry, O Lord my rock; be not silent to me: lest, if thou be silent to me, I become like them that go down into the pit.—He brought me up also out of an horrible pit, out of the miry clay, and set my feet upon a rock, and established my goings." Ps. xxviii. 1, xl. 2. The following allusion occurs in the Prophecies of Isaiah (li. 14): "The captive exile hasteneth that he may be loosed, and that he should not die in the pit, nor that his bread should fail."

PITCH. In the English Bible there are two Hebrew words which are rendered "pitch"—zepheth (Exod. ii. 3; Isa. xxxiv. 9), and chemer (Gen. vi. 14); the latter of which is again rendered slime, in Gen. xi. 3, and xiv. 10. They are both thought to be used for asphaltum or bitumen, a brittle substance, of a black or brownish colour, and of a consistence somewhat harder than pitch. The ancients were well acquainted with this substance, which is nothing more than mineral tar in an indurated or hardened state. It is found on the surface of volcanic productions; and it floats in solid pieces, and in considerable abundance, on the Asphaltic Lake, which has thence received its name. It is also found near ancient Babylon; and there is reason to suppose that the mortar so celebrated among the ancients, and with which the walls of Babylon were cemented, was nothing more than a preparation of this substance. Gen. xi. 3. We are informed by Herodotus, that a composition of heated bitumen, mixed with the tops of reeds, was used by the ancients as a cement. This account is confirmed by modern travellers, who assert that the remains of buildings have been discovered in which bitumen was formerly thus employed. It was doubtless the pitch used by Noah for closing the interstices of the ark (Gen. vi. 14), and by the mother of Moses to render the vessel in which she placed her infant son on the Nile (Exod. ii. 3) water-proof. The Arabs still use it for similar purposes. (See BABYLON.) Josephus states that bitumen was used among the ingredients for embalming the dead.

PITCHER. See BARREL.

PITHOM, one of the cities built by the children of Israel for Pharaoh in Egypt, during their servitude. Exod. i. 11. This is, probably, the Pathmos mentioned by Herodotus, which he places on the canal made by the kings Necho and Darius, to join the Red Sea with the Nile. We find, also, in the ancient geographers, that there was an arm of the Nile called Pathmeticus, Phatmiens, Phatnicus, or Phatniticus. Marsham makes Pithom the same as Pelusium, or Damietta.

PITY is generally defined to be the uneasiness we feel at the unhappiness of others, prompting us to compassionate them, with a desire of their relief. God is said to pity them that fear him, as a father pitieth his children. The father, says Mr. Henry, pities his children that are weak in knowledge, and instructs them; pities them when they are froward, and bears with them; pities them when they are sick, and comforts them (Isa. lxvi. 13); when they are fallen, and helps them up again; when they have offended, and forgives them; when they are wronged, and rights them. Thus the Lord pitieth them that fear him. Ps. ciii. 13. See COMPASSION or GOD.

PLAGUES OF EGYPT. These were ten in number, and appear to have been inflicted as a judgment from heaven upon Pharaoh and the Egyptians for their oppression of the Israelites, and that Jehovah might be seen to be the only, the Almighty Lord. But while this may be regarded as the general origin of the plagues, each of them has in it a peculiar fitness to punish special sins which prevailed among the Egyptians. Thus the first plague consisted in the waters of the Nile being turned into blood, and in this judgment we see a righteous retribution for the sin of idolatry, the river of Egypt being worshipped as a deity. And not only was it a righteous, it was also a significant plague. The Egyptians had stained the waters of that river with the blood of the Hebrew innocents, and now he gave them blood to drink, for they were worthy. The second plague was also obviously a punishment for idolatry, the frog being one of the sacred animals of the Egyptians. The third plague, that of lice, or gnats, as some translate it, was sent upon the Egyptians without warning, and must have been a severe punishment to a people so fastidiously cleanly in their habits. Still more painful and disgusting must have been the plague of flies or beetles which was the fourth in the series. No creature could be more fitly employed to punish idolatry, as the fly or beetle occupies a conspicuous place among the sacred animals of the Egyptians. In the fifth plague, the murrain upon the cattle, Pharaoh and the Egyptians were reminded of the effects of their sin, as evinced in the sufferings of the unoffending brute creation. But unaffected as they were by the pestilence which had wasted their flocks and herds, a sixth plague, which was still more severe, was sent, causing boils to break forth upon man and beast. The plague of hail, which formed the seventh, was one of the greatest marvels that could occur in a climate like that of Egypt, and was followed by the eighth, the plague of locusts, which completed the havoc begun with the hail. The awful plague of darkness, which lasted for three days, constituting the ninth in this melancholy catalogue of judgments, was a most significant sign of the divine displeasure, and a fearful premonition of that "blackness of darkness" which awaits the finally impenitent. But the last of these plagues was the most solemn and severe of all, the destruction of the first-born in every Egyptian family. There are two questions which naturally arise in connection with the plagues, which it is well known from the sacred record were imitated by the magicians of Egypt:—1. What was Pharaoh's design in calling these magicians into his presence? and 2. What do we learn from the sacred text they actually did? In reply to these questions, we quote the remarks of Professor Bush:—

"First, As to Pharaoh's design in sending for the magicians, there is no good reason for supposing that the object was to engage the gods of Egypt to work miracles in direct opposition to the God of Israel, and thereby to invalidate Moses' divine commission. In that case they would obviously have endeavoured to counteract the aim of Jehovah, and not to promote it. Instead of joining with the God of the Hebrews in bringing down heavier judgments and adding to the direful plagues already inflicted, they would have sought to have had them diminished and removed. Instead of desiring them to turn more water into blood, they would have besought them to restore the corrupted waters to their natural state. Instead of entreating them to multiply frogs, their prayer would have been for them to be removed or destroyed, as it would certainly be as easy to do the one as the other. The fact seems to have been, that Pharaoh's first thought was that Moses was nothing more than a magician, and that he sent for his magicians in order to learn from them whether the sign given by Moses was truly supernatural, or only such as their art was able to accomplish. The question, therefore, was not whether the gods of Egypt were superior to the God of Israel, or whether evil spirits could perform greater miracles than those which Moses performed by the assistance of Jehovah; but whether the works of Moses were proper proofs that the God of Israel was Jehovah, the only Sovereign of nature, and consequently whether Moses was acting by his commission. This was to be determined by the result of their efforts to perform the same extraordinary acts as Moses did; and had they succeeded, the effect would have been the same as if Baal had answered his votaries by fire; it would have followed, of course, that Moses, whatever he might pretend, was a magician only, and not a divinely commissioned messenger, and also that Jehovah was not the only Sovereign of nature. Having been summoned, therefore, for this purpose into the royal presence, the question arises,

"Secondly, As to the true nature of the magicians' performances. Were they real miracles, and if so, by what power effected? or were they nothing more than dextrous feats of juggling or sleight of hand? On these points various opinions have been held, each supported by an array of reasoning more or less plausible. Some have supposed that the magicians were aided by evil spirits in the performance of the miracles; and that these spirits were allowed by God to exercise a supernatural power up to a certain point, when they were suddenly arrested and confounded in their impotency, and made to give a more signal triumph to the cause of omnipotence and truth. But to this it is, we think, validly objected that the Scriptures, properly understood, never ascribe to evil spirits the power of working real miracles. Whatever wonders they may be capable of effecting, a miracle, strictly so termed, invariably requires and implies a divine interposition, as otherwise it would be difficult to conceive how a miracle should be proof of a commission from God. Others therefore have supposed that although the magicians pretended to have communication with evil spirits, and employed their arts accordingly, yet that God was pleased to interpose in concurrence with their enchantments, and to work a real miracle, contrary perhaps to their expectations; while yet his design was, by working a still greater one on the side of Moses and Aaron, to show the vast superiority of his power over theirs. This they would infer of course when they saw, for instance, Aaron's rod swallowing up their own, and consequently both they and Pharaoh would be inexcusable in refusing to acknowledge the agency of Omnipotence. But to this again it may be replied, that the proof thus adduced was not absolutely conclusive to their minds, that no power but that of Jehovah could work miracles. How was the transformation of Moses' rod a demonstration of his being sent by Jehovah, when the magicians apparently produced the very same credentials of a supernatural ability? Nay, the magicians, in the first contest, if a real miracle was wrought on their side, no matter by what power, would appear not only to have imitated, but to have exceeded Moses, having the advantage over him in the number of their miracles. For to human view they turned not only one rod into a serpent, which was all that Moses had hitherto done, but they turned their several rods into serpents. Now, why was Moses to be credited on account of a single miracle, if it were contradicted and overborne by several miracles fully equal to it? After the conversion of the rods, it is true, Moses' serpent swallowed up those of the magicians; but this after-victory, however splendid, could not retrieve the credit of the former defeat. It could not establish the validity of the proof, from the change of his rod, which he had appealed to in the beginning as a decisive testimony in favour of his claims. We seem therefore to be shut up to the necessity of seeking for a still more satisfactory solution of the difficulties involved in the case of the Egyptian magicians. Our conclusion, on the whole, is the same with that of Dr Dwight, as expressed in his 'Theology' (Serm. lx. on the Miracles of Christ), that the magicians wrought no miracles. All they did was to busy themselves with their enchantments, by which every man now knows that, although the weak and credulous may be deceived, miracles cannot possibly be accomplished.

"We proceed, therefore, to state the grounds of this interpretation, and in doing it, we regret that, from its depending so entirely upon the idiomatic structure of the Hebrew, the mere English reader will not perhaps be able fully to appreciate its force. We will endeavour to make it, however, if not demonstrable, at least intelligible. It is a canon of interpretation of frequent use in the exposition of the sacred writings, that verbs of action sometimes signify merely the will and endeavour to do the action in question. Thus, Ezek. xxiv. 13, 'I have purified thee, and thou wast not purged;' i. e., I have endeavoured, used means, been at pains, to purify thee. Johu v. 44, 'How can ye believe which receive honour one of another;' i. e., endeavour to receive. Rom. ii. 4, 'The goodness of God leadeth thee to repentance;' i. e., endeavours or tends to lead thee. Amos ix. 3, 'Though they be hid from my sight in the bottom of the sea;' i. e., though they aim to be hid. 1 Cor. x. 33, 'I please all men;' i. e., endeavour to please. Gal. v. 4, 'Whosoever of you are justified by the law;' i. e., seek and endeavour to be justified. Ps. lxix. 4, 'They that destroy me are mighty;' i. e., that endeavour to destroy me; Eng., 'that would destroy me.' Acts vii. 26, 'And set them at one again;' i. e., wished and endeavoured; Eng., 'would have set them.' The passage before us we consider as exhibiting a usage entirely analogous. 'They also did in like manner with their enchantments;' i. e., they endeavoured to do in like manner; just as in chap. viii. 18, it is said, 'And the magicians did so with their enchantments to bring forth lice, but they could not;' the words being precisely the same in both instances. Adopting this construction, we suppose that the former clause of verse 12 should be rendered, 'For they cast down every man his rod, that they might become serpents;' which the Hebrew reader will perceive to be a rendering precisely parallel to that which occurs chap. vi. 11, 'Speak unto Pharaoh that he let the children of Israel go;' Heb., 'And he shall let go.' So also chap. vii. 2, 'Shall speak unto Pharaoh, that he send;' Heb., 'And he shall send.' The magicians cast down their rods that they might undergo a similar transmutation with that of Moses, but it is not expressly said that they were so changed, and we therefore incline to place their discomfiture in the loss of their rods, those instruments with which they had vainly hoped to compete with Moses. If it be contended that there was some kind of change produced on the magicians' rods, but that it was effected by feats of juggling, or legerdemain, and amounted in fact merely to an optical illusion, we do not particularly object to this construction, inasmuch as it admits our main position, that there was no real miracle wrought by or through the magicians. Perhaps on the whole it may be considered as the most probable hypothesis, especially as the narrative does not require us to understand all these various incidents as having occurred at one and the same interview. It seems that it was after the miracle wrought upon Aaron's rod that the magicians were called for by Pharaoh, and as they would learn from the summons itself the object for which they were called into the royal presence, as well as the character of the miracle that had been wrought, they would of course have time to make all the necessary preparations for playing off an illusion upon the senses of the spectators by their semblances of serpents."

PLAISTER. This word is used in Lev. xiv. 42: "And they shall take other stones, and put them in the place of those stones; and he shall take other mortar, and shall plaster the house." In a medical sense, it occurs in Isa. xxxviii. 21: "For Isaiah had said, Let them take a lump of figs, and lay it for a plaster upon the boil, and he shall recover," that is from the disease.

PLAITING. See HAIR—HEAD-DRESS.

PLANE. This is mentioned among workmen's tools in Isa. xlv. 13. It was probably some kind of hatchet. See CARPENTER.

PLANETS. The Hebrew word, which in our version is rendered planets, in 2 Kings xxiii. 5, Gesenius translates, the constellations of the zodiac. See ASTRONOMY—CONSTELLATION.

PLANKS. In describing the building of Solomon's temple, planks of fir are mentioned as having been used for flooring.

PLATE. Speaking of the dress of the high priest, it is said, in Exod. xxviii. 30: "And thou shalt put in the breastplate of judgment the Urin and the Thummim; and they shall be upon Aaron's heart, when he goeth in before the Lord: and Aaron shall bear the judgment of the children of Israel upon his heart before the Lord continually." PLATTER. Our Lord, when engaged in reproving the Pharisees for hypocrisy, says: "Woe unto you, scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites! for ye make clean the outside of the cup and of the platter, but within they are full of extortion and excess." Matt. xxiii. 25.

PLEASURE, the delight which arises in the mind from the contemplation or enjoyment of something agreeable. See HAPPINESS.

PLEDGE, a security for the performance of a promise, or a deposit for money advanced. The regulations laid down under the Mosaic law in reference to pledges are to be found in Deut. xxiv. 10-13: "When thou dost lend thy brother any thing, thou shalt not go into his house to fetch his pledge. Thou shalt stand abroad, and the man to whom thou dost lend shall bring out the pledge abroad unto thee. And if the man be poor, thou shalt not sleep with his pledge: in any case thou shalt deliver him the pledge again when the sun goeth down, that he may sleep in his own raiment, and bless thee: and it shall be righteousness unto thee before the Lord thy God." These arrangements were characterised by the utmost mildness and benevolence, and were obviously intended to prevent harsh treatment of the poor.

PLEIADES. The word Kima is translated, in Job ix. 9, xxxviii. 31, and Amos v. 8, by the word Pleiades, which is a constellation consisting of seven stars in the shoulder of Taurus. When Job says, "Canst thou bind the sweet influences of the Pleiades?" he probably refers to the stars thus named as rising early in the spring, and thus bringing on the fruitful season.

PLOUGH. To prepare the ground for sowing, immediately after the first short season of rain in the fall, the ancient oriental husbandman set himself to break it up with the plough. His plough, however, was a trifling thing in comparison with one of ours. It was probably much like the ploughs that are used at the present day in eastern countries. One of those is often so light that a man can lift it with one hand; and when it passes over the ground, it leaves only a moderate scratch behind, instead of the deep, broad furrow which we are accustomed to see. The ploughshare is a piece of iron, somewhat broad, but not large, fixed to the end of a shaft that lies flat. Two handles, and sometimes only one, standing nearly upright from this shaft, prepare it to be guided by the ploughman's hand; while a pole of sufficient length, rudely fastened to the bottom, near the handles, and slanting upward to the proper height, answers the purpose of a beam, to which is fixed the common yoke for drawing. The share has a good deal of likeness to the short sword that was anciently used, and might easily be beaten into such an instrument. It was not uncommon, once, to change one into the other, as we may learn from the language of the prophet: "Beat your ploughshares into swords, and your pruning-hooks into spears." Joel iii. 10. See also Isa. ii. 4. With such a light, unsteady plough, the ploughman needs the greatest caution and care to keep it in the ground, or to make a straight furrow: he must be continually bending over and pressing upon it, so as to give it steadiness and weight. For a man, therefore, who undertook to manage a Jewish plough, to turn his head behind him, was even more imprudent and foolish than the same thing is with us. To this our Saviour refers: "No man, having put his hand to the plough, and looking back, is fit for the kingdom of heaven." Luke ix. 62.

PLOUGHMAN. This word, which is found in Is. lxi. 5, does not signify only a ploughman, but a husbandman generally. Men of high rank and of great wealth were not ashamed to hold the plough, and to engage in other labours of the field.

PLOUGHSHARE. See PLOUGH.

PLUMB-LINE. The use of this article for measurement is referred to in threatening the destruction of Jerusalem. "And I will stretch over Jerusalem the line of Samaria, and the plummet of the house of Ahab: and I will wipe Jerusalem as a man wipeth a dish, wiping it, and turning it upside down." 2 Kings xxi. 13. And the prophet Amos (vii. 7) says: "Thus he showed me, and, behold, the Lord stood upon a wall made by a plumb-line, with a plumb-line in his hand."

PLURALIST, one that holds more than one ecclesiastical benefice with cure of souls. Episcopalians contend there is no impropriety in a presbyter holding more than one ecclesiastical benefice. Others, on the contrary, affirm that this practice is exactly the reverse of the primitive churches, as well as the instructions of the apostle. Tit. i. 5. Instead of a plurality of churches to one pastor, they say, we ought to have a plurality of pastors to one church. The origin of this abuse is to be found in the extreme poverty of some of the clergymen of the Church of England. To prevent non-residence in connection with a plurality of livings, the canon law prescribes that no two livings could be held together at a greater distance than thirty miles. This regulation, however, has been long disregarded, but of late years active measures have been adopted, which in course of time are likely to abolish the system of pluralities in the English Church.

PLYMOUTH BRETHREN, a sect of recent origin, which derives its name from its head quarters being in and around Plymouth. The grand doctrinal error of this body of professing Christians is that Christ hath abrogated the moral law, so that all who believe on him are delivered from the law, not only as a covenant but as a rule of life. They take the name of Christians or brethren, and hold that in virtue of the priesthood of all believers, and as the gifts of the Spirit are still enjoyed by the church, the ministry should be exercised by all Christians, and not confined to a particular class. They declare that the exercise of every political privilege, or the execution of the office of a magistrate, is inconsistent with the Christian character. They deny any peculiar sanctity as attaching to the Sabbath more than other days of the week, but observe the communion regularly every Lord's day. The congregations of this sect in England amount, it is believed, to nearly a hundred, but they are as yet very few in Scotland.

POETRY, HEBREW. Our knowledge of the pronunciation of Hebrew is allowed to be very uncertain and defective. Hence, though we are able to perceive a difference of numbers and measures from prose, yet we cannot with certainty reduce them to fixed rules. Some peculiarities, however, distinctly appear, and upon them different systems have been formed. Among these, that by Bishop Lowth, whose lectures on Hebrew poetry have been so highly extolled, for the beauty of their style, and the correctness of their Latinity, has been most generally adopted.

"The first poem on record, of any considerable length, is of the lyric order; and, as the sacred history informs us, it was sung alternately, by different parties, with the repetition of a chorus at separate periods. 'Then sang Moses,' it is said, 'and the children of Israel, this song unto the Lord, and spake, saying, I will sing unto the Lord, for he hath triumphed gloriously; the horse and his rider hath he thrown into the sea. And Miriam the prophetess, the sister of Aaron, took a timbrel in her hand, and all the women went out after her, with timbrels and with dances.' Examples of a similar kind you will find, on various occasions, in the course of the sacred history. These show the customs of Israel, and the origin of some of those peculiarities of construction and form which distinguish many of their sacred hymns. Thus, when David returned from the slaughter of the Philistine, the women, it is said, came out of all the cities of Israel, singing and dancing, to meet King Saul, with tabrets and with instruments of music; and the women answered, as they played, and said, 'Saul hath slain his thousands, and David his ten thousands.' In the time of Samuel, mention is made of a company of prophets, who, coming down from the high place, met Saul, with a psaltery, and a tabret, and a pipe, and a harp before them; and we are informed they prophesied, that is, as the expression means here, they sang in sacred strains the praises of God. And, in the days of David, four thousand Levites, divided into twenty-four classes under their respective leaders, were set apart for the daily worship of God, singing divine hymns, with instruments of music. To the heads of these, Heman, Asaph, and Jeduthun, many of the psalms of David were directed, for the service of the sanctuary. They were sung variously, according to the subject and the occasion. But several of them, it appears, were sung in alternate verses, as was done in the time of Moses. In the time of Ezra, when the builders laid the foundation of the second temple, it is said, 'They set the priests, in their apparel, with trumpets, and the Levites, the sons of Asaph, with cymbals, to praise the Lord, after the ordinance of David, the king of Israel;' and they sang together by course, in praising and giving thanks unto the Lord, because 'he is good, for his mercy endureth for ever toward Israel.'

"These facts teach us two particulars respecting the form of Hebrew poetry,—first, that in many of their hymns a measure was adopted suited to the accompaniment of music; and, secondly, that there was often a repetition of similar sentiment, and a change of persons responding. These you will often see in those treasures of devotion which are collected in the book of Psalms. They are the natural exhibition of strong emotion, expressed alternately, by different persons taking up the idea, and uniting in the expression of it. This mode assumes also different forms. Sometimes there is one principal idea, which is the burden of the hymn. To this all other parts are accessory, and at the conclusion of every part it is repeated, as the united expression of the whole assembly. At other times, you find the alternation taken up by different persons in succession; and then the whole uniting in one great combination of devout expression. Again, you find the hymn assuming the form of question and answer, as in the 24th Psalm, the sublimity and grandeur of which have often been illustrated.

"From these examples it is evident, that in many of the sacred hymns there was a regular rhythm, and that the lines were so framed as to correspond with the music which accompanied them. Thus, from the frequent alternations, there was often a repetition of idea, in a similar form of construction and of measure. But this was chiefly in the case of lyric verses intended to be sung; though it is possible that, being familiar with this mode, on such occasions it might be sometimes, and in a limited degree, followed in sacred poetry of a different description.

"On this is founded the system which Lowth has illustrated at great length in his lectures on Hebrew poetry, and in his introduction to his translation of Isaiah. 'The poetical conformation,' he says, 'of the sentences, which has been so often alluded to as characteristic of the Hebrew poetry, consists chiefly in a certain equality, resemblance, or parallelism between the members of each period; so that, in two lines (or members of the same period), things, for the most part, shall answer to things, and words to words, as if fitted to each other by a kind of rule or measure. It may be said to consist of three species. The first is the synonymous parallelism, when the same sentiment is repeated in different but equivalent terms. The antithetic parallelism is the next,' he says, 'that I shall specify; when a thing is illustrated by its contrary being opposed to it. There is a third species of parallelism in which the sentences answer to each other, not by the iteration of the same image or sentiment, or the opposition of their contraries, but merely by the form of construction.' This he calls the synthetic or constructive parallelism.

"These parallelisms are often, he observes, of a very obscure order. Sometimes, according to this system, there are also triplet parallelisms, and sometimes stanzas of five lines, the nature of which is nearly similar. The variety in the form of this synthetic parallelism is very great, and the degrees of resemblance, he adds, almost infinite, so that sometimes the scheme of the parallelism is very subtile and obscure, and must be developed by art and ability, in distinguishing the different members of the sentences, and in distributing the points."

POISON, or VENOM, whatever substance violently deranges the healthful functions of the animal system, and tends, if unchecked, to produce death. That there is a great variety of vegetable and mineral poisons, as hemlock, arsenic, &c., is sufficiently known; but what the Scripture usually calls poison is that liquor which asps, serpents, dragons, vipers, &c., convey by their bite, for the killing of other animals. What is poisonous and destructive to some animals, however, is harmless and medicinal to others.

Wickedness in false doctrine, wicked language, or evil courses, are likened to poison or venom: how hurtful and deadly to men's souls and bodies! how sinners delight in it, and are fond of infecting others with it! how they have it in or under their lips or tongue, in their heart, and ever ready to be vented! Deut. xxxii. 33; Ps. lviii. 4; Rom. iii. 13; James iii. 8. The destructive judgments of God are likened to poison; how often they come insensibly on men! how they spread, torment, and destroy them! Job vi. 4, xx. 16.

POLE. This word, which occurs in Numb. xxi. 8, 9, denotes that on which the brazen serpent was exposed to the view of the Israelites.

POLL, a head. Numb. i. 2. Ezekiel's visionary priests polling or cutting short the hair of their heads, but not shaving them, may import their avoiding every mark of effeminacy, on the one hand, and every heathenish and monkish custom or superstition, on the other. Ezek. xlv. 20. This idea is, however, conjectural.

POLLUX, a tutelary deity of mariners in ancient times (Acts xxviii. 11), whose image was placed either at the prow or stern of the ship.

POLYGAMY, the state of having more wives than one at the same time.

The circumstances of the patriarchs living in polygamy, and their not being reprov'd for it, has given occasion for some modern writers to suppose that it is not unlawful: but it is answered, that the equality in the number of males and females born into the world intimates the intention of God that one woman should be assigned to one man: "for," says Dr. Paley, "if to one man be allowed an exclusive right to five or more women, four or more men must be deprived of the exclusive possession of any; which could never be the order intended. The equality, indeed, is not quite exact. The number of male infants exceeds that of females in the proportion of nineteen to eighteen, or thereabouts; but this excess provides for the greater consumption of males by war, sea-faring, and other dangerous or unhealthy occupations. It seems also a significant indication of the divine will, that he at first created only one woman to one man. Had God intended polygamy for the species, it is probable he would have begun with it; especially as by giving to Adam more wives than one, the multiplication of the human race would have proceeded with a quicker progress.

"Polygamy not only violates the constitution of nature, and the apparent design of the Deity, but produces to the parties themselves, and to the public, the following bad effects: Contentions and jealousies among the wives of the same husband; distracted affections, or the loss of all affection in the husband himself; a voluptuousness in the rich, which dissolves the vigour of their intellectual as well as active faculties, producing that indolence and imbecility, both of mind and body, which have long characterized the nations of the East; the abasement of one half of the human species, who, in countries where polygamy obtains, are degraded into instruments of physical pleasure to the other half; neglect of children; and the manifold, and sometimes unnatural mischiefs which arise from a scarcity of women. (See MARRIAGE.)

"The state of manners in Judea had probably undergone a reformation in this respect before the time of Christ; for in the New Testament we meet with no trace or mention of any such practice being tolerated. For which reason, and because it was likewise forbidden amongst the Greeks and Romans, we cannot expect to find any express law upon the subject in the Christian code. The words of Christ (Matt. xix. 9) may be construed by an easy implication to prohibit polygamy; for if 'whosoever putteth away his wife, and marrieth another, committeth adultery,' he who marrieth another, without putting away the first, is no less guilty of adultery, because the adultery does not consist in the repudiation of the first wife (for however unjust or cruel that may be, it is not adultery), but entering into a second marriage during the legal existence and obligation of the first. The several passages in Paul's writings which speak of marriage, always suppose it to signify the union of one man with one woman. Rom. vii. 2, 3; 1 Cor. vii. 12, 14, 16. The manners of different countries have varied in nothing more than in their domestic constitutions. Less polished and more luxurious nations have either not perceived the bad effects of polygamy, or, if they did perceive them, they who in such countries possessed the power of reforming the laws, have been unwilling to resign their own gratifications. Polygamy is retained at this day among the Turks, and throughout every part of Asia in which Christianity is not professed. In Christian countries it is universally prohibited. In Sweden it is punished with death. In England, besides the nullity of the second marriage, it subjects the offender to transportation or imprisonment, and branding, for the first offence, and to capital punishment for the second. And whatever may be said in behalf of polygamy, when it is authorized by the law of the land, the marriage of a second wife, during the lifetime of the first, in countries where such a second marriage is void, must be ranked with the most dangerous and cruel of those frauds by which a woman is cheated out of her fortune, her person, and her happiness."

POLYTHEISM (from polus, many, and theos, God), the doctrine of a plurality of gods, or invisible powers superior to man. (See GODS—IDOLATRY—PAGANS.)

From the accounts given us by the best writers of antiquity, it seems that though the polytheists believed heaven, earth, and hell, were all filled with divinities, yet there was one who was considered as supreme over all the rest, or, at most, that there were but two self-existent gods, from whom they conceived all the other divinities to have descended in a manner analogous to human generation. It appears, however, that the vulgar pagans considered each divinity as supreme and unaccountable within his own province, and therefore entitled to worship, which rested ultimately in himself. The philosophers, on the other hand, seem to have viewed the inferior gods as accountable for every part of their conduct to him who was their sire and sovereign, and to have paid to them only that inferior kind of devotion which the Church of Rome pays to departed saints. The vulgar pagans were sunk in the grossest ignorance, from which statesmen, priests, and poets exerted their utmost influence to keep them from emerging; for it was a maxim which, however absurd, was universally received, "That there were many things true in religion which it was not convenient for the vulgar to know; and some things which, though false, it was expedient that they should believe." It was no wonder, therefore, that the vulgar should be idolaters and polytheists. The philosophers, however, were still worse; they were wholly "without excuse, because that, when they knew God, they glorified him not as God, neither were thankful; but became vain in their imaginations, and their foolish heart was darkened. Professing themselves wise, they became fools, and worshipped and served the creature more than the Creator, who is God, over all, blessed for ever." Rom. i. 20-22, 25.

POMEGRANATE (reman—Numb. xiii. 23, xx. 5; 1 Sam. xiv. 2), a low tree, growing very common in Palestine, and in other parts of the East. Its branches are very thick and bushy: some of them are armed with sharp thorns. They are garnished with narrow spear-shaped leaves. Its flowers are of an elegant red colour, resembling a rose. It is chiefly valued for the fruit, which is as big as a large apple, is quite round, and has the general qualities of other summer fruits, allaying heat and quenching thirst. The high estimation in which it was held by the people of Israel, may be inferred from its being one of the three kinds of fruit brought by the spies from Eshcol to Moses and the congregation in the wilderness (Numb. xiii. 23, xx. 5), and from its being specified by that rebellious people as one of the greatest luxuries which they enjoyed in Egypt, the want of which they felt so severely in the sandy desert. The pomegranate, classed by Moses with wheat and barley, vines and figs, oil-olive and honey, was, in his account, one principal recommendation of the promised land. Deut. viii. 8. The form of this fruit was so beautiful, as to be honoured with a place at the bottom of the high priest's robe (Exod. xxviii. 33; Eccus. xlv. 9); and was the principal ornament of the stately columns of Solomon's temple. The inside is full of small kernels, replenished with a generous liquor. In short, there is scarcely any part of the pomegranate which does not delight and recreate the senses.

POMMELS, a term used in 2 Chron. iv. 12, 13, to denote a part of the capital of the pillar. The same word is rendered bowls in 1 Kings vii. 41.

POND. This word, in the sense of a fish-pond, is found in Exod. vii. 19.

PONTIFF, or HIGH PRIEST, a person who has the superintendence and direction of divine worship, as the offering of sacrifices, and other religious solemnities. The Romans had a college of pontiffs, and over these a sovereign pontiff, instituted by Numa, whose function it was to prescribe the ceremonies with which each god was to be worshipped, compose the rituals, direct the vestals, and for a good while to perform the business of augury, till, on some superstitious occasion, he was prohibited intermeddling therewith. The Jews, too, had their pontiffs; and among the Romanists the pope is styled the sovereign pontiff.

PONTIFICATE is used for the state or dignity of a pontiff, or high priest; but more particularly, in modern writers, for the reign of a pope.

PONTUS, a province in Asia Minor, having the Euxine Sea north, Cappadocia south, Paphlagonia and Galatia east, and the Lesser Armenia west. It is thought that Peter preached here, because he addresses his First Epistle to the faithful of this and of the neighbouring provinces.

POOLS. This word is mentioned by Solomon in Eccles. ii. 6; and the necessity of constructing artificial pools arose from the circumstance, that in Palestine rain only fell at particular seasons of the year. See CISTERN.

POOR. It is altogether an error to suppose that either poverty or riches is essential to true happiness. No. "A man's life," or real enjoyment, "consisteth not in the abundance of the things which he possesseth." He may at one and the same time be poor and profligate; he may be rich and wretched. If, then, we would think of our outward condition at all, in its bearing upon our happiness, our safety lies in adopting the prayer of Agur, "Give me neither poverty nor riches; feed me with food convenient for me."

By the poor in spirit, whom our Lord pronounces blessed (Matt. v. 3), we must understand those who are humbled before God, under a sense of their own insignificance, and utter vileness; who are lying low at the divine footstool in quiet submission, being of a lowly and a contrite heart, and trembling at his word; who are feeling themselves to be wretched, and poor, and miserable, and who are, therefore, calmly receiving every thing from the hand of God, whether it be good, or whether it be evil. Such was the spirit of David when he penned the Ps. cxxxi. "Lord, my heart is not haughty, nor mine eyes lofty: neither do I exercise myself in great matters, or in things too high for me. Surely I have behaved and quieted myself, as a child that is weaned of his mother: my soul is even as a weaned child." Such a man is truly blessed or happy. Sensible how little he deserves at the hand of God, he is thankful for what he is permitted to enjoy. He expects no great satisfaction in earthly things, and therefore he cannot be seriously disappointed. His temporal wants bear lightly upon his heart, compared with his spiritual necessities. He is poor in spirit. He feels his need of that gold tried in the fire, by which alone he can be made rich. To the inexhaustible treasury of Christ's fulness, therefore, he is incessantly repairing, and seeking to obtain those supplies of grace which Christ alone can give. Pardon, peace, purity, life everlasting, are the chief objects of his desire. These are to him the true riches. If poor, he is contented, peaceful, and resigned; if rich in this world's goods, he is poor in spirit. The elements of real enjoyment are in that man's heart. "Peace is sown for the righteous, and gladness for the up-right in heart."

But not only are the poor in spirit happy in this world, we are told on the highest authority that they are truly blessed, "for theirs is the kingdom of heaven." There is evidently a beautiful harmony between the character here described and the nature of the blessedness which the Redeemer promises to its possessor. They are poor in spirit, but theirs is a rich inheritance in the heavens. "God hath chosen the poor of this world rich in faith, and heirs of the kingdom." Some have supposed that the expression "the kingdom of heaven," simply refers to the blessings of the gospel dispensation, which the Messiah introduced. But when we look at the rest of the beatitudes, and more especially at that which occurs in the 8th verse, where we find the promise, "they shall see God," we cannot refrain from interpreting the words in a far more exalted sense, as implying that they are subjects of the kingdom of grace on earth, and shall enter the kingdom of glory in heaven. This shall form the consummation of their happiness. "He raiseth the poor from the dunghill, and causeth him to sit among princes." Often did the humble believer sit like another Lazarus at the master's gate, feeling that he was a worthless beggar, all covered over with sores, and gladly did he feed upon the crumbs that fell from his master's table, but now the beggar has become a king. The royal diadem sparkles on his brow. He is clothed in the royal robe; the sceptre of a monarch is in his hand; and lo! he sits beside the Son of God, himself a king and priest for ever. Truly, "Blessed are the poor in spirit, for theirs is the kingdom of heaven."

POPE, the title of the supreme pontiff, or head of the Romish Church. It is derived from a Greek word, signifying father, and was, at an early period, given to all bishops, as appears from the ancient ecclesiastical writers, and is still given to every priest in Russia. But about the end of the eleventh century, Gregory VIII., in a council held at Rome, ordered that the title should be applied exclusively to the bishop of Rome. What was thus arrogantly claimed has long been conceded, and is now enjoyed without dispute, and without envy. He is commonly addressed as Most Holy Father. See ANTICHRIST.

POPERY comprehends the religious doctrines and practices adopted and maintained by the Church of Rome. The following summary, extracted chiefly from the decrees of the Council of Trent, continued under Paul III., Julius III., and Pius IV., from the year 1545 to 1563, by successive sessions; and the creed of Pope Pius IV., subjoined to it, and bearing date November 1564; sets forth the peculiar tenets of Popery. One of the fundamental tenets strenuously maintained by Popish writers is the infallibility of the Church of Rome, though they are not agreed whether this privilege belongs to the Pope or a general council, or to both united; but they pretend that an infallible living judge is absolutely necessary to determine controversies, and to secure peace in the Christian Church. However, Protestants allege that the claim of infallibility in any Church is not justified by the authority of Scripture, much less does it pertain to the Church of Rome; and that it is inconsistent with the nature of religion and the personal obligations of its professors; and that it has proved ineffectual to the end for which it is supposed to be granted, since popes and councils have disagreed in matters of importance, and they have been incapable, with the advantage of this pretended infallibility, of maintaining union and peace.

Another essential article of the Popish creed is, the supremacy of the pope, or his sovereign power over the universal Church. (See SUPREMACY.)

Further, the doctrine of the seven sacraments is a peculiar and distinguishing doctrine of the Church of Rome: these are, baptism, confirmation, the eucharist, penance, extreme unction, orders, and matrimony.

The Council of Trent pronounces an anathema on those who say that the sacraments are more or fewer than seven, or that any one of the above number is not truly and properly a sacrament. And yet it does not appear that they amounted to this number before the twelfth century, when Hugo de St. Victor and Peter Lombard, about the year 1144, taught that there were seven sacraments. The Council of Florence, held in 1438, was the first council that determined this number. These sacraments confer grace, according to the decree of the Council of Trent, ex opere operato, by the mere administration of them: three of them—viz., baptism, confirmation, and orders—are said to impress an indelible character, so that they cannot be repeated without sacrilege; and the efficacy of every sacrament depends on the intention of the priest by whom it is administered. Pope Pius expressly enjoins that all these sacraments should be administered according to the received and approved rites of the Catholic Church. With regard to the eucharist, in particular, we may here observe, that the Church of Rome holds the doctrine of transubstantiation; the necessity of paying divine worship to Christ, under the form of the consecrated bread or host; the propitiatory sacrifice of the mass, according to their ideas of which, Christ is truly and properly offered as a sacrifice as often as the priest says mass; it practises likewise solitary mass, in which the priest consecrates, communicates, and allows communion only in one kind, viz., the bread, to the laity.

The doctrine of merits is another distinguishing tenet of Popery; with regard to which the Council of Trent has expressly decreed, that the good works of justified persons are truly meritorious, deserving not only an increase of grace, but eternal life, and an increase of glory; and it has anathematized all who deny the doctrine. Of the same kind is the doctrine of satisfactions; which supposes that penitents may truly satisfy, by the afflictions they endure under the dispensations of Providence, or by voluntary penances to which they submit, for the temporal penalties of sin to which they are subject, even after the remission of their eternal punishment. In this connection we may mention the Popish distinction of venial and mortal sins: the greatest evils arising from the former are the temporary pains of purgatory; but no man, it is said, can obtain the pardon of the latter without confessing to a priest, and performing the penances which he imposes.

The Council of Trent has expressly decreed, that every one is accursed who shall affirm that penance is not truly and properly a sacrament instituted by Christ in the universal Church, for reconciling those Christians to the Divine Majesty who have fallen into sin after baptism; and this sacrament, it is declared, consists of two parts—the matter and the form: the matter is the act of the penitent, including contrition, confession, and satisfaction; the form of it is the act of absolution on the part of the priest. Accordingly it is enjoined, that it is the duty of every man who hath fallen after baptism to confess his sins once a year, at least, to a priest; that this confession is to be secret, for public confession is neither commanded nor expedient; and that it must be exact and particular, including every kind and act of sin, with all the circumstances attending it. When the penitent has so done, the priest pronounces an absolution, which is not conditional or declarative only, but absolute and judicial. The secret or auricular confession was first decreed and established in the fourth Council of Lateran, under Innocent III., in 1215. And the decree of this Council was afterwards confirmed and enlarged in the Council of Florence, and in that of Trent, which ordains, that confession was instituted by Christ; that, by the law of God, it is necessary to salvation; and that it has always been practised in the Christian Church. As for the penances imposed on the penitent by way of satisfaction, they have been commonly the repetition of certain forms of devotion, as paternosters or ave-marias, the payment of stipulated sums, pilgrimages, fasts, or various species of corporeal discipline. But the most formidable penance, in the estimation of many who have belonged to the Romish communion, has been the temporary pains of purgatory. But, under all the penalties which are inflicted or threatened in the Romish Church, it has provided relief by its indulgences, and by its prayers or masses for the dead, performed professedly for relieving and rescuing the souls that are detained in purgatory.

Another article that has been long authoritatively enjoined and observed in the Church of Rome, is the celibacy of her clergy. This was first enjoined at Rome by Gregory VII., about the year 1074, and established in England by Anselm, archbishop of Canterbury, about the year 1175; though his predecessor Lanfranc had imposed it upon the prebendaries and clergy that lived in towns. And though the Council of Trent was repeatedly petitioned by several princes and states to abolish this restraint, the obligation of celibacy was rather established than relaxed by this Council; for they decreed that marriage contracted after a vow of continence is neither lawful nor valid; and thus deprived the Church of the possibility of ever restoring marriage to the clergy; for if marriage, after a vow, be in itself unlawful, the greatest authority upon earth cannot dispense with it, nor permit marriage to the clergy who have already vowed continence. See CELIBACY.

To the doctrines and practices above recited may be further added, the worship of images, of which Protestants accuse the Papists. But to this accusation the Papist replies, that he keeps images by him to preserve in his mind the memory of the persons represented by them, as people are wont to preserve the memory of their deceased friends by keeping their pictures. He is taught, he says, to use them, so as to cast his eyes upon the pictures or images, and thence to raise his heart to the things represented, and there to employ it in meditation, love, and thanksgiving, desire of imitation, &c., as the object requires.

These pictures or images, he argues, have this advantage, that they inform the mind, by one glance, of what in reading might require a whole chapter, there being no other difference between them than that reading represents leisurely and by degrees, and a picture all at once. Hence he finds a convenience in saying his prayers with some devout pictures before him, he being no sooner distracted but the sight of these recalls his wandering thoughts to the right object, and as certainly brings something good into his mind, as an immodest picture disturbs his heart with filthy thoughts; and because he is sensible that these holy pictures and images represent and bring to his mind such objects as in his heart he loves, honours, and venerates, he cannot but on that account love, honour, and respect the images themselves.

The Council of Trent likewise decreed, that all bishops and pastors who have the care of souls do diligently instruct their flocks, "that it is good and profitable to desire the intercession of saints reigning with Christ in heaven." And this decree the Papists endeavour to defend by the following observations: They confess that we have but one Mediator of redemption, but affirm that it is acceptable to God that we should have many mediators of intercession. Moses (they say) was such a mediator for the Israelites; Job for his three friends; Stephen for his persecutors. The Romans were thus desired by Paul to be his mediators; so were the Corinthians; so the Ephesians; so almost every sick man desires the congregation to be his mediators, by remembering him in their prayers. And so the Papist desires the blessed in heaven to be his mediators; that is, that they would pray to God for him. But between these living and dead mediators there is no similarity: the living mediator is present, and certainly hears the request of those who desire him to intercede for them; the dead mediator is as certainly absent, and cannot possibly hear the requests of all those who at the same instant may be begging him to intercede for them, unless he is possessed of the divine attribute of omnipresence; and he who gives that attribute to any creature is unquestionably guilty of idolatry. And as this decree is contrary to one of the first principles of natural religion, so does it receive no countenance from Scripture, or any Christian writer of the three first centuries. Other practices peculiar to the Papists are, the religious honour and respect that they pay to sacred relics—by which they understand not only the bodies and parts of the bodies of the saints, but any of those things that appertained to them, and which they touched; and the celebration of divine service in an unknown tongue: to which purpose the Council of Trent hath denounced an anathema on any one who shall say that mass ought to be celebrated only in the vulgar tongue; though the Council of Lateran, under Innocent III., in 1215, had expressly decreed, that, because in many parts within the same city and diocese there are many people of different manners and rites mixed together, but of one faith, the bishops of such cities or dioceses should provide fit men for celebrating divine offices, according to the diversity of tongues and rites, and for administering the sacraments.

We shall only add, that the Church of Rome maintains that unwritten traditions ought to be added to the Holy Scriptures, in order to supply their defect, and to be regarded as of equal authority; that the books of the Apocrypha are canonical Scripture; that the Vulgate edition of the Bible is to be deemed authentic; and that the Scriptures are to be received and interpreted according to that sense which the Holy Mother Church, to whom it belongs to judge of the true sense, hath held, and doth hold, and according to the unanimous consent of the fathers.

Such are the principal and distinguishing doctrines of Popery, most of which have received the sanction of the Council of Trent, and that of the creed of Pope Pius IV., which is received, professed, and sworn to by every one who enters into holy orders in the Church of Rome; and at the close of this creed we are told, that the faith contained in it is so absolutely and indispensably necessary, that no man can be saved without it.

It is one of the worst properties of Popery, that it has no natural tendency to improve; that it evidently stands still in the career of ages; that whilst other orbs are brightening more and more unto the perfect day, it remains the same cheerless, changeless, and opaque spot on the face of an illuminated sky. See ANTICHRIST—JESUITS.

POPLAR. This tree is mentioned in Gen. xxx. 37, and Hos. iv. 13. It is generally supposed to be the Populus alba, or white poplar. Michaelis, however, agrees with the Seventy and the Arabic version in rendering the Hebrew word as the styrax or storax shrub.

PORTER, a keeper of the gates, and usually applied to the Levites, who watched the gates of the temple both day and night. The guardianship of the house of the Lord was accounted not only a highly honourable but a highly responsible situation, and was assigned to them by lot. They are said to have been twenty-four in number, including three priests, and they kept watch at every gate lest any excommunicated or unclean person should enter into the holy place. Maimonides informs us that there was one who acted as superintendent over the whole, and was called "the man of the mountain of the house," and whose office it was to see that every man was at his post. These porters are supposed to be alluded to by the Psalmist when he says, Ps. cxxxiv., "Ye who by night stand in the house of the Lord."

PORTION. It was customary, in Eastern countries, on any great feast, to send portions to those relatives or friends who might be unable, either in consequence of mourning or illness, to attend. This appears to be referred to in Neh. viii. 10: "Then he said unto them, Go your way, eat the fat, and drink the sweet, and send portions unto them for whom nothing is prepared: for this day is holy unto our Lord: neither be ye sorry; for the joy of the Lord is your strength." We find David, also, sending a portion from the royal table to Uriah: "And David said to Uriah, Go down to thy house, and wash thy feet. And Uriah departed out of the king's house, and there followed him a mess of meat from the king." 2 Sam. xi. 8. Among the primitive Christians the custom prevailed, at the celebration of the Lord's supper, of sending, by the hands of the deacons, portions of the sacred elements to their brethren, who, from sickness or imprisonment, were unable to attend. Often, accordingly, did they send fragments of the consecrated bread at the communion to the sick-beds or the dungeons where their brethren were confined. They scrupled not even to send it to penitents when in a dying state, though, in other circumstances, they would not have been deemed qualified to partake of the communion. Sometimes the early Christians carried home a portion of the consecrated bread, and reserved it for private use. When possessed of this precious treasure, as they accounted it, they would sometimes consecrate the day by partaking privately of the sacrament; or, if visited by a Christian brother or sister from a distance, they would partake together of this solemn ordinance.

POSITIVE INSTITUTES. The nature of a positive law essentially differs from that of a moral law. The matter of a moral law, whether it be of the nature of a requirement or of a prohibition, commends itself as holy, just, and good, and must therefore be unchangeable, and of perpetual obligation; but a positive law, whether to do or to omit, has nothing either of good or evil in itself, and is binding only by virtue of its being enacted, and therefore may be changed at the will of the lawgiver.

"Moral precepts," says Bishop Butler, "are precepts the reason of which we do see; positive precepts are precepts the reason of which we do not see. Moral duties arise out of the nature of the case itself, prior to external command; positive duties do not arise out of the nature of the case, but from external command; nor would they be duties at all, were it not for such command, received from Him whose creatures and subjects we are."

"Positive precepts," says President Edwards, "are the greatest and most proper trials of obedience, because in them the mere authority and will of the legislator is the sole ground of the obligation, and nothing in the nature of the things themselves; and, therefore, they are the greatest trials of any person's respect to that authority and will."

Dr. Gerard observes: "A total disregard to the positive and external duties of religion, or a very great neglect of them, is justly reckoned more blamable, and a stronger evidence of an unprincipled character, than even some transgressions of moral obligation. Even particular positive precepts, as soon as they are given by God, have something moral in their nature. Suppose the rites which are enjoined by them perfectly indifferent before they were enjoined, yet from that moment they cease to be indifferent. The divine authority is interposed for the observance of them. To neglect them is no longer to forbear an indifferent action; or to do a thing in one way rather than another, which has naturally no greater propriety: it is very different; it is to disobey God; it is to despise his authority; it is to resist his will. Can any man believe a God, and not acknowledge that disobedience to him, and contempt of his authority, are immoral, and far from the least heinous species of immorality?"

POSSESSION OF THE DEVIL. See DEMONIACS.

POST. This word occurs in Job ix. 25, where the patriarch, referring to the rapidity with which the short term of human life passes away, says, "Now my days are swifter than a post; they flee away, they see no good." In eastern countries, where the usual modes of travelling have always been proverbially slow, the runners or posts, who sometimes rode on dromedaries or swift camels, are considered as travelling with remarkable velocity. The use of posts, it is evident from the passage here referred to, must have been of great antiquity. It has been supposed by some that the use of posts originated with the Persians, but whether this be the case or not, we learn at all events from both Diodorus Siculus, and Xenophon, that carriers travelled in that country on horseback with great rapidity. Gibbon also informs us that among the Romans "houses were every where erected at the distance only of five or six miles; each of them was constantly provided with forty horses; and by the help of these relays it was easy to travel a hundred miles a-day along the Roman roads."

POT. The word frequently translated "pot," means a vessel or utensil of any kind. Sometimes it is applied to an earthenware vessel, which whenever it became ceremonially unclean, was to be dashed or broken to pieces; at other times it means a brazen pot. We find in one passage ranges for pots mentioned which, when unclean, were to be broken down. Thus, Lev. xi. 35: "And everything whereupon any part of their carcass falleth shall be unclean; whether it be oven, or ranges for pots, they shall be broken down: for they are unclean, and shall be unclean unto you." The allusion here is probably to a few bricks or stones, on which the pots rested. The hole in which the pot is set has an aperture on one side for the purpose of receiving the fuel, which seems to be what Jeremiah (i. 13) calls the face of the pot. "I see," said the prophet, "a pot, and the face thereof is towards the north;" intimating that the fuel to heat it was to be brought from that quarter. This prediction was fulfilled when Nebuchadnezzar, whose dominions lay to the north of Palestine, led his armies against Jerusalem, and overturned the thrones of the house of David.

POTIPHAR, an officer of the court of Pharaoh, king of Egypt (Gen. xxxvii. 36); general of his troops, according to the Vulgate; but chief of his victuallers, or cooks, according to the Hebrew.

POTIPHERAH, a priest of On (Gen. xli. 45), whose daughter, Asenath, Pharaoh gave in marriage to Joseph. The name Potiphera (he who belongs to the sun) is very common on the Egyptian monuments. This name is especially appropriate to the priest of On, or Heliopolis. (See AVEN.) Since Pharaoh evidently intended by this marriage to establish the power bestowed on Joseph upon a firm basis, it is implied in this account—first, that the Egyptian high priests occupied a very important position; and secondly, that among them the high priest of On was the most distinguished. Both these points are confirmed by history. Heeren tells us that the high priests were in a manner hereditary princes, who stood by the side of the kings, and enjoyed almost the same prerogatives.

POTSHERD, a broken fragment or piece of an earthen vessel; not a brittle pot only, but a piece of a pot—a pot already broken. Isa. xlv. 9. The same word occurs in Job ii. 8; and on this passage, Dr. Mason Good says, that the word translated "potsherd" was also employed to import a sharp instrument in general, as a rasp, scraper, or scalpel—a sense in which it has to this day descended to the Arabs.

POTTAGE. This kind of food is mentioned in Gen. xxv. 29–34. The red pottage of Esau was composed of LENTILES (which see); and from the word translated in our version "Feed me," which rather means "Let me have a draught," it appears that the dish was served up in a liquid form. Mr. Roberts tells us that "the people of the East are exceedingly fond of pottage, which they call kool. It is something like gruel, and is made of various kinds of grain, which are first beaten in a mortar. The red pottage is made of kurakon and other grains, but is not superior to the others." For such a mess, then, did Esau sell his birthright.

POTTER, a maker of earthen vessels. This kind of artificer, and even the peculiarities of his art are frequently referred to in the Sacred Writings. We find a very minute allusion of this kind in Jer. xviii. 3, 4. The original word here translated "wheels" rather means "stones," the machine mentioned being probably, as Dr Blayney explains, a pair of circular stones placed upon one another like mill-stones, of which the lower was immovable, but the upper one turned upon the foot of a spindle or axis, and had motion communicated to it by the feet of the potter sitting at his work, and causing it to revolve rapidly. The art of the potter is sometimes used in the Bible as a symbol of creation. Thus, "we are the clay, and thou our potter." When a vessel had cracked from the intensity of the heat it was thrown aside. To lie among the pots is still a proverb in the east, denoting degradation.

POTTER'S FIELD. See ACELDAMA.

POUND. The word translated "pound" in our version, was the maneh, which was equal to a hundred shekels. See MANEH—SHEKEL.

POVERTY is that state or situation opposed to riches, in which we are deprived of the conveniences of life. Indigence is a degree lower, where we want the necessities, and is opposed to superfluity. Want seems rather to arrive by accident, implies a scarcity of provision rather than a lack of money, and is opposed to abundance. Need and necessity relate less to the situation of life than the other three words, but more to the relief we expect, or the remedy we seek; with this difference between the two, that need seems less pressing than necessity.

Poverty has been sanctified by Christ in his own person, and in that of his parents; in that of his apostles, and of the most perfect of his disciples. Solomon besought the Lord to give him neither poverty nor riches (Prov. xxx. 8), looking on each extreme as dangerous to virtue.

Poverty of mind is a state of ignorance, or a mind void of religious principle and enjoyment. Rev. iii. 17.

Poverty of spirit consists in an inward sense and feeling of our wants and defects; a conviction of our wretched and forlorn condition by nature; with a dependence on divine grace and mercy for pardon and acceptance. Matt. v. 3. It must be distinguished from a poor-spiritedness, a sneaking fearfulness, which bringeth a snare. It is the effect of the operation of the Divine Spirit on the heart (John xvi. 8); is attended with submission to the Divine will; contentment in our situation; meekness and forbearance as to others, and genuine humility as to ourselves. It is a spirit approved of by God (Isa. lxvi. 2), evidential of true religion (Luke xviii. 13), and terminates in endless felicity. Matt. v. 3; Isa. lvii. 15; Ps. xxxiv. 18.

POWER, the ability of performing a thing. It is in a sovereign degree an attribute of Deity. God is all-powerful. It means sometimes a right, privilege, or dignity (John i. 12); sometimes absolute authority (Matt. xxviii. 18); sometimes the exertion or act of power, as of the Holy Spirit (Eph. i. 19), of angels, or of human governments, magistrates, &c. (Rom. xiii. 1); and perhaps it generally includes the idea of dignity, superiority. So the body is sown in weakness, but raised in power.

POWER OF GOD. See OMNIPOTENCE.

PRAISE, an acknowledgment made of the excellency or perfection of any person or action, with a commendation of the same.

"The desire of praise," says an elegant writer, "is generally connected with all the finer sensibilities of human nature. It affords a ground on which exhortation, counsel, and reproof can work a proper effect. To be entirely destitute of this passion betokens an ignoble mind, on which no moral impression is easily made; for where there is no desire of praise, there will also be no sense of reproach; but while it is admitted to be a natural, and in many respects an useful principle of action, we are to observe that it is entitled to no more than our secondary regard. It has its boundary set, by transgressing which, it is at once transformed from an innocent into a most dangerous passion. When, passing its natural line, it becomes the ruling spring of conduct; when the regard which we pay to the opinions of men encroaches on that reverence which we owe to the voice of conscience and the sense of duty; the love of praise, having then gone out of its proper place, instead of improving, corrupts, and instead of elevating, debases, our nature."

PRAISE OF GOD, the acknowledging his perfections, works, and benefits. Praise and thanksgiving are generally considered as synonymous, yet some distinguish them thus: Praise properly terminates in God, on account of his natural excellencies and perfections, and is that act of devotion by which we confess and admire his several attributes; but thanksgiving is a more contracted duty, and imports only a grateful sense and acknowledgment of past mercies. We praise God for all his glorious acts of every kind, that regard either us or other men—for his very vengeance, and those judgments which he sometimes sends abroad in the earth; but we thank him, properly speaking, for the instances of his goodness alone, and for such only of these as we ourselves are some way concerned in. See THANKSGIVING.

PRAYER has been well defined, the offering up of our desires unto God, for things agreeable to his will, in the name or through the mediation of Jesus Christ, by the help of the Holy Spirit, with a confession of our sins, and a thankful acknowledgment of his mercies.

Nothing can be more rational or consistent than the exercise of this duty. It is a divine injunction that men should always pray, and not faint. Luke xviii. 1. It is highly proper we should acknowledge the obligations we are under to the Divine Being, and supplicate his throne for the blessings we stand in need of. It is essential to our peace and felicity, and is the happy mean of our carrying on and enjoying fellowship with God. It has an influence on our tempers and conduct, and evidences our subjection and obedience to God. We shall here consider the object, nature, kinds, matter, manner, and forms of prayer, together with its efficacy, and the objections made against it.

The object of prayer is God alone, through Jesus Christ, as the Mediator. All supplications, therefore, to saints or angels, are not only useless but blasphemous. All worship of the creature, however exalted that creature is, is idolatry, and strictly prohibited in the sacred law of God. Nor are we to pray to the Trinity, as three distinct Gods; for though the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost be addressed in various parts of the Scripture, 2 Cor. xiii. 14; 2 Thess. ii. 16, 17, yet never as three Gods, for that would lead us directly to the doctrine of polytheism: the more ordinary mode the Scripture points out is, to address the Father through the Son, depending on the Spirit to help our infirmities. Eph. ii. 18; Rom. viii. 26.

"As to the nature of this duty, it must be observed, that it does not consist in the elevation of the voice, the posture of the body, the use of a form, or the mere extemporary use of words, nor, properly speaking, in any thing of an exterior nature; but simply the offering up of our desires to God. Matt. xv. 8. It has been generally divided into adoration, by which we express our sense of the goodness and greatness of God, Dan. iv. 34, 35; confession, by which we acknowledge our unworthiness, 1 John i. 9; supplication, by which we pray for pardon, grace, or any blessing we want, Matt. vii. 7; intercession, by which we pray for others, James v. 16; and thanksgiving, by which we express our gratitude to God, Phil. iv. 6. To which some add invocation, a making mention of one or more of the names of God; pleading, arguing our case with God in an humble and fervent manner; dedication, or surrendering ourselves to God; deprecation, by which we desire that evils may be averted; blessing, in which we express our joy in God, and gratitude for his mercies: but as all these appear to me to be included in the first five parts of prayer, I think they need not be insisted on.

"The different kinds of prayer are,—1. Ejaculatory, by which the mind is directed to God on any emergency. It is derived from the word ejaculo, to dart or shoot out suddenly, and is therefore appropriate to describe this kind of prayer, which is made up of short sentences, spontaneously springing from the mind. The Scriptures afford us many instances of ejaculatory prayer. Exod. xiv. 15; 1 Sam. i. 13; Rom. vii. 24, 25; Gen. xliii. 29; Judg. xvi. 28; Luke xxiii. 42, 43. 2. Secret or closet prayer is another kind of prayer to which we should attend. It has its name from the manner in which Christ recommended it. Matt. vi. 6. He himself set us an example of it, Luke vi. 12; and it has been the practice of the saints in every age. Gen. xxviii., xxxii.; Dan. vi. 10; Acts x. 9. 3. Family prayer is also another part not to be neglected. It is true, there is no absolute command for this in God's Word; yet from hints, allusions, and examples, we may learn that it was the practice of our forefathers: Abraham, Gen. xviii. 19; David, 2 Sam. vi. 20; Solomon, Prov. xxii. 6; Job i. 4, 5; Josh. xxiv. 15; see also Eph. vi. 4; Prov. vi. 20; Jer. x. 25; Acts x. 2, 30, xvi. 15. Family prayer, indeed, may not be essential to the character of a true Christian, but it is surely no honour to heads of families to have it said that they have no religion in their houses. If we consider what a blessing it is likely to prove to our children and our domestics; what comfort it must afford to ourselves; what utility it may prove to the community at large; how it sanctifies domestic comforts and crosses; and what a tendency it has to promote order, decency, sobriety, and religion in general, we must at once see the propriety of attending to it. The objection often made to family prayer is want of time; but this is a very frivolous excuse, since the time allotted for this purpose need be but short, and may easily be redeemed from sleep or business. Others say, they have no gifts: where this is the case, a form may soon be procured and used, but it should be remembered that gifts increase by exercise, and no man can properly decide, unless he make repeated trials. Others are deterred through shame, or the fear of man: in answer to such we shall refer them to the declarations of our Lord. Matt. x. 37, 38; Mark viii. 38. As to the season for family prayer, every family must determine for itself. 4. Social prayer is another kind Christians are called upon to attend to. It is denominated social, because it is offered by a society of Christians in their collective capacity, convened for that particular purpose, either on some peculiar and extraordinary occasions, or at stated and regular seasons. Special prayer-meetings are such as are held at the meeting and parting of intimate friends, especially churches and ministers; when the church is in a state of unusual deadness and barrenness; when ministers are sick, or taken away by death; in times of public calamity and distress, &c. Stated meetings for social prayer are such as are held weekly in some places, which have a special regard to the state of the nation and churches; missionary prayer-meetings for the spread of the gospel; weekly meetings held in most of the congregations, which have a more particular reference to their own churches, ministers, the sick, feeble, and weak of the flock. Christians are greatly encouraged to this kind of prayer from the consideration of the promise, Matt. xviii. 20; the benefit of mutual supplications, from the example of the most eminent primitive saints, Mal. iii. 16, Acts xii. 12; the answers given to prayer, Acts xii. 1-12, Josh. x., Isaiah xxxvii., &c.; and the signal blessing they are to the churches, Phil. i. 19, 2 Cor. i. 11. We now come, lastly, to take notice of public prayer, or that in which the whole congregation is engaged, either in repeating a set form, or acquiescing with the prayer of the minister who leads their devotions. This is both an ancient and important part of religious exercise: it was a part of the patriarchal worship, Gen. iv. 56. It was a part of the temple service, Isa. lvi. 7; 1 Kings viii. 59. Jesus Christ recommended it both by his example and instruction, Matt. xviii. 20; Luke iv. 16. The disciples also attended to it, Acts ii. 41, 42; and the Scriptures in many places countenance it, Exod. xx. 24; Ps. lxxiii. 1, 2, lxxxiv. 11, xxvii. 4." For the nature, necessity, place, time, and attendance on public worship, see WORSHIP.

"As to forms of prayer. We find this has been a matter of controversy among divines and Christians, whether such ought to be used, or whether extempore prayers are not to be preferred. We shall state the arguments on both sides. Those who are advocates for forms observe that it prevents absurd, extravagant, or impious addresses to God, as well as the confusion of extemporary prayer; that forms were used under the Old Testament dispensation; and in proof thereof cite Num. vi. 24, 26, x. 35, 36. On the other side it is answered, that it is neither reasonable nor scriptural to look for the pattern of Christian worship in the Mosaic dispensation, which, with all its rites and ceremonies, is abrogated and done away; that though forms may be of use to children, and such as are very ignorant, yet restriction to forms, either in public or private, does not seem scriptural or lawful. If we look to the authority and example of Christ and his apostles, every thing is in favour of extempore prayer. The Lord's prayer, it is observed, was not given to be a set form, exclusive of extemporary prayer. See LORD'S PRAYER. It is farther argued, that a form cramps the desires, inverts the true order of prayer, making our words to regulate our desires, instead of our desires regulating our words, has a tendency to make us formal, cannot be suited to every one's case; that it looks as if we were not in reality convinced of our wants, when we want a form to express them; and, finally, in answer to the two first arguments, that it is seldom the case that those who are truly sensible of their condition, and pray extempore, do it in an impious and extravagant manner; and if any who have the gift of prayer really do so, and run into the extreme of enthusiasm, yet this is not the case with the generality, since an unprejudiced attention to those who pray extempore must convince us, that if their prayers be not so elegantly composed as that of a set form, they are more appropriate, and delivered with more energy and feeling."

PREACHER, one who discourses publicly on religious subjects. See MINISTER—SERMON.

PREACHING, is publicly discoursing on any religious subject. It is impossible, in the compass of this work, to give a complete history of preaching from the beginning down to the present day. This must be considered as a desideratum in theological learning. Mr. Robinson, in his second volume of "Claude's Essay," has prefixed a brief dissertation on this subject, from which we glean the following particulars:—

From the sacred records we learn, that when men began to associate for the purpose of worshipping the Deity, Enoch prophesied. Jude 14, 15. We have a very short account of this prophet and his doctrine—enough, however, to convince us that he taught the principal truths of natural and revealed religion. Conviction of sin was in his doctrine, and communion with God was exemplified in his conduct. Gen. v. 24; Heb. xi. 5, 6. From the days of Enoch to the time of Moses, each patriarch worshipped God with his family; probably several assembled at new moons, and alternately instructed the whole company. Noah, it is said, was a preacher of righteousness. 2 Pet. ii. 5; 1 Pet. iii. 19, 20. Abraham commanded his household after him, to keep the way of the Lord, and to do justice and judgment (Gen. xviii. 19); and Jacob, when his house lapsed to idolatry, remonstrated against it, and exhorted them, and all that were with him, to put away strange gods, and to go up with him to Bethel. Gen. xxxv. 2, 3. Melchizedek, also, we may consider as the father, the prince, and the priest of his people, publishing the glad tidings of peace and salvation. Gen. xviii., Heb. vii.

Moses was a most eminent prophet and preacher, raised up by the authority of God; and by whom, it is said, came the law. John i. 17. This great man had much at heart the promulgation of his doctrine; he directed it to be inscribed on pillars, to be transcribed in books, and to be taught both in public and private by word of mouth. Deut. xxvii. 8, vi. 9, xxvi. 16–19, xvii. 18; Numb. v. 23; Deut. iv. 9. Himself set the example of each; and how he and Aaron sermonized, we may see by several parts of his writings. The first discourse was heard with profound reverence and attention; the last was both uttered and received in raptures. Exod. iv. 31; Deut. xxxiii. 7, 8. Public preaching does not appear under this economy to have been attached to the priesthood: priests were not officially preachers; and we have innumerable instances of discourses delivered in religious assemblies by men of other tribes besides that of Levi. Ps. lxviii. 11. Joshua was an Ephraimite; but being full of the Spirit of wisdom, he gathered the tribes to Shechem, and harangued the people of God. Deut. xxxiv. 9; Josh. xxiv. Solomon was a prince of the house of Judah, Amos a herdsman of Tekoa; yet both were preachers, and one at least was a prophet. 1 Kings ii. 1; Amos vii. 14, 15. When the ignorant notions of pagans, the vices of their practice, and the idolatry of their pretended worship, were in some sad periods incorporated into the Jewish religion by the princes of that nation, the prophets and all the seers protested against this apostasy, and they were persecuted for so doing. Shemaiah preached to Rehoboam, the princes, and all the people at Jerusalem. 2 Chron. xii. 5. Azariah and Hanani preached to Asa and his army. 2 Chron. xv. 1–16; xvi. 7. Micaiah to Ahab. Some of them opened schools, or houses of instruction, and there to their disciples they taught the pure religion of Moses. At Naioth, in the suburbs of Ramah, there was one where Sammel dwelt; there was another at Jericho; and a third at Bethel, to which Elijah and Elisha often resorted. Thither the people went on Sabbath-days, and at new moons, and received public lessons of piety and morality. 1 Sam. xix. 18; 2 Kings ii. 3–5, iv. 2, 3. Through all this period there was a dismal confusion of the useful ordinance of public preaching. Sometimes they had no open vision, and the word of the Lord was precious or scarce: the people heard it only now and then. At other times they were left without a teaching priest, and without law. And at other seasons, again, itinerants, both princes, priests, and Levites, were sent through all the country, to carry the book of the law, and to teach in the cities. In a word, preaching flourished when pure religion grew; and when the last decayed, the first was suppressed. Moses had not appropriated preaching to any order of men: persons, places, times, and manners, were all left optional and discretionary. Many of the discourses were preached in camps and courts, in streets, schools, cities, and villages, sometimes with great composure and coolness, at other times with vehement action and rapturous energy: sometimes in a plain, blunt style; at other times in all the magnificent pomp of Eastern allegory. On some occasions, the preachers appeared in public with visible signs, with implements of war, yokes of slavery, or something adapted to their subject. They gave lectures on these, held them up to view, girded them on, broke them in pieces, rent their garments, rolled in the dust, and endeavoured, by all the methods they could devise, agreeably to the customs of their country, to impress the minds of their auditors with the nature and importance of their doctrines. These men were highly esteemed by the pious part of the nation; and princes thought proper to keep seers and others, who were scribes, who read and expounded the law. 2 Chron. xxxiv. 29, 30, xxxv. 15. Hence false prophets, bad men who found it worth while to affect to be good, crowded the courts of princes. Jezebel, an idolatress, had four hundred prophets of Baal; and Ahab, a pretended worshipper of Jehovah, had as many pretended prophets of his own profession. 2 Chron. xviii. 5.

When the Jews were carried captive into Babylon, the prophets who were with them inculcated the principles of religion, and endeavoured to possess their minds with an aversion to idolatry; and to the success of preaching we may attribute the reconversion of the Jews to the belief and worship of one God—a conversion that remains to this day. The Jews have since fallen into horrid crimes, but they have never since this period lapsed into idolatry. Hos. ii. 3; Ezek. ii. 3, iii. 4. There were not wanting, however, multitudes of false prophets among them, whose characters are strikingly delineated by the true prophets, and which the reader may see in the 13th chapter of Ezekiel, 56th of Isaiah, and 23d of Jeremiah. When the seventy years of the captivity were expired, the good prophets and preachers, Zerubbabel, Joshua, Haggai, and others, having confidence in the word of God, and aspiring after their natural, civil, and religious rights, endeavoured by all means to extricate themselves and their countrymen from that mortifying state into which the crimes of their ancestors had brought them. They wept, fasted, prayed, preached, prophesied, and at length prevailed. The chief instruments were Nehemiah and Ezra: the first was governor, and reformed their civil state; the last was a scribe of the law of the God of heaven, and addressed himself to ecclesiastical matters, in which he rendered the noblest service to his country, and to all posterity. He collected and collated manuscripts of the Sacred Writings, and arranged and published the holy canon in its present form. To this he added a second work, as necessary as the former: he revived and new-modelled public preaching, and exemplified his plan in his own person. The Jews had almost lost in the seventy years' captivity their original language: that was now become dead; and they spoke a jargon made up of their own language and that of the Chaldeans and other nations with whom they had been confounded. Formerly preachers had only explained subjects; now they were obliged to explain words—words which, in the sacred code, were become obsolete, equivocal, or dead. Houses were now opened, not for ceremonial worship, as sacrificing, for this was confined to the temple; but for moral obedience, as praying, preaching, reading the law, divine worship, and social duties. These houses were called synagogues: the people repaired thither morning and evening for prayer; and on Sabbaths and festivals the law was read and expounded to them. We have a short but beautiful description of the manner of Ezra's first preaching. Neh. viii. Upwards of fifty thousand people assembled in a street, or large square, near the water-gate. It was early in the morning of a Sabbath-day. A pulpit of wood, in the fashion of a small tower, was placed there on purpose for the preacher; and this turret was supported by a scaffold, or temporary gallery, where, in a wing on the right hand of the pulpit, sat six of the principal preachers; and in another, on the left, seven. Thirteen other principal teachers, and many Levites, were present also on scaffolds erected for the purpose, alternately to officiate. When Ezra ascended the pulpit, he produced and opened the Book of the Law, and the whole congregation instantly rose up from their seats, and stood. Then he offered up prayer and praise to God, the people bowing their heads, and worshipping the Lord with their faces to the ground; and, at the close of the prayer, with uplifted hands, they solemnly pronounced, Amen, amen. Then, all standing, Ezra, assisted at times by the Levites, read the law distinctly, gave the sense, and caused them to understand the reading. The sermons delivered so affected the hearers, that they wept excessively; and about noon the sorrow became so exuberant and immeasurable, that it was thought necessary by the governor, the preacher, and the Levites, to restrain it. "Go your way," said they; "eat the fat, drink the sweet, send portions unto them for whom nothing is prepared." The wise and benevolent sentiments of these noble souls were imbibed by the whole congregation, and fifty thousand troubled hearts were calmed in a moment. Home they returned, to eat, to drink, to send portions, and to make mirth, because they had understood the words that were declared unto them. Plato was alive at this time, teaching dull philosophy to cold academics; but what was he, and what was Xenophon, or Demosthenes, or any of the pagan orators, in comparison with these men? From this period to that of the appearance of Jesus Christ, public preaching was universal: synagogues were multiplied, vast numbers attended, and elders and rulers were appointed for the purpose of order and instruction.

The most celebrated preacher that arose before the appearance of Jesus Christ, was John the Baptist. He was commissioned from heaven to be the harbinger of the Messiah. He took Elijah for his model; and as the times were very much like those in which that prophet lived, he chose a doctrine and a method very much resembling those of that venerable man. His subjects were few, plain, and important. His style was vehement, his images bold, his deportment solemn, his actions eager, and his morals strict; but this bright morning star gave way to the illustrious Sun of Righteousness, who now arose on a benighted world. Jesus Christ certainly was the most sublime of preachers. Who but can admire the simplicity and majesty of his style, the beauty of his images, the alternate softness and severity of his address, the choice of his subjects, the gracefulness of his deportment, and the indefatigableness of his zeal? Let the reader charm and solace himself in the study and contemplation of the character, excellency, and dignity of this best of preachers, as he will find them delineated by the evangelists.

The apostles exactly copied their divine Master. They formed multitudes of religious societies, and were abundantly successful in their labours. They confined their attention to religion, and left the school to dispute, and politicians to intrigue. The doctrines they preached they supported entirely by evidence; and neither had nor required such assistance as human laws or worldly policy, the eloquence of the schools or the terror of arms, could afford them.

The apostles being dead, every thing came to pass as they had foretold. The whole Christian system underwent a melancholy change: preaching shared the fate of other institutions, and this glory of the primitive Church was now generally degenerated. Those writers whom we call the Fathers, however held up to view by some as models of imitation, do not deserve that indiscriminate praise ascribed to them. Christianity, it is true, is found in their writings; but how sadly incorporated with Pagan philosophy and Jewish allegory! It must, indeed, be allowed, that, in general, the simplicity of Christianity was maintained, though under gradual decay, during the first three centuries. The next five centuries produced many pious and excellent preachers both in the Latin and Greek Churches, though the doctrine continued to degenerate. The Greek pulpit was adorned with some eloquent orators. Basil, bishop of Cæsarea; John Chrysostom, preacher at Antioch, and afterwards patriarch (as he was called) of Constantinople; and Gregory Nazianzen, who all flourished in the fourth century, seem to have led the fashion of preaching in the Greek Church: Jerome and Augustine did the same in the Latin Church.

For some time, preaching was common to bishops, elders, deacons, and private brethren, in the primitive Church; in process, it was restrained to the bishop, and to such as he should appoint. They called the appointment ordination; and at last attached I know not what ideas of mystery and influence to the word, and of dominion to the bishop who pronounced it. When a bishop or preacher travelled, he claimed no authority to exercise the duties of his function, unless he were invited by the Churches where he attended public worship. The first preachers differed much in pulpit action. The greater part used very moderate and sober gesture. They delivered their sermons all extempore, while there were notaries who took down what they said. Sermons in those days were all in the vulgar tongue. The Greeks preached in Greek, the Latins in Latin. They did not preach by the clock (so to speak), but were short or long as they saw occasion, though an hour was about the usual time. Sermons were generally both preached and heard standing; but sometimes both speaker and auditors sat, especially the aged and the infirm. The fathers were fond of allegory; for Origen, that everlasting allegorizer, had set them the example. Before preaching, the preacher usually went into a vestry to pray, and afterwards to speak to such as came to salute him. He prayed with his eyes shut, in the pulpit. The first words the preacher uttered to the people, when he ascended the pulpit, were, "Peace be with you," or, "The love of our Lord Jesus Christ, the grace of God, and the fellowship of the Holy Ghost, be with you all;" to which the assembly at first added, "Amen;" and, in after times, they answered, "And with thy spirit." Degenerate, however, as these days were in comparison with those of the apostles, yet they were golden ages in comparison with the times that followed, when metaphysical reasonings, mystical divinity, yea, Aristotelian categories, and reading the lives of saints, were substituted in the place of sermons. The pulpit became a stage, where ludicrous priests obtained the vulgar laugh by the lowest kind of wit, especially at the festivals of Christmas and Easter.

But the glorious Reformation was the offspring of preaching, by which mankind were informed: there was a standard, and the religion of the times was put to trial by it. The avidity of the common people to read Scripture, and to hear it expounded, was wonderful: and the Papists were so fully convinced of the benefit of frequent public instruction, that they who were justly called "unpreaching prelates," and whose pulpits, to use an expression of Latimer, had been "bells without clappers" for many a long year, were obliged for shame to set up regular preaching again.

The Church of Rome has produced some great preachers since the Reformation, but not equal to the reformed preachers; and a question naturally arises here, which it would be unpardonable to pass over in silence, concerning the singular effect of the preaching of the reformed, which was general, national, universal reformation.

In the darkest times of Popery, there had arisen, now and then, some famous popular preachers, who had zealously inveighed against the vices of their times, and whose sermons had produced sudden and amazing effects on their auditors; but all these effects had died away with the preachers who produced them, and all things had gone back into the old state. Law, learning, commerce, society at large, had not been improved. Here a new scene opens: preachers arise less popular, perhaps less indefatigable and exemplary; their sermons produce less striking immediate effects; and yet their auditors go away, and agree by whole nations to reform.

Jerome Savonarola, Jerome Narni, Capistran, Connecte, and many others, had produced by their sermons great immediate effects. When Connecte preached, the ladies lowered their head-dresses, and committed quilled caps by hundreds to the flames. When Narni taught the populace in Lent, from the pulpits of Rome, half the city went from his sermons, crying along the streets, "Lord, have mercy upon us! Christ, have mercy upon us!" so that in only one passion-week, two thousand crowns' worth of ropes were sold to make scourges with; and when he preached before the pope to cardinals and bishops, and painted the crime of non-residence in its own colours, he frightened thirty or forty bishops who heard him instantly home to their dioceses. In the pulpit of the University of Salamanca, he induced eight hundred students to quit all worldly prospects of honour, riches, and pleasures, and to become penitents in divers monasteries. Some of this class were martyrs too. We know the fate of Savonarola, and more might be added; but all lamented the momentary duration of the effects produced by their labours. Narni himself was so disgusted with his office, that he renounced preaching, and shut himself up in his cell to mourn over his irreclaimable contemporaries; for bishops went back to court, and rope-makers lay idle again.

Our reformers taught all the good doctrines which had been taught by these men, and they added two or three more, by which they laid the axe to the root of apostasy, and produced general reformation. Instead of appealing to popes, and canons, and founders, and fathers, they only quoted them, and referred their auditors to the Holy Scriptures for law. Pope Leo X. did not know this when he told Prierio, who complained of Luther's heresy, "Friar Martin had a fine genius!" They also taught the people what little they knew of Christian liberty; and so led them into a belief that they might follow their own ideas in religion, without the consent of a confessor, a diocesan, a pope, or a council. They went further, and laid the stress of all religion on justifying faith. This obliged the people to get acquainted with Christ, the object of their faith; and thus they were led into the knowledge of a character altogether different from what they saw in their old guides—a character which it is impossible to know, and not to admire and imitate. The old Papal popular sermons had gone off like a charge of gunpowder, producing only a fright, a bustle, and a black face; but those of the neue learninge, as the monks called them, were small hearty seeds, which, being sown in the honest hearts of the multitude, and watered with the dew of heaven, softly vegetated, and imperceptibly unfolded blossoms and fruits of inestimable value.

These eminent servants of Christ excelled in various talents, both in the pulpit and in private. Knox came down like a thunder-storm; Calvin resembled a whole day's set rain; Beza was a shower of the softest dew. Old Latimer, in a coarse frieze gown, trudged afoot, his Testament hanging at one end of his leathern girdle, and his spectacles at the other, and without ceremony instructed the people in rustic style from a hollow tree; while the courtly Ridley, in satin and fur, taught the same principles in the cathedral of the metropolis. Cranmer, though a timorous man, ventured to give King Henry VIII. a New Testament, with the label, "Whoremongers and adulterers God will judge;" while Knox, who said "there was nothing in the pleasant face of a lady to affray him," assured the Queen of Scots, that, "if there were any spark of the Spirit of God, yea, of honesty and wisdom in her, she would not be offended with his affirming, in his sermons, that the diversions of her court were diabolical crimes—evidences of impiety or insanity." These men were not all accomplished scholars; but they all gave proof enough that they were honest, hearty, and disinterested in the cause of religion.

All Europe produced great and excellent preachers; and some of the more studious and sedate reduced the art of public preaching to a system, and taught rules of a good sermon. Bishop Wilkins enumerated, in 1646, upwards of sixty who had written on the subject. Several of these are valuable treatises, full of edifying instructions; but all are on a scale too large, and, by affecting to treat of the whole office of a minister, leave that capital branch, public preaching, unfinished and vague.

One of the most important articles of pulpit science, that which gives life and energy to all the rest, and without which all the rest are nothing but a vain parade, is either neglected or exploded in all these treatises. It is essential to the ministration of the divine Word by public preaching, that preachers be allowed to form principles of their own, and that their sermons contain their real sentiments, the fruits of their own intense thought and meditation. Preaching cannot be in a good state in those communities where the shameful traffic of buying and selling manuscript sermons is carried on. Moreover, all the animating encouragements that arise from a free, unbiassed choice of the people, and from their uncontaminated, disinterested applause, should be left open to stimulate a generous youth to excel. Command a man to utter what he has no inclination to propagate, and what he does not even believe; threaten him, at the same time, with all the miseries of life, if he dare to follow his own ideas, and to declare his own sentiments, and you pass a sentence of death on all he says. He does declaim, but all is languid and cold, and he lays his system out as an undertaker does the dead.

Since the reformers, we have had multitudes who have entered into their views with disinterestedness and success; and, in the present times, both in Europe and in America, names could be mentioned which would do honour to any pulpit: for though there are too many who do not fill up that important station with proportionate piety and talent, yet we have men who are conspicuous for their extent of knowledge, depth of experience, originality of thought, fervency of zeal, consistency of deportment, and great usefulness in the Christian Church. May their numbers still be increased, and their exertions in the cause of truth be eminently crowned with the divine blessing!

PREACHING FRIARS. See DOMINICANS.

PRECEPT, a rule given by a superior; a direction or command. The precepts of religion, says Saurin, are as essential as the doctrines: and religion will as certainly sink if the morality be subverted, as if the theology be undermined. The doctrines are only proposed to us as the ground of our duty. See DOCTRINE—LAW.

PRECISIANS. This was a term of reproach applied to the Puritans in the days of Cromwell, because of the scrupulous strictness and precision of their moral conduct, which was in general so exemplary, and at the same time so completely opposed to the maxims and manners of the age in which they lived, that the men of the world regarded them as unwarrantably precise, and often subjected them to unworthy treatment.

PREDESTINARIANS, those who believe in predestination. See next article.

PREDESTINATION. The word "predestinate" is of Latin original (prædestino), and signifies in that tongue to deliberate beforehand with one's self how one shall act, and, in consequence of such deliberation, to form a settled plan, or predetermine where, when, how, and by whom anything shall be done, and to what end it shall be done. So the Greek word proōrizō, which exactly answers to the English word predestinate, and is rendered by it (Acts iv. 28; Rom. viii. 29, 30; 1 Cor. ii. 7; Eph. i. 5, 11), signifies to resolve what shall be done, and before the thing resolved on is actually effected, to appoint it to some certain use, and direct it to some determinate end. (See DECREES OF GOD.)

This doctrine has been the occasion of considerable disputes and controversies among divines. On the one side it has been observed, that it is impossible to reconcile it with our ideas of the justice and goodness of God, that it makes God to be the author of sin, destroys moral distinction, and renders all our efforts useless.

Predestinarians deny these consequences, and refer, in proof of this doctrine, to the consideration of the perfections of the divine nature, and to Scripture testimony. If his knowledge, say they, be infinite and unchangeable, he must have known everything from eternity. If we allow the attribute of prescience, the idea of a decree must certainly be believed also; for how can an action that is really to come to pass be foreseen, if it be not determined either to do or to suffer it? God knew everything from the beginning; but this he could not have known if he had not so determined it. If, also, God be infinitely wise, it cannot be conceived that he would leave things at random, and have no plan. He is a God of order, and this order he observes as strictly in the moral as the natural world, however confused things may appear to us. To conceive otherwise of God, is to degrade him, and is an insult to his perfections. If he, then, be wise and unchangeable, no new idea or purpose can arise in his mind; no alteration of his plan can take place, upon condition of his creatures acting in this or that way. (See FOREKNOWLEDGE—PRESCIENCE.)

To say that this doctrine makes God the author of sin, is not justifiable. We all allow omnipotence to be an attribute of Deity, and that by this attribute he could have prevented sin from entering into the world, had he chosen it; yet we see he did not. Now he is no more the author of sin in one case than the other. May we not ask, Why does he suffer those inequalities of providence? why permit whole nations to lie in idolatry for ages? why leave men to the most cruel barbarities? why punish the sins of the fathers in the children? in a word, why permit the world at large, to be subject to pains, crosses, losses, evils of every kind, and that for so many thousands of years? And yet, will any dare call the Deity unjust? The fact is, our finite minds know but little of the ways of God. Rom. xi. 33-36.

But, supposing there are difficulties in this subject, (and what subject is without them?) the Scripture abounds with passages which at once prove the doctrine. Matt. xxv. 34; Rom. viii. 29, 30; Eph. i. 3, 6, 11; 2 Tim. i. 9; 2 Thess. ii. 13; 1 Pet. i. 1, 2; John vi. 37, xvii. 2-24; Rev. xiii. 8, xvii. 8; Dan. iv. 35; 1 Thess. v. 19; Matt. xi. 26; Exod. iv. 21; Prov. xvi. 4; Acts xiii. 48.

The moral uses of this doctrine are these: (1.) It hides pride from man. (2.) Excludes the idea of chance. (3.) Exalts the grace of God. (4.) Renders salvation certain. (5.) Affords believers great consolation. See DECREES OF GOD—ELECTION.

PRE-EMINENCE, higher power and honour. In all things, in nature, in person, in office, work, power, and honour, Christ has the pre-eminence above angels and men, or any other creature. Col. i. 18. A man has no pre-eminence above a beast as to his body; he is liable to the same diseases and death. Eccles. iii. 19.

PRE-EXISTENCE OF JESUS CHRIST, is his existence before he was born of the Virgin Mary. That he really did exist before, is plain from John iii. 13, vi. 50-65, xvii. 1, viii. 58; 1 John i. 3; but there have been different opinions respecting this existence.

Dr. Watts supposes, that the doctrine of the pre-existence of the soul of Christ explains dark and difficult Scriptures, and discovers many beauties and proprieties of expression in the Word of God, which on any other plan lie unobserved. For instance, in Col. i. 15, Christ is described as the image of the invisible God, the first-born of every creature. His being the image of the invisible God cannot refer merely to his divine nature; for that is as invisible in the Son as in the Father: therefore it seems to refer to his pre-existent soul in union with the Godhead. Again, when man is said to be created in the image of God (Gen. i. 26), it may refer to the God-man—to Christ in his pre-existent state. God says, "Let us make man in our image, after our likeness." The word is redoubled, perhaps, to intimate that Adam was made in the likeness of the human soul of Christ, as well as that he bore something of the image and resemblance of the divine nature.

On the other side it is affirmed, that this doctrine of the pre-existence of the human soul of Christ weakens and subverts that of his personality. (1.) A pure intelligent spirit, say they, the first, the most ancient, and the most excellent of creatures, created before the foundation of the world, so exactly resembles the second person of the Arian Trinity, that it is impossible to show the least difference, except in name. (2.) The pre-existent intelligence supposed in this doctrine is so confounded with those other intelligences called angels, that there is great danger of mistaking this human soul for an angel, and so of making the person of Christ to consist of three natures. (3.) If Jesus Christ had nothing in common like the rest of mankind, except a body, how could this semi-conformity make him a real man? (4.) The passages quoted in proof of the pre-existence of the human soul of Jesus Christ are of the same sort with those which others allege in proof of the pre-existence of all human souls. (5.) This opinion, by ascribing the dignity of the work of redemption to his sublime human soul, detracts from the deity of Christ, and renders the last as passive as the first active. (6.) This notion is contrary to Scripture. Paul says, in all things it behoved him to be made like his brethren: he partook of all our infirmities, except sin. Luke says, he increased in stature and in wisdom. Heb. ii. 17; Luke ii. 52. See JESUS CHRIST.

PREPARE—(1.) To make ready. Josh. i. 11. (2.) To fit and qualify. Rom. ix. 23. (3.) To appoint. Matt. xx. 23. (4.) To direct, establish. 1 Chron. xxix. 18. God prepares mercy and truth for men when he graciously fulfils his promises and blesses them. Ps. lxi. 7. To prepare the way of the Lord Jesus, is to consider the predictions concerning him, lay aside every prejudice against him, and readily receive him as the promised Messiah and Saviour of the world. Isa. xl. 3. To prepare the heart, is to mortify its various lusts, and put it into a frame of holy submission to, and earnest longing for, a God in Christ. 1 Sam. vii. 3; 1 Chron. xxix. 18. The preparation of the heart and the answer of the tongue are both from the Lord: the arranging and fixing of the thoughts and inclinations of the heart about civil, and much more about spiritual things, and the giving ability to speak readily, distinctly, and to edification, are from the Lord, as his free gift and effectual work. Prov. xvi. 1. The preparation day on which Christ suffered was not the preparation of the passover, for that was the day before, but for the Sabbath of the passover week. Matt. xxvii. 62; John xix. 14.

PRESBYTER. See next article; and articles BISHOP—DEACON—ELDER.

PRESBYTERIANISM. The title "Presbyterian" comes from the Greek word presbuteros, which signifies senior or elder, intimating that the government of the Church in the New Testament was by presbyteries; that is, by associations of ministers and ruling elders, possessed all of equal powers, without any superiority among them, either in office or order. The Presbyterians believe that the authority of their ministers to preach the gospel, to administer the sacraments of baptism and the Lord's supper, and to feed the flock of Christ, is derived from the Holy Ghost by the imposition of the hands of the presbytery; and they oppose the Independent scheme of the common rights of Christians by the same arguments which are used for that purpose by the Episcopalians. They affirm, however, that there is no order in the Church, as established by Christ and his apostles, superior to that of presbyters; that all ministers, being ambassadors of Christ, are equal by their commission; that presbyter and bishop, though different words, are of the same import; and that Prelacy was gradually established upon the primitive practice of making the moderator, or speaker of the presbytery, a permanent officer.

These positions they maintain against the Episcopalians by the following arguments: They observe, that the apostles planted Churches by ordaining bishops and deacons in every city; that the ministers, which in one verse are called bishops, are in the next, perhaps, denominated presbyters; that we nowhere read in the New Testament of bishops, presbyters, and deacons in any one Church; and that, therefore, we are under the necessity of concluding bishop and presbyter to be two names for the same Church officer. (See EPISCOPACY.)

"The identity of the office of bishop and presbyter being thus clearly established, it follows, that the presbyterate is the highest permanent office in the Church, and that every faithful pastor of a flock is successor to the apostles in every thing in which they were to have any successors. In the apostolic office there were, indeed, some things peculiar and extraordinary; such as their immediate call by Christ, their infallibility, their being witnesses of our Lord's resurrection, and their unlimited jurisdiction over the whole church. These powers and privileges could not be conveyed by imposition of hands to any successors, whether called presbyters or bishops; but as rulers or office-bearers in particular Churches, we have the confession of 'the very chiefest apostles,' Peter and John, that they were nothing more than presbyters or pastors. This being the case, the dispute which has been so warmly agitated concerning the validity of Presbyterian ordination may be soon decided; for if the ceremony of ordination be at all essential, it is obvious that such a ceremony performed by presbyters must be valid, as there is no higher order of ecclesiastics in the Church by whom it can be performed. Accordingly we find that Timothy himself, though said to be a bishop, was ordained by the laying on of the hands of a presbytery. At that ordination, indeed, Paul presided, but he could preside only as primus in paribus; for we have seen, that, as permanent officers in the Church of Christ, the apostles themselves were no more than presbyters. If the apostles' hands were imposed for any other purpose, it must have been to communicate those charismata, or miraculous gifts of the Holy Spirit, which were then so frequent, but which no modern presbyter or bishop will pretend to give, unless his understanding be clouded by the grossest ignorance, or perverted by the most frantic enthusiasm."

As to the Church government among the Scotch Presbyterians, no one is ignorant that, from the first dawn of the Reformation among us till the era of the Revolution, there was a perpetual struggle between the court and the people for the establishment of an Episcopal or a Presbyterian form. The former model of ecclesiastical polity was patronized by the house of Stuart, on account of the support which it gave to the prerogatives of the crown; the latter was the favourite of the majority of the people, not only on account of its superior claim to apostolical institution, but also because the laity are mixed with the clergy in Church judicatories, and the two orders, which under Episcopacy are kept so distinct, incorporated, as it were, into one body. (See CHURCH OF SCOTLAND.)

PRESBYTERIANS, UNITED. See UNITED PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH.

PRESCIENCE OF GOD is his foreknowledge, or that knowledge which God has of things to come. The doctrine of predestination is founded on the prescience of God, and on the supposition of all futurity being present to him. Properly speaking, indeed, prescience supposes that of predestination; for if we allow that God from all eternity foresaw all things, he must thus have foreseen them in consequence of his permitting or foreappointing them. Hence events are not certain merely because foreknown; but foreknown because antecedently certain on account of predetermining reasons. Some have denied that the prescience of God can extend to contingent events or moral actions. The prescience of a moral action, it is alleged, would destroy its contingent nature, and convert it into an absolute and determined certainty. Contingency, however, as applied to a moral action, means simply its freedom, and stands opposed, not to certainty, but necessity, or rather constraint. If Scripture speaks the truth, the omniscience of God comprehends his certain prescience of all events, however contingent, and the consequences of the contrary doctrine cannot be better described than in the following remarks by President Edwards: "It would follow from this notion (namely, that the Almighty doth not foreknow what will be the result of future contingencies), that as God is liable to be continually repenting what he has done, so he must be exposed to be constantly changing his mind and intentions as to his future conduct; altering his measures, relinquishing his old designs, and forming new schemes and projections. For his purposes, even as to the main parts of his scheme (namely, such as belong to the state of his moral kingdom), must be always liable to be broken, through want of foresight; and he must be continually putting his system to rights, as it gets out of order, through the contingency of the actions of moral agents: he must be a Being who, instead of being absolutely immutable, must necessarily be the subject of infinitely the most numerous acts of repentance, and changes of intention, of any being whatsoever; for this plain reason, that his vastly extensive charge comprehends an infinitely greater number of those things which are to him contingent and uncertain. In such a situation, he must have little else to do but to mend broken links as well as he can, and be rectifying the disjointed frame and disordered movements in the best manner the case will allow. The Supreme Lord of all things must needs be under great and miserable disadvantages in governing the world which he has made, and has the care of, through his being utterly unable to find out things of chief importance which hereafter shall befall his system, which, if he did but know, he might make seasonable provision for. In many cases there may be very great necessity that he should make provision, in the manner of his ordering and disposing things, for some great events which are to happen, of vast and extensive influence, and endless consequence to the universe; which he may see afterwards, when it is too late, and may wish in vain that he had known beforehand, that he might have ordered his affairs accordingly. And it is in the power of man, on these principles, by his devices, purposes, and actions, thus to disappoint God, break his measures, make him continually to change his mind, subject him to vexation, and bring him into confusion." See FOREKNOWLEDGE—DECREES OF GOD—PREDESTINATION.

PRESENT—(1.) At hand, and within view, as to place. 1 Sam. xiii. 15. (2.) Just now, as to time. 1 Cor. iv. 11. God is represented as present when he utters his mind, displays his glory, favour, or wrath, or some symbol of his presence: so he is represented as present in heaven (Ps. xvi. 11), in Canaan (Joel ii. 27), in the courts of the temple (Ps. c. 2), in the Church (Gen. iv. 16), in his noted providences (Isa. xix. 1, lxiv. 1), and in his ordinances and fellowship with her (Luke xiii. 26; Ps. li. 11). God in Christ is present with the saints in the ordinances of the gospel, in the influences of grace, and continued care of his outward providence. Ps. xlv. 1; Matt. xviii. 20. To be present with the Lord, is to be in heaven, enjoying the immediate view of his glory and fruition of his love. 2 Cor. v. 8. To be present in spirit, is to be near in respect of direction, will, and inclination. 1 Cor. v. 3. This present world is one abounding with fleshly delights, and with troubles, temptations, and corruptions. Tit. ii. 12. The present truth, is the truth greatly opposed, and which is so difficult, and yet much for the honour of Christ, to be cleaved to in principle and practice. 2 Pet. i. 12.

PRESENT—(1.) To show, and to arraign in the presence or view. 1 Sam. xvii. 16; Acts xxiii. 33. (2.) To offer (Matt. ii. 11); and so a present is a gift, rendered to testify regard or subjection, or to procure or confirm friendship. 1 Kings iv. 21; 2 Kings xvii. 3. It was customary in the East to propitiate enemies by making presents of cattle, as Jacob did at his dreaded interview with his injured brother; and also as a mode of doing homage to a superior. No mark of esteem is more common through all the Oriental regions than a present. It is even reckoned uncivil in that quarter of the world to make a visit without an offering in the hand. There is an evident allusion to this custom in Prov. xviii. 16: "A man's gift maketh room for him, and bringeth him before great men;" and in 1 Sam. ix. 7: "Then said Saul to his servant, But, behold, if we go, what shall we bring the man? for the bread is spent in our vessels, and there is not a present to bring to the man of God: what have we?" The presents made, on consulting a prophet or a seer, consisted usually of some kind of provisions. Thus, 2 Kings iv. 42: "And there came a man from Baal-shalisha, and brought the man of God bread of the first-fruits, twenty loaves of barley, and full ears of corn in the husk thereof: and he said, Give unto the people, that they may eat." And Jeroboam's present to Ahijah is thus described: "And take with thee ten loaves, and cracknels, and a cruse of honey, and go to him: he shall tell thee what shall become of the child." 1 Kings xiv. 3. Sometimes the presents, on such occasions, were of great value. The king of Syria sent a gift by Naaman of ten talents of silver, and six thousand pieces of gold, and ten changes of raiment. At the birth of the Saviour, the wise men from the East presented gold, and frankincense, and myrrh. Such presents were commonly made to a king, on his elevation to the throne. Accordingly, in describing the kingly government of Christ, it is said: "And he shall live, and to him shall be given of the gold of Sheba: prayer also shall be made for him continually; and daily shall he be praised." Ps. lxxii. 15. To these costly gifts presents of dresses were frequently added. Joseph gave to each of his brethren a change of raiment, but he gave five changes to Benjamin. Presents are commonly sent, even to persons in private station, with great ceremony and pomp. It is probably in allusion to some custom of this kind that it is said of Joseph's brethren: "And they made ready the present against Joseph came at noon." Taxes in Persia are commonly levied under the form of presents to the monarch. Hence it is said of Christ: "Vow, and pay unto the Lord your God: let all that be round about him bring presents unto him that ought to be feared." Ps. lxxvi. 11. Nay, gifts were sometimes presented yearly to great monarchs, in token of respect or admiration. Thus, 2 Chron. ix. 23, 24: "And all the kings of the earth sought the presence of Solomon, to hear his wisdom, that God had put in his heart. And they brought every man his present, vessels of silver, and vessels of gold, and raiment, harness, and spices, horses, and mules, a rate year by year." And to the same custom David alludes (Ps. lxxii. 10): "The kings of Tarshish and of the isles shall bring presents: the kings of Sheba and Seba shall offer gifts." Judges, in the East, are frequently bribed by presents; and kings have also been corrupted by the same means. Thus, 1 Kings xv. 18, 19: "Then Asa took all the silver and the gold that were left in the treasures of the house of the Lord, and the treasures of the king's house, and delivered them into the hand of his servants: and king Asa sent them to Benhadad, the son of Tabrimon, the son of Hezion, king of Syria, that dwelt at Damascus, saying, There is a league between me and thee, and between my father and thy father: behold, I have sent unto thee a present of silver and gold; come and break thy league with Baasha, king of Israel, that he may depart from me." Kings offer presents to Christ when they give their hearts to him, believing in and obeying him, and give up their people and wealth to his service. Ps. lxxii. 10. Ministers present their hearers as chaste virgins before Christ, when, by their means, they come to appear at his judgment-seat, sound in principle, lively in faith, single in affection to Christ, and holy in their lives and conversation.

PRESIDENT. The word rendered "president," in Dan. vi. 2, 3, signifies an overseer or superintendent.

PRESS. The wine-press constructed for expressing the juice of the grapes does not seem to be a movable implement in the East; and our Lord, in the parable of the vineyard, says expressly that it was formed by digging. Chardin found the wine-press in Persia was made after the same manner; it was a hollow place dug in the ground, and lined with mason work. Besides this, they had what the Romans called lacus, the lake, a large open place or vessel, which, by a conduit or spout, received the must from the wine-press. In very hot countries it was perhaps necessary, or at least convenient, to have the lake under ground, or in a cave hewed out of the rock for coolness, that the heat might not cause too great a fermentation, and sour the must.

In peaceful times, the press in which the grapes and olives were trodden was constructed in the vineyard; but in time of war and danger it was removed into the nearest city. This precaution the restored captives were reduced to the necessity of taking for their safety, at the time they were visited by Nehemiah. In a state of great weakness themselves, without an efficient government or means of defence, they were exposed to the hostile machinations of numerous and powerful enemies. For this reason, many of the Jews brought their grapes from the vineyards, and trod them in Jerusalem,—the only place of safety which the desolated country afforded. "In those days," said Nehemiah, "saw I in Judah, some treading wine-presses on the Sabbath, and bringing in sheaves and lading asses; and also wine grapes and figs, and all manner of burthens which they brought into Jerusalem on the Sabbath-day." Neh. xiii. 15. Had these wine-presses been at a distance from Jerusalem, Nehemiah, who so strictly observed the precept of resting on that day, would not have seen the violation of which he complains.

PRESUMPTION, as it relates to the mind, is a supposition formed before examination. As it relates to the conduct or moral action, it implies arrogance or irreverence. As it relates to religion in general, it is a bold and daring confidence in the goodness of God, without obedience to his will.

Presumptuous sins must be distinguished from sins of infirmity, or those failings peculiar to human nature (Eccles. vii. 20; 1 John i. 8, 9); from sins done through ignorance (Luke xii. 48); and from sins into which men are hurried by sudden and violent temptation (Gal. vi. 1). The ingredients which render sin presumptuous are—knowledge (John xv. 22), deliberation and contrivance (Prov. vi. 14; Ps. xxxvi. 4), obstinacy (Jer. xlv. 16; Deut. i. 43), inattention to the remonstrances of conscience (Acts vii. 51), opposition to the dispensations of Providence (2 Chron. xxviii. 22), and repeated commission of the same sin (Ps. lxxviii. 17).

Presumptuous sins are numerous—such as profane swearing, perjury, theft, adultery, drunkenness, Sabbath-breaking, &c. These may be more particularly considered as presumptuous sins, because they are generally committed against a known law, and so often repeated. Such sins are most heinous in their nature, and most pernicious in their effects. They are said to be a reproach to the Lord (Numb. xv. 30); they harden the heart (1 Tim. iv. 2); draw down judgments from heaven (Numb. xv. 31); even when repented of, they are seldom pardoned without some visible testimony of God's displeasure (2 Sam. xii. 10).

As it respects professors of religion, as one observes, they sin presumptuously—(1.) When they take up a profession of religion without principle; (2.) When they profess to ask the blessing of God, and yet go on in forbidden courses; (3.) When they do not take religion as they find it in the Scriptures; (4.) When they make their feelings the test of their religion, without considering the difference between animal passion and the operations of the Spirit of God; (5.) When they run into temptation; (6.) When they indulge in self-confidence and self-complacency; (7.) When they bring the spirit of the world into the Church; (8.) When they form apologies for that in some which they condemn in others; (9.) When, professing to believe in the doctrines of the Gospel, they live licentiously; (10.) When they create, magnify, and pervert their troubles; (11.) When they arraign the conduct of God as unkind and unjust.

PRÆTORIUM, the name of the Roman governor's house in Jerusalem. It was a magnificent building in the upper part of the city, which had been formerly Herod's palace, and from which there was an approach to the citadel Antonia, which adjoined to the temple. This the Roman procurators, whose ordinary residence was at Cæsarea, occupied when at Jerusalem. In front of this edifice was the tribunal on which the governor sat in his judicial capacity. Matt. xxvii. 27; Mark xv. 16; John xviii. 28, 33. Paul mentions also the palace or prætorium at Rome where he testified for Christ. Phil. i. 13.

PREVAIL—(1.) To have the advantage of, or power over. Judg. xvi. 5. (2.) To rise higher. Gen. xvii. 18, 19. Jesus prevailed to open the sealed book of his Father's purposes: he had sufficient knowledge and authority for that work. Rev. v. 5. The word of God prevails, when, by the Holy Ghost, it gains the attention of multitudes, converts them to Christ, and disposes them to lay aside their sinful practices. Acts xix. 20. Jacob's blessings, particularly of Joseph, prevailed above the blessings of his progenitors, in the extent of the plainness, and the nearness of their accomplishment. None of his seed were excluded from the blessing, as in the case of Abraham and Isaac. In his blessing, Canaan was particularly divided; and by the increase of his posterity there was a nearer prospect of their inheriting it. Gen. xlix. 26. Wicked men prevail, when permitted to act as they please in dishonouring God and afflicting his people. Ps. ix. 19. Iniquities prevail against a saint, when the apprehensions of his guilt greatly affright and distress him, or his powerful corruptions lead him, contrary to his inclination and the convictions of his judgment, to commit sin. Ps. lxxv. 3.

PREVENT—(1.) To come before one is expected or sought. Job xxx. 27. (2.) To go before, or be sooner. Ps. cxix. 147. One is happily prevented, when distress is hindered and favours come unasked (Job iii. 12; Ps. xviii. 18); or unhappily, when snares and afflictions come unexpected (2 Sam. xxii. 6).

PRIDE is inordinate and unreasonable self-esteem, attended with insolence and rude treatment of others.

1. "It is sometimes," says a good writer, confounded with vanity and sometimes with dignity; but to the former passion it has no resemblance, and in many circumstances it differs from the latter. Vanity is the parent of loquacious boasting; and the person subject to it, if his pretences be admitted, has no inclination to insult the company. The proud man, on the other hand, is naturally silent, and, wrapt up in his own importance, seldom speaks but to make his audience feel their inferiority." Pride is the high opinion that a poor, little, contracted soul entertains of itself. Dignity consists in just, great, and uniform actions, and is the opposite to meanness.

2. Pride manifests itself by praising ourselves, adorning our persons, attempting to appear before others in a superior light to what we are; contempt and slander of others; envy at the excellencies others possess; anxiety to gain applause; distress and rage when slighted; impatience of contradiction; and opposition to God himself.

3. The evil effects of pride are beyond computation. It has spread itself universally in all nations, among all characters; and as it was the first sin, as some suppose, that entered into the world, so it seems the last to be conquered. It may be considered as the parent of discontent, ingratitude, covetousness, poverty, presumption, passion, extravagance, bigotry, war, and persecution. In fact, there is hardly an evil perpetrated but what pride is connected with it in a proximate or remote sense.

4. To suppress this evil, we should consider what we are. "If we could trace our descents," says Seneca, "we should find all slaves to come from princes, and all princes from slaves. To be proud of knowledge, is to be blind in the light; to be proud of virtue, is to poison ourselves with the antidote; to be proud of authority, is to make our rise our downfall." The imperfection of our nature, our scanty knowledge, contracted powers, narrow conceptions, and moral inability, are strong motives to excite us to humility. We should consider, also, what punishments this sin has brought on mankind. See the cases of Pharaoh, Haman, Nebuchadnezzar, Herod, and others. How particularly is it prohibited (Prov. xvi. 18; 1 Pet. v. 5; James iv. 6; Prov. xxix. 23); what a torment is it to its possessor (Esth. v. 13); how soon all things of a sublunary nature will end; how disgraceful it renders us in the sight of God, angels, and men; what a barrier it is to our felicity and communion with God; how fruitful it is of discord; how it precludes our usefulness, and renders us really contemptible. See HUMILITY.

PRIEST, a person set apart for the performance of sacrifice, and other offices and ceremonies of religion. The office of the priesthood was originally vested in the first-born of every family. Afterwards a particular tribe, the Levites, was selected by God to discharge the priestly duties, and of this tribe a special family, that of Aaron, was alone entitled to fulfil the duties of the high-priest. There was a peculiar order of priesthood, the order of Melchisedec, which received direct appointment from God himself, and was designed to typify and represent the priesthood of the Lord Jesus Christ, who is said to be a priest for ever after the order of Melchisedec. In the Epistle to the Hebrews, the glory and excellency of the priesthood of Jesus, and its superiority to the priesthood under the Jewish economy, are set forth with the utmost clearness, Heb. v.-ix.

PRIMACY, the highest post in the Church. The Romanists contend that Peter, by our Lord's appointment, had a primacy or sovereign authority and jurisdiction over the apostles. This, however, is denied by the Protestants, and that upon just grounds.

Dr. Barrow observes, that there are several sorts of primacy which may belong to a person in respect of others. 1. A primacy of worth or personal excellency. 2. A primacy of reputation and esteem. 3. A primacy of order, or bare dignity and precedence. 4. A primacy of power and jurisdiction.

1. As for the first of these, a primacy of worth, we may well grant it to Peter, admitting that probably he did exceed the rest of his brethren in personal endowments and capacities; particularly in quickness of apprehension, boldness of spirit, readiness of speech, charity to our Lord, and zeal for his service.

2. As to a primacy of repute, which Paul means when he speaks of those who had a special reputation, of those who seemed to be pillars, of the super-eminent apostles (Gal. ii. 6-9; 2 Cor. xi. 5, xii. 11), this advantage cannot be refused him, being a necessary consequent of those eminent qualities resplendent in him, and of the illustrious performances achieved by him beyond the rest. This may be inferred from that renown which he hath had from the beginning; and likewise from his being so constantly ranked in the first place before the rest of the brethren.

3. As to a primacy of order or bare dignity, importing that commonly, in all meetings and proceedings, the other apostles did yield him the precedence, this may be questioned; for this does not seem suitable to the gravity of such persons, or their condition and circumstances, to stand upon ceremonies of respect; for our Lord's rules seem to exclude all semblance of ambition, all kind of inequality and distance between his apostles. But yet this primacy may be granted as probable upon divers accounts of use and convenience; it might be useful to preserve order, and to promote expedition, or to prevent confusion, distraction, and dilatory obstruction in the management of things.

4. As to a primacy importing a superiority in command, power, or jurisdiction, this we have great reason to deny, upon the following considerations:—(1.) For such a power it was needful that a commission from God, its founder, should be granted in absolute and perspicuous terms; but no such commission is extant in Scripture. (2.) If so illustrious an office was instituted by our Saviour, it is strange, that nowhere in the evangelical or apostolical history there should be any express mention of that institution. (3.) If Peter had been instituted sovereign of the apostolical senate, his office and state had been in nature and kind very distinct from the common office of the other apostles, as the office of a king from the office of any subject; and probably would have been signified by some distinct name, as that of arch-apostle, arch-pastor, the vicar of Christ, or the like; but no such name or title was assumed by him, or was by the rest attributed to him. (4.) There was no office above that of an apostle known to the apostles or primitive Church. Eph. iv. 11; 1 Cor. xii. 28. (5.) Our Lord himself declared against this kind of primacy, prohibiting his apostles to affect, to seek, to assume, or admit a superiority of power, one above another. Luke xxii. 14, 24; Mark ix. 35. (6.) We do not find any peculiar administration committed to Peter, nor any privilege conferred on him which was not also granted to the other apostles. John xx. 23; Mark xvi. 15. (7.) When Peter wrote two catholic epistles, there does not appear in either of them any intimation or any pretence to this arch-apostolical power. (8.) In all relations which occur in Scripture about controversies incident to doctrine or practice, there is no appeal made to Peter's judgment or allegation of it as decisive—no argument is built on his authority. (9.) Peter nowhere appears intermeddling as a judge or governor paramount in such cases; yet where he doth himself deal with heretics and disorderly persons, he proceedeth not as a pope, decreeing, but as an apostle, warning, arguing, and persuading against them. (10.) The consideration of the apostles proceeding in the conversion of people, in the foundation of Churches, and in administration of their spiritual affairs, will exclude any probability of Peter's jurisdiction over them. They went about their business, not by order or license from Peter, but according to special direction of God's Spirit. (11.) The nature of the apostolic ministry (their not being fixed in one place or residence, but continually moving about the world), the state of things at that time, and the manner of Peter's life, render it unlikely that he had such a jurisdiction over the apostles as some assign him. (12.) It was indeed most requisite that every apostle should have a complete, absolute, independent authority in managing the duties and concerns of the office, that he might not any wise be obstructed in the discharge of them, not clogged with a need to consult others, not hampered with orders from those who were at a distance. (13.) The discourse and behaviour of Paul towards Peter do evidence that he did not acknowledge any dependence on him, or any subjection to him. Gal. ii. 11. (14.) If Peter had been appointed sovereign of the Church, it seems that it should have been requisite that he should have outlived all the apostles; for otherwise, the Church would have wanted a head, or there must have been an inextricable controversy who that head was. But Peter died long before John, as all agree, and perhaps before divers others of the apostles.

From these arguments, we must see what little ground the Church of Rome hath to derive the supremacy of the pope from the supposed primacy of Peter.

PRIMATE, an archbishop who is invested with a jurisdiction over other bishops. See ARCHBISHOP.

PRIMITIVE CHRISTIANS, those who lived in the first ages of Christianity, especially the apostles and immediate followers of our Lord.

PRINCE is sometimes taken for the chief, the principal; as the princes of the families, of the tribes, of the houses of Israel; the princes of the Levites, of the people, of the priests; the princes of the synagogue, or assembly; the princes of the children of Reuben, of Judah, &c. Also, for the king, the sovereign of a country, and his principal officers; the princes of the army of Pharaoh; Phicol, prince of the army of Abimelech.

For the transgression of a land its princes are many; the pretenders to royalty or high power are numerous, and are soon cut off. Prov. xxviii. 2. The princes and thousands of Judah denote the same thing, the governor being put for the governed, or whole body. Matt. ii. 6; Mic. v. 2. God is called the Prince of the host, and Prince of princes; he rules over all, and in a peculiar manner was the governor of the Jewish nation. Dan. viii. 11, 25. Jesus Christ is the Prince of the kings of the earth; in his person he surpasses every creature in excellence, and he bestows rule and authority on men as he sees fit. Rev. i. 5. He is the Prince of life; as God, he is the author and disposer of all life, temporal, spiritual, and eternal; as Mediator, he purchases, bestows, and brings men to everlasting happiness. Acts iii. 15. He is the Prince of peace; he is the God of peace; he purchased peace for guilty man; he made peace between Jews and Gentiles; he left peace to his disciples and people; and he governs his Church in the most peaceful manner. Isa. ix. 6.

The "prince of this world" is the devil, who boasts of having all the kingdoms of the earth at his disposal. John xii. 31, xiv. 30, xvi. 11.

PRINCIPALITY. (1.) Royal state, or the attire of the head marking the same. Jer. xiii. 18. (2.) Chief rulers. Tit. iii. 1. (3.) Good angels. Eph. i. 21, iii. 10. (4.) Bad angels. Eph. vi. 12; Col. ii. 15.

PRINCIPLE, an essential truth from which others are derived; the ground or motive of action. See DISPOSITION—DOCTRINE.

PRIOR, the head of a convent; next in dignity to an abbot.

PRISCILLA, or PRISCA (2 Tim. iv. 19), a Christian woman, well known in the Acts, and in Paul's Epistles; sometimes placed before her husband Aquila. Their house was so thoroughly Christianized, that Paul calls it a Church. See AQUILA.

PRISON, a place for confining evil-doers. Luke xxiii. 19. To it are compared whatever tends to restrict liberty, and render a person disgraceful and wretched; as (1.) A low, obscure, and afflicted condition. Eccles. iv. 14. (2.) The state of restraint in which God keeps Satan from seducing mankind. Rev. xx. 7. (3.) The state of spiritual thralldom in which sinners are kept by the curse of the law, and by Satan and their own lusts. Isa. xlii. 7. (4.) Custody out of which men cannot move, and in which they are shut up as evil-doers. Isa. liii. 8. Perhaps in allusion to this David calls the cave in which he was, as if one buried alive, a prison. Ps. cxlii. 7. (5.) Hell, where damned sinners are shamefully and miserably, but securely, confined. 1 Pet. iii. 19. Such as are shut up in any of these, or are in a captive condition, are called prisoners. Isa. xlix. 9; Ps. lxxix. 33; Job iii. 18. There were two prisons in Jerusalem; of which one was called the king's prison, which had a lofty tower that overlooked the royal palace, with a spacious court before it, where state prisoners were confined. The other was designed to secure debtors and other inferior offenders; and in both these the prisoners were supported by the public on bread and water. Sometimes a part of the house which was occupied by the great officers of state was converted into a prison. Thus Joseph was put in prison in the house of Potiphar, in Egypt; and it is said also, in Jer. xxxvii. 15: "Wherefore the princes were wroth with Jeremiah, and smote him, and put him in prison in the house of Jonathan the scribe; for they had made that the prison." The royal prison in Jerusalem, and especially the dungeon into which the prisoner was let down naked, seems to have been a most dreadful place, probably an old well. Hence, Jer. xxxviii. 6: "Then took they Jeremiah, and cast him into the dungeon of Malchiah the son of Hammelech, that was in the court of the prison: and they let down Jeremiah with cords. And in the dungeon there was no water, but mire: so Jeremiah sunk in the mire." And to these empty wells being used as prisons, Zechariah (ix. 11) alludes: "As for thee also, by the blood of thy covenant I have sent forth thy prisoners out of the pit wherein is no water."

PRISONER. This word is found in Ps. lxxix. 11: "Let the sighing of the prisoner come before thee; according to the greatness of thy power preserve thou those that are appointed to die." When we think of the miserable condition of an Oriental prisoner, and the harshness and severity with which he is treated, we need not be surprised to find the sighing of the prisoner spoken of so strongly.

PRIZE. The word thus translated, in 1 Cor. ix. 24, refers to the reward which was bestowed on the victors in the public games of the Greeks. The prize was generally a wreath or crown, which is evidently adverted to in 2 Tim. iv. 8: "Henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness, which the Lord, the righteous Judge, shall give me at that day; and not to me only, but unto all them also that love his appearing;" and Phil iii. 14: "I press toward the mark for the prize of the high calling in Christ Jesus." In this last passage, there is an allusion to the circumstance that the prizes were placed in a conspicuous situation, for the purpose of animating the competitors, by having them always in their sight.

PROBATION, MORAL, that state in which the character of men is formed and developed in action preparatory to judgment. It is the state antecedent to a state of retribution. More strictly speaking, moral probation is that experimental trial which lays the foundation for approbation or disapprobation, praise or blame, reward or punishment. It involves obligations to obedience; exposure to temptations; commands and prohibitions; promises, on the one hand, to encourage to duty; threatenings, on the other, to deter from sin; with a certainty of final retribution according to the character produced under these various means, and visibly proved by the course of action pursued by the individual. This is the state which is denominated moral probation; and in such a state is mankind under the law of God, and the mediatorial reign of Christ; or, in the customary language of the New Testament, under the kingdom of heaven. Matt. xiii. 10-52. See MORAL AGENCY—MORAL OBLIGATION—RESPONSIBILITY—RETRIBUTION, FUTURE.

PROBITY, honesty, sincerity, or veracity. "It consists in the habit of actions useful to society, and in the constant observance of the laws which justice and conscience impose upon us. The man who obeys all the laws of society with an exact punctuality, is not, therefore, a man of probity; laws can only respect the external and definite parts of human conduct; but probity respects our more private actions, and such as it is impossible in all cases to define; and it appears to be in morals what charity is in religion. Probity teaches us to perform in society those actions which no external power can oblige us to perform, and is that quality in the human mind from which we claim the performance of the rights commonly called imperfect."

PROCESSION OF THE HOLY GHOST, a term made use of in reference to the Holy Ghost, as proceeding from the Father, or from the Father and the Son. It is founded on that passage in John xv. 26: "When the Comforter is come, whom I will send unto you from the Father, even the Spirit of Truth, which proceedeth from the Father, he shall testify of me." See also 1 Cor. ii. 12. This procession is here evidently distinguished from his mission; for it is said: "Whom I will send to you from the Father, even the Spirit of Truth which proceeds from the Father."

Dr. Watts, indeed, observes, that the procession of the Holy Ghost from the Father, respects not his nature or substance, but his mission only; and that as no distinct and clear ideas can be formed of this procession, it must be given up as Popish, scholastic, inconceivable, and indefensible. But it is answered, What clear idea can be given us of the original, self-existent, eternal being of the Father? Shall we, therefore, deny him to be without beginning or end, and to be self-existent, because we know not how he is so? If not, why must we give up the procession of the Spirit, because we know not the mode of it? We can no more explain the manner how the Spirit proceeds from the Father, than we can explain the eternal generation and hypostatical union of the two natures of the Son. We may say to the objector, as Gregory Nazianzen said to his adversary: "Do you tell me how the Father is unbegotten, and I will attempt to tell you how the Son is begotten, and the Spirit proceeds."

About the eighth and ninth centuries, there was a very warm dispute between the Greek and Latin Churches, whether the Spirit proceeded from the Father only, or from the Father and the Son; and the controversy arose to such a height, that they charged one another with heresy and schism, when neither side well understood what they contended for. The Latin Church, however, has not scrupled to say that the Spirit proceeds from the Father and the Son; but the Greek Church chooses to express it thus: The Spirit proceeds from the Father, by or through the Son, or he receives of the Son. Gal. iv. 6. See HOLY GHOST.

PROCHORUS, one of the seven primitive deacons of the Church at Jerusalem; but little or nothing is known concerning him.

PROCLAMATION. The decrees of Eastern monarchs were usually proclaimed by public criers or heralds. 1 Kings xv. 22; Jer. l. 29.

PRODIGAL, one who is profuse, wasteful, and extravagant. The case of an individual of this character forms the groundwork of one of the most beautiful, interesting, and instructive of our Lord's parables, Luke xv. There are various points in this narrative which it may be important to notice. It may appear strange that the father should have yielded to the wishes of the self-willed youth, but the truth is, that according to the principles or practice of Eastern law, he had no alternative but to make, when required by his family, a division of his property. The depth to which the profligate young man degraded himself is described by his becoming a swine-herd, an occupation which, when we take into account the rooted aversion of the Jews to swine, may well be regarded as of the lowest kind. In illustration of the latter part of the parable, in which the father and the whole family are represented as engaging in joyful festivities, in celebration of the prodigal's return, it may be remarked that similar instances of feasting are not unfrequent at this day in Oriental families, when almost invariably a hired company of musicians and dancers are present for the entertainment of the guests.

PROFANE, a term used in opposition to holy. A person is said to be guilty of profaning sacred things when he treats them with irreverence. But in common use the word profane is frequently applied to express that which is simply not sacred; thus profane history implies all history that is not included in the Bible.

PROFESSION. Christians are required to make a profession of their faith,—(1.) Boldly. Rom. i. 16. (2.) Explicitly. Matt. v. 16. (3.) Constantly. Heb. x. 23. (4.) Yet not ostentatiously, but with humility and meekness. Among the Romanists, it denotes the entering into a religious order, whereby a person offers himself to God by a vow of inviolably observing obedience, chastity, and poverty.

PROFESSOR, a term commonly used, in the religious world, to denote any person who makes an open acknowledgment of the religion of Christ, or who outwardly manifests his attachment to Christianity. All real Christians are professors, but all professors are not real Christians. In this, as in all other things of worth and importance, we find counterfeits. There are many who become professors, not from principle, from investigation, from love to the truth, but from interested motives, prejudice of education, custom, influence of connections, novelty, &c.—as Saul, Jehu, Judas, Demas, the foolish virgins, &c. See CHRISTIAN.

PROGNOSTICATORS. We find in Isa. xlvii 13, these words: "Thou art wearied in the multitude of thy counsels. Let now the astrologers, the star-gazers, the monthly prognosticators, stand up and save thee from these things that shall come upon thee." On the margin, the words in the Hebrew, here translated "monthly prognosticators," are rendered, "that give knowledge concerning the months;" and thus seem to point to a class of astrologers who professed to predict the events which were to happen in each month, like our own almanac-makers. See ASTROLOGY—DIVINATION.

PROMISE, is a solemn asseveration, by which one pledges his veracity that he shall perform, or cause to be performed, the thing which he mentions.

The obligation of promises arises from the necessity of the well-being and existence of society. "Virtue requires," as Dr. Doddridge observes, "that promises be fulfilled. The promisee—that is, the person to whom the promise is made—acquires a property in virtue of the promise. The uncertainty of property would evidently be attended with great inconvenience. By failing to fulfil my promise, I either show that I was not sincere in making it, or that I have little constancy or resolution, and either way injure my character, and consequently my usefulness in life.

"Promises, however, are not binding,—(1.) If they were made by us before we came to such exercise of reason as to be fit to transact affairs of moment; or if by any distemper or sudden surprise we are deprived of the exercise of our reason at the time when the promise is made. (2.) If the promise was made on a false presumption, in which the promiser, after the most diligent inquiry, was imposed upon, especially if he were deceived by the fraud of the promisee. (3.) If the thing itself be vicious; for virtue cannot require that vice should be committed. (4.) If the accomplishment of the promise be so hard and intolerable, that there is reason to believe that, had it been foreseen, it would have been an excepted case. (5.) If the promise be not accepted, or if it depend on conditions not performed."

PROMISES OF GOD, are the kind declarations of his Word, in which he hath assured us he will bestow blessings upon his people. The promises contained in the Sacred Scriptures may be considered—

(1.) Divine as to their origin. (2.) Suitable as to their nature. (3.) Abundant as to their number. (4.) Clear as to their expression. (5.) Certain as to their accomplishment. The consideration of them should prove—(1.) An antidote to despair. (2.) A motive to patience. (3.) A call for prayer. (4.) A spur to perseverance.

PROOF, trial, temptation. God proved the Israelites, to see if they would walk in his ways. Exod. xx. 20. After he had proved and afflicted them, he had pity on them. Deut. viii. 16. As gold and silver are tried in the furnace, so God proves the heart. Prov. xvii. 3.

PROPHECY, a word derived from propheteia, and in its original import signifies the prediction of future events. It is thus defined by Witsius: "A knowledge and manifestation of secret things, which a man knows not from his own sagacity, nor from the relation of others, but by an extraordinary revelation of God from heaven." It is prophecy according to this definition we shall here consider.

Prophecy (with the power of working miracles) may be considered as the highest evidence that can be given of a supernatural communion with the Deity. The ways by which the Deity made known his mind were various; such as by dreams, visions, angels, symbolic representations, impulses on the mind. Numb. xii. 6; Jer. xxxi. 26; Dan. viii. 16, 17. Hence, among the professors of almost every religious system, there have been numberless pretenders to the gift of prophecy. Pagans had their oracles, augurs, and soothsayers; modern idolaters their necromancers and diviners; and the Jews, Christians, and Mohammedans, their prophets. The pretensions of pagans and impostors have, however, been justly exposed; while the Jewish and Christian prophecies carry with them evident marks of their validity.

I. As to the language of prophecy: "It is," says Mr Gray, "remarkable for its magnificence. Each prophetic writer is distinguished for peculiar beauties; but their style in general may be characterised as strong, animated, and impressive. Its ornaments are derived not from accumulation of epithet or laboured harmony; but from the real grandeur of its images, and the majestic force of its expressions. It is varied with striking propriety, and enlivened with quick but easy transitions. Its sudden bursts of eloquence, its earnest warmth, its affecting exhortations and appeals, afford very interesting proofs of that lively impression and of that inspired conviction under which the prophets wrote; and which enabled them, among a people not distinguished for genius, to surpass, in every variety of composition, the most admired productions of pagan antiquity. If the imagery employed by the sacred writers appears sometimes to partake of a coarse and indelicate cast, it must be recollected that the Eastern manners and languages required the most forcible representations; and that the masculine and indignant spirit of the prophets led them to adopt the most energetic and descriptive expressions. No style is, perhaps, so highly figurative as that of the prophets. Every object of nature and of art which could furnish allusions is explored with industry; every scene of creation and every page of science seems to have unfolded its rich varieties to the sacred writers, who, in the spirit of Eastern poetry, delight in every kind of metaphorical embellishment. Thus, by way of illustration, it is obvious to remark, that earthly dignities and powers are symbolized by the celestial bodies; the effects of moral evil are shown under the storms and convulsions of nature; the pollutions of sin are represented by external impurities; and the beneficial influence of righteousness is depicted by the serenity and confidence of peaceful life. This allegorical language, being founded in ideas universally prevalent, and adhered to with invariable relation and regular analogy, has furnished great ornament and elegance to the sacred writings. Sometimes, however, the inspired penmen drew their allusions from local and temporary sources of metaphor; from the peculiar scenery of their country; from the idolatries of heathen nations; from their own history and circumstances; from their service of the temple, and the ceremonies of their religion; from manners that have faded, and customs that have elapsed. Hence many appropriate beauties have vanished. Many descriptions and many representations, that must have had a solemn importance among the Jews, are now considered, from a change of circumstances, in a degraded point of view. Hence likewise here and there a shade of obscurity. In general, however, the language of Scripture, though highly sublime and beautiful, is easy and intelligible to all capacities."

II. The manifold use of prophecy. As prophecy is so striking a proof of a supernatural communion with the Deity, and is of so early a date, we may rest assured it was given for many important ends. "The uses of prophecy," says Dr. Jortin, "besides gradually opening and unfolding the things relating to the Messiah, and the blessings which by him should be conferred upon mankind, are many, great, and manifest:—

"1. It served to secure the belief of a God, and of a providence.

"As God is invisible and spiritual, there was cause to fear that, in the first and ruder ages of the world, when men were busier in cultivating the earth than in cultivating arts and sciences, and in seeking the necessities of life than in the study of morality, they might forget their Creator and Governor; and, therefore, God maintained amongst them the great article of faith in him, by manifestations of himself, by sending angels to declare his will, by miracles, and by prophecies.

"2. It was intended to give men the profoundest veneration for that amazing knowledge from which nothing was concealed, not even the future actions of creatures, and the things which as yet were not. How could a man hope to hide any counsel, any design or thought, from such a Being?

"3. It contributed to keep up devotion and true religion, the religion of the heart, which consists partly in entertaining just and honourable notions of God and of his perfections, and which is a more rational and a more acceptable service than rites and ceremonies.

"4. It excited men to rely upon God, and to love him who condescended to hold this mutual intercourse with his creatures, and to permit them to consult him, as one friend asks advice of another.

"5. It was intended to keep the people, to whom God revealed himself, from idolatry; a sin to which the Jews would be inclined, both from the disposition to it which they had acquired in Egypt, and from the contagion of bad example.

"The people of Israel were strictly forbidden to consult the diviners and the gods of other nations, and to use any enchantments and wicked arts; and that they might have no temptation to it, God permitted them to apply to him and to his prophets, even upon small occasions; and he raised up amongst them a succession of prophets, to whom they might have recourse for advice and direction. These prophets were revered abroad as well as at home, and consulted by foreign princes; and, in times of the captivity, they were honoured by great kings, and advanced to high stations."

As it respects us, prophecy connected with miracles affords evidence of the truth of revelation, as well as of a superintending providence. This evidence, too, is a growing evidence. "The divine design, uniformly pursued through a series of successive generations, opens with a greater degree of clearness, in proportion to the lapse of time and the number of events. An increase of age is an addition to its strength; and the nearer we approach the point towards which the dispensations of God unvaryingly tend, the more clearly shall we discern the wonderful regularity, consistency, and beauty, of this stupendous plan for universal good. Of the great use of prophecies which have been fulfilled, as a direct and strong argument to convert unbelievers to Christianity, and to establish Christians in the faith, we have the most ample proofs. Our Lord himself made very frequent appeals to prophecy, as evidence of his divine mission: he referred the Jews to their own Scriptures, as most fully and clearly bearing witness of himself. Upon them he grounded the necessity of his sufferings; upon them he settled the faith of the disciples at Emmaus, and of the apostles at Jerusalem. The same source supplied the eloquence of St. Peter and St. Paul, and the means with which Apollos 'mightily convinced the Jews.' This was a powerful instrument of persuasion in the succeeding ages of the Church, when used by the primitive apologists. Upon this topic were employed the zeal and diligence, not only of Justin Martyr, but Tertullian, Cyprian, and Augustine. It would never have been so frequently employed, if it had not been well adapted to the desired end; and that it did most completely answer this end, by the conversion of unbelievers, is evident from the accounts of Scripture and the records of the primitive Church."

III. Plain examples of the fulfilment of prophecy. Our limits will not permit us to give a copious account of the various prophecies which have been remarkably fulfilled: but whoever has examined profane history with any degree of attention, and compared it with the predictions of Scripture, must, if he be not blinded by prejudice, and hardened by infidelity, be convinced of the truth of prophecy by its exact accomplishment. It is in vain to say that these prophecies were delivered since the events have taken place; for we see the prophecies, the latest whereof were delivered about seventeen hundred years ago, and some of them above three thousand years ago, fulfilling at this very time; and cities, and countries, and kingdoms, in the very same condition, and all brought about in the very same manner, and with the very same circumstances, as the prophets had foretold. "We see," says Bishop Newton, "the descendants of Shem and Japheth ruling and enlarged in Asia and Europe, and perhaps in America, and 'the curse of servitude' still attending the wretched descendants of Ham, in Africa. We see the posterity of Ishmael 'multiplied exceedingly,' and become 'a great nation,' in the Arabians; yet living like 'wild men,' and shifting from place to place, in the wilderness; their hand against every man, and every man's hand against them; and still dwelling an independent and free people, 'in the presence of all their brethren,' and in the presence of all their enemies. We see the family of Esau totally extinct, and that of Jacob subsisting at this day; 'the sceptre departed from Judah,' and the people living nowhere in authority, everywhere in subjection; the Jews still dwelling alone among the nations, while 'the remembrance of Amalek is utterly put out from under heaven.' We see the Jews severely punished for their infidelity and disobedience to their great Prophet like unto Moses; 'plucked from off their own land, and removed into all the kingdoms of the earth; oppressed and spoiled evermore;' and made a 'proverb and a by-word among all nations.' We see 'Ephraim so broken as to be no more a people,' while the whole nation is comprehended under the name of Judah; the Jews wonderfully preserved as a distinct people, while their great conquerors are everywhere destroyed; their land lying desolate, and themselves cut off from being the people of God, while the Gentiles are advanced in their room. We see Nineveh so completely destroyed that the place thereof is not and cannot be known; Babylou made 'a desolation for ever,' a possession for the bitter, and pools of water; Tyre become 'like the top of a rock, a place for fishers to spread their nets upon;' and Egypt, 'a base kingdom, the basest of the kingdoms,' and still tributary and subject to strangers. We see, of the four great empires of the world, the fourth and last, which was greater and more powerful than any of the former, divided in the western part thereof into ten lesser kingdoms; and among them a power with a triple crown 'differs from the first,' with 'a mouth speaking very great things,' and with 'look more stout than his fellows, speaking great words against the Most High, wearing out the saints of the Most High, and changing times and laws.' We see a power 'cast down the truth to the ground, and prosper, and practise, and destroy the holy people, not regarding the God of his fathers, nor the desire of wives, but honouring Mahuzzim,' gods-protectors, or saints-protectors, 'and causing' the priests of Mahuzzim 'to rule over many, and to divide the land for gain.' We see the Turks 'stretching forth their hand over the countries,' and particularly 'over the land of Egypt, the Libyans at their steps,' and the Arabians still 'escaping out of their hand.' We see the Jews 'led away captive into all nations, and Jerusalem trodden down of the Gentiles,' and likely to continue so 'until the times of the Gentiles be fulfilled,' as the Jews are by a constant miracle preserved a distinct people for the completion of other prophecies relating to them. We see one 'who opposeth and exalteth himself,' above all laws, divine and human, 'sitting as God in the church of God, and showing himself that he is God, whose coming is after the working of Satan, with all power, and signs, and lying wonders, and with all deceivableness of unrighteousness.' We see a great apostasy in the Christian Church, which consists chiefly in the worship of demons, angels, or departed saints, and is promoted 'through the hypocrisy of liars, forbidding to marry, and commanding to abstain from meats.' We see the seven Churches of Asia lying in the same forlorn and desolate condition that the angel had signified to St. John, their 'candlestick removed out of its place,' their churches turned into mosques, their worship into superstition. In short, we see the character of 'the beast and the false prophet,' and 'the whore of Babylon,' now exemplified in every particular, and in a city that is seated 'upon seven mountains,' so that if the Bishop of Rome had sat for his picture, a greater resemblance and likeness could not have been drawn.

"For these things we have the attestation of past and the experience of present times; and we cannot well be deceived, if we will only believe our own eyes and observation. We actually see the completion of many of the prophecies in the state of men and things around us; and we have the prophecies themselves recorded in books, which books have been read in public assemblies these seventeen hundred or two thousand years, have been dispersed into several countries, have been translated into several languages, and quoted and commented upon by different nations, so that there is no room to suspect so much as a possibility of forgery or illusion." See also the several articles referred to in this work.

IV. Rules for correctly understanding the prophecies. In order to understand the prophecies, and to form a right judgment of the argument for the truth of Christianity, we must not consider them singly and apart, but as a grand whole, or a chain reaching through several thousand years, yet manifestly subservient to one and the same end. This end is no other than the establishment of the universal empire of truth and righteousness under the dominion of Jesus Christ. We are not, indeed, to suppose that each of the prophecies recorded in the Old Testament expressly points out and clearly characterizes Jesus Christ; yet, taken as a whole, this grand system refers to him; for "the testimony of Jesus is the spirit of prophecy." All the revolutions of Divine Providence have him for their scope and end. Is an empire or kingdom erected? that empire or kingdom is erected with a view, directly or indirectly, to the kingdom of the Messiah. Is an empire or kingdom subverted or overthrown? that empire or kingdom is overthrown in subserviency to the glory of his kingdom and empire, which shall know neither bounds nor end, but whose limits shall be no other than the limits of the universe, and whose end no other than the days of eternity. Jesus Christ, then, is the only person that ever existed in whom all the prophecies meet as in a centre. In order, therefore, to oppose error and confront the infidel, we must study the prophecies not as independent of each other, but as connected; for "the argument from prophecy," says Bishop Hurd, "is not to be formed from the consideration of single prophecies, but from all the prophecies taken together, and considered as making one system; in which, from the mutual dependence and connection of its parts, preceding prophecies prepare and illustrate those which follow; and these, again, reflect light on the foregoing: just as in any philosophical system, that which shows the solidity of it is the harmony and correspondence of the whole, not the application of it in particular instances.

"Hence, though the evidence be but small from the completion of any one prophecy taken separately, yet that evidence being always something, the amount of the whole evidence resulting from a great number of prophecies, all relative to the same design, may be considerable; like many scattered rays, which, though each be weak in itself, yet, concentrated into one point, shall form a strong light, and strike the sense very powerfully. Still more; this evidence is not merely a growing evidence, but is indeed multiplied upon us, from the number of reflected lights which the several component parts of such a system reciprocally throw upon each, till, at length, the conviction rise unto a high degree of moral certainty."

Further; in order to understand the prophecies, we must endeavour to find out the true subject of prophecy; that is, precisely what the prophets speak of, and the characters that are applied to that subject. The literal sense should be always kept in view, and a knowledge of Oriental customs attained. The beginning and end of the prophetic sermons must be carefully observed. The time, as near as possible, of the prediction should be ascertained. An acquaintance with the method of salvation by Christ will greatly assist us in this work. The mind must be unprejudiced, and we should be well acquainted with the Scriptures at large. These rules, with dependence on the divine teaching, will assist us in understanding the prophecies.

PROPHET, a person who foretells future events. It is particularly applied to such inspired persons among the Jews as were commissioned by God to declare his will and purposes to that people. (See PROPHECY.)

Scripture often gives to prophets the name of men of God, or of angels (that is, messengers) of the Lord. The verb nibba, which we translate to prophecy, is of very great extent. Sometimes it signifies to foretell what is to come; at other times, to interpret, to promulge, or to sing in strains of sacred music, the prophetic declarations of Scripture. 1 Sam. xviii. 10, x. 5, 6. God says to Moses (Exod. vii. 1): "Aaron thy brother shall be thy prophet;" he shall explain thy sentiments to the people. Scripture does not withhold the name of prophet from impostors, although they falsely boasted of inspiration. Paul (Tit. i. 12), quoting a heathen poet, calls him a prophet. So we read (1 Chron. xxv. 1), that the sons of Asaph were appointed to prophesy upon harps.

The term "prophesy" is also used (1 Cor. xi. 4, 5, xiv.), either for explaining Scripture, speaking to the Church in public by way of exhortation, or singing the praises of God in the language of inspiration.

PROPHETESS. This word seems to be used in Scripture as of the same meaning with poetess. Hence the term is applied to Miriam, Deborah, Huldah, and others, who wrote sacred songs under divine inspiration.

PROPHETS, SONS OF THE, an appellation given to young men who were educated in the schools or colleges under a proper master, who was commonly, if not always, an inspired prophet, in the knowledge of religion, and in sacred music, and thus were qualified to be public preachers. 1 Sam. x. 11, xix. 20; 2 Kings ii.

PROPITIATION, a sacrifice offered to God to avert the punishment of sin, and secure the bestowment of his favour. Among the Jews, there were both ordinary and public sacrifices, as holocausts, &c., offered by way of thanksgiving; and extraordinary ones, offered by persons guilty of any crime, by way of propitiation.

The Romish Church believe the mass to be a sacrifice of propitiation for the living and the dead. The Reformed Churches allow of no propitiation, but that one offered by Jesus on the cross, whereby divine justice is appeased, and our sins forgiven. Rom. iii. 25; 1 John ii. 2.

As it respects the unbloody propitiatory sacrifice of the mass above mentioned, little need be said to confute such a doctrine. Indeed, it is owned in the Church of Rome, that there is no other foundation for the belief of it than an unwritten tradition. There is no hint in the Scripture of Christ's offering his body and blood to his Father at his institution of the eucharist. It is also a manifest contradiction to Paul's doctrine, who teaches, that without shedding of blood there is no remission; therefore, there can be no remission of sins in the mass. The sacrifice of Christ, according to the same apostle, is not to be repeated. A second oblation would be superfluous: consequently the pretended true and proper sacrifice of the mass must be superfluous and useless. See EXPIATION—ATONEMENT.

PROPITIATORY, the MERCY-SEAT (which see). See also ATONEMENT—PROPITIATION.

PROPORTION OF FAITH. See ANALOGY OF FAITH.

PROSELYTE. The word originally signifies a stranger or foreigner, one who came from a different country from that which the Jews inhabited. It was generally used, however, to indicate an individual who, although not a Jew by birth, embraced the Jewish religion, and was thus admitted to various privileges.

Among the Jews there were two kinds of proselytes, which were called severally proselytes of the gate and proselytes of justice or righteousness. The former were those who, having abandoned idolatry, worshipped the true God, yet did not undergo circumcision, and who, though they attended at the synagogues to hear the word, still occupied a situation separate from that appointed to the Jews. The latter class of proselytes included those Gentiles who thoroughly embraced the Jewish religion by undergoing circumcision, and were said to have become sons of Abraham. These last were numbered with the Jews. This distinction of proselytes, however, is generally considered to be a rabbinical notion, and accordingly Dr Lardner says, "I do not believe that the notion of two sorts of Jewish proselytes can be found in any Christian writer before the fourteenth century, or later." Dr Adam Clarke fancifully supposes that our Lord had in view the qualifications of the Jewish proselytes in the conditions which he lays down to his own followers: Matt. xvi. 24, "Then said Jesus unto his disciples, If any man will come after me, let him deny himself, and take up his cross, and follow me."

PROSEUCHÆ, or ORATORIES. The buildings so called were, as the names import, properly places for prayer. They were usually mere enclosures, open above, and frequently shaded with trees. They were also, at least during the later times of the Jewish economy, commonly erected in some retired place. If connected with cities, and in foreign countries, they were perhaps always at some distance from the former, and generally by some river side or on the sea-shore.

Questions have been raised as to the origin of these, and their being or not being the same with the synagogue. Philo and Josephus certainly speak of them and the synagogues as if they were substantially one. The former expressly declares that they were places of instruction. "The places dedicated to devotion," says he, "and which are commonly called Proseuchæ, what are they but schools in which prudence, fortitude, temperance, righteousness, piety, holiness, and every virtue are taught—everything necessary for the discharge of duty, whether human or divine?" As the writer's observations were chiefly confined to the Jews of Alexandria and other parts of Egypt, this description will chiefly apply to these. But there is no doubt, on the other hand, that where synagogues existed, and especially in Judea, they did to some extent differ. And we are, therefore, very much disposed to concur in the opinion, that the oratory was substantially and in effect a synagogue. But the latter was the more perfect form, and required, for its erection and support, special means. There was in every synagogue a local court, deriving its authority, at least in Judea, from the sanhedrim; and there were office-bearers to be maintained; whereas, in the oratory, there does not seem to have been any very fixed or necessary form of procedure. It might, for aught that appears, have been all, or substantially all, which belonged to the synagogue, or it might be little more than what we would call a prayer-meeting. And hence, perhaps, the reason of the prevalence of the one (the synagogue) in Judea, and of the other in Egypt, and other countries not subject to Jewish laws.

PROSPERITY, the state wherein things succeed according to our wishes, and are productive of affluence and ease.

However desirable prosperity be, it has its manifest disadvantages. It too often alienates the soul from God, excites pride, exposes to temptation, hardens the heart, occasions idleness, promotes effeminacy, damps zeal and energy, and too often has a baneful relative influence. It is no wonder, therefore, that the Almighty in general withholds it from his children; and that adversity should be their lot, rather than prosperity. Indeed, adversity seems more beneficial on the whole, although it be so unpleasant to our feelings. "The advantages of prosperity," says Bacon, "are to be wished; but the advantages of adversity are to be admired. The principal virtue of prosperity is temperance; the principal virtue of adversity is fortitude, which in morality is allowed to be the most heroic virtue. Prosperity best discovers vice; adversity best discovers virtue, which is like those perfumes which are most fragrant when burnt or bruised."

It is not, however, to be understood that prosperity in itself is unlawful. The world, with all its various productions, was formed by the Almighty for the happiness of man, and designed to endear himself to us, and to what leads our minds up to him. What, however, God often gives us as a blessing, by our own folly we pervert and turn into a curse. Where prosperity is given, there religion is absolutely necessary to enable us to act under it as we ought. Where this divine principle influences the mind, prosperity may be enjoyed and become a blessing; for, "while bad men snatch the pleasures of the world as by stealth, without countenance from God, the proprietor of the world, the righteous sit openly down to the feast of life, under the smile of heaven. No guilty fears damp their joys. The blessing of God rests upon all they possess. Their piety reflects sunshine from heaven upon the prosperity of the world; unites, in one point of view, the smiling aspect both of the powers above and of the objects below. Not only have they as full a relish as others of the innocent pleasures of life, but, moreover, in them they hold communion with God. In all that is good or fair they trace his hand. From the beauties of nature, from the improvements of art, from the enjoyments of social life, they raise their affections to the Source of all the happiness which surrounds them, and thus widen the sphere of their pleasures, by adding intellectual and spiritual to earthly joys."

Spiritual prosperity consists in the continual progress of the mind in knowledge, purity, and joy. It arises from the participation of the divine blessing; and evidences itself by frequency in prayer, love to God's Word, delight in his people, attendance on his ordinances, zeal in his cause, submission to his will, usefulness in his Church, and increasing abhorrence of every thing that is derogatory to his glory. 3 John 2.

PROTESTANTS. This well-known designation was derived from the celebrated protest of the 19th April 1529, presented at the diet of Spires. This protest opposes two abuses in matters of religion,—first, the intrusion of the civil magistrate; and, second, the arbitrary authority of the church. Instead of these abuses Protestantism sets the power of conscience above the magistrate, and the authority of the Word of God above the visible church. "In the first place," says D'Aubigné, "it rejects the civil power in divine things, and says, with the prophets and apostles, 'We must obey God rather than man.' In presence of the crown of Charles the Fifth, it uplifts the crown of Jesus Christ. But it goes farther: it lays down the principle, that all human teaching should be subordinate to the oracles of God. Even the primitive church, by recognising the writings of the apostles, had performed an act of submission to this supreme authority, and not an act of authority, as Rome maintains; and the establishment of a tribunal charged with the interpretation of the Bible had terminated only in slavishly subjecting man to man in what should be the most unfettered—conscience and faith. In this celebrated act of Spires no doctor appears, and the Word of God reigns alone. Never has man exalted himself like the pope; never have men kept in the background like the reformers." In addition to this clear and distinct view of what was included in the protest, from which Protestants have derived their name, the following remarks may be quoted from Chillingworth as containing a view of the religion of Protestants:—"Know then, sir, that when I say the religion of Protestants is in prudence to be preferred before yours, on the one side, I do not understand by your religion the doctrine of Bellarmine, or Baronius, or any other private man amongst you, nor the doctrine of the Sorbonne, of the Jesuits, or of the Dominicans, or of any other particular company among you, but that wherein you all agree, or profess to agree—the doctrine of the Council of Trent; so, accordingly, on the other side, by the religion of Protestants, I do not understand the doctrine of Luther, or Calvin, or Melancthon, nor the Confession of Augsburg, or Geneva, nor the Catechism of Heidelberg, nor the Articles of the Church of England, no, nor the harmony of Protestant confessions; but that in which they all agree, and which they all subscribe with a greater harmony, as a perfect rule of faith and action—that is, the BIBLE.

"The Bible, I say, the Bible only, is the religion of Protestants. Whatsoever else they believe besides it, and the plain, irrefragable, indubitable consequences of it, well may they hold it as a matter of opinion; but as a matter of faith and religion, neither can they, with coherence to their own grounds, believe it themselves, nor require belief of it of others, without most high and most schismatical presumption. I, for my part, after a long, and, as I verily believe and hope, impartial, search of the true way to eternal happiness, do profess plainly that I cannot find any rest for the sole of my foot but upon this rock only. I see plainly, and with my own eyes, that there are popes against popes, and councils against councils; some fathers against other fathers, the same fathers against themselves; a consent of fathers of one age against a consent of fathers of another age; traditive interpretations of Scripture are pretended, but there are few or none to be found; no tradition but that of Scripture can derive itself from the fountain, but may be plainly proved either to have been brought in in such an age after Christ, or that in such an age it was not in. In a word, there is no sufficient certainty but of Scripture only for any considering man to build upon. This, therefore, and this only, I have reason to believe. This I will profess; according to this I will live; and for this, if there be occasion, I will not only willingly, but even gladly, lose my life, though I should be sorry that Christians should take it from me.

"Propose me any thing out of this book, and require whether I believe it or no, and, seem it never so incomprehensible to human reason, I will subscribe it with hand and heart, as knowing no demonstration can be stronger than this—GOD HATH SAID SO, THEREFORE IT IS TRUE. In other things, I will take no man's liberty of judging from him; neither shall any man take mine from me."

Such is the essential difference between Protestants and Papists, between Reformation and Rome. "The Reformation," says Mr Wylie, in his valuable Prize Essay on the Papacy, "ascribed all the glory of man's salvation to God,—Rome ascribed it to the Church. Salvation of God and salvation of man are the two opposite poles around which are ranged respectively all true and all false systems of religion. Popery placed salvation in the Church, and taught men to look for it through the sacraments; the Reformation placed salvation in Christ, and taught men that it was to be obtained through faith. 'By grace are ye saved, through faith, and that not of yourselves: it is the gift of God.' Eph. xi. 8. The development of the grand primordial truth,—salvation of grace,—has constituted the history of the Church. This truth gave being to the patriarchal religion; it formed the vital element in the Mosaic economy; it constituted the glory of primitive Christianity; and it was it that gave maturity and strength to the Reformation. With one voice, Calvin, Luther, and Zuingli did homage to God as the author of man's salvation. The motley host of wrangling theologians which met at Trent made man his own Saviour, by extolling the efficacy and merit of good works."

PROVENDER. This word, which occurs in Gen.

xxiv. 25, seems to denote a mixture of several kinds of fodder, cut straw, barley, beans, &c., so combined as to render the whole palatable. Hay is not made in the East. Cattle continue, at the present day, to be fed with chopped straw, mixed with barley.

PROVERBS, short and pithy sayings, a mode of conveying instruction which has from ancient times been very prevalent in all countries, but more especially in the East. From Solomon we learn that brief maxims of this kind were a principal subject of study in his time, Prov. i. 6: "To understand a proverb, and the interpretation; the words of the wise, and their dark sayings."

"The moralists of the East," says Sir William Jones, "have, in general, chosen to deliver their precepts in short sententious maxims, to illustrate them by sprightly comparisons, or to inculcate them in the very ancient forms of agreeable apologues. There are, indeed, both in Arabic and Persian, philosophical tracts on ethics, written with sound ratiocination and elegant perspicuity; but in every part of the Eastern world, from Pekin to Damascus, the popular teachers of moral wisdom have immemorially been poets; and there would be no end of enumerating their works, which are still extant in the five principal languages of Asia."

PROVERBS, BOOK OF. This book has always been ascribed to Solomon, whose name it bears, though, from the frequent repetition of the same sentences, as well as from some variations in style which have been discovered, doubts have been entertained whether he really was the author of every maxim it comprises. Those in the thirtieth chapter are expressly called The words of Agur the son of Jakeh; and the thirty-first chapter is entitled The words of King Lemuel. It seems certain that the collection called the PROVERBS OF SOLOMON was arranged in the order in which we now have it by different hands; but it is not therefore to be concluded that they are not the productions of Solomon, who, we are informed, spoke no less than three thousand proverbs. 1 Kings iv. 32. As it is nowhere said that Solomon himself made a collection of proverbs and sentences, the general opinion is, that several persons made a collection of them, perhaps, as they were uttered by him; Hezekiah, among others, as mentioned in the twenty-fifth chapter. The Jewish writers affirm that Solomon wrote the Canticles, or song bearing his name, in his youth, the Proverbs in his riper years, and Ecclesiastes in his old age.

Michaelis has observed, that the book of Proverbs is frequently cited by the apostles, who considered it as a treasure of revealed morality, whence Christians were to derive their rules of conduct; and the canonical authority of no book of the Old Testament is so well ratified by the evidence of quotations as that of the Proverbs.

The scope of this book is, to instruct men in the deepest mysteries of true wisdom and understanding, the height and perfection of which is the true knowledge of the divine will, and the sincere fear of the Lord. Prov. i. 2-7, ix. 10. To this end the book is filled with the choicest sententious aphorisms, infinitely surpassing all the ethical sayings of the ancient sages, and comprising in themselves distinct doctrines, duties, &c., of piety towards God, of equity and benevolence towards man, and of sobriety and temperance; together with precepts for the right education of children, and for the relative situations of subjects, magistrates, and sovereigns.

The Proverbs of Solomon afford a noble specimen of the didactic poetry of the Hebrews. They abound with antithetic parallels, for this form is peculiarly adapted to adages, aphorisms, and detached sentences. Much, indeed, of the elegance, acuteness, and force, which are discernible in Solomon's wise sayings, is derived from the antithetic form, the opposition of diction and sentiment. Hence a careful attention to the parallelism of members will contribute to remove that obscurity in which some of the proverbs appear to be involved. Sometimes, also, one member, or part of a proverb, must be supplied from the other; or, as Glassius has expressed it in other words, sometimes one thing is expressed in one member, and another in the other, and yet both are to be understood in both members.

PROVIDENCE, the superintendence and care which God exercises over the whole created universe. This providence is not only universal, extending over all, but it is also particular, extending to every individual. This last, however, is denied by some. And yet nothing can be more unreasonable, for all creation being simply a sum of particulars, it is evident that there is no way of taking care of this sum without taking care of each particular. This objection, therefore, under the appearance of honouring God, plainly dishonours him. Again, whatever it was not too great condescension in him to create, it cannot be too great a condescension in him to take care of. Besides, with regard to God, all distinctions in the creation vanish. All beings are infinitely, that is to say, equally, inferior to him.

The uniform doctrine of the Sacred Writings is, that throughout the universe nothing happens without God; that his hand is ever active, and his decree of performance or sufferance intervenes in all; that nothing is too great or unwieldy for his management, and nothing so minute and inconsiderable as to be below his inspection and care. While he is guiding the sun and moon in their course through the heavens; while in this inferior world he is ruling among empires, stilling the ragings of the waters, and the tumults of the people, he is at the same time watching over the humble good man, who, in the obscurity of his cottage, is serving and worshipping him.

In what manner, indeed, providence interposes in human affairs; by what means it influences the thoughts and counsels of men, and, notwithstanding the influence it exerts, leaves to them the freedom of choice, are subjects of a dark and mysterious nature, and which have given occasion to many an intricate controversy. Let us remember that the manner in which God influences the motion of all the heavenly bodies, the nature of that secret power by which he is ever directing the sun and the moon, the planets, stars, and comets, in their course through the heavens, while they appear to move themselves in a free course, are matters no less inexplicable to us than the manner in which he influences the counsels of men. But though the mode of divine operation remains unknown, the fact of an overruling influence is equally certain in the moral as it is in the natural world. In cases where the fact is clearly authenticated, we are not at liberty to call its truth in question, merely because we understand not the manner in which it is brought about.

Nothing can be more clear, from the testimony of Scripture, than that God takes part in all that happens among mankind; directing and overruling the whole course of events so as to make every one of them answer the designs of his wise and righteous government. We cannot, indeed, conceive God acting as the governor of the world at all, unless his government were to extend to all the events that happen. It is upon the supposition of a particular providence that our worship and prayers to him are founded. All his perfections would be utterly insignificant to us, if they were not exercised, on every occasion, according as the circumstances of his creatures required. The Almighty would then be no more than an unconcerned spectator of the behaviour of his subjects, regarding the obedient and the rebellious with an equal eye. See PRAYER.

PRUDENCE is the act of suiting words and actions according to the circumstances of things, or rules of right reason. "It differs from wisdom only in degree; wisdom being nothing but a more consummate habit of prudence, and prudence a lower degree or weaker habit of wisdom." It is divided into—

1. Christian prudence, which directs to the pursuit of that blessedness which the gospel discovers by the use of gospel means.
2. Moral prudence has for its end peace and satisfaction of mind in this world, and the greatest happiness after death.
3. Civil prudence is the knowledge of what ought to be done in order to secure the outward happiness of life, consisting in prosperity, liberty, &c.
4. Monastic prudence, relating to any circumstances in which a man is not charged with the care of others.
5. Economical prudence regards the conduct of a family.
6. Political prudence refers to the good government of a state.

The idea of prudence, says one, includes due consultation—that is, concerning such things as demand consultation; in a right manner, and for a competent time, that the resolution taken up may be neither too precipitate nor too slow; and a faculty of discerning proper means when they occur. To the perfection of prudence these three things are further required, viz., a natural sagacity; presence of mind, or a ready turn of thought; and experience.

Plato styles prudence the leading virtue; and Cicero observes, "that not one of the virtues can want prudence;" which is certainly most true, since without prudence to guide them, piety would degenerate into superstition, zeal into bigotry, temperance into austerity, courage into rashness, and justice itself into folly.

PRUNING-HOOK. It was predicted in Isa. ii. 4: "They shall beat their swords into ploughshares, and their spears into pruning-hooks." The word denotes a knife for cutting or pruning the vines. See VINE.

PSALMISTS and PSALMODISTS. The former term means the authors, the latter the singers of psalms.

PSALMODY, the art or act of singing psalms. Psalmody was always esteemed a considerable part of devotion, and usually performed in the standing posture; and as to the manner of pronunciation, the plain song was sometimes used, being a gentle inflection of the voice, not much different from reading, like the chant in cathedrals; at other times, more artificial compositions were used, like our anthems.

As to the persons concerned in singing, sometimes a single person sung alone; sometimes the whole assembly joined together, which was the most ancient and general practice. At other times, the psalms were sung alternately, the congregation dividing themselves into two parts, and singing verse about, in their turns. There was also a fourth way of singing, pretty common in the fourth century, which was, when a single person began the verse, and the people joined with him in the close; this was often used for variety in the same service with alternate psalmody. (See PSALMS—SINGING—MUSIC.)

PSALMS. The book of Psalms presents every possible variety of Hebrew poetry. They may all, indeed, be termed poems of the lyric kind,—that is, adapted to music, but with great variety in the style of composition. Thus some are simply odes. "An ode is a dignified sort of song, narrative of the facts, either of public history or of private life, in a highly adorned and figured style. But the figure in the Psalms is that which is peculiar to the Hebrew language, in which the figure gives its meaning with as much perspicuity as the plainest speech." Others, again, are ethic or didactic, "delivering grave maxims of life, or the precepts of religion, in solemn, but for the most part simple strains." To this class we may refer the hundred and nineteenth, and the other alphabetical psalms, which are so called because the initial letters of each line or stanza follow the order of the alphabet. Nearly one-seventh part of the psalms are elegiac, or pathetic compositions on mournful subjects. Some are enigmatic, delivering the doctrines of religion in enigmas, sentences contrived to strike the imagination forcibly, and yet easy to be understood; while a few may be referred to the class of idyls, or short pastoral poems. But the greater part, according to Bishop Horsley, is a sort of dramatic ode, consisting of dialogues between certain persons sustaining certain characters. "In these dialogue-psalms the persons are frequently the psalmist himself, or the chorus of priests and Levites, or the leader of the Levitical band, opening the ode with a proem declarative of the subject, and very often closing the whole with a solemn admonition drawn from what the other persons say. The other persons are, Jehovah, sometimes as one, sometimes as another of the three persons; Christ in his incarnate state, sometimes before, sometimes after his resurrection; the human soul of Christ, as distinguished from the divine essence. Christ, in his incarnate state, is personated sometimes as a priest, sometimes as a king, sometimes as a conqueror; and in those psalms in which he is introduced as a conqueror, the resemblance is very remarkable between this conqueror in the book of Psalms, and the warrior on the white horse, in the book of Revelations, who goes forth with a crown on his head, and a bow in his hand, conquering and to conquer. And the conquest in the Psalms is followed, like the conquest in the Revelations, by the marriage of the conqueror. These are circumstances of similitude, which, to any one versed in the prophetic style, prove beyond a doubt that the mystical conqueror is the same personage in both."

The right of the book of Psalms to a place in the sacred canon has never been disputed. They are frequently alluded to in the Old Testament, and are often cited by our Lord and his apostles as the work of the Holy Spirit. They are generally termed the Psalms of David, that Hebrew monarch being their chief author. Origen, Chrysostom, Augustine, Ambrose, Euthymius, and others of the ancient fathers, indeed, were of opinion that he was their sole author; but they were opposed by Hilary and Athanasius

(or the author of the synopsis attributed to him), Jerome, Eusebius, and other fathers of equal eminence. And indeed this notion is manifestly erroneous, for an attentive examination of the Psalms will immediately prove them to be the compositions of various authors in various ages, some much more ancient than the time of David, some of a much later age, and others were evidently composed during the Babylonish captivity. Some modern commentators have even referred a few to the time of the Maccabees; but for this opinion there does not appear to be any foundation. Altogether, they embrace a period of about nine hundred years.

At what time and by whom the book of Psalms was collected into one volume we have no certain information. Many are of opinion that David collected such as were extant in his time into a book for the use of the national worship. This is not unlikely; but it is manifest that such a collection could not include all the psalms, because many of David's odes are scattered throughout the entire series. Some have ascribed the general collection to the friends or servants of Hezekiah before the captivity; but this could only apply to the psalms then extant, for we read that Hezekiah caused the words or psalms of David to be sung in the temple when he restored the worship of Jehovah there. 2 Chron. xxix. 25-30. The collection by the men of Hezekiah could not comprise any that were composed either under or subsequent to the captivity. That the Psalms were collected together at different times and by different persons is very evident from an examination of their contents. Accordingly, in the Masoretic copies, and also in the Syriac version, they are divided into five books.

The division of the Psalms into five books is of great antiquity, because it was in existence before the Septuagint Greek version was executed; and as there are many Chaldee words in those composed during or after the Babylonish captivity, the most probable opinion is, that the different collections then extant were formed into one volume by Ezra, when the Jewish canon of Scripture was completed. But whatever subordinate divisions may have existed, it is certain that the Psalms composed but one book in that canon, for they are cited by our Lord collectively as the "Psalms" (Luke xxiv. 44), and also as "the book of Psalms" (Luke xx. 42); by which last title they are cited by St Peter in Acts i. 20, and they are reckoned only as one book in all subsequent enumerations of the Scriptures, both by Jews and Christians.

The number of the canonical psalms is one hundred and fifty; but in the Septuagint version, as well as in the Syriac, Arabic, and Ethiopic translations, there is extant another which is numbered cli. Its subject is the combat of David with Goliath (related in 1 Sam. xvii.), but it is evidently spurious; for besides that it possesses not a particle of David's genius and style, it never was extant in the Hebrew, and has been uniformly rejected by the fathers, and by every council that has been held in the Christian church. It is certainly very ancient, as it is found in the Codex Alexandrinus.

PSALMS OF DEGREES, a name given to the fifteen psalms which extend from the one hundred and twentieth to the one hundred and thirty-fourth inclusive. Some, among whom is Calmet, think that these psalms derived their name from the going up of the Jews from Babylon, and that they were probably composed at the deliverance from the captivity. Mr Taylor supposes that they may have been sung by the Jews, when coming up to Jerusalem every year to worship at the temple. But others still suppose that they were sung as the Jews ascended the steps leading to the temple.

PSALTERY. See VIOL.

PTOLEMAIS. See ACCRO.

PTOLEMY, the name of all the kings of Egypt, from Ptolemy, son of Lagus, to the conquest of Egypt by the Romans; that is, from A.M. 3631 to 3974; or from the death of Alexander to the death of Cleopatra, spouse of Mark Antony. See EGYPT.

PUBLICAN. When Judea was subject to the Romans, those to whom the public revenue was farmed out were called Publicans. The superiors were generally Romans by birth, but the subordinates, who were in some cases at least natives of the provinces, were remarkable for their injustice and extortion. Zaccheus is mentioned in Scripture as "a chief publican," which probably meant a receiver-general for a large district. The Jews were very reluctant to own the authority of the Roman government, and hence they viewed with marked hostility all who collected the taxes or tribute which went to the support of the government. No sect was more intolerant of the Roman yoke than the Pharisees, and hence, in one of his parables (Luke xviii. 10-13), our blessed Lord selects a Pharisee and a Publican as the extremes of character and reputation.

PUBLIUS, the governor of Malta or Melita, when Paul was shipwrecked on that island, A.D. 60. Acts xxviii. 7-9. It is said, that not only Publius and his father, but the whole island also, were converted to the Christian faith.

PUDENS, mentioned by Paul (2 Tim. iv. 21), is thought by the ancients to have been a Roman senator converted by Peter. But there is reason to think they confound him with another Pudens, a senator, said to be father of Praxedus and Prudentiana, in the time of Pope Pius, above a hundred years afterwards. The Greeks put him in the list of the seventy disciples, and say, that after the death of Paul, he was beheaded by Nero. Some think that Claudia, mentioned by Paul after Pudeus, was his wife.

PUFF. In Ps. x. 5, it is said: "His ways are always grievous; thy judgments are far above out of his sight: as for all his enemies, he puffeth at them." To this day, one of the most expressive ways in the East of showing contempt is by puffing with the mouth and blowing through the nostrils.

PUL, king of Assyria. 2 Kings xv. 19; Hos. v. 13. Pul is thought to have been the father of Sardanapalus, who added the name Pal or Pul to that of Sardan; as Merodach added the name of Baladan, and called himself Merodach-baladan. If this conjecture be true, Pul is the same as the Anacindarxes, or Anabaxares, of profane authors. He is the first king of Assyria mentioned in Scripture. See ASSYRIA.

PUL, an island now called Philæ, in the Nile, according to Bochart, not far from Syene (Isa. lxvi. 19), on which are remains and ruins of very noble and extensive temples, built by the ancient Egyptians. It is thought that the people called Phul, are represented in Egypt to this day, by the Pholabs, Pholeys, or Fellahs, who are for the most part husbandmen and cultivators.

PULSE (peli, from pul, a bean—Lev. xxiii. 14; 1 Sam. xvii. 17), those grains or seeds which grow in pods, as beans, peas, &c. The ancient Hebrews used parched chick-peas as a common provision when they took the field. 2 Sam. xvii. 28.

PUNISHMENTS. In the Epistle to the Hebrews we have an enumeration of the sufferings and species of punishments to which good people were exposed in Old Testament times, Heb. xi. 36, 37, "And others had trial of cruel mockings and scourgings, yea, moreover of bonds and imprisonment: they were stoned, they were sawn asunder, were tempted, were slain with the sword: they wandered about in sheepskins and goatskins; being destitute, afflicted, tormented." Capital punishments, under a variety of forms, prevailed among the Jews in early times. The most frequent forms were by stoning, burning, hanging, and crucifixion. Sometimes criminals were executed by decapitation, by drowning, or by casting from a precipice. Beating to death was practised among the Greeks, and inflicted only upon slaves. Among the Chaldeans and Persians, on some occasions, one or both of the feet and hands were cut off. Sawing asunder—as in the case of Isaiah, if we believe the Talmudists—was sometimes, though rarely, practised by the Jews. Exposing to wild beasts, which was inflicted upon the prophet Daniel, was a punishment among the Medes and Persians. Ecclesiastical punishment among the Jews consisted of the three species of excommunication, the niddui, the cherem, and the maranatha.

PUR, a Hebrew word signifying a lot, and hence the feast of Purim or lots introduced by Mordecai to commemorate the deliverance of the Jews in the time of Ahasuerus from the cruel designs of the wicked Haman. The festival received its name from the circumstance that Haman fixed the day by lot on which the Jews were to be destroyed. The Jews to this day observe this festival with great rejoicing. They meet in the synagogues when the book of Esther is read, and whenever the name of Haman occurs they clap their hands, and stamp with their feet, exclaiming, "Let his memory perish." See MORDECAI—ESTHER.

PURGATORY, a fiction of the Church of Rome. It is an imaginary place, in which the just, who depart out of this life, are supposed to expiate certain offences which do not merit eternal damnation. Broughton has endeavoured to prove that this notion has been held by Pagans, Jews, and Mohammedans, as well as by Christians; and that, in the days of the Maccabees, the Jews believed that sin might be expiated by sacrifice after the death of the sinner.

The arguments advanced by the Papists for purgatory are these:—(1.) Every sin, how slight soever, though no more than an idle word, as it is an offence to God, deserves punishment from him, and will be punished by him hereafter, if not cancelled by repentance here. (2.) Such small sins do not deserve eternal punishment. (3.) Few depart this life so pure as to be totally exempt from spots of this nature, and from every kind of debt due to God's justice. (4.) Therefore, few will escape without suffering something from his justice for such debts as they have carried with them out of this world, according to that rule of divine justice by which he treats every soul hereafter according to its works, and according to the state in which he finds it in death. From these propositions, which the Papist considers as so many self-evident truths, he infers that there must be some third place of punishment; for, since the infinite goodness of God can admit nothing into heaven which is not clean and pure from all sin, both great and small, and his infinite justice can permit none to receive the reward of bliss who as yet are not out of debt, but have something in justice to suffer, there must, of necessity, be some place or state where souls, departing this life pardoned as to external guilt or pain, yet obnoxious to some temporal penalty, or with the guilt of some venial faults, are purged and purified before their admittance into heaven. And this is what he is taught concerning purgatory, which, though he know not where it is, of what nature the pains are, or how long each soul is detained there, yet he believes that those who are in this place are relieved by the prayers of their fellow-members here on earth, as also by alms and masses offered up to God for their souls. And as for such as have no relations or friends to pray for them, or give alms to procure masses for their relief, they are not neglected by the Church, which makes a general commemoration of all the faithful departed in every mass, and in every one of the canonical hours of the divine office. Besides the above arguments, the following passages are alleged as proofs. 2 Mac. xii. 43–45; Matt. xii. 31, 32; 1 Cor. iii. 15; 1 Pet. iii. 19.

But it may be observed, (1.) That the Books of Maccabees have no evidence of inspiration; therefore quotations from them are not to be regarded. (2.) If they were, the texts referred to would rather prove that there is no such place as purgatory, since Judas did not expect the souls departed to reap any benefit from his sin-offering till the resurrection. The texts quoted from the Scriptures have no reference to this doctrine, as may be seen by consulting the context, and any just commentator thereon. (3.) Scripture, in general, speaks of departed souls going, immediately at death, to a fixed state of happiness or misery, and gives us no idea of purgatory. Isa. lvii. 2; Rev. xiv. 13; Luke xvi. 22; 2 Cor. v. 8. (4.) It is derogatory from the doctrine of Christ's satisfaction. If Christ died for us, and redeemed us from sin and hell, as the Scripture speaks, then the idea of further meritorious suffering detracts from the perfection of Christ's work, and places merit still in the creature—a doctrine entirely opposed to Scripture.

It is remarkable that the modern doctrine of universal restoration is grounded on the same general arguments as the Papal purgatory.

PURIFICATION, a ceremony which consists in cleansing anything from pollution or defilement. Purifications are common to Jews, Pagans, and Mohammedans. See IMPURITY.

PURITANS (Cathari) has been a common term of reproach applied to the friends of "pure religion and undefiled." In the middle ages it was applied to a branch of the Paulicians (see CATHARI), who are charged with the heresies of the Manichæans; but whose principal crime, according to Milner, was their aversion to the Church of Rome. (See PAULICIANS.) This able historian says: "The Cathari were a plain, unassuming, harmless, and industrious race of Christians; condemning, by their doctrine and manners, the whole apparatus of the reigning idolatry and superstition; placing true religion in the faith and love of Christ, and retaining a supreme regard for the Divine Word."

In England, the term Puritans was applied to those who wished for a farther degree of reformation in the Church than was adopted by Queen Elizabeth; and a *pur*er form, not of faith, but of discipline and worship. It was a common name given to all who, from conscientious motives, though on different grounds, disapproved of the established religion, from the Reformation under Elizabeth, to the Act of Uniformity, in 1662. From that time to the Revolution, in 1688, as many as refused to comply with the established worship (among whom were about two thousand clergymen, and perhaps five hundred thousand people), were denominated Nonconformists. From the passing of the Act of Toleration, on the accession of William and Mary, the name of Nonconformists was changed to that of Protestant Dissenters. (See DISSENTERS—TOLERATION.)

The greater part of the Puritans were Presbyterians. Their objections to the English Establishment lay principally in forms and ceremonies. Some, however, were Independents and Baptists. The objections of these were much more fundamental; disapproving of all National Churches, as such, and disavowing the authority of human legislation in matters of faith and worship.

PURITY, the freedom of anything from foreign admixture; but more particularly it signifies the temper directly opposite to criminal sensualities, or the ascendancy of irregular passions. (See CHASTITY.) Purity implies—(1.) A fixed, habitual abhorrence of all forbidden indulgences of the flesh. (2.) All past impurities, either of heart or life, will be reflected on with shame and sorrow. (3.) The heart will be freed, in a great measure, from impure and irregular desires. (4.) It will discover itself by a cautious fear of the least degree of impurity. (5.) It implies a careful and habitual guard against everything which tends to pollute the mind.

PURPLE (aregamen—Exod. xxv. 4, &c.; porphura—Mark xv. 17, 20; Luke xvi. 19; John xix. 2, 5; Rev. xvii. 4, xviii. 12, 16.) This is supposed to be the very precious colour extracted from the purpura or murex, a species of shell-fish; and the same with the famous Tyrian dye, so costly, and so much celebrated in antiquity. The purple dye is called, in 1 Mac. iv. 23, “purple of the sea,” or sea purple; it being the blood or juice of a turbinated shell-fish, which the Jews call chelzun. (See SCARLET.) Among the blessings pronounced by Moses upon the tribes of Israel, those of Zebulun and Issachar are, “They shall suck of the abundance of the seas, and of the treasures hid in the sand.” Deut. xxxiii. 19. The words of Tacitus are remarkable: “The river Belus falls into the Jewish Sea, about whose mouth those sands mixed with nitre are collected, out of which glass is formed.” But it seems much more natural to explain “the treasures hid in the sand,” of those highly valuable murices and purpuræ which were found on the sea-coast, near the country of Zebulun and Issachar, and of which those tribes partook in common with their heathen neighbours of Tyre, who rendered the curious dyes made from those shell-fish so famous among the Romans by the names of Sarranum ostrum, Tyrii colores. Acts xvi. 14. In reference to the purple vestment (Luke xvi. 19), it may be observed that this was not appropriately a royal robe. In the earlier times it was the dress of any of high rank. Thus all the courtiers were styled by the historians purpurati. Mr. Harmer styles purple the most sublime of all earthly colours, having the gaudiness of red, of which it retains a shade, softened with the gravity of blue.

PURPOSE OF GOD. See DECREES.

PURSE. This word, which is found in Prov. i.

14, denotes a bag for money or weights, which is usually carried in the girdle in Oriental countries.

PUSEYISM, the system of doctrine allied to Popery, if not entirely identical with it, which has of late years sprung up among Oxford divines connected with the Church of England. It has received the name of Puseyism from Dr. Pusey, one of its most eminent and learned expounders. The peculiar tenets of this school are set forth in the “Tracts for the Times,” and in the writings of Dr. Pusey and Dr. Newman. Able exposures of these doctrines may be found in Isaac Taylor’s “Ancient Christianity,” and Dr. Alexander’s “Anglo-Catholicism not Apostolical,” and in an interesting little work by Dr. James Buchanan, “On the Tracts for the Times.” The Tractarian party, as they are often called, try to disguise the Romish character of their system, alleging, that they occupy a middle place between the Reformers and the Romanists. Yet the whole tendency of their writings is decidedly in favour of the Romish Church, and accordingly, a great number of the body have left the Church of England, and gone over to Popery. It may be useful and not uninteresting to give a rapid view of some of their most peculiar tenets.

The Anglo-Catholic or Puseyite party do not deny, in broad terms, the sufficiency of Scripture as a rule of faith and obedience, but they regard the tradition of the early Church as the fixed and authoritative interpreter of the Sacred Scriptures. The Church they consider as consisting not so much of the whole body of believers, as of a certain government consisting of bishops, priests, and deacons. They hold that the only authorized ministers in the Church of Christ are such as can be traced in a regular line of succession from the apostles. (See APOSTOLICAL SUCCESSION.) On this last doctrine, combined with the tenet, which the Puseyites also hold, that there is in the sacraments an efficacy to impart divine grace, may the whole system of the Tractarians be considered as founded. The late Dr. Arnold of Rugby gives the following beautifully connected view of the whole Puseyite heresy:—“God’s grace and our salvation come principally through the virtue of the sacraments. The virtue of the sacraments depends on the apostolical succession of those who administer them. The clergy, therefore, thus holding in their hands the most precious gifts of the Church, acquire naturally the title of the Church itself; the Church, as possessed of so mysterious a virtue, as to communicate to them the only means of salvation, their saving efficacy becomes at once an object of the deepest reverence. What wonder if, to a body endowed with so transcendent a gift, there should be given also the spirit of wisdom to discern all truth; so that the solemn voice of the Church in its creeds and in the decrees of its general councils, must be received as the voice of God himself! Nor can such a body be supposed to have commended any practices or states which are not really excellent, and the duty either of all Christians, or of those at least who would follow the most excellent way. Fasting, therefore, and the state of celibacy, are, the one a Christian obligation—the other, a Christian perfection. Again, being members of a body so exalted, and receiving our very salvation in a way altogether above reason, we must be cautious how we either trust to our individual consciences, rather than to the command of the Church, or how we venture to exercise our reason at all in judging of what the Church teaches; childlike faith and childlike obedience are the dispositions which God most loves. What, then, are they who are not of the Church?—who do not receive the sacraments from those who can alone give them their virtue? Surely they are aliens from God—they cannot claim his covenanted mercies; and the goodness which may not be apparent in them may not be a real goodness. God may see that it is false, though to us it appear sincere; but it is certain that they do not possess the only appointed means of salvation; and, therefore, we must consider their state as dangerous, although we may not venture to condemn them." In this systematic form, Puseyism, or the doctrines of the Oxford school, are scarcely even disguised Popery. The remarks which have already been made (see POPERY) on the unscriptural tenets of the Church of Rome, are applicable, in all their strength, to the Anglo-Catholic heresy, which has for several years past been threatening to destroy the orthodoxy, and to endanger the very existence of the Church of England.

PUSILLANIMITY is a feebleness of mind, by which it is terrified at mere trifles or imaginary dangers, unauthorised by the most distant probability.

PUTEOLI, a maritime town of Campania, in Italy, with a convenient port, which was the usual landing place from Egypt. Its modern name is Pozzoli, about eight miles distant from Naples. In the course of his journey to Rome as a prisoner, Paul landed at Puteoli, and finding some brethren in Christ, he was prevailed upon to spend a week with them, giving and receiving comfort. Acts xxviii. 13. The port of Puteoli was regarded as the most convenient harbour in Italy, and hence the merchant ships from Alexandria were uniformly accustomed to put in here. The place was a favourite resort of invalids, from the hot medicinal springs for which it was famed.

PYGARG. This animal, mentioned in Deut. xiv. 5, is explained in the margin to be the bison, or perhaps more properly the antelope.

PYRRHONISTS. See SCEPTICS.

PYTHAGOREANS, the followers of Pythagoras, a celebrated Greek philosopher, who flourished about five hundred years before the Christian era. His distinguishing doctrine was that of the metempsychosis (or transmigration of souls), which he learned among the philosophers of India. This doctrine refers to the transmigration of the human soul after death into the bodies of various animals, till it return again to its own nature. This notion led to the total rejection of animal food, and to a merciful treatment of the brute creation, which, in those ages, no other kind of argument could have secured. See METEMPSYCHOSIS—HINDUISM—PHARISEES.

PYTHONESS. See WITCH.

Q.

QUAIL (shalar—Exod. xvi. 13; Numb. xi. 31, 32; Ps. cv. 40), a bird of the gallinaceous kind. Hasselquist, mentioning the quail of the larger kind, says: "It is of the size of the turtle-dove. I have met with it in the wilderness of Palestine, near the shores of the Dead Sea and the Jordan, between Jordan and Jericho, and in the deserts of Arabia Petræa. If the food of the Israelites was a bird, this is certainly it; being so common in the places through which they passed." It is said that God gave quails to his people in the wilderness upon two occasions; first, within a few days after they had passed the Red Sea. Exod. xvi. 3–13. The second time was at the encampment at the place called in Hebrew, Kibroth-hattaavah—the graves of lust. Numb. xi. 32; Ps. cv. 40. Both of these happened in the spring, when the quails passed from Asia into Europe. They are then to be found in great quantities upon the coasts of the Red Sea and Mediterranean. God caused a wind to arise that drove them within and about the camp of the Israelites; and it is in this that the miracle consists, that they were brought so seasonably to this place, and in so great number as to furnish food for above a million of persons for more than a month. The Hebrew word shalar signifies "a quail," by the agreement of the ancient interpreters. And the Chaldee, Syriac, and Arabic languages call them nearly by the same name. The Septuagint, Symmachus, and most of commentators, both ancient and modern, understand it in the same manner; and with them agree Philo, Josephus, Apollinaris, and the rabbins; but Ludolphus has endeavoured to prove that a species of locust is spoken of by Moses. (See LOCUST.) Dr. Shaw answers, that the holy Psalmist, in describing this particular food of the Israelites, by calling the animals feathered fowls, entirely confutes this supposition. And it should be recollected, that this miracle was performed in compliance with the wish of the people that they might have flesh to eat.

QUAKERS, or FRIENDS, a body of Christians which took its rise in England, about the middle of the seventeenth century, and rapidly found its way into other countries in Europe, and into the English settlements in North America. The members of this society, we believe, called themselves at first Seekers, from their seeking the truth; but after the society was formed, they assumed the appellation of Friends. The name of Quakers was given to them by their enemies; and, though an epithet of reproach, seems to be stamped upon them indelibly. George Fox is supposed to be their first founder; but, after the Restoration, Penn and Barclay gave to their principles a more regular form. The doctrines of the society have been variously represented; and some have thought and taken pains to prove them favourable to Socinianism. But, according to Penn, they believe in the Holy Trinity, or the Father, Word, and Spirit, agreeably to the Scripture. In reply to the charge that they deny Christ to be God, Penn says, "that it is a most untrue and uncharitable censure; that they truly and expressly own him to be so, according to the Scripture." To the objection that they deny the human nature of Christ,

ACTE XXVIII. 13 14

A. Pulliam & Co. London & Cincinnati

he answers, "We never taught, said, or held, so gross a thing, but believe him to be truly and properly man, like us, sin only excepted." The doctrines of the fall, and the redemption by Christ, are, according to him, believed by them; and he firmly declares, "that they own Jesus Christ as their sacrifice, atonement, and propitiation."

But we shall here state a further account of their principles and discipline, as extracted from a summary given by one of their most respectable members.

They tell us that, about the beginning of the seventeenth century, a number of men, dissatisfied with all the modes of religious worship then known in the world, withdrew from the communion of every visible Church, to seek the Lord in retirement. Among these was their honourable elder, George Fox, who, being quickened by the immediate touches of divine love, could not satisfy his apprehensions of duty to God without directing the people where to find the like consolation and instruction. In the course of his travels, he met with many seeking persons in circumstances similar to his own, and these readily received his testimony. They then give us a short account of their sufferings and different settlements; they also vindicate Charles II. from the character of a persecutor; acknowledging that, though they suffered much during his reign, he gave as little countenance as he could to the severities of the legislature. They even tell us that he exerted his influence to rescue their friends from the unprovoked and cruel persecutions they met with in New England; and they speak with becoming gratitude of the different acts passed in their favour during the reigns of William and Mary, and George I. They then proceed to give us the following account of their doctrine:—

"We agree with other professors of the Christian name in the belief of one eternal God, the Creator and Preserver of the universe; and in Jesus Christ, his Son, the Messiah and Mediator of the new covenant. Heb. xii. 24.

"When we speak of the gracious display of the love of God to mankind, in the miraculous conception, birth, life, miracles, death, resurrection, and ascension of our Saviour, we prefer the use of such terms as we find in Scripture; and, contented with that knowledge which divine wisdom hath seen meet to reveal, we attempt not to explain those mysteries which remain under the veil; nevertheless we acknowledge and assert the divinity of Christ, who is the wisdom and power of God unto salvation. 1 Cor. i. 24.

"To Christ alone we give the title of the Word of God (John i. 1), and not to the Scriptures, although we highly esteem these sacred writings, in subordination to the Spirit (2 Pet. i. 21), from which they were given forth; and we hold, with the Apostle Paul, that they are able to make wise unto salvation, through faith, which is in Christ Jesus. 2 Tim. iii. 15.

"We reverence those most excellent precepts which are recorded in Scripture to have been delivered by our great Lord; and we firmly believe that they are practicable and binding on every Christian; and that in the life to come every man will be rewarded according to his works. Matt. xvi. 27. And further, it is our belief that, in order to enable mankind to put in practice these sacred precepts, many of which are contradictory to the unregenerate will of man (John i. 9), every man coming into the world is endued with a measure of the light, grace, or good Spirit of Christ; by which, as it is attended to, he is enabled to distinguish good from evil, and correct the disorderly passions and corrupt propensities of his nature, which mere reason is altogether insufficient to overcome. For all that belongs to man is fallible, and within the reach of temptation; but this divine grace which comes by Him who hath overcome the world (John xvi. 33), is, to those who humbly and sincerely seek it, an all-sufficient and present help in the time of need. By this the snares of the enemy are detected, his allurements avoided, and deliverance is experienced through faith in its effectual operation; whereby the soul is translated out of the kingdom of darkness, and from under the power of Satan, unto the marvellous light and kingdom of the Son of God

"Being persuaded that man, without the Spirit of Christ inwardly revealed, can do nothing to the glory of God or to effect his own salvation, we think this influence especially necessary to the performance of the highest act of which the human mind is capable—even the worship of the Father of lights and of spirits, in spirit and in truth; therefore we consider as obstructions to pure worship, all forms which divert the attention of the mind from the secret influence of this unction from the Holy One. 1 John ii. 20, 27. Yet, although true worship is not confined to time and place, we think it incumbent on Christians to meet often together (Heb. x. 25), in testimony of their dependence on the heavenly Father, and for a renewal of their spiritual strength: nevertheless, in the performance of worship, we dare not depend for our acceptance with him on a formal repetition of the words and experiences of others; but we believe it to be our duty to lay aside the activity of the imagination, and to wait in silence to have a true sight of our condition bestowed upon us; believing even a single sigh (Rom. vii. 24), arising from such a sense of our infirmities, and of the need we have of divine help, to be more acceptable to God than any performances, however specious, which originate in the will of man.

"From what has been said respecting worship, it follows that the ministry we approve must have its origin from the same source; for that which is needful for man's own direction, and for his acceptance with God (Jer. xxiii. 30–32), must be eminently such as to enable him to be helpful to others. Accordingly, we believe that the renewed assistance of the light and power of Christ is indispensably necessary for all true ministry; and that this holy influence is not at our command, or to be procured by study, but is the free gift of God to chosen and devoted servants. Hence arises our testimony against preaching for hire, in contradistinction to Christ's positive command: 'Freely ye have received, freely give' (Matt. x. 8); and hence our conscientious refusal to support such ministry by tithes, or other means.

"As we dare not encourage any ministry but that which we believe to spring from the influence of the Holy Spirit, so neither dare we attempt to restrain this influence to persons of any condition in life, or to the male sex alone; but, as male and female are one in Christ, we allow such of the female sex as we believe to be endued with a right qualification for the ministry, to exercise their gifts for the general edification of the Church; and this liberty we esteem a peculiar mark of the gospel dispensation, as foretold by the prophet Joel (ii. 28, 29), and noticed by the apostle Peter. Acts ii. 16, 17.

"There are two ceremonies in use among most professors of the Christian name—water baptism, and what is termed the Lord's supper. The first of these is generally esteemed the essential means of initiation into the Church of Christ; and the latter of maintaining communion with him. But as we have been convinced that nothing short of his redeeming power, inwardly revealed, can set the soul free from the thralldom of sin, by this power alone we believe salvation to be effected. We hold, that as there is one Lord and one faith (Eph. iv. 5), so his baptism is one, in nature and operation; that nothing short of it can make us living members of his mystical body; and that the baptism with water, administered by his forerunner John, belonged, as the latter confessed, to an inferior dispensation. John iii. 30.

"With respect to the other rite, we believe that communion between Christ and his Church is not maintained by that, nor any other external performance, but only by a real participation of his divine nature (1 Pet. ii. 4), through faith; that this is the supper alluded to in the Revelation (iii. 20): 'Behold, I stand at the door, and knock: if any man hear my voice, and open the door, I will come in to him, and will sup with him, and he with me;' and that where the substance is attained, it is unnecessary to attend to the shadow, which doth not confer grace, and concerning which opinions so different, and animosities so violent, have arisen.

"Now, as we thus believe that the grace of God, which comes by Jesus Christ, is alone sufficient for salvation, we can neither admit that it is conferred on a few only, whilst others are left without it; nor, thus asserting its universality, can we limit its operation to a partial cleansing of the soul from sin, even in this life. We entertain worthier notions both of the power and goodness of our heavenly Father, and believe that he doth vouchsafe to assist the obedient to experience a total surrender of the natural will to the guidance of his pure unerring Spirit; through whose renewed assistance they are enabled to bring forth fruits unto holiness, and to stand perfect in their present rank. Matt. v. 48; Eph. iv. 13; Col. iv. 12.

"There are not many of our tenets more generally known than our testimony against oaths, and against war. With respect to the former of these, we abide literally by Christ's positive injunction, delivered in his sermon on the mount, 'Swear not at all.' Matt. v. 34. From the same sacred collection of the most excellent precepts of moral and religious duty, from the example of our Lord himself (Matt. v. 39, 44-48, xxvi. 52, 53; Luke xxii. 51; John xviii. 11), and from the correspondent convictions of his Spirit in our hearts, we are confirmed in the belief that wars and fightings are in their origin and effects utterly repugnant to the gospel, which still breathes peace and good-will to men. We also are clearly of the judgment, that if the benevolence of the gospel were generally prevalent in the minds of men, it would effectually prevent them from oppressing, much more from enslaving, their brethren (of whatever colour or complexion), for whom, as for themselves, Christ died; and would even influence their conduct in their treatment of the brute creation, which would no longer groan, the victims of their avarice, or of their false ideas of pleasure.

"Some of our ideas have in former times, as hath been shown, subjected our friends to much suffering from government; though to the salutary purposes of government our principles are a security. They inculcate submission to the laws in all cases wherein conscience is not violated. But we hold that, as Christ's kingdom is not of this world, it is not the business of the civil magistrate to interfere in matters of religion, but to maintain the external peace and good order of the community. We therefore think persecution, even in the smallest degree, unwarrantable. We are careful in requiring our members not to be concerned in illicit trade, nor in any manner to defraud the revenue.

"It is well known that the Society, from its first appearance, has disused those names of the months and days which, having been given in honour of the heroes or false gods of the heathen, originated in their flattery or superstition; and the custom of speaking to a single person in the plural number, as having arisen also from motives of adulation. Compliments, superfluity of apparel and furniture, outward shows of rejoicing and mourning, and the observation of days and times, we esteem to be incompatible with the simplicity and sincerity of a Christian life; and public diversions, gaming, and other vain amusements of the world, we cannot but condemn. They are a waste of that time which is given us for nobler purposes; and divert the attention of the mind from the sober duties of life, and from the reproofs of instruction by which we are guided to an everlasting inheritance.

"To conclude, although we have exhibited the several tenets which distinguish our religious society as objects of our belief, yet we are sensible that a true and living faith is not produced in the mind of man by his own effort, but is the free gift of God in Christ Jesus (Eph. ii. 8), nourished and increased by the progressive operation of his Spirit in our hearts, and our proportionate obedience. John vii. 17. Therefore, although, for the preservation of the testimonies given us to bear, and for the peace and good order of the Society, we deem it necessary that those who are admitted into membership with us should be previously convinced of those doctrines which we esteem essential, yet we require no formal subscription to any articles, either as a condition of membership, or a qualification for the service of the Church. We prefer the judging of men by their fruits, and depending on the aid of Him who, by his prophet, hath promised to be 'a spirit of judgment to him that sitteth in judgment.' Isa. xxviii. 6. Without this, there is a danger of receiving numbers into outward communion, without any addition to that spiritual sheepfold, whereof our blessed Lord declared himself to be both the door and the shepherd (John x. 7, 11); that is, such as know his voice, and follow him in the paths of obedience.

"In the practice of discipline, we think it indispensable that the order recommended by Christ himself be invariably observed. Matt. xviii. 15-17.

"To effect the salutary purposes of discipline, meetings were appointed at an early period of the Society, which, from the times of their being held, were called quarterly meetings. It was afterwards found expedient to divide the districts of those meetings, and to meet more frequently; from whence arose monthly meetings, subordinate to those held quarterly. At length, in 1669, a yearly meeting was established, to superintend, assist, and provide rules for the whole; previously to which general meetings had been occasionally held."

Within a few years past, a great division has been taking place in this peaceable community. They subsist now in two separate bodies, called the Orthodox, and the Hicksites, after David Hicks, whose views are Socinian. The number of Quakers in England and Ireland seems to be rather diminishing. In 1800 they had 413 meeting-houses, while by last census in 1851 the number was only 371. In Scotland they amount to only a few hundreds. In America their number is estimated at nearly three hundred thousand people.

QUARANTANA. This is the loftiest of the hills in the mountainous regions of Judea, between Jerusalem and Jericho. It is a steep, naked, and lofty hill, and has been supposed, from time immemorial, the scene of our Lord's temptation, when the devil, taking him up into an exceeding high mountain," showed him "all the kingdoms of the world, and the glory of them." "The prospect from the top," says Mr. Wylie, "commands the hills of Gilead, the countries of Ammon and Moab, the whole of the Dead Sea, and immediately beneath, the valley and stream of the Jordan. The aspect of the region appears to have differed little in the time of our Saviour from its appearance at this day; a mountainous and gloomy wilderness extending from a point considerably north of Jericho to the bottom of the Dead Sea—confined, however, to the mountains, and not extending into the fertile vale of the Jordan beneath. The narrative of Matthew would lead us to infer that the scene of the fasting and temptation was somewhere in this solitude; for we are told that, immediately on being baptized in the Jordan—and his baptism appears to have taken place nearly opposite Jericho—he went up into the wilderness to be tempted. The gloomy and terrific features of the scenery around the mountain of Quarantana realize all that the mind can picture to itself of such a spot—a place where the spirit of darkness might walk, and where the melancholy power of the scenery might unite with the force of the temptation in subduing the mind. 'A most miserable, dry, barren place it is,' says Maundrell, 'consisting of high rocky mountains, so torn and disordered, as if the earth had here suffered some great convulsion, in which its very bowels had been turned outwards.'"

QUARREL, a brawl or contest. Solomon compares him who meddles with the quarrels of people unknown, to one who takes a dog by the ears, and so rashly exposes himself to be bitten. This is generally the case; but it should not be concluded from hence, that we ought never to try to reconcile neighbours. It must be attempted, however, with much prudence, caution, and charity, for fear of increasing the evil we undertake to appease. Matt. v. 9.

QUARRIES. The Hebrew word rendered "quarries," in Judg. iii. 19, is derived from a root signifying to cut out or carve as a sculptor; whence several of the ancient versions understand the word of idols or graven images, by which it is generally rendered. It was perhaps the place where idolatrous statues of stone were cut out of the quarry, and erected as objects of worship by the Moabites.

QUARTUS, a disciple mentioned by the apostle Paul in his Epistle to the Romans (xvi. 23). The Greeks say he was one of the seventy whom Christ sent out to preach the gospel of the kingdom, and that he was afterwards bishop of Berythus, a seaport town in Phœnicia.

QUATERNION. In Acts xii. 4, we are told that the apostle Peter was guarded by four quater-nions of soldiers. Among the Romans, the night-watch was distributed among quaternions, or detachments of four soldiers, each of whom watched three hours; and, since Herod chose that Peter should be watched by four soldiers, of whom two should be in the prison (verse 6), and two be stationed at the gates, it was necessary that four quaternions of soldiers should be appointed for that purpose.

QUEEN, a king's wife. This is the general acceptance of the term queen; but it seems to be used by the Orientals in another sense, and corresponds to the official title of "king's mother." A knowledge of this circumstance will remove several discrepancies in the historical books of the Old Testament, which have greatly perplexed the commentators. See KING'S MOTHER.

QUEEN OF HEAVEN, the same with Ashtaroth or Astarte (which see), supposed by many to be the moon. The name occurs in Jer. vii. 18, "The children gather wood, and the fathers kindle the fire, and the women knead their dough, to make cakes to the queen of heaven, and to pour out drink-offerings unto other gods, that they may provoke me to anger." It is probable that the first mode of idolatrous worship was that of the sun and moon and the other heavenly bodies. That the Hebrews had been accustomed to practise this species of idolatry is plain from Jer. xlv. 16-18, "As for the word that thou hast spoken unto us in the name of the Lord, we will not hearken unto thee: but we will certainly do whatsoever thing goeth forth out of our own mouth, to burn incense unto the queen of heaven, and to pour out drink-offerings unto her, as we have done, we, and our fathers, our kings, and our princes, in the cities of Judah, and in the streets of Jerusalem: for then had we plenty of victuals, and were well, and saw no evil. But since we left off to burn incense to the queen of heaven, and to pour out drink-offerings unto her, we have wanted all things, and have been consumed by the sword and by the famine."

QUEEN OF SHEBA. See SHEBA.

QUENCH, a word which is frequently used in Scripture in a figurative sense. It is applied to the influence of the Holy Spirit in 1 Thess. v. 19, "Quench not the Spirit," where the Spirit is compared to a candle or fire, which the believer is in danger of quenching or extinguishing by inconsistency of character and conduct, or by neglecting to employ those means which are fitted to cherish the operation of the Spirit in the soul. Some commentators suppose the apostle's warning not to quench the Spirit, to apply to the extraordinary gifts of the Spirit; but we see no warrant in Scripture for any such limitation, and would rather be disposed to consider the passage as pointing at those common graces of the Spirit which are the privilege and the portion of all God's people.

QUESTIONS. We are informed, in Luke ii. 46: "And it came to pass, that after three days they found him in the temple, sitting in the midst of the doctors, both hearing them, and asking them questions." The employment in which the parents of our Lord found him engaged, was quite usual among the Jews. Questions were put by the pupils to the Jewish rabbis, who, in solving them, gave much instruction on the point under consideration.

QUIETNESS, in a moral sense, is opposed to disorderly motion, to turbulence, to contention, to pragmatical curiosity, to all such improper behaviour whereby the right of others is infringed, their peace disturbed, their just interest or welfare in any way prejudiced. It is a calm, steady, regular way of proceeding, within the bounds and measures prescribed by reason, justice and charity, modesty and sobriety. It is of such importance, that we find it enjoined in the Sacred Scripture; and we are commanded to study and pursue it with the greatest diligence and care. 1 Thess. iv. 11. Dr. Barrow has two admirable sermons on this subject, in the first volume of his works. He justly observes—1. That quietness is just and equal. 2. It indicates humility, modesty, and sobriety of mind. 3. It is beneficial to the world, preserving the general order of things. 4. It preserves concord and amity. 5. It begets tranquillity and peace. 6. It is a decent and lovely thing, indicating a good disposition, and producing good effects. 7. It adorneth any profession, bringing credit and respect thereto. 8. It is a safe practice, keeping us from needless encumbrances and hazards; whereas pragmatism, interfering with the business and concerns of others, often raises dissensions, involves in guilt, injures others, shows our vanity and pride, and exposes to continual trouble and danger.

QUINQUAGESIMA, a Sunday, so called because it is the fiftieth day before Easter, reckoned in whole numbers. See SHROVE SUNDAY.

QUIRINUS. See CYRENIUS.

QUIVER. See ARCHERY—ARMS—ARROW—BOW.

R.

RAAMAH, a trading city, thus referred to in Ezek. xxvii. 22, "The merchants of Sheba and Raamah, they were thy merchants: they occupied in thy fairs with chief of all spices, and with all precious stones, and gold." It is supposed to have been in Arabia, and to have derived its name from the fourth son of Cush, Gen. x. 7.

RAAMSES or RAMESSES. The precise situation of this place is not ascertained, but as the land of Goshen in Egypt is called (Gen. xlvii. 11) "the land of Rameses," there is good reason to believe that the town was in that country, to which it gave, or from which it received, its name. The Jerusalem Targum calls it Pelusium.

RAB, RABBI, a title of dignity applied in ancient times to the chief officers of an Eastern prince. The word Rab signifies literally a great or mighty one; but in the time of our blessed Lord it was an appellation of one who was superior in learning. The word at that period assumed the form of Rabbi, my master. It seems to have been first used by the Chaldee princes to their ministers of state. When applied as a literary title, it was somewhat equivalent to doctor among us, and before receiving such a title, it was necessary to pass through several gradations, a Rab or Rabbin being regarded as one perfectly skilled in the law and traditions. To this there may possibly be an allusion in Matt. x. 24, "The disciple is not above his master, nor the servant above his lord." The title and office of Rabbin is still preserved among the modern Jews, their office being not only to preach in the synagogues, but to celebrate marriages, to declare divorces, and to judge in all religious and civil matters. They are supposed to be intimately acquainted with the Targums, the Talmud, the Masora, and the Cabbala. Those who study the letter of Scripture are called CARAITES (which see), and those who chiefly study the traditions are called Rabbinists or Talmudists, while those who apply themselves to the imaginary mysteries involved in letters and numbers are called CABBALISTS (which see.)

RABBAH or RABBATH, the capital city of the Ammonites, near the source of the river Jabbok. This was the city that David sent Joab and the army to besiege, and before the walls of which Uriah the Hittite was smitten that he died. It was called Rab-bath-Ammon by the Hebrews, Philadelphia by the Greeks, and Ammon by the Arabs. The present aspect of this ruinous city affords a striking fulfilment of ancient prophecy. It is said in Ezekiel xxv. 5, "I will make Rabbah a stable for camels." Lord Lindsay informs us that the place is "absolutely covered in every direction with their dung." In the same passage, Ezekiel says, "I will make the Ammonites a couching-place for flocks; and ye shall know that I am the Lord." Lord Lindsay tells us that in ascending the valley he met with sheep and goats by thousands coming to drink.

RABBATH-MOAB. See AR-MOAB.

RABSARIS, an officer of Sennacherib, king of Assyria. 2 Kings xviii. 17.

RABSHAKEH, a messenger despatched by Sennacherib to summon Hezekiah, king of Judah, to surrender to his master. 2 Kings xviii. 17; Isa. xxxvi. 2.

RACA, a Syriac word of contempt, translated by the Vulgate, in Judg. xi. 3, "vain, empty, worthless men." It is referred to as a term of great reproach, in Matt. v. 22. Lightfoot tells us, that when used by the Jews, it was pronounced with visible tokens of indignation, as spitting, or turning away the head.

RACE, RUNNING. The numerous allusions in the writings of Paul to the races and games established in Greece, require some acquaintance with the nature and laws of those institutions, to render such passages intelligible. (See GAMES.) There were two kinds of races—the foot race and the chariot race. The former was regarded as holding the first rank among the ancient games. The race course was usually a stadium in length, or about six hundred feet. It is to this that the language of Paul alludes, (Heb. xii. 1), "The race set before him," or appointed by authority, and publicly measured. On each side of the race-course, and at its extremity, were erected seats for the spectators, who had come in crowds from all parts of Greece. Hence the force of the apostolic expression: "Seeing we are compassed about with so great a cloud of witnesses." The racers were required, before starting, to put away from them every hindrance to their progress; and, accordingly, the apostle entreats the Christian, "Let us lay aside every weight, and the sin which doth so easily beset us." To animate the competitors in the race, the prizes were placed in a very conspicuous situation, that they might be always in view. To this the apostle obviously refers in Phil. iii. 14, 15: "I press toward the mark for the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus. Let us therefore, as many as be perfect, be thus minded: and if in any thing ye be otherwise minded, God shall reveal even this unto you." The chariot races were the most renowned among the Grecian games. Burder, in his Oriental Customs, supposes that when the apostle says, in 1 Cor. xvi. 9, "For a great door and effectual is opened unto me, and there are many adversaries," he alludes to the door of the circus, which was opened to let out the chariots where the races were to begin; and that by the word "adversaries," is meant the competitors with whom he was to contend, as in a race-course. The victors in their games were crowned with wreaths of wild olive, pine, parsley, or laurel, according to the different places where the games were celebrated. (See CROWN.)

RACHEL, the daughter of Laban, sister of Leah, and favourite wife of Jacob. She was the mother of Joseph and Benjamin. The evangelist Matthew introduces Rachel thus, in speaking of the cruel massacre of the children at Bethlehem (ii. 18), "In Rama was there a voice heard, lamentation, and weeping, and great mourning, Rachel weeping for her children, and would not be comforted, because they are not." Many a mother's heart in Bethlehem and in its neighbourhood was torn with anguish on witnessing the murder of the child of her bosom. The wailings of an Oriental mother on the loss of her children are said to be heart-rending. She tears her hair and beats her bosom, and utters piercing cries of deepest sorrow. And to describe the horrors of that mournful day the evangelist quotes the language of Jer. xxxi. 15. By a bold figure, Rachel the beloved wife of Jacob might be conceived as roused from the grave and viewing this slaughter of the children as the consummation of the wrongs which her descendants had suffered from her death even until now, she reads the heavens with her cries, weeping for her children, and refusing to be comforted.

RAGUEL. See JETHRO.

RAHAB, a woman belonging to the city of Jericho, who received and concealed the spies sent by Joshua. Commentators have disputed much about Rahab's character. Some have supposed her to have been a hostess or inn-keeper. But in Eastern countries, more especially in those early times, houses of public entertainment were unknown. (See INN.) It cannot be denied that the Hebrew word is rightly translated "harlot." Many are unwilling to admit this, as she is commended by the apostle for her faith (Heb. xi. 31), and, by her marriage with Salmon (Matt. i. 5), subsequently came into the line of our Lord's progenitors. But it is surely quite possible that the previous character of Rahab may have been notoriously immoral, like that of Mary Magdalene, and yet that, after the destruction of Jericho, she may have been remarkable for her piety and Christian consistency. The opprobrious appellation remained, it is true, as in the case of Matthew, who is called "Matthew the publican," after he had been chosen an apostle. But if she had truly repented, there is no more justice in charging the sins of her former life upon her, than in reproaching Abraham with idolatry, though he had been undoubtedly an idolater before he was called of God.

RAIMENT. See DRESS.

RAIN, the vapours exhaled by the sun, which descend from the clouds to water the earth. The sacred writers often speak of the early and latter rains. The early rains usually commenced in the end of October, or beginning of November; the latter rain occurred in the month of March. Rain is sometimes used as the symbol of the Divine goodness, "Then shall we know, if we follow on to know the Lord: his going forth is prepared as the morning; and he shall come unto us as the rain, as the latter and former rain unto the earth." Hosea vi. 3. And also as the symbol of instruction, "My doctrine shall drop as the rain, my speech shall distil as the dew; as the small rain upon the tender herb, and as the showers upon the grass." Deut. xxxii. 2. The divine influences are compared to rain in Isa. xlv. 3, 4.

RAINBOW. This beautiful and interesting appearance is caused by the refraction and reflection of the sun's rays, by clouds or drops of rain. The colours of the rainbow are the result of the decomposition of white light, in its passage through the globular drops of water, forming a shower of rain. The rainbow was appointed after the deluge as a sign of God's covenant with man. Thus, Gen. ix. 12: "And God said, This is the token of the covenant which I make between me and you, and every living creature that is with you, for perpetual generations." It has been disputed whether the rainbow had ever been seen before the flood; but the language of the sacred historian certainly conveys the impression, that this was the first appearance of the celestial arch. There is a frequent reference to the rainbow throughout the Sacred Volume. Thus: "As the appearance of the bow that is in the cloud in the day of rain, so was the appearance of the brightness round about. This was the appearance of the likeness of the glory of the Lord. And when I saw it, I fell upon my face, and I heard a voice of one that spake." Ezek. i. 28. "And he that sat was to look upon like a jasper and a sardine stone; and there was a rainbow round about the throne, in sight like to an emerald." Rev. iv. 3. "And I saw another mighty angel come down from heaven, clothed with a cloud; and a rainbow was upon his head, and his face was as it were the sun, and his feet as pillars of fire." Rev. x. 1.

RAISINS. The word so translated, in 1 Sam. xxv. 18, signifies dried grapes, or lumps of them, as it is in the margin. See GRAPES—VINE.

RAM, the male of sheep. It is spoken of in prophecy as the symbol of a monarch or prince. Thus, in the prophecy of Daniel, Darius the Persian is represented as a ram. It is also an engine of war, used by the ancients for beating down the enemies' walls, and called a battering-ram, which was an engine with an iron head, resembling the head of a ram. Such was the formidable engine of which the prophet Ezekiel (iv. 1, 2) warned the inhabitants of Jerusalem: "Thou also, son of man, take thee a tile, and lay it before thee, and portray upon it the city, even Jerusalem: and lay siege against it, and build a fort against it, and cast a mount against it; set the camp also against it, and set battering-rams against it round about." These engines were invented by the Babylonians, from whom they were borrowed, and improved upon by the Greeks and Romans. Ezekiel would become acquainted with their dreadful execution, even during his residence in Assyria. In the reign of David, the battering-ram seems to have been employed in the siege of Abel-bethmaachah: "And they came and besieged him in Abel of Beth-maachah, and they cast up a bank against the city, and it stood in the trench: and all the people that were with Joab battered the wall, to throw it down." 2 Sam. xx. 15.

RAMAH, literally signifying an eminence, a city of Benjamin, six miles from Jerusalem on the road from Samaria. The true site, Dr Robinson alleges, of that Ramah which was the birth-place, residence, and burial-place of Samuel, must have been early forgotten; for both Eusebius and Jerome, with little probability, place it in the plain near Diospolis or Lydda. There is a spot still called Kharaib-er-Ram, or "Ruins of Ramah," the name of which, Lord Lindsay says, fell upon his ear "like the crack of a pistol." Dr Wilson tells us that "at this place there are only a few ruined arches and some heaps of stones, which, as conjectured by Dr Robinson, have probably belonged to some khan. On an adjoining height, lying directly E.N.E., at the distance of a quarter of an hour, is an ancient site, marked by ruins bearing the name of Ramah, which has been recognised as the Ramah of Benjamin."

RAMESES. See RAAMES.

RAMOTH, a city in the mountains of Gilead, and hence often called Ramoth-Gilead, and also Ramoth-Mizpeh, or the Watch tower. It was one of the cities of refuge beyond the Jordan, and was famous as having been the occasion of several wars between the kings of Israel and the kings of Damascus. It was the scene of Ahab's murder in battle with the Syrians. - Jehoram, king of Judah, also, was wounded here, and Jehu was anointed in this town king of Israel. After that event Ramoth disappears from the sacred narrative, and the utmost obscurity rests upon its present site. The city has shared in the curse pronounced upon the country of the Ammonites, to which it belonged. Gesenius thinks that the Ramoth of Scripture is the modern Zsalt, which is situated twenty-two miles south-east from Abou Obcida in the plain of the Jordan. Others, however, suppose that it is represented by a small town called Ramya.

RANSOM, a price paid to recover a person or thing from one who detains that person or thing in captivity. Hence prisoners of war, or slaves, are said to be ransomed, when they are liberated in exchange for a valuable consideration. Whatever is substituted or exchanged, in compensation for the party, is his ransom; but the word ransom is more extensively taken in Scripture. A man is said to ransom his life (Exod. xxi. 30), to substitute a sum of money instead of his life (Exod. xxx. 12; Job xxxvi. 18; Ps. xlix. 7); and some kinds of sacrifices might be regarded as ransoms—that is, as substitutes for the offerer. In like manner Christ is said to give himself a ransom for all (1 Tim. ii. 6; Matt. xx. 28; Mark x. 45); a substitute for them; bearing sufferings in their stead; undergoing that penalty which would otherwise attach to them. Rom. iii. 24, viii. 23; 1 Cor. i. 30; Eph. i. 7, iv. 30; Heb ix. 15. See REDEEMER.

RANTERS. See METHODISTS.

RASHNESS consists in undertaking an action, or pronouncing an opinion, without a due examination of the grounds, motives, or arguments, that ought first to be weighed. See JUDGING, RASH.

RATIONALISM, a name given to a philosophico-religious system of belief, which has been for some time prevalent in Germany, professing to reduce the truths of revelation to the standard of human reason. The intuitions of the human mind are considered as superior in authority to the statements of the Bible, and are therefore viewed as criteria by which these statements are to be judged. The respective spheres of operation of reason and revelation are thus reversed, and reason, which ought to bow with implicit submission before a well-authenticated revelation, is exalted above it. See NEOLOGY.

RAVEN, called oreb among the Hebrews, a ravenous bird of the genus Corvus, regarded as unclean by the law of Moses. The blackness of the raven is proverbial. Hence, in Cant. v. 11, the locks of the bridegroom are said to be black and bushy as a raven; or, more literally, his pendulous locks to be black as a raven. "However the fact may be accounted for, the satisfying of their hunger, by the supply of food, is repeatedly alluded to by the inspired writers as a proof of the care of Providence for every living thing. 'The Lord giveth to the beast his food,' says the Psalmist (cxlvii. 9), 'and to the young ravens which cry.' When the question is asked, in Job xxxviii. 41: 'Who provideth for the raven his food, when his young ones cry unto God, wandering for want of meat?' the answer intimateth that God alone provides for them.

"From this care of God for ravens, our Saviour calls upon human beings, who are of a far nobler nature, to trust to his providence for the supply of their wants. 'Consider the ravens; for they neither sow nor reap, which neither have storehouse nor barn, and God feedeth them. How much more are ye better than the fowls?' Luke xii. 24. By this declaration, our Lord does not mean to throw an obstacle in the way of industry. He only means to discourage unreasonable anxiety about the supplies of to-morrow. While we bestir ourselves in securing these, we discharge an important duty; but excessive anxiety concerning them accuses God of negligence in providing for our wants, or weakness in the control of those events on which supplies depend.

"If ravens at any time forget their offspring, they were once at least serviceable in supplying with food an eminent servant of Heaven. In the 17th chapter of 1 Kings, we are told that Elijah the Tishbite received a command from the God of Israel, after prophesying a drought of three years, as a punishment of that people for apostasy, to hide himself from Ahab by the brook Cherith, which is before Jordan, and to drink of the brook, and the ravens should feed him with bread and flesh morning and evening.

"No bird, or even beast, deserves more to be called omnivorous than the raven. It refuses no kind of food, when hunger prompts, but prefers flesh, whether alive or dead, fresh or putrid. It preys on lambs and weakly sheep, leverets, and young ducks, shore fish and shell fish. Shell fish it lifts up into the air and drops, that the shell may be broken and the fish obtained. When it assails dead or living bodies, it always begins with their eyes. These it reckons a delicious morsel, and picks them out before it proceed to any other part. This fact is mentioned by Solomon: 'The eye that mocketh at his father, and despiseth to obey his mother, the ravens of the valley shall pick it out, and the young eagles shall eat it.'" Prov. xxx. 17.

RAVISH, the taking away of any thing from any one by violence. Gen. xxxiv. 2.

RAZOR. The Psalmist compares the tongue of Doeg (Ps. lii. 2) to a sharp razor starting aside from what should be its true operation, to a bloody purpose and effect. In reference to Isa. vii. 20, "Shaving by a razor that is hired," Mr. Taylor thinks it likely that there is an implication of contempt as well as suffering included in it, as the office of a barber ambulant has seldom been esteemed of any dignity, either in the East or in the West.

READING OF THE SCRIPTURES. See SCRIPTURES.

READINGS, VARIOUS. The different manner in which some passages are expressed in different manuscripts of the Old and New Testaments, together with the omission or insertion of a word or a clause, constitute what are called various readings. These have arisen from the oversight or mistakes of transcribers, who of course were not supernaturally guarded against the possibility of error, and thus various readings would be propagated and increased in proportion to the number of transcripts that were made. "These various readings," says a learned writer, "do not weaken the authority of the sacred text, or prove it to have been wilfully corrupted, because it is well known they do not interfere with the doctrines revealed or the practices enjoined by the Word of God; as originally delivered by the inspired writers, 'the weightier matters of the law' stand unaffected by them, and indeed we may say, confirmed, because every text which in all manuscripts and versions is read without variation, receives thereby the strongest confirmation; and, moreover, various readings are not without their use, for they may often assist us to understand a passage which appears difficult, or to account for the expressions of one which appears contradictory. To a person who has not considered the subject closely, it may appear sufficient to overthrow the authority of the text, that thirty thousand various readings have been discovered, but when they are examined closely, and all that are not properly various readings rejected, the number will be somewhat diminished; from these let all be deducted which make no alteration in the several passages to which they refer, and the reduction will be still greater; and out of the remainder there are not any that can invalidate the authority of those doctrines that have been esteemed fundamental, or shake a single point of that internal evidence whereby the divine original of the Scriptures is supported; so that the friends of revelation had no grounds for the alarm they felt at the time when the subject of various readings began to be discussed. These observations apply strongly to the New Testament, which, as it has been transcribed more frequently, and probably by less skilful transcribers than the Old, has in proportion many more various readings; and respecting these it has been said, 'that all the omissions of the ancient manuscripts put together would not countenance the omission of any essential doctrine of the gospel, relative to faith or morals; and all the additions countenanced by the whole mass of manuscripts already collated do not introduce a single point essential either to faith or morals, beyond what may be found in the Complutensian or Elzevir editions.'"

REALISTS, the name of a sect of philosophers formed in the middle ages, in opposition to the Nominalists. The former believed that universals are realities, and have an actual existence out of the mind; while the latter contended that they exist only in name, and not in reality.

REAPING is such a natural employment in agriculture, that it almost glides of itself into a metaphorical action, at once expressive and easily understood. To cut down corn, to gather fruits, when come to maturity; to receive the natural effects, or consequences, or rewards, of good or bad actions, have many points of similitude, which are readily comprehended by all, and furnish frequent allusions in Scripture. The reapers of Palestine and Syria make use of the sickle in cutting down their crops. They go to the field very early in the morning, and return betimes in the afternoon. They carry provisions along with them, and leathern bottles filled with water. It appears, from the beautiful story of Ruth, that, in Palestine, the women lent their assistance in cutting down and gathering in the harvest. It was another custom among the Jews to set a confidential servant over the reapers, to see that they executed their work properly, that they had suitable provisions, and to pay them their wages; the Chaldees called him rab, the master, ruler, or governor of the reapers. Such was the person who directed the labours of the reapers in the field of Boaz. See HARVEST.

REASON. We have been endowed by our Creator with reason for the most valuable and necessary ends; but these ends, in reference to theology, are too little regarded. The Socinian entertains the most vague and extravagant views as to the illimitable extent to which reason can go, while the enthusiast, on the other hand, restricts it within too narrow bounds; and one of the most necessary points, we conceive, in the logical training of the speculative inquirer in theology, is to enable him to ascertain the precise and definite limits which bound the province within which the exercise of human reason must be strictly confined. As long as we investigate the evidence on which the truth of revelation rests, all is well; and even after having ascertained that there is sufficient evidence to prove that the alleged revelation has indeed come from God, reason may legitimately inquire what is the precise meaning of its contents, and the relative bearing of its parts upon each other, or, in other words, what is usually termed the analogy of faith. Here, however, we have reached the point at which reason must pause, and revelation assume the sole and undivided supremacy. The truth of the individual doctrines is founded not on their reasonableness, though that may be admitted as an additional evidence in their favour, but solely on the authority of Him from whom we have ascertained the revelation to have come. It is not necessary, as the Socinian would argue, that what the Bible teaches should be proved to be consistent with reason; this were to make the reason of man, feeble though it be, the arbiter and judge in matters which, from their very nature, must be regarded as beyond the limits of human investigation. Revelation presupposes man to be ignorant of those truths which it unfolds, and shall he, notwithstanding, dare to exalt reason so extravagantly as to imagine it, in point of fact, superior in authority to the dictates of inspiration? No, by no means. It is in condescension to the feebleness and inadequacy of human reason that a revelation has been imparted at all; and ever recollecting that what we do not understand is far from being, on that account, necessarily untrue, let us bow implicitly to the simple statements of that Being whose "understanding is infinite."

No little injury has been done to the cause of Christianity by the extravagant adulators of human reason. Under the delusive idea, that by depriving the religion of the Bible of all that was peculiar, and by endeavouring to reduce it to a perfect consistency and harmony with what are imagined to be the necessary truths taught by nature, they have furnished the infidel with powerful, and, we fear, too effective weapons, wherewith to destroy the whole Christian system. The result, accordingly, has been such as might have been anticipated. Bolingbroke, Tindal, Collins, and many others of the same school, have directed their whole efforts to show that there is nothing in Christianity which was not previously revealed to us in the religion of nature; and if any mysteries are recorded, they are merely resolvable into the figurative phraseology in which the author wrote, or into subsequent corruptions and interpolations of the record itself. Thus it is that under the guise of friendship have the deadliest blows been struck at all that is vital in the Christianity of the Bible; and that, too, arising from no other cause than the injudicious conduct of its real friends. It is not in Germany alone that this spirit of rationalism has been diffusing its withering influence; in Britain, also, has such a spirit been gradually gaining ground. The consistency of revelation with reason is, no doubt, when properly conducted, a powerful argument in its favour; but there is a point in the argument beyond which we dare not go, and the exact position of which it is absolutely necessary for us previously to ascertain. It was an investigation of this kind that gave rise to one of the most valuable works on mental science that has ever appeared—the immortal essay of Locke on the Human Understanding. “Were it fair to trouble thee with the history of this essay,” says the author in his epistle to the reader, “I should tell thee that five or six friends meeting at my chamber, and discoursing on a subject very remote from this, found themselves quickly at a stand by the difficulties that rose on every side. After we had a while puzzled ourselves, without coming any nearer a resolution of those doubts which perplexed us, it came into my thoughts that we took a wrong course, and that before we set ourselves upon inquiries of that nature it was necessary to examine our own abilities, and see what object our understandings were or were not fitted to deal with.” It were well for the cause of Christianity, and well for the cause of science in general, that the example of Locke were more frequently followed, and the fact rendered familiar to our minds, that there is a point where reason ends, and implicit faith in revelation must begin. The human mind has not previously discovered all that the Bible unfolds to us, otherwise what necessity for the Bible at all? If, then, there be truths peculiar to the Christian system, there is no necessity for the slightest anxiety on the part of the defenders of Christianity to reconcile any apparent inconsistency between these peculiar Christian truths and the principles of reason. A strong, presumptive argument, it is true, may be founded on the fact which, in most instances, can be shown by analogy, that what is peculiar in Christianity is not contrary to reason. Such an argument, however, can never amount to more than a presumption in its favour; and though it may be powerful enough to silence the cavils of objectors, it adds little to the direct force of the Christian evidence.

The essential and primary elements of all religious truth may be learned by the pure efforts of reason unaided by revelation, and all revealed religion, in fact, proceeds on the existence of that class of truths which is included under the term Natural Religion. But to assert this is just tantamount to the assertion that the Scriptures are accommodated to the nature of the beings to whom they are addressed. This is not all, however, that may be said in reference to their value. They state, no doubt, what is addressed to our reason, and what proceeds on the supposition that there are some truths which unassisted reason has discovered; but they do more, for they state, and in this their peculiar excellence consists, many truths which the reason of man hath not discovered, and by its most strenuous and sustained exertions never could discover. And the danger is, that in deference to a certain class of sceptics and unbelievers, these peculiarities of the Christian system should either be entirely overlooked, or attempted to be so modified as to suit the caprice of those who, while they profess an adherence to the doctrines of revelation, are all the while still more devoted admirers of human reason. All systems of religion, even the most degrading, are founded to some extent on natural religion, or, in other words, on those religious sentiments and feelings which are inherent in the constitution of every mind. But from these Christianity stands separate and apart; and the exhibition of its peculiarities, as contradistinguished from every other system of religious doctrine, forms a most important branch of the Christian evidences. This argument, skilfully conducted, would tend to destroy the force of the infidel maxim, which is too often assumed as the shibboleth of a self-styled liberal party—that all religions are alike. The counterfeit, we admit, may resemble the true coin in one point—that they are both of them coins, but in every other point they are diametrically opposed. Between truth and falsehood in the eyes of God there is, and must ever be, a great gulph fixed; and though man may impiously dare to approximate the two, and even to mistake the one for the other, the eye of Omniscience discerns between them an inconceivable, an infinite distance. A false religion, whether recorded in the Koran of the Mohammedan, or the Shaster of the Brahmin, may contain many truths which in themselves are far from unimportant; but the fact that it is a false in opposition to the true religion is enough to render its services, however scrupulously observed, unacceptable in the sight of Him who is “just and true in all his ways,” as well as “holy in all his works.”

REASONING. Speaking generally, reasoning is the process by which unknown truths are inferred from those which are already known or admitted. According to this definition, it is plain that, in proportion to the certainty with which the already admitted truths are known and believed, will be the confidence with which the hitherto unknown truths will be derived from them. Truth is the end at which all reasoning is designed to aim; but it is only when the truth of the thing is indissolubly connected with the truth of the name, as in mathematics, that complete certainty can be attained. In other sciences, supported by moral evidence merely, there is a constant oscillation of mind between the truth of the name and the truth of the thing. Ambiguity attaches to the words employed; and a constant and unremitting exercise of attention is necessary, to prevent us from falling into error. Such a vigorous effort of mind we are invariably, though unconsciously, putting forth in reasoning, and must in fact continue to do so, until every word that we employ shall be as fixed and certain in its signification as any one of the terms in mathematical science. It is on the nature of the definition that the great difference depends which subsists between demonstrative and moral reasoning. Condillac speaks slightly of this distinction, as if there were no difficulty in overcoming it. The same idea seems to have been entertained by Leibnitz and Locke. But when we take into consideration the uncertainty and ambiguity which attaches to the words employed in moral reasoning, we may well despair of ever realising the expectations of these eminent philosophers. Unless we could arrive at as clear and definite notions of the complicated objects with which moral reasoning is conversant, as of the simple relations of number and quantity, it were absurd to think of the distinction ever being removed.

Besides the usual division of reasoning into demonstrative and probable, it is sometimes distinguished into reasoning à priori, and reasoning à posteriori. Reasoning à priori is that which infers effects from causes previously known, or deduces consequences from principles previously assumed. The reverse of this process is termed reasoning à posteriori. Now, of these two kinds of arguments, there can be scarcely the slightest doubt which of them is to be preferred. A priori reasoning implies a strong confidence in the power of human reason—stronger than, we fear, we are ever warranted in entertaining. Hence, when applied to subjects of great importance, as in the argument for the existence of God, drawn from the abstract necessity of his existence, philosophers the most acute have doubted its force. Both Dr Reid and Dr Brown—and in this point they are followed by Dr Chalmers—express themselves strongly. In ordinary cases, however, the à priori argument is nothing more than a piece of reasoning founded on a strong presumption derived from a previous knowledge of the subject. It supposes previous knowledge, and argues on the supposition that that knowledge is correct; or it supposes principles previously admitted, and argues on the supposition that these principles are well founded. The à posteriori argument takes a contrary course. By it we deduce causes from effects. Thus we infer that the figure of the earth is spherical, from its shadow on the moon in a lunar eclipse; and we infer the existence of a God from our own existence, and that of the objects around us.

Another division of reasoning is into direct and indirect. The one goes directly to establish the truth of any statement; the other goes to prove the falsehood or absurdity of its contrary. Mathematicians make frequent use of indirect reasoning. They first suppose the contrary to be true, then they demonstrate the impossibility of this assumption; and thence they infer the truth of the statement which it was their wish to establish. Thus moralists and theologians sometimes argue in favour of the existence of an all-wise and all-powerful Creator from the absurdities which the contrary supposition involves.

REBEKAH, the daughter of Bethuel, and wife of Isaac. See ISAAC—ESAU—JACOB.

REBEL, to cast off lawful authority, or make war against a superior. Numb. xvi. 1-22; 2 Sam. xv. 10. Men rebel against God, when they contemn his authority, and do what he forbids. Numb. xiv. 9. They rebel against his Spirit, when they resist his motions and slight his reproofs. Isa. lxiii. 10. They rebel against his word, when they refuse to believe his promises, receive his offers, or obey his laws. Ps. cvii. 11.

RECEIPT OF CUSTOM. This expression occurs in the course of the account which the Evangelist Matthew gives of his own calling. Matt. ix. 9-13. By trade or profession, Levi or Matthew was a publican or tax-gatherer. The receipt of custom, then, at which he was sitting, when Jesus passed by, was probably a small house or booth at the port of Capernaum, where it was the occupation of Matthew to collect the customs upon goods carried across the Sea of Galilee.

RECEIVE. Christ receives power, wisdom, strength, honour, glory, and blessing, when they are heartily ascribed to him in his people's praise. Rev. v. 12. To receive Christ, is to believe the promises of the Gospel, in which he is freely offered, as made of God to us wisdom, righteousness, sanctification, and redemption. John i. 12. To receive his word or law, is to hear, consider, understand, believe, and love it. Prov. ii. 1. To receive Christ's ministers, as such, is to hear them as invested with his authority, and earnestly endeavour to believe and obey their instructions. Matt. x. 40, 41. Hypocrites receive the Word of God merely by a rational consideration of and assent to it, but not so as to have it impressed on their heart. Matt. xiii. 20. Unregenerate men receive not the things of God; they have not the spiritual knowledge, love, or possession of them in their heart. 1 Cor. ii. 10.

RECHAB. The progenitor of the Rechabites, and who seems himself to have been descended from Hemath, a Kenite, as we learn from 1 Chron. ii. 55.

RECHABITES, a peculiar wandering race, sprung from the ancient Kenites, and large numbers of whom seem to have dwelt in Jerusalem in the reign of Ahab. Jeremiah informs us, chap. xxxv., that he was commissioned by God to bring them into one of the chambers of the Lord's house, and give them wine to drink. This, however, they refused to do, alleging (ver. 6, 7), "We will drink no wine: for Jonadab the son of Rechab, our father, commanded us, saying, Ye shall drink no wine, neither ye, nor your sons for ever: neither shall ye build house, nor sow seed, nor plant vineyard, nor have any: but all your days ye shall dwell in tents; that ye may live many days in the land where ye be strangers." Hitherto they had dwelt in the deserts, but the invasion of Nebuchadnezzar had driven them into Jerusalem. Some have imagined that they had separated themselves, like the Nazarites, to a life of strict seclusion and religious service. The Rechabites, however, were not Jews at all, but Kenites; and their peculiar mode of living they acknowledged to have no higher origin than the command, and probably the example, of a remote ancestor, Jonadab, the son of Rechab, who had been zealous in his day in destroying the house of Ahab and the worshippers of Baal. Travellers inform us that the Rechabites are still to be found in Arabia, observing the same customs and modes of life as their ancestors. These are the BENI-KHAIBER (which see), who dwell in tents near Medina, and, Dr Wolff says, "believe and observe the law of Moses by tradition, for they are not in possession of the written law." It is somewhat remarkable that the Talmud speaks of the Beni-Khaiber as descended from Jethro, the father-in-law of Moses.

RECLUSE, among the Papists, a person shut up in a small cell of a hermitage, or monastery, and cut off not only from all conversation with the world, but even with the house. This is a kind of voluntary imprisonment, from a motive either of devotion or penance. See MONASTERY.

RECONCILIATION, the restoring to favour or friendship those who were at variance. It is more particularly used in reference to the doctrine of the atonement. Thus God is said to reconcile us to himself by Jesus Christ. 2 Cor. v. 18. Our state by nature is that of enmity, dissatisfaction, and disobedience. But by the sufferings and merit of Christ we are reconciled and brought near to God. The blessings of reconciliation are pardon, peace, friendship, confidence, holiness, and eternal life. The judicious Guyse gives us an admirable note on this doctrine, which we may here transcribe. "When the Scripture speaks of reconciliation by Christ, or by his cross, blood, or death, it is commonly expressed by God's reconciling us to himself, and not by his being reconciled unto us; the reason of which seems to be because God is the offended party, and we are the offenders, who, as such, have need to be reconciled to him; and the price of reconciliation, by the blood of Christ, is paid to him, and not to us. Grotius observes, that, in heathen authors, men's being reconciled to their gods is always understood to signify appeasing the anger of their gods. Condemned rebels may be said to be reconciled to their sovereign when he, on one consideration or another, pardons them; though, perhaps, they still remain rebels in their hearts against him. And when our Lord ordered the offending to go and be reconciled to his offended brother, Matt. v. 23, 24, the plain meaning is, that he should go and try to appease his anger, obtain his forgiveness, and regain his favour and friendship, by humbling himself to him, asking his pardon, or satisfying him for any injury that he might have done him. In like manner, God's reconciling us to himself by the cross of Christ does not signify, as the Socinians contend, our being reconciled by conversion to a religious turn in our hearts to God, but is a reconciliation that results from God's graciously providing and accepting an atonement for us, that he might not inflict the punishment upon us which we deserved, and the law condemned us to; but might be at peace with us, and receive us into favour on Christ's account. For this reconciliation by the cross of Christ is in a way of atonement or satisfaction to divine justice for sin; and with respect hereunto, we are said to be reconciled to God by the death of his Son while we are enemies, which is of much the same import with Christ's dying for the ungodly, and while we were yet sinners. Rom. v. 6, 8, 10. And our being reconciled to God, by approving and accepting of his method of reconciliation by Jesus Christ, and, on that encouragement, turning to him, is distinguished from his reconciling us to himself, and not imputing our trespasses to us, on account of Christ's having been made sin for us, that we might be made the righteousness of God in him. 2 Cor. v. 18, 21. This is called Christ's making reconciliation for iniquity and making reconciliation for the sins of the people, Dan. ix. 24, Heb. ii. 17, and answers to the ceremonial and typical reconciliation which was made by the blood of the sacrifices under the law, to make atonement and reconciliation for Israel, 2 Chron. xxix. 24, Ezek. xlv. 15, 17, and which was frequently styled making atonement for sin, and an atonement for their souls. Now as all the legal sacrifices of atonement, and the truly expiatory sacrifices of Christ were offered, not to the offenders but to God, to reconcile him to them, what can reconciliation by the death, blood, or cross of Christ mean, but that the law and justice of God were thereby satisfied, and all obstructions, on his part, to peace and friendship toward sinners are removed, that he might not pursue his righteous demands upon them, according to the holy justice of his nature and will, and the threatenings of his law for their sins; but might mercifully forgive them, and take them into a state of favour with himself, upon their receiving the atonement, or reconciliation (Rom. v. 11) by faith, after the offence that sin had given him, and the breach it had made upon the original friendship between him and them." See articles ATONEMENT, MEDIATOR, and PROPITIATION.

RECORDER. An office so called is mentioned in 2 Sam. viii. 16; and in the margin he is termed a remembrancer, or writer of chronicles. These functionaries were held in high honour in the East, and were invariably employed by kings to record or register the daily events of their reign.

RECORDS. See CHRONICLES.

RECTITUDE, or UPRIGHTNESS, is the choosing and pursuing those things which the mind, upon due inquiry and attention, clearly perceives to be fit and good, and avoiding those that are evil. God's law is the standard of moral rectitude.

RECTOR, a term applied to several persons whose offices are very different; as—1. The rector of a parish is a clergyman that has the charge and care of a parish, and possesses all the tithes, &c. 2. The same name is also given to the chief elective officer in several foreign universities, and also to the head master of large schools. 3. Rector is also used in several convents for the superior officer who governs the house. The Jesuits gave this name to the superiors of such of their houses as were either seminaries or colleges.

RECUSANTS, such persons as acknowledge the pope to be the supreme head of the Church, and refuse to acknowledge the king's supremacy; who are hence called Popish recusants.

REDEEMER, one who pays a ransom to deliver another from captivity or death. The term, accordingly, is applied to the Lord Jesus Christ, who "hath redeemed us to God." Christ as God-man was alone able to pay the price of human redemption, which did not consist of corruptible things, but of "the precious blood of Christ, as of a lamb slain, without blemish and without spot." The ransom was accepted of the Father, and the ransomed church of God was set free from the captivity of Satan and sin, and made partakers of that glorious liberty with which Christ makes his people free.

REDEMPTION. This word, says Dr. Gill, is from the Latin tongue, and signifies buying again; and several words, in the Greek language of the New Testament, are used in the affair of our redemption, which signify the obtaining of something by paying a proper price for it; sometimes the simple verb agorazo, to buy, is used; so the redeemed are said to be bought unto God by the blood of Christ, and to be bought from the earth, and to be bought from among men, and to be bought with a price—that is, with the price of Christ's blood. 1 Cor. vi. 20. Hence the Church of God is said to be purchased with it. Acts xx. 28. Sometimes the compound word exagorazo is used; which signifies to buy again, or out of the hands of another, as the redeemed are bought out of the hands of justice, as in Gal. iii. 13, iv. 5. In other places, lutroō is used, or other words derived from it; which signifies the deliverance of a slave or captive from thralldom, by paying a ransom price for him; so the saints are said to be redeemed not with silver or gold, the usual price paid for a ransom, but with a far greater one—the blood and life of Christ, which he came into this world to give as a ransom price for many, and even himself, which is antitutron, an answerable, adequate, and full price for them. 1 Pet. i. 18.

The evils from which we are redeemed or delivered, are, the curse of the law, sin, Satan, the world, death and hell. The moving cause of redemption is the love of God. John iii. 16. The procuring cause, Jesus Christ. 1 Pet. i. 18, 19. The ends of redemption are, that the justice of God might be satisfied; his people reconciled, adopted, sanctified, and brought to glory. The properties of it are these: 1. It is agreeable to all the perfections of God. 2. What a creature never could merit, and therefore entirely of free grace. 3. It is special and particular. 4. Full and complete. And, lastly, 5. It is eternal as to its blessings.

Redemption, then, in New Testament usage, is that glorious deliverance from sin secured by the propitiatory sacrifice of Christ for his Church. The relation which atonement and redemption hold to each other, is that of cause and effect. Atonement is the ground of redemption. (See ATONEMENT.) Redemption is one of the results of atonement. The atonement has an inseparable relation to the law as its object, yielding it such honour “that God may be just, and the justifier of him that believeth in Jesus.” Redemption has an inseparable relation to men as its object; and, therefore, in its very nature, is limited to the number for whom the price is paid, in whose behalf it is accepted, and on whom the blessing is actually bestowed. In other words, while the atonement is general, redemption is particular.

Calvinists in general, says Mr. Fuller, have considered the particularity of redemption as consisting not in the degree of Christ's sufferings (as though he must have suffered more, if more had been finally saved), or in any insufficiency that attended them, but in the sovereign purpose and design of the Father and the Son, whereby they were constituted or appointed the price of redemption; the objects of that redemption ascertained; and the ends to be answered by the whole transaction determined. They suppose the sufferings of Christ, in themselves considered, are of infinite value, sufficient to have saved all the world, and a thousand worlds, if it had pleased God to have constituted them the price of their redemption, and to have made them effectual to that end. Farther, whatever difficulties there may appear in these subjects, they in general suppose that there is in the death of Christ a sufficient ground for universal calls and invitations; and that there is no mockery or insincerity in the Holy One in any of these things. (See CALLING.)

The principal merits of this subject are involved in the two questions:—1. Had our Lord Jesus Christ any absolute determination in his death to save any of the human race? 2. Supposing such a determination to exist concerning some which does not exist concerning others, is this consistent with indefinite calls and universal invitations?

If the affirmative of the first question be established—if it be shown that Christ had an absolute purpose of salvation in his death—the limited extent of that purpose must follow, for the plain reason that an absolute purpose must be effectual. If it extended to all mankind, all mankind would certainly be saved. Unless, therefore, we will maintain the final salvation of all mankind, we must either suppose a limitation to the absolute determination of Christ to save, or deny any such determination to exist.

The affirmative of the first question is shown from the following considerations:—(1.) The promises made to Christ of the certain efficacy of his death. Ps. cx. 3; Isa. liii. 10–12. (2.) The character under which Christ died. Christ laid down his life as a shepherd. John x. 11–18; Heb. xiii. 20. Christ also laid down his life as a husband, as a surety, and as a sacrifice of atonement—all these characters implying limitation as to number. (3.) From the effects ascribed to the death of Christ being such as do not terminate upon all mankind. (4.) Christ is said to have borne the sin of many (the term many being in Scripture used to express an unlimited number only when opposed to one, or to few; but when no such opposition exists it is always used for a limited number, and generally stands opposed to all). (5.) The intercession of Christ, which is founded upon his death, and expressive of its grand design, extends not to all mankind. John vi. 37, xvii. 20. (6.) If the doctrine of eternal, personal, gratuitous election be a truth, that of a special design in the death of Christ must necessarily follow. (7.) The character of the redeemed in the world above implies a special design in the death of Christ. These are some of the reasons in favour of the doctrine that there was a certain, absolute, and consequently limited design in the death of Christ, securing the salvation of all those, and only those, who are finally saved.

With regard to the consistency of the limited extent of Christ's redemption with universal calls and invitations, we may remark, it is a subject upon which a curious mind may start many questions which it would be difficult, and perhaps impossible, to solve. That there is a consistency between the divine decrees and the free agency of man, we are bound to believe; but whether we can account for it is another thing. Both are distinctly revealed, and we must believe them. (See ATONEMENT.)

The same difficulty which presents itself to the mind respecting the consistency of a belief in particular redemption, and a belief that there is in the death of Christ a sufficient ground for indefinite calls and universal invitations, attends us, in our present state, respecting almost all the works of God. For example—(1.) The time of man's life is appointed of God. (2.) Our portion in this life is represented as coming under the divine appointment. Acts vii. 26; Ps. xxxi. 15, xlvii. 4. (3.) Events which imply the evil actions of men come under divine appointment. It must be confessed that some of these things may look like contradictions of the doctrine of free agency. They are doubtless profound subjects; and perhaps, as some have expressed it, we shall never be fully able, in the present state, to explain the link that unites the appointments of God with the free agency of man; the fact, however, is abundantly revealed in Scripture; and it ought not to distress Christians if in this matter they have all their lives to “walk by faith, and not by sight." See ATONEMENT—PROPITIATION—RECONCILIATION—SATISFACTION.

RED HEIFER. See HEIFER.

RED SEA. This extensive sea, called also the Arabian Gulf, bears the name of the Yam Suph, or sea of weeds. It is upwards of fourteen hundred miles in length, and one hundred and fifty in average breadth. In its northern part it divides into two branches, the western of which, or the gulph of Suez, was the scene of the destruction of the Egyptians when they pursued the Israelites. The precise place of the Israelites crossing the Western Gulf of the Red Sea has been much disputed. Niebuhr, Rosenmuller, Professor Robinson, and others, suppose it to have been in the immediate vicinity of Suez, but the editor of the Pictorial Bible argues strenuously in favour of a point some ten or twelve miles further south, at Ain Mousa. The latter opinion is thus supported: "At the distance of about fifteen miles below Suez, occurs Ras (Cape) Addagi projecting into the sea, and which is formed by the termination of a cluster of hills about five miles in length, which now interpose on the left between the valley and the sea, so that the road in this part has mountains on either hand for several miles. Was the entrance of this defile the mouth of the Hiroth, or pass, before which the Hebrews encamped? The cape on the opposite coast is called Ras (Cape) Moses, and near this are the Fountains of Moses (Ain Mousa), which one of the most distinct traditions points out as the scene of the miracle. The claims of Ain Mousa above Suez in the present, and indeed in any state of the gulf, are, that if the Israelites crossed here, they must have been more completely 'shut in' than at Suez, between the mountains, the wilderness, and the sea—that it is far enough from the bottom of the gulf to account for the Egyptians not going round to intercept them as they came up from the sea—that the waters being here deeper and broader, the miracle would be the more conspicuous and unquestionable, and at the same time the waters would be the more adequate to overwhelm the Egyptian host; while still the channel is not too broad for the Hebrew host to pass through in a single night. It is true that Dr Shaw does not think the water deep enough even here; but there is every reason to conclude that the water was deeper formerly than at present, and the same objection certainly applies with still greater force to the passage at Suez. Let us, however, proceed southward, and having traversed the pass, and continued our course along the shore, we come to an expansion or bay, forming the mouth, towards the Red Sea, of a valley or opening in the mountains, which is here called Badea, and also Wady Tyh, or 'The Valley of Wandering,' and which, under the various names of Wady Ramlia, Derb Towarek, Wady Jendeli, &c., extends from the Nile to the Red Sea, and through which a canal of communication seems to have formerly ran. Was this the Hiroth, or pass, before or in the mouth of which the Israelites encamped, and from which they afterwards made their famous passage? Many good authorities are of this opinion; and it deserves to be mentioned that D'Anville and Major Rennel concur in fixing the town of Clysma at this spot. Certainly no body of men could be more effectually shut in than in this bay of Badea. There are many indications that an arm of the sea, now filled up, stretched a considerable way into the opening at this place, and must have prevented all further progress to the south; and if such progress had not been thus prevented, it would be so by the mountains of Ghobede, which bound the bay and valley on the south, and which, with their continuations, stand out so close to the sea as to preclude the continuation of the march along the shore. There was therefore no retreat but through the sea, or back to Egypt through the valley; and, on the hypothesis that there was then, as at present, a practicable road through this valley between the Red Sea and the Nile, we hazard a conjecture that it was Pharaoh's intention to drive them back before him through this valley. As names and traditions, on one side of the sea, point the egress of the Hebrews at Ain Mousa—as, on the other side, the same authorities place the ingress at Badea—and as it is necessary to assume that the opening was most extensive, we might hazard a conjecture that the whole opening extended from about Ain Mousa to opposite Badea. We must again repeat, however that not the least stress is to be laid on the unsupported traditions of the natives. Ain Mousa is only one out of many places which they indicate as the point of passage. Perhaps the place which both Arabian and Egyptian traditions most strongly indicate is the large bay called Birket Faroun (Pharaoh's Pool), about the 29th parallel of latitude." On this point, however, we cannot speak with certainty.

REED (agamun—Job xl. 21, xli. 2, 20; Isa. ix. 14, xix. 15, lviii. 5; kalamos—Matt. xi. 7), a plant growing in fenny and watery places; very weak and slender, and bending with the least breath of wind. Matt. xi. 7; Luke vii. 24. Thus it is threatened: "The Lord shall smite Israel, as a reed is shaken in the water, and he shall root up Israel out of this good land, which he gave to their fathers, and shall scatter them beyond the river; because they have made their groves, provoking the Lord to anger." 1 Kings xiv. 15. The slenderness and fragility of the reed is mentioned in 2 Kings xviii. 21; Isa. xxxvi. 6: and is referred to in Matt. xii. 20, where the remark, illustrating the gentleness of our Saviour, is quoted from the prophecy of Isa. xlii. 3. The Hebrew word in these places is queneh; as also in Job xl. 21; Isa. xix. 6, xxxv. 7; Ezek. xxix. 6. See CALAMUS.

REFINE, to purge, as founders do metal from dross, or as vintners do wine from dregs. 1 Chron. xxviii. 18; Isa. xxv. 6. Christ is a refiner and purifier. By his word, his blood, his Spirit, and by sanctified troubles, he purges out the dross of error, corruption, and scandalous persons from the Church, and the dross of sinful defilement from the heart and life of his people. Mal. iii. 2, 3; Isa. xlviii. 10; Zech. xiii. 9. The word of the Lord is refined; there is no dross, error, wickedness, or vanity to be found therein. 2 Sam. xxii. 31; Ps. cxix. 140.

REFORM, to bring into a new shape, course, or disposition. The Hebrews were reformed when they left their idolatries and other evil courses, and turned to the Lord. Lev. xxvi. 23. The gospel dispensation is called the reformation: the ceremonial ordinances, being fulfilled in Christ, were laid aside for more clear, easy, and spiritual ones; and multitudes of Jews and Gentiles were turned from their legal, superstitious, idolatrous, and other wicked courses, to the profession, faith, and obedience of a God in Christ. Heb. ix. 10.

REFORMATION. This term is usually applied to the great reformation from Popery, begun by Luther in 1517. (See LUTHER.) The following succinct view of the circumstances which, under God, gave rise to the blessed Reformation are from the pen of the Rev. Mr Bryce, formerly of Gilcomston, Aberdeen:—"The direct causes of the Reformation lie on the surface, and are familiar to every reader of ecclesiastical history, but it is only the careful student who can tell all the circumstances, remote and indirect, by which this great event was accelerated. The history of the Waldenses, and the preaching of Wickliffe in England, and even the operations of John Huss and Jerome of Prague, are passed over, not because they had not an effect in bringing on the Reformation, but because they obviously occur to the most cursory reader. We fix our attention on causes somewhat less apparent and direct, which suggest to the mind the interesting truth, that Providence, for several ages, had been pointing with a true and steady aim at the restoration of scriptural religion. If we consider the Popedom as a system of dominion, which had been gradually improved and matured by succeeding generations of men, no human power can be conceived to be fixed on a more stable foundation, or so likely to remain durable. The basis of this dominion is the infallibility of the Pope, which was the characteristic, not of any individual, but of every one whose brows might chance to be encircled by the triple crown. Hence all the successors of St Peter were equally infallible, and this claim was, after a certain period, and after a severe struggle, conceded by all the nations of Europe. The apostolical succession was a matter of universal belief, and was always taught by the Romish Church, as being applicable to the Pope and his bishops, in the same absurd and unscriptural sense in which it is maintained at this day by the semi-papist party in the Church of England. Nothing could, perhaps, be so well devised to lay hold of the feelings and passions of men as the fact, that the reigning Pope was the successor of the Apostle Peter; that in his person resided all the qualities which belonged to that gifted and inspired disciple of our Lord; and that he was directed by infallible guidance to the truth in all his decisions. It was on this foundation that the dominion of the Popes was raised; it was enlarged, till it held in its tenacious grasp the property and the consciences of men; it was the source from which emanated the rights of sovereigns to their kingdoms, and to every new discovery which might be made; from the same source learned bodies received their charters, and the decisions of the courts of law their sanctions; in short, there was nothing so trifling or minute to which it did not extend, and in which it was not acknowledged, and yet it contained within itself the principles of decay. The whole range of history contains nothing so well calculated to illustrate the trite observation, that the wisdom of man can devise no scheme, however ingenious, which is perfect and durable.

"The first proof of the imperfection of the Papal system is the personal character of the individuals. The Popes were but men, some of them not the best of men; and, under the influence of unsubdued passions, especially of grasping ambition, they were induced to pronounce decisions which, even in the opinion of their most attached votaries, brought their infallibility into question. These decisions were frequently unwise, and sometimes unjust. The present interests of the reigning Pope were uniformly preferred to the prospective advantages of the holy see, and the system of nepotism, a term of which the particular application is somewhat doubtful, had occasionally the effect of exhausting the sacred treasury. As these circumstances were made known, serious doubts began to be entertained in reference to the infallible judgment of the successor of St Peter; and lest these doubts should evaporate, the Pope did not fail to pronounce decisions directly opposed to those of his predecessor, by way of proving that one of them must be wrong. The lesson of the weakness and fallibility of the Popes was taught by themselves, and must have tended to weaken the influence and authority of the Popedom, for he who claims to be universally right, and yet is often found to be wrong, will gradually lose the respect and confidence of his fellow-men. In addition to this, the profligacy of several of the Popes was calculated to undeceive the people in regard to their religious character. Leo X. was a person devoid of religious principle, and was, besides, prodigal, luxurious, and imprudent. Julius II. had nothing of the churchman in his character; his private vices were only exceeded by his savage ferocity, his arrogance, and his love of war and bloodshed. Alexander VI. is altogether remarkable, even among sovereign princes, for the magnitude of his crimes, of which the atrocity is only surpassed by that of the worst of the Roman emperors. This list might be easily increased, but enough has been said to show that the personal profligacy of the so-called vicars of Christ may be ranked among those causes which led to the Reformation.

"There was another circumstance, which led even the most blinded to discover that the Popes were subject to like passions as other men. This was the celebrated schism, which exhibited two infallible bishops—heads of the Romish Church—one at Rome and the other at Avignon. In order that men's minds might be settled on this point, so important to those who had difficulty in ascertaining their real spiritual head, a council was called, and the assembled bishops began to exercise powers which, for many ages, they were not known to possess. They deposed both the reigning Popes, and authorised the cardinals to proceed to a new election; but the love of power prevailed, and both refused to obey. For fourteen years after the council was assembled, this schism continued to prevail, and, at its termination, it was found to have given a deadly blow to the authority of the Pope. To add to the evil, the blow was dealt by themselves. The council of Basle soon after declared, by a solemn decision, that the Pope was subject to the councils of the church, and that an appeal could be taken from a sentence of the Pope to a general council.

"These divisions and disputes had the effect of opening men's eyes to the spiritual bondage in which they had been so long held, and the influence and authority of the supreme head of the church were no longer taken for granted. In the course of this schism, which lasted nearly forty years, there had been displayed by both parties a fierceness of passion, a sanguinary disposition, a worldly spirit, and a love of power entirely inconsistent with that religion which it was their professed object to maintain and promote. It is somewhat curious to observe the blindness of the contending parties in betraying to the world the weakness of that principle on which the Popedom is based—no inconsiderable proof of that deprivation of intellect which is frequently the forerunner of destruction. From this period the princes of Europe considered a general council as an effectual check upon the haughtiness and arrogance of the Popes.

"There were other causes which had an indirect influence in bringing about the Reformation, such as the restoration of learning; the multiplication of schools and universities, by which education was rendered more accessible; the invention of the art of printing, by which books were cheaply and readily diffused; and those writings in which the follies and vices of the priesthood were most severely satirized: all these things had the effect of enabling men to see the evils which had for ages been creeping into the prevailing system. The Popes now began to be alarmed for the continuance of their authority, and did what they could to obviate the effects which were likely to follow; but the period of inquiry had arrived, and it was vain to stay its progress.

"When John de Medicis, who assumed the name of Leo X., ascended the papal throne, he speedily exhausted the sacred treasury by his prodigality and licentious pleasures. The question was, how were his coffers to be replenished? and the readiest way that occurred to his counsellors was a sale of indulgences, which should be offered to all without any exceptions. As this term is apt to be misunderstood by Protestant readers, and Papists complain of the doctrines of their church being misrepresented by us, it may be observed, that it does not imply the obtaining of a liberty to sin, but being set free from those penances which the church imposed upon transgressors, by the payment of a sum of money. The rich could thus easily get rid of those troublesome and protracted penances to which poorer culprits were always subjected. It must also be confessed that Leo was not the first of the Popes who engaged in this species of traffic; it had been practised by many of his predecessors. A despiser of religion himself, and accustomed to think highly of the supreme authority of the Popes, he adopted the suggestions of his counsellors without any consideration of the change that had taken place in the opinions and information of the people. The pretence for selling indulgences at that particular time was to obtain money for promoting the pious work, as it was regarded, of completing the splendid structure of St Peter's Church at Rome; and Leo seems to have extended the term indulgence to the forgiveness of sins which might be committed in after life. This statement is made under correction, but such is my understanding of the author from whom this account is taken. Those who bought these indulgences were permitted to eat flesh during Lent, to choose a confessor most agreeable to themselves, and they received the entire forgiveness of their sins, and exemption from the pains of purgatory. This bull was forthwith published, and the indulgences exposed to sale. In Germany the management of this business was intrusted to Tetzel, a monk belonging to the order of the Dominicans, and a person of the most infamous character. Whatever Papists may say about the meaning of the papal bull, there can be no doubt of the fact that Tetzel preached about the excellency of the commodity of which he had to dispose in a strain of eloquence calculated to catch an ignorant and superstitious multitude, and declared that he had power to pardon all sins that had been committed, as well as all those which might afterwards be committed. It is not improbable that this worthless person exceeded his powers, but his insolence, impudence, and indecency are on record, and the Papist writers must admit that the court of Rome was singularly indifferent to the respectability of its agents. Tetzel and his companions openly practised the grossest vices, and set the example of the most flagitious conduct, under the shelter of the Pope. This mode of acting had led some to question the efficacy of indulgences conveyed by the hands of men so utterly polluted.

"The individual who took the lead in exposing the worthlessness of Tetzel, and the folly of trusting to indulgences, was Martin Luther, Professor of Divinity in the University of Wittemberg. He was born at Eisleben in Saxony, and originally intended to study law, but was diverted from this purpose by a singular providential occurrence. As he was walking in the fields, a flash of lightning struck his companion dead at his feet. This led to great seriousness of mind, and he entered the monastery of the Augustine friars, and took the vows, contrary to the consent, or at least the remonstrances, of his father. About a year after he had entered the monastery, he fell in with a Latin Bible, of which he was entirely ignorant, and as he read the word of inspiration, his mind was gradually expanded. Along with the sacred volume he perused with great care the writings of Augustine, and thus acquired a profound knowledge of what had been the doctrines of the church in its purest times. At first Luther was not prepared to question the Pope's authority, he merely refused to absolve those to whom Tetzel had sold indulgences. Complaints were made to Tetzel, and he threatened with the vengeance of the Pope any who should question the efficacy of the indulgences which had been granted; but he had to deal with a spirit not easily daunted. Luther examined the nature of indulgences with the greatest attention, and published the result of the investigation in a series of propositions, which Tetzel condemned to the flames, and he afterwards published two discourses by way of refuting them. Luther ridiculed without mercy the arguments and rash statements of his opponent, and his opinions were rapidly diffused over Germany. It was thus, from one step to another, that Luther was led to perceive the unscriptural nature of the Popish system, and publicly to adopt and teach that religion which is found in the Scriptures. One advantage which Luther enjoyed, was the feeling of security on the part of the Pope, and his utter contempt for the obscure individual who questioned his supremacy. It is not intended here to give a detail of the progress of the Reformation generally, but merely to show its rise in Germany, as leading to its introduction into other countries. Luther's dispute with Tetzel began in the year 1517, and in 1520 the Pope published the famous bull, by which every hope of accommodation was destroyed. When Luther received this bull he set about investigating the origin of the dominion of the Popedom, and the result was a conviction of its inconsistency with the gospel of Christ. He, therefore, contemptuously burned the bull and the decretals, publicly maintained that the Pope was antichrist, and exhorted all within his reach to separate from a church which was founded in ignorance and superstition. It is from this period we date the adoption of that system to which Protestants adhere, under various modifications, throughout Europe."

REFORMED CHURCH. See CHURCH, REFORMED.

REFRESH—(1.) To strengthen one by food. 1 Kings xiii. 7. (2.) To take REST and recover strength after fatigue. Exod. xxiii. 12. (3.) To revive and comfort. 1 Cor. xvi. 18. Men's spirits, souls, or bowels, are refreshed when they get new inward ease, strength, vigour, and comfort. Job xxxii. 20; 2 Cor. vii. 13; Prov. xxv. 13; Philem. 7. The times of refreshing and of restitution, spoken of Acts iii. 19–21, appear to be the season of religious revival and ultimate restoration of the Jews, so often predicted by the prophets. It may, however, refer to the results of the last judgment. Acts iii. 19. See REST.

REFUGE, CITIES OF. According to the law of Moses, six cities were appointed in Canaan as places of refuge for those who were guilty of unintentional manslaughter, and had thereby exposed themselves to the vengeance of the kinsmen of the deceased. Three of these cities were on the eastern, and three on the western side of the Jordan. These cities were appointed to be easy of access, and well supplied with water and provisions. The roads thither were kept in good order by the public authorities; and at every division of the road there was a direction-post, bearing on it in legible characters the inscription, Refuge. These cities did not exempt the manslayer who had fled to them from the power of justice; they only prevented private revenge, and left the accused time to prepare his defence. If found guilty on trial, he was condemned to death; but if proved innocent, he was permitted to remain in safety in the city of refuge to which he had fled, and which he was allowed to quit at the death of the high-priest. Before the institution of these cities of refuge, it seems to have been customary for the manslayer to take refuge at the altar, and if the avenger of blood pursued him thither, he himself was put to death.

REFUGEES, a term first applied to the French Protestants, who, by the revocation of the edict of Nantes, were constrained to flee from persecution, and take refuge in foreign countries. Since that time, however, it has been extended to all such as leave their country in times of distress.

REGENERATION, a scriptural designation for the new birth; that work of the Holy Spirit by which we experience a change of heart, or receive a holy disposition.

It will be of advantage to notice the import of this term in other writers. It is compounded of palin, again, and genesis, generation, or origin. It is used by Greek writers to express the state of the earth in the spring, when the face and appearance of nature is renovated, and the vegetables, flowers, and fruits, are regenerated in the successors of those of the last year. So, by a strong metaphor, Cicero, writing to Atticus, expresses the state and dignity to which he was reappointed after his return from exile, by the term regeneration. Josephus also calls the rebuilding and restoration of Jerusalem, after the captivity, the regeneration of his country.

The fathers, by a literal interpretation of Paul's metaphorical language (Tit. iii. 5), unhappily employed the term regeneration to signify baptism; so that Phavorinus says expressly, referring to this place, the holy rite of baptism is called regeneration. It is so used by Justin Martyr, and other early Christians. But this is to confound the sign with the thing signified—an error, the consequences of which have been most deplorable in every succeeding age. Baptism was always thought to denote a resurrection, a transplantation, a change of manners, of society, of interests, and of cares, as those who are "risen with Christ," who are "alive from the dead," with whom "old things are passed away, and all things are become new," and when administered to believers, as in the primitive times, it actually did denote this. Still it was not the thing itself.

Regeneration, then, is to be distinguished from baptism, which is an external rite, though some have confounded them together. Nor does it signify a mere reformation of the outward conduct. Nor is it a conversion from one sect or creed to another, or even from atheism. Nor are new faculties given in this change. Nor does it consist in new revelations, a succession of terrors or consolations, or any whisper as it were from God to the heart, concerning his secret love, choice, or purpose to save us.

The change in regeneration consists in the recovery of the moral image of God upon the heart; that is to say, so as to love him supremely and serve him ultimately as our highest end, and to delight in him superlatively as our chief good. The sum of the moral law is to love the Lord our God with all our heart, and soul, and strength, and mind. This is the duty of every rational creature; and in order to obey it perfectly, no part of our inward affection or actual service ought to be, at any time, or in the least degree, misapplied. Regeneration consists in the principle being implanted, obtaining the ascendancy, and habitually prevailing over its opposite. It may be remarked, that though the inspired writers use various terms and modes of speech in order to describe this change of mind, sometimes terming it conversion, regeneration, a new creation, or the new creature; putting off the old man with his deeds, and putting on the new man; walking not after the flesh, but after the spirit, &c.; yet it is all effected by the word of truth, or the gospel of salvation, gaining an entrance into the mind, through divine teaching, so as to possess the understanding, subdue the will, and reign in the affections. In a word, it is faith working by love that constitutes the new creature, the regenerate man. Gal. v. 6; 1 John v. 1–5. It is expressed in Scripture by being born again (John iii. 7); born from above, so it may be rendered (John iii. 3, 7, 27); being quickened (Eph. ii. 1); Christ formed in the heart (Gal. iv. 12); a partaking of the divine nature. 2 Pet. i. 4.

The efficient cause of regeneration is the Divine Spirit. That man is not the author of it is evident, if we consider—(1.) The state in which men are before it takes place—a state of ignorance and inability. John iii. 4. (2.) The nature of the work shows plainly that it is not in the power of man to do it: it is called a creation, the production of a new class of principles, which was not in the mind before, and which man could not himself produce. Eph. ii. 8–10. (3.) It is expressly denied to be of man, but declared to be of God. John i. 12, 13; 1 John iii. 9. (4.) The instrumental cause, if it may be so called, or means, is the Word of God. James i. 18; 1 Cor. iv. 15.

The evidences of it are, conviction of sin, holy sorrow, deep humility, knowledge, faith, repentance, love, and devotedness to God's glory.

The properties of it are these:—(1.) It is a passive work, and herein it differs from conversion. In regeneration we are passive, and receive from God; in conversion we are active, and turn to him. (2.) It is an effectual or invincible work of God's grace. Eph. iii. 8. (3.) It is an instantaneous work, for there can be no medium between life and death; and here it differs from sanctification, which is progressive. (4.) It is a complete work, and perfect in its kind—a change of the whole man. 2 Cor. v. 17.

REHOB, a Levitical city in the tribe of Asher. Josh. xix. 28. It was also the name of a Syrian people who fought with David, but were defeated. 2 Sam. x. 8.

REHOBAM, a king of Judah who succeeded Solomon his father at the mature age of forty-one. During the seventeen years to which his reign extended he conducted himself in so despotic a manner that ten out of the twelve tribes revolted, and thus gave rise to the formation of the separate kingdom of Israel. His error lay in taking counsel of inexperienced, rash, inconsiderate young men, who advised him to adopt a course of acting the most opposed to his own interests and those of his kingdom. He died A.M. 3046, and was buried in the city of David, being succeeded by his son Abijah.

REHOBOTH, one of the cities founded by Asshur, or, as some think, Nimrod. Gen. x. 11. The original word signifies streets; and some, following the Vulgate, render "the streets of the city"—that is, of Nineveh. Michaëlis suggests that the place is called Rehoboth-ir, to distinguish it from Rehoboth by the river, mentioned in Gen. xxxvi. 37, and which was the residence or birth-place of one of the dukes of Edom.

REIGN, to rule or command as a king. 2 Sam. v. 4, 5. The saints' reign; they have a spiritual dominion over sin, Satan, and the corrupt influence of this world; and by their prayers have considerable influence in the management of it: and during the millennium, they shall possess the chief power in Church and State. Rev. v. 10, xx. 6. They reign in life spiritual, being more than conquerors, through Him that loved them, of sin, Satan, and the world; and reign in life eternal when they are advanced to the highest glory, and have every thing to their wish. Rom. v. 17. Sin reigns, and reigns unto death, when indwelling sin has the chief power in the heart, and when sin in general hastens forward, and condemns to death temporal, spiritual, and eternal. Rom. vi. 12, v. 21. Grace reigns, and reigns to eternal life; through the finished and imputed righteousness of Jesus Christ, the free favour of God, in a glorious and irresistible manner, disposes of the elect and all their concerns so as to promote their eternal life: the gracious habits implanted in their souls conquer their inward corruptions, and prepare them for eternal life; nor can sin reign over them as before. Rom. vi. 14, v. 21.

RELICS, in the Romish Church, the remains of the bodies or clothes of saints or martyrs, and the instruments by which they were put to death, devoutly preserved in honour to their memory, kissed, revered, and carried in procession.

The honouring the relics of saints, on which the Church of Rome afterwards founded her superstitious and lucrative use of them, as objects of devotion, as a kind of charms, or amulets, and as instruments of pretended miracles, appears to have originated in a very ancient custom that prevailed among Christians, of assembling at the cemeteries or burying-places of the martyrs, for the purpose of commemorating them, and of performing divine worship. When the profession of Christianity obtained the protection of civil government, under Constantine the Great, stately churches were erected over their sepulchres, and their names and memories were treated with every possible token of affection and respect. This reverence, however, gradually exceeded all reasonable bounds; and those prayers and religious services were thought to have a peculiar sanctity and virtue which were performed over their tombs: hence the practice which afterwards obtained of depositing relics of saints and martyrs under the altars in all churches. This practice was then thought of such importance, that St. Ambrose would not consecrate a church because it had no relics; and the Council of Constantinople in Trullo ordained, that those altars should be demolished under which were found no relics! Such was the rage for them at one time, that, as F. Mabillon, a Benedictine, justly complains, the altars were loaded with suspected relics: numerous spurious ones being everywhere offered to the piety and devotion of the faithful. He adds, too, that bones are often consecrated, which, so far from belonging to saints, probably do not belong to Christians. From the catacombs numerous relics have been taken, and yet it is not known who were the persons interred therein. In the eleventh century, relics were tried by fire, and those which did not consume were reckoned genuine, and the rest not. Relics were, and still are, preserved on the altars whereon mass is celebrated: a square hole being made in the middle of the altar big enough to receive the hand; and herein is the relic deposited, being first wrapped in red silk and enclosed in a leaden box.

Besides the arguments from antiquity, to which the Papists refer in vindication of their worship of relics, of which the reader may form some judgment from this article, Bellarmine appeals to Scripture in support of it! and cites the following passages, namely, Exod. xiii. 19; Deut. xxxiv. 6; 2 Kings xiii. 21, xxiii. 16-18; Isa. xi. 10; Matt. ix. 20-22; Acts v. 12, 15, xix. 11, 12.

"No doubt," says Dr Begg in his Handbook of Popery, "Papists speak of the woman who was healed by touching the hem of Christ's garment. But we are expressly told that it was from Christ himself that the virtue went forth. Mark v. 30. And it is remarkable that God hid the body of Moses, Deut. xxxiv. 6, most probably to prevent any part of it from being turned into a 'relic.' It is also probable that the dispute between the devil and Michael about this body, Jude 9, may have arisen from a wish of Satan to turn it, like the brazen-serpent, or as Papists would have done, into an object of profitable idolatry. Papists sometimes refer to the miraculous effects said to have been produced by the 'shadow of Peter,' Acts v. 15, in the apostolic age. Whether they profess to have preserved this 'shadow' as a 'relic,' as some of the 'darkness of Egypt' is said to have been bottled up and kept, does not clearly appear. But at all events, as a shadow is only the adjunct of a living man, and as Peter is no longer in the midst of us, it has justly been remarked that there is no 'substance' whatever in this argument."

RELIGION is a Latin word, derived, according to Cicero, from religere, "to reconsider;" but according to Servius and most modern grammarians, from religare, "to bind fast." If the Ciceronian etymology be the true one, the word religion will denote the diligent study of whatever pertains to the worship of God. Accordingly, those who exhibited zeal and earnestness in the service of God, as the most important concern, were, therefore, called religiosi; and their conduct was called religio (the name of the Deity being frequently annexed) Dei, or erga Deum. The word religio, however, and especially the plural, religiones, was most commonly used in reference to external worship, rites, and ceremonies. According to the other derivation, it denotes that obligation which we feel on our minds from the relation in which we stand to some superior power. The word is sometimes used as synonymous with sect; but, in a practical sense, it is generally considered as the same with godliness, or a life devoted to the worship and fear of God. Dr. Doddridge thus defines it:—"Religion consists in the resolution of the will for God, and in a constant care to avoid whatever we are persuaded he would disapprove, to despatch the work he has assigned us in life, and to promote his glory in the happiness of mankind." (See GODLINESS.) The foundation of all religion rests on the belief of the existence of God. As we have, however, already considered the evidences of the Divine existence, they need not be enumerated again in this place; the reader will find them under the article EXISTENCE OF GOD. See also the articles GOD—JEHOVAH.

Religion has been divided into natural and revealed. By natural religion is meant that knowledge, veneration, and love of God, and the practice of those duties to him, our fellow-creatures, and ourselves, which are discoverable by the right exercise of our rational faculties, from considering the nature and perfections of God, and our relation to him and to one another. By revealed religion is understood that discovery which he has made to us of his mind and will in the Holy Scriptures.

As it respects natural religion, some doubt whether, properly speaking, there can be any such thing; since, through the fall, reason is so depraved, that man without revelation is under the greatest darkness and misery, as may be easily seen by considering the history of those nations who are destitute of it, and who are given up to barbarism, ignorance, cruelty, and evils of every kind. So much as this, however, may be observed, that the light of nature can give us no proper ideas of God, nor inform us what worship will be acceptable to him. It does not tell us how man became a fallen, sinful creature, as he is, nor how he can be recovered. It affords us no intelligence as to the immortality of the soul, the resurrection of the body, and a future state of happiness and misery. The apostle, indeed, observes, that the Gentiles have the law written on their hearts, and are a law unto themselves; yet the greatest moralists among them were so blinded as to be guilty of, and actually to countenance, the greatest vices. Such a system, therefore, it is supposed, can hardly be said to be religious, which leaves man in such uncertainty, ignorance, and impiety. (See REVELATION.)

On the other side, it is observed, "that though it is in the highest degree probable that the parents of mankind received all their theological knowledge by supernatural means, it is yet obvious that some parts of that knowledge must have been capable of a proof purely rational, otherwise not a single religious truth could have been conveyed through the succeeding generations of the human race, but by the immediate inspiration of each individual. We, indeed, admit many propositions as certainly true, upon the sole authority of the Jewish and Christian Scriptures, and we receive these Scriptures with gratitude, as the lively oracles of God; but it is self-evident that we could not do either the one or the other, were we not convinced by natural means that God exists; that he is a being of goodness, justice, and power; and that he inspired with divine wisdom the penmen of these sacred volumes. Now, though it is very possible that no man, or body of men, left to themselves from infancy in a desert world, would ever have made a theological discovery, yet, whatever propositions relating to the being and attributes of the First Cause, and duty of man, can be demonstrated by human reason, independent of written revelation, may be called natural theology, and are of the utmost importance, as being to us the first principles of all religion. Natural theology, in this sense of the word, is the foundation of Christian revelation; for, without a previous knowledge of it, we could have no evidence that the Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments are indeed the Word of God."

The religions which exist in the world have been generally divided into four—the Pagan, the Jewish, the Mohammedan, and the Christian; to which articles the reader is referred. The various duties of the Christian religion also are stated in their different places. See also, as connected with this article, the articles INSPIRATION—REVELATION—THEOLOGY, NATURAL—CHRISTIANITY.

RELIGIOUS, in a general sense, something that relates to religion; and, in reference to persons, that which indicates that they give their attention to religion, and are influenced by it, so as to differ from the world. It is also used for a person engaged by solemn vows to the monastic life; or a person shut up in a monastery, to lead a life of devotion and austerity under some rule or institution. The male religious are called monks and friars; the females, nuns and canonesses.

REMEDIAL LAW. See LAW—NEONOMIANS—JUSTIFICATION.

REMISSION, the release of an obligation. It is sometimes taken for the year of jubilee, or the sabbatical year, in which the slaves were set at liberty, and in which every one returned into his own inheritance. Lev. xxv. 10; Numb. xxxvi. 4; Deut. xv. 1. It is generally used in the New Testament for the pardon of sin, which is a divine discharge from the obligation to suffer the punishment of the law. The Gospel says, that "John did baptize in the wilderness, and preach the baptism of repentance, for the remission of sins" (Mark i. 4; Luke iii. 3); and, that the blood of Jesus Christ was shed to procure remission of our sins. Eph. i. 7; Col. i. 14; Matt. xxvi. 28. See PARDON.

REMONSTRANTS, a title given to the Arminians, by reason of the remonstrance which, in 1610, they made to the States of Holland against the sentence of the Synod of Dort, which condemned them as heretics. Episcopius and Grotius were at the head of the Remonstrants, whose principles were first openly patronized in England by Archbishop Laud. In Holland, the Calvinists presented an address in opposition to the remonstrance of the Arminians, and called it a counter-remonstrance. See ARMINIANS—DORT.

REMORSE, uneasiness occasioned by a consciousness of guilt. When it is blended with the fear of punishment, and rises to despair, it constitutes the supreme wretchedness of the mind.

REMPHAN. See ANAMMELECH—CHIUN—MOLOCH.

REND. The rending or tearing of the clothes was a custom of great antiquity, and the highest expression of grief in the primitive ages. This ceremony was never omitted by the Hebrews, when any mournful event happened, and was performed in the following manner:—They took a knife, and, holding the blade downwards, gave the upper part of the garment a cut in the right side, and rent it an hand's-breadth. For very near relations, all the garments are rent on the right side. Neighbours or other spectators who happened to be in the house at the time of the decease, tore only a hand's-breadth of their dress on the left side. The custom of rending the clothes, however, was not only a token of mourning, but also of indignation. Thus, Matt. xxvi. 65: "Then the high priest rent his clothes, saying, He hath spoken blasphemy; what farther need have we of witnesses? behold, now ye have heard his blasphemy." And Acts xiv. 14: "Which when the apostles, Barnabas and Paul, heard of, they rent their clothes, and ran in among the people crying out." See BURIAL—MOURNING.

REPENTANCE signifies a change of the mind from a rebellious and disaffected state, to that submission and thorough separation from iniquity by which converted sinners are distinguished. Matt. iii. 2-8.

Repentance is sometimes used generally for a change of mind, and an earnest wishing that something were undone that has been done. In a sense analogous to this, God himself is said to repent; but this can be only understood of his altering his conduct towards his creatures, either in the bestowing of good or the infliction of evil; which change in the divine conduct is founded on a change in his creatures; and thus, speaking after the manner of men, God is said to repent. In this generic sense, also, Esau found no place for repentance, though he sought it carefully with tears; he could not move his father Isaac to repent of what he had done, or to recall the blessing from Jacob and confer it on himself. Heb. xii. 17; Rom. xi. 29; 2 Cor. vii. 10.

The Greek metanoia (repentance) properly denotes the soul recollecting its own actions, and that in such a manner as to produce sorrow in the review, and a desire of amendment. It is strictly a change of mind, and includes the whole of that alteration, with respect to views, dispositions, and conduct, which is effected by the power of the gospel. This term is used in the New Testament about sixty times. Another word is also used in a few instances (but never where repentance is enjoined as a duty), which merely signifies anxiety or uneasiness upon the consideration of what is done. Matt. xxi. 29, 32, xxvii. 3; 2 Cor. vii. 8; Heb. vii. 21. The first word signifies a change founded on a re-consideration of principles; the second, a concern founded on a view of consequences. The first is thorough, the second is partial and ineffectual.

To distinguish these, there should have been two distinct words in our common version, corresponding to the two in the original. But as there is no difference made in the translation, the old divines used to designate the latter by the term legal, and the former by the term evangelical—a designation as unfortunate as it is miscriptural, because it by no means truly describes the difference between them. The law of God is in fact an essential instrument in producing evangelical repentance; it is emphatically a schoolmaster to bring us to Christ. The real difference is much better expressed by the terms worldly and godly, which, moreover, have a scriptural sanction. 2 Cor. vii. 9, 10. Let it be remembered, then, that there is—(1.) A worldly or partial repentance, wherein one is grieved for, and turns from, his outward sin, merely on account of the hurt it has done, or is likely to do him; as a malefactor, who still loves his sin, repents of doing it, because it brings him to punishment. (2.) A godly or evangelical repentance, which is a pious sorrow wrought in the heart of a sinner by the Word and Spirit of God, whereby, from a sense of his sin, as offensive to God, and defiling and endangering to his own soul, and from an apprehension of the mercy of God in Christ, he, with grief and hatred of all his known sins, turns from them to God, as his Saviour and Lord. This is called "repentance towards God," as therein we turn from sin to him; and "repentance unto life," as it leads to spiritual life, and is the first step to eternal life. Matt. iii. 2; Acts iii. 19, xi. 18. There are only these two kinds of repentance.

The author, as well as object, of true repentance, is God. Acts v. 31. The subjects of it are sinners, since none but those who have sinned can repent. The means of repentance are the Word, and the ministers of it; yet sometimes consideration, sanctified afflictions, conversation, &c., have been the instruments of repentance. The blessings connected with repentance are, pardon, peace, and everlasting life. Acts xi. 18. The time of repentance is the present life. Isa. lv. 6; Eccles. ix. 5. The evidences of repentance are, faith, humility, prayer, and obedience. Zech. xii. 10.

The necessity of repentance appears evident from the evil of sin, the misery it involves us in here, the commands given us to repent in God's Word, the promises made to the penitent, and the absolute incapability of enjoying God here or hereafter without it.

REPETITIONS, VAIN. Our blessed Lord, in his sermon on the mount, thus speaks in reference to prayer, Matt. vi. 7, 8, "But when ye pray, use not vain repetitions, as the heathen do: for they think that they shall be heard for their much speaking. Be not ye therefore like unto them: for your Father knoweth what things ye have need of before ye ask him." We find a remarkable example of the practice here referred to in 1 Kings xviii. 25-29. The word here translated, "use not vain repetitions," is a very peculiar one, indicating empty words, unmeaning repetitions. All repetitions in prayer are not to be understood as discountenanced by the Saviour, for on some occasions they manifest simply an intense earnestness of spirit, as in the case of the Redeemer himself, when in his agony in the garden, he retired to a little distance and prayed, using the same words. Neither are we to understand the Redeemer as discountenancing on every occasion long prayers. These also, as every experienced believer knows, are frequently an indication of the ardent longings of the soul. The prayer offered up by Solomon, at the dedication of the temple, is an instance of a long prayer on a special occasion; and it is remarkable, that He who dictated to the disciples the shortest and most comprehensive prayer which the Bible contains, is declared to have spent a whole night in secret, solitary prayer. He reproves "vain repetitions," and the foolish imagination that the acceptableness of prayer depends upon the number or the copiousness of its expressions. The sigh heaved from the bosom of a contrite one, which may never have found vent in words, is a powerful prayer. It is not our much speaking but our earnest longing that will obtain an answer.

REPHAIM, a people of extraordinary stature, inhabiting the country east of the Jordan and Dead Sea. The country of the Rephaim is identified with that of Bashan, the last king of which, Og by name, so famous for his stature, was dispossessed by the Israelites, when the city of Ashteroth was given to the half tribe of Manasseh, whose allotment was east of Jordan. There is a place mentioned in several passages, as in Josh. xv. 8 and xviii. 16, which was famous both in Joshua's and David's time.

REPHIDIM, a place where the Israelites were encamped before they approached the mount of the Lord. It was remarkable as having been the scene of the temptation and strife when the Israelites murmured from want of water, and by a miracle, Moses, at the command of the Lord, smote the rock and water flowed forth. It was here also that they put to flight the Amalekites. The place which is now recognised as the site of the ancient Rephidim is near the Sinaitic range of mountains, and is thus described by Dr Wilson in his "Lands of the Bible:"—"At the place where it" (the range of hills now called Wadiyah) "approaches Wadí Sheikh, was probably Rephidim, where the Israelites were encamped before they approached the mount of the Lord. If this was the case, it is to be particularly noticed, that water from the rock in Horeb could easily flow to them at this very place, on the only road practicable to them from the Wadí Feirán to Sinai. The Wadí Sheikh, through which we had come down from Sinai, forms to this day, in fact, the channel by which the winter torrents find their way to the Red Sea, passing out of it into Wadí Feirán, which, after running to the north-west till it approaches the Wadí Mukatteb, strikes nearly directly to the west, and runs into the sea. I was greatly struck with the regular descent from Sinai of this water-channel through the Wadí esh-Sheikh; and I cannot resist directing particular attention to the impression connected with it which I have mentioned. I was glad, in looking into Dr Robinson's work, to find that he had fixed on this very neighbourhood as Rephidim. After quoting Burckhardt's account of it,—for he himself had not visited it, but turned off to 'Akabah, near the tomb of Saleh,—he says, 'The entrance to this defile from the west is five hours distant from the point where Wady esh-Sheikh issues from the plain er-Râhah. This would correspond well to the distance of Rephidim; and then these blackened cliffs would be the outskirts of Horeb. I am not aware of any objection to this view, except one which applies equally to every part of Wady esh-Sheikh and the adjacent district, viz., that neither here nor in all this tract is there at the present day any special want of water. There is a well near the defile itself, and an hour above it a spring called Abu Suweirah which we visited; besides others in various quarters. This difficulty I am not able to solve, except by supposing, that as the people seemed to have remained for some time at Rephidim, the small supply of water was speedily exhausted.' No other solution of the difficulty is needed, when the wants of two millions and a half of people are adverted to. Dr Robinson brings the Rock in Horeb 'near to Rephidim;' but we have already seen that there is no need of this limitation."

REPLY. To reply against God, is to quarrel with his purpose or providence. Rom. ix. 20.

REPRESENTERS. See MARROW-MEN.

REPROACH, the act of finding fault in opprobrious terms, or attempting to expose to infamy and disgrace. In whatever cause we engage, however disinterested our motives, however laudable our designs, reproach is what we must expect. But it becomes us not to retaliate, but to bear it patiently; and so to live, that every charge brought against us be groundless. If we be reproached for righteousness' sake, we have no reason to be ashamed nor to be afraid. All good men have thus suffered, Jesus Christ himself especially. We have the greatest promises of support. Besides, it has a tendency to humble us, detach us from the world, and excite in us a desire for that state of blessedness where all reproach shall be done away. Matt. v. 11, 38-48.

REPROBATION. This term, among divines, is used to express that act of God's will by which, when he viewed all mankind as involved in guilt and misery, he rejected some, while he chose others. Some, who allow of personal and eternal election, deny any such thing as reprobation. But the one unavoidably follows from the other; for the choice of some must necessarily imply the rejection of others. "Election and rejection," says Dr Dick, in his Lectures on Theology, "are correlative terms; and men impose upon themselves, and imagine that they conceive what it is impossible to conceive, when they admit election, and deny reprobation. If the reason be inquired why God passed by some of mankind sinners, while he elected others to life, it must be resolved into the counsel of his own will, whereby he extends or withholds mercy as he pleaseth. 'He hath mercy on whom he will have mercy, and whom he will he hardeneth.' But if the reason be inquired why God ordained to dishonour and wrath those whom he passed by, this must be resolved into their own sin." See ELECTION.

REPROOF, blame or reprehension spoken to a person's face. It is distinguished from a reprimand thus: He who reproves another, points out his fault, and blames him. He who reprimands, affects to punish, and mortifies the offender. (See OFFENCE.)

In giving reproof, the following rules may be observed:—(1.) We should not be forward in reproving our elders or superiors, but rather to remonstrate and supplicate for redress. What the ministers of God do in this respect, they do by special commission, as those that must give an account. 1 Tim. v. 1; Heb. xiii. 7. (2.) We must not reprove rashly; there should be proof before reproof. (3.) We should not reprove for slight matters, for such faults or defects as proceed from natural frailty, from inadvertency, or mistake in matters of small consequence. (4.) We should never reprove unseasonably, as to the time, the place, or the circumstances. (5.) We should reprove mildly and sweetly, in the calmest manner, in the gentlest terms. (6.) We should not affect to be reprehensive; perhaps there is no one considered more troublesome than he who delights in finding fault with others.

In receiving reproof, it may be observed—(1.) That we should not reject it merely because it may come from those who are not exactly on a level with ourselves. (2.) We should consider whether the reproof given be not actually deserved; and that, if the reprover knew all, whether the reproof would not be sharper than what it is. (3.) Whether, if taken humbly and patiently, it will not be of great advantage to us. (4.) That it is nothing but pride to suppose that we are never to be the subjects of reproof, since it is human to err.

RESEN, a city of Assyria, between Nineveh and Calah (Gen. x. 12), on the river Chaboras, in Mesopotamia. Bochart thinks it the Greek Larissa.

RESENTMENT, the feeling that arises from a sense of injury. It is, however, most generally used in an ill sense, implying a determination to return an injury. Dr. Johnson observes, that resentment in this sense is an union of sorrow with malignity; a combination of a passion which all endeavour to avoid, with a passion which all concur to detest. The man who retires to meditate mischief, and to exasperate his own rage; whose thoughts are employed only on means of distress and contrivances of ruin; whose mind never pauses from the remembrance of his own sufferings, but to indulge some hope of enjoying the calamities of another, may justly be numbered among the most miserable of human beings—among those who are guilty—who have neither the gladness of prosperity, nor the calm of innocence.

RESIGNATION, a submission without discontent to the will of God. The obligations to this duty arise from—(1.) The perfections of God. Deut. xxxii. 4. (2.) The purpose of God. Eph. i. 11. (3.) The commands of God. Heb. xii. 9. (4.) The promises of God. 1 Pet. v. 7. (5.) Our own interest. Hos. ii. 14, 15. (6.) The prospect of eternal felicity. Heb. iv. 9. See AFFLICTION—DESPAIR—PATIENCE.

RESOLUTIONERS, a name applied to those ministers and elders in Scotland, in the troublous times of Charles II., who were carried away by secular and prudential views of expediency. Many of the resolutioners were men of great piety and worth, but somewhat deficient in firmness of character; lovers of peace to such an extent as to be willing to sacrifice some of their own principles for its attainment. Of these David Dickson was one; but some years afterwards, when the perfidy of Charles and the malignants had become evident, he on his death-bed acknowledged his error, and admitted that the Protesters had seen the matter in a truer light than the Resolutioners had done.

RESPECT OF PERSONS, or appearances, signifies partiality in judicial proceedings. God appointed that the judges should pronounce sentence without respect of persons. Lev. xix. 15; Deut. xvi. 16, 17, 19. That they should consider neither the poor nor the rich, the weak nor the powerful; but should attend only to truth and justice. God has no respect of persons. And the Jews complimented our Saviour, that he told the truth without respect of persons, without fear. Matt. xxii. 16; Isa. xxxii. 1–16. In matters of grace or bounty this phrase has no proper application. Hence when we read (Exod. ii. 25): “God had respect to the children of Israel,” it can only express his compassion and sympathy for them. When God had respect to the offering of Abel (Gen. iv. 4), it imports to accept favourably, to notice with satisfaction. Compare 1 Kings viii. 28; Numb. xvi. 15.

REST, (1.) To cease from work. Exod. xxiii. 12.

(2.) To sit or nestle quietly. Gen. xviii. 4; Isa. xxxiv. 14. (3.) To lean, or to trust in. 2 Chron. xxxii. 8. (4.) To continue fixed. Isa. li. 4. (5.) To come to an end. Ezek. xvi. 42, xxi. 17. God rested from his work of creation, and was refreshed; he ceased to make new kinds of creatures, and took pleasure in what he had made. Heb. iv. 4; Exod. xxxi. 17. His resting in his love implies his unchanging pleasure in the past effects of it, and his taking delight in showing it more abundantly. Zeph. iii. 17. His taking his rest during the Assyrian ravages of Egypt and Ethiopia imports his forbearing to interpose remarkably between the contending parties. Isa. lviii. 4. Men rest on the Lord, when, with a strong faith in his promise and righteousness, they commit themselves to his care, and depend on him for all necessary blessings. Ps. xxxvii. 7. The saints rest at noon, when, amid scorching persecution and temptation, God bestows upon them distinguished protection, inward patience, and comfort. Cant. i. 7. The dead rest in their graves from all labour, disturbance, and pain. Isa. lvii. 2. To QUIET is to cause to rest, make still. God’s Spirit was quieted in the north country, when the Persians, Greeks, and after them the Romans, executed the destined vengeance on Chaldea, where his people had been oppressed; or when the spread of the gospel was the means of converting multitudes to Christ. Zech. vi. 8. God quieteth the earth with the south wind, when he makes his gentle gales to blow on it. Job xxxvii. 17.

REST, QUIETNESS. (1.) A ceasing from labour. Exod. v. 5. (2.) A ceasing from open war. Josh. xiv. 15. (3.) Ceasing from tillage and husbandry. Lev. xxv. 5. (4.) A state of peace and reconciliation with God and men’s own conscience. Matt. xi. 29; Heb. iv. 3. (5.) A calm composure of mind, produced by the love of God shed abroad in the heart, and by the Holy Ghost’s witnessing to the conscience, justification, reconciliation, regeneration, adoption, and sure title to eternal glory; this is attended with a cheerful confidence in the promises, and a submission to the providences of God. Ps. cxvi. 7. (6.) REST also signifies a peaceful and comfortable settlement, such as Canaan to the Hebrews, and the temple to the ark. Deut. iii. 20; Ps. cxxxii. 8–14.

Christ, in his person, offices, relations, righteousness, power, and love, and in his promises, is a rest and refreshing, which, if applied and improved, yield a most sweet pleasure and quiet to men. Isa. xxviii. 12. Christ’s rest is glorious; his gospel-church, or his new-covenant state, in which his people enjoy sweet delight and repose, is the product of his glorious power and bleeding love, and is glorious in its properties and ends. Isa. xi. 10. The rest remaining for the people of God is the heavenly state, in which the saints shall be for ever free from sin, sorrow, temptation, and trouble or toil, and for ever delighted in the full enjoyment of and conformity to a God in Christ. Heb. iv. 9.

RESTITUTION, that act of justice by which we restore to our neighbour whatever we have unjustly deprived him of. Exod. xxii. 1; Luke xix. 8. Moralists observe, respecting restitution—(1.) That where it can be made in kind, or the injury can be certainly valued, we are to restore the thing or the value. (2.) We are bound to restore the thing with the natural increase of it; that is, to satisfy for the loss sustained in the meantime, and the gain hindered. (3.) Where the thing cannot be restored, and the value of it is not certain, we are to give reasonable satisfaction, according to a middle estimation. (4.) We are at least to give by way of restitution what the law would give, for that is generally equal, and in most cases rather favourable than rigorous. (5.) A man is not only bound to restitution for the injury he did, but for all that directly follows from the injurious act. For the first injury being wilful, we are supposed to will all that which follows upon it.

RESTORATIONISTS, those who believe that all men will ultimately become holy and happy. They maintain that God created only to bless; and that in pursuance of that purpose, he sent his Son to "be for salvation to the ends of the earth;" that Christ's kingdom is moral in its nature, and extends to moral beings in every state or mode of existence; that the probation of man is not confined to the present life, but extends through the mediatorial reign; and that, as Christ died for all, so, before he shall have delivered up the kingdom to the Father, all shall be brought to a participation of the knowledge and enjoyment of that truth which maketh free from the bondage of sin and death. They believe in a general resurrection and judgment, when those who have improved their probation in this life will be raised to more perfect felicity, and those who have misimproved their opportunities on earth will come forward to shame and condemnation, which will continue till they become truly penitent; that punishment itself is a mediatorial work, a discipline, perfectly consistent with mercy; that it is a means employed by Christ to humble and subdue the stubborn will, and prepare the mind to receive a manifestation of the goodness of God, which leadeth the sinner to true repentance. See Gen. xii. 3, xxii. 18; Gal. iii. 8; Isa. xlv. 22, 23; Phil. ii. 10, 11; Rev. v. 13; 1 Tim. ii. 1-6; Col. i. 20; Eph. i. 7-11; Rom. v. 12-21, viii. 20, 21; 1 Cor. xv. 24-28.

They contend that this doctrine is not only sustained by particular texts, but grows necessarily out of some of the first principles of divine revelation. They maintain that it is immediately connected with the perfections of the Deity; that God, being infinitely benevolent, must have desired the happiness of all his offspring; that his infinite wisdom would enable him to form a perfect plan, and his almighty power will secure its accomplishment. They contend that the mission of Christ is abortive on any other plan, and that nothing short of the "restitution of all things" can satisfy the ardent desires of every pious soul. On this system alone can they reconcile the attributes of justice and mercy, and secure to the Almighty a character worthy of our imitation. (See ATONEMENT.)

They insist that the words rendered everlasting, eternal, and for ever, which are in a few instances applied to the misery of the wicked, do not prove that misery to be endless; because these terms are loose in their signification, and are frequently used in a limited sense; that the original terms being often used in the plural number, clearly demonstrates that the period, though indefinite, is limited in its very nature. They maintain that the meaning of the term must always be sought in the subject to which it is applied; and that there is nothing in the nature of punishment which will justify an endless sense. (See AION.) They believe that the doctrine of the restoration is the most consonant to the perfections of the Deity, the most worthy of the character of Christ, and the only doctrine which will accord with pious and devout feelings, or harmonize with the Scriptures. They teach their followers that ardent love to God, active benevolence to man, and personal meekness and purity, are the natural results of these views. (See RETRIBUTION, FUTURE.)

The difference between the Restorationists and Universalists relates principally to the subject of a future retribution. The Universalists believe that a full and perfect retribution takes place in this world; that our conduct here cannot affect our future condition; and that the moment man exists after death, he will be as pure and happy as the angels. From these views the Restorationists dissent. They maintain that a just retribution does not take place in time; that the conscience of the sinner becomes callous, and does not increase in the severity of its reprovings with the increase of guilt; that men are invited to act with reference to a future life; that if all are made perfectly happy at the commencement of the next state of existence, they are not rewarded according to their deeds; that if death introduces them into heaven, they are saved by death and not by Christ; and if they are made happy by being raised from the dead, they are saved by physical, and not by moral means, and made happy without their agency or consent; that such a sentiment weakens the motives to virtue, and gives force to the temptations of vice; that it is unreasonable in itself, and opposed to many passages of Scripture. See Acts xxiv. 25, xvii. 30, 31; Heb. ix. 27, 28; Matt. xi. 23, 24; 2 Pet. ii. 9; 2 Cor. v. 8-11; John v. 28, 29; Matt. x. 28; Luke xii. 4, 5, xvi. 19-31; 1 Pet. iii. 18-20. See UNIVERSALISTS.

RESURRECTION, the rising of the dead from their graves, and the reuniting of the soul and body in a future state. This doctrine is plainly taught in the Word of God, and probably the fulness with which it was taught by our Lord and his apostles may be one grand reason why the Sadducees, who denied the resurrection, were so intensely opposed to the gospel. And when Paul preached the doctrine of the resurrection at Athens, the philosophers of that city ridiculed the idea, and supposed that by the word resurrection he meant some new deity. The following passage plainly states the doctrine, John v. 28, 29, "Marvel not at this: for the hour is coming, in the which all that are in the grave shall hear his voice, and shall come forth; they that have done good, unto the resurrection of life; and they that have done evil, unto the resurrection of damnation." Even in the time of the apostles the subject of the resurrection gave rise to much keen contention. Thus we find Paul declaring in 1 Cor. xv. 35, "And some man will say, How are the dead raised up? and with what body do they come?" The apostle supposes doubts to arise as to the power of God to raise the dead, and on this he appeals to the operations of God in creation, concluding with the challenge, "Why should it be thought a thing incredible for God to raise the dead?" But the objection may be supposed to arise, Is not the body often a hindrance to the soul in its operations? And to this he replies by showing, that though sown in corruption it will rise in incorruption; though sown in weakness it will be raised in power; though sown a natural body it will be raised a spiritual body. Our vile bodies will be changed and made like unto Christ's glorious body. The resurrection is a doctrine clearly and explicitly taught in the Bible.

This doctrine is argued—(1.) From the resurrection of Christ. 1 Cor. xv. (2.) From the doctrines of grace, as union, election, redemption, &c. (3.) From Scripture testimonies. Matt. xxii. 23, &c.; Job xix. 25, 27; Isa. xxvi. 19; Phil. iii. 10; 1 Cor. xv.; Dan. xii. 2; 1 Thess. iv. 14; Rev. xx. 13. (4.) From the general judgment, which of course requires it.

This doctrine is of great use and importance. It is one of the first principles of the doctrine of Christ; the whole gospel stands or falls with it. It serves to enlarge our views of the divine perfections. It encourages our faith and trust in God under all the difficulties of life. It has a tendency to regulate our affections and moderate our desires after earthly things. It supports the saints under the loss of near relations, and enables them to rejoice in the glorious prospect set before them.

RESURRECTION OF CHRIST. Few articles are more important than this. It deserves our particular attention, because it is the grand hinge on which Christianity turns. Hence, says the apostle, "He was delivered for our offences, and raised again for our justification." Infidels, however, have disbelieved it, but with what little reason we may easily see on considering the subject.

"If the body of Jesus Christ," says Saurin, "were not raised from the dead, it must have been stolen away. But this theft is incredible. Who committed it? The enemies of Jesus Christ? Would they have contributed to his glory by countenancing a report of his resurrection? Would his disciples? It is probable they would not, and it is next to certain they could not. How could they have undertaken to remove the body? Frail and timorous creatures, people who fled as soon as they saw him taken into custody; even Peter, the most courageous, trembled at the voice of a servant girl, and three times denied that he knew him. People of this character, would they have dared to resist the authority of the governor? Would they have undertaken to oppose the determination of the sanhedrim, to force a guard, and to elude, or overcome soldiers armed and aware of danger? If Jesus Christ were not raised again (I speak the language of unbelievers), he had deceived his apostles with vain hopes of his resurrection. How came the disciples not to discover the imposture? Would they have hazarded themselves by undertaking an enterprise so perilous in favour of a man who had so cruelly imposed on their credulity? But were we to grant that they formed the design of removing the body, how could they have executed it? How could soldiers armed, and on guard, suffer themselves to be overreached by a few timorous people? Either (says Augustine) they were asleep or awake. If they were awake, why should they suffer the body to be taken away? If asleep, how could they know that the disciples took it away? How dare they, then, depone that it was stolen?"

The testimony of the apostles furnishes us with arguments, and there are eight considerations which give the evidence sufficient weight. 1. The nature of these witnesses. They were not men of power, riches, eloquence, credit, to impose upon the world; they were poor and mean. 2. The number of these witnesses. See 1 Cor. xv.; Luke xxiv. 34; Mark xvi. 14; Matt. xxviii. 10. It is not likely that a collusion should have been held among so many to support a lie, which would be of no utility to them. 3. The facts themselves which they avow; not suppositions, distant events, or events related by others, but real facts which they saw with their own eyes.

1 John i. 4. The agreement of their evidence; they all deposed the same thing. 5. Observe the tribunals before which they gave evidence—Jews and heathens, philosophers and rabbins, courtiers and lawyers. If they had been impostors, the fraud certainly would have been discovered. 6. The place in which they bore their testimony; not at a distance, where they might not easily have been detected, if false, but at Jerusalem, in the synagogues, in the pretorium. 7. The time of this testimony; not years after, but three days after, they declared he was risen: yea, before their rage was quelled, while Calvary was yet dyed with the blood they had spilt. If it had been a fraud, it is not likely they would have come forward in such broad daylight, amidst so much opposition. 8. Lastly, the motives which induced them to publish the resurrection; not to gain fame, riches, glory, profit; no, they exposed themselves to suffering and death, and proclaimed the truth from conviction of its importance and certainty.

"Collect," says Saurin, "all these proofs together; consider them in one point of view, and see how many extravagant suppositions must be advanced if the resurrection of our Saviour be denied. It must be supposed that guards, who had been particularly cautioned by their officers, sat down to sleep; and that, however, they deserved credit when they said the body of Jesus Christ was stolen. It must be supposed that men, who had been imposed on in the most odious and cruel manner in the world, hazarded their dearest enjoyments for the glory of an impostor. It must be supposed that ignorant and illiterate men, who had neither reputation, fortune, nor eloquence, possessed the art of fascinating the eyes of all the world. It must be supposed either that five hundred persons were all deprived of their senses at a time, or that they were all deceived in the plainest matters of fact; or that this multitude of false witnesses had found out the secret of never contradicting themselves or one another, and of being always uniform in their testimony. It must be supposed that the most expert courts of judicature could not find out a shadow of contradiction in a palpable imposture. It must be supposed that the apostles, sensible men in other cases, chose precisely those places and those times which were most unfavourable to their views. It must be supposed that millions madly suffered imprisonments, tortures, and crucifixions to spread an illusion. It must be supposed that ten thousand miracles were wrought in favour of falsehood, or all these facts must be denied; and then it must be supposed that the apostles were idiots; that the enemies of Christianity were idiots; and that all the primitive Christians were idiots."

The doctrine of the resurrection of Christ affords us a variety of useful instructions. Here we see evidence of divine power, prophecy accomplished, the character of Jesus established, his work finished, and a future state proved. It is a ground of faith, the basis of hope, a source of consolation, and a stimulus to obedience.

RETALIATION. This law holds a conspicuous place in the Jewish code, the application of which was made absolute, as appears from the words in which it is couched: "And if any mischief follow, then thou shalt give life for life, eye for eye, tooth for tooth, hand for hand, foot for foot, burning for burning, wound for wound, stripe for stripe." Exod xxi. 23-25.

RETIREMENT, the state of a person who quits a public station in order to be alone. Retirement is of great advantage to a wise man. To him "the hour of solitude is the hour of meditation. He communes with his own heart. He reviews the actions of his past life. He corrects what is amiss; he rejoices in what is right; and, wiser by experience, lays the plan of his future life. The great and the noble, the wise and the learned, the pious and the good, have been lovers of serious retirement. On this field the patriot forms his schemes, the philosopher pursues his discoveries, the saint improves himself in wisdom and goodness. Solitude is the hallowed ground which religion, in every age, has adopted as its own. There her sacred inspiration is felt, and her holy mysteries elevate the soul; there devotion lifts up the voice; there falls the tear of contrition; there the heart pours itself forth before Him who made and Him who redeemed it. Apart from men, we live with nature, and converse with God."

RETRIBUTION, FUTURE. That man is a responsible being, and that his responsibility extends into his future state of existence, is generally admitted throughout the world. Among those who believe in a punishment after death, of different degrees of severity, proportioned to the character and conduct of the guilty, a difference of opinion exists as to its design and duration. (See RESTORATIONISTS.) As in that article the leading arguments are introduced in support of its remedial design, and limited duration, we shall here state some of the evidence on the opposite side of the question.

It is proper, however, to observe, that there is no dispute about the fact of the divine benevolence in punishment. The only question on this point is, whether benevolence requires the Divine Lawgiver to consult the happiness of the transgressor beyond the limits of his present probationary state; or whether the general good be not better consulted by warning him beforehand that his probation terminates with his present life, and that if he does not turn from his sins here, he must hereafter be made a warning example to the universe.

This question cannot be settled by abstract reasoning. It must be decided by an appeal to divine revelation.

The position believed to be taught in the Scripture is this:—THAT ALL SINNERS WHO DO NOT REPENT AND TAKE REFUGE IN THE SAVIOUR IN THE PRESENT LIFE, SHALL IN THE FUTURE STATE SUFFER EVERLASTING PUNISHMENT, AS THE NECESSARY AND JUST RETRIBUTION OF THEIR SINS.

We urge—1. Those passages of Scripture which declare that certain sinners shall not enter the kingdom of heaven. Matt. v. 20, vii. 21–23; Luke xiii. 26; Matt. xviii. 3; Mark x. 23–27; Luke xiii. 24; Matt. vii. 13; John iii. 3–5; 1 Cor. vi. 9, 10; Gal. v. 19–21; Eph. v. 5; Heb. iii. 19, iv. 1, 13.

If some men, according to the language of these Scriptures, are to be excluded from heaven, they must necessarily sink to hell; for the Scriptures give us no intimation of a middle state. Purgatory was the invention of later ages.

2. Those passages of Scripture which describe the future and final state of men in contrast. Ps. xvii. 14, 15; Prov. x. 28, xiv. 35; Dan. xii. 2; Matt. iii. 12, vii. 13, 14, 21, viii. 11, 12, xiii. 30–43, 47–50, xxiv. 46–51, xxv. 23–46; Mark xvi. 16; Luke vi. 23, 24, 47–49; John iii. 16, v. 29; Rom. ix. 21–23; 2 Tim. ii. 19, 20; Gal. vi. 7, 8; Heb. vi. 8, 9; Phil. iii. 17–21; 2 Thess. i. 5–12; 1 Pet. iv. 18; Rom. vi. 21–23.

These passages we consider as referring to the final state of man, for these reasons—(1.) Because in several of them the state is expressly called their end. (2.) Because the state of the righteous and the wicked are put in exact opposition to each other. If in respect to the former it is not denied to be final, it must therefore, by parity of reason, be true of the latter. (3.) There is a dead silence about any succeeding state. And, (4.) The phraseology of some of the passages will admit of no other interpretation. But if the final state of some men will be miserable, there will be some who will suffer everlasting punishment; for no other state can succeed that which is final.

3. Those passages of Scripture which apply the terms "everlasting," "eternal," "for ever," and "for ever and ever," to this future state. Dan. xii. 2; Matt. xviii. 8, xxv. 41–46; 2 Thess. i. 9; Mark iii. 29; Jude 7; 2 Pet. ii. 17; Jude 13; Rev. xiv. 10–12, xix. 3, xx. 10; 2 Cor. iv. 18.

On these terms, we would observe—(1.) That they are as strong as any in the Greek language to express endless duration. (2.) That although sometimes used improperly for a limited duration, there is nothing in this case which requires them to be limited. The sound rule of interpretation is, always to give a word its usual and proper signification, unless there be something in the context, or in the nature of the subject itself, to indicate that it is used in a different sense. (3.) The antithesis which occurs in several of the above passages fixes the meaning beyond all rational doubt. If the Spirit of God has chosen the same terms to express the duration of future punishment which he employs to denote the duration of future felicity, he certainly would have us to understand them to be co-extensive in duration.

4. Those passages which express future punishment by phrases which imply its eternity. John xvii. 9; Matt. xii. 31, 32; Mark iii. 29; 1 John v. 16; Heb. vi. 6, x. 26, 27; Luke ix. 25; Matt. x. 28; Mark ix. 43–48; Luke xiv. 26; John iii. 36, viii. 21; Phil. iii. 9; James ii. 13.

If there be some for whom Christ refuses to intercede—some who shall not be forgiven, but are obnoxious to eternal damnation—some whose sin is unto death, and must not be prayed for—some whom it is impossible to renew to repentance, who are nigh unto cursing, whose end is to be burned—some who draw back unto perdition, who lose their own souls, or are cast away, for whom it had been good if they had not been born, then there are some who will suffer eternal punishment; for all these phrases imply it.

Furthermore, if there be a hell, a fire that never shall be quenched, where their worm dieth not, and their fire is not quenched; if between this dread abode and the world of bliss there be an impassable chasm; if they who believe not in the Son of God shall not see life, but the wrath of God abideth on them; if they die in their sins, and where Christ is they cannot come; if they shall have judgment without mercy, and their end is destruction, then there will be some who will suffer endless punishment.

5. Those passages which intimate that a change of heart, and a preparation for heaven, are confined to this life. Isa. lv. 6, 7; Prov. i. 24–28; Luke xiii. 24–29; John xii. 36; Matt. xxv. 5–13; 2 Cor. vi. 1, 2; Heb. iii. 1–10, xiii. 15–22; Rev. xxii. 11.

If there are limits to the accepted time; if the day of salvation is to be succeeded by a night in which no man can work; if some shall find the door of acceptance closed against them; if a period is approaching beyond which there can be no change of moral character, and the character of some shall then be unholy and unjust, then it follows that some will suffer punishment without end.

To all these arguments one subtle objection has been made, which ought to be considered. These threatenings are all (it has been said) the voice of the law, denouncing merely what sinners deserve to suffer; but the gospel, notwithstanding, secures the salvation of all. To this it may be replied, the gospel ascertains the salvation of none but real believers. Rom. i. 16. But all manifestly do not obey the gospel. Hence a long train of warning declarations in the Scriptures; which we shall embody into a sixth class of arguments, in support of the doctrine we maintain, as the doctrine of Holy Writ.

6. Those passages of Scripture which foretell the consequences of rejecting the gospel. Ps. ii. 12; Prov. xxix. 1; Acts xiii. 40-46, xx. 26, xxviii. 26, 27; 1 Cor. i. 18; 2 Cor. iv. 3, ii. 15, 16; 1 Cor. xvi. 22; 1 Thess. v. 3; 2 Thess. i. 8, ii. 10-12; Heb. ii. 1-3, iv. 1-11, x. 26-31, 38, 39, xii. 25-29; James ii. 14; 1 Pet. iv. 17, 18; 2 Pet. ii. 1-21, iii. 7; Rom. x. 12.

The gospel, we well know, presents the only way of salvation to mankind. Acts iv. 12. To reject the gospel, then, is to reject the only method by which we can be saved. Hence those who do it must necessarily and inevitably perish. In the words of the apostles, they judge themselves unworthy of everlasting life. And in these passages it is expressly declared that some do reject it; that they do perish; that the ministry of the gospel itself is to them but "a saviour of death unto death."

Furthermore: as the gospel is the most signal display of the wisdom and mercy of God, its rejection must involve the sinner in deeper guilt and condemnation. Hence, in the above passages, the doom of the unbeliever and the apostate is represented as the most severe and dreadful. John iii. 19; Luke xv. 10-15.

REUBEN (he, the Lord, sees the son; so called in reference to the sentiment of his mother, "The Lord hath looked on my affliction"), the eldest son of Jacob and Leah, born A.M. 2246. Gen. xxix. 32. Reuben by his conduct in reference to Bilhah forfeited his birthright, and all the privileges of the first-born. He manifested, however, great kindness to his brother Joseph, when the rest of his brethren had resolved to put him to death. The doom which Jacob on his death-bed pronounced upon Reuben, Genesis xlix. 4, is concluded in these words, "Unstable as water thou shalt not excel;" and similar was the declaration of Moses concerning the tribe of Reuben, "Let Reuben live, and not die; and let not his men be few." Deut. xxxiii. 6. These predictions were remarkably fulfilled in the case of the Reubenites, who never excelled in the whole course of their history either in numbers or power.

REVELATION, the act of revealing or making a thing public that was before unknown; it is also used for the discoveries made by God to his prophets, and by them to the world; and more particularly for the books of the Old and New Testaments. (See BIBLE.)

1. A revelation is, in the first place, possible. God may, for any thing we can certainly tell, think proper to make some discovery to his creatures which they knew not before. As he is a being of infinite power, we may be assured he cannot be at a loss for means to communicate his will, and that in such a manner as will sufficiently mark it his own.

2. It is desirable. For, whatever the light of nature could do for man before reason was depraved, it is evident that it has done little for man since. Though reason be necessary to examine the authority of divine revelation, yet, in the present state, it is incapable of giving us proper discoveries of God, and the way of salvation; or of bringing us into a state of communion with God. It therefore follows,

3. That it is necessary. Without it we can attain to no certain knowledge of God, of Christ, of the Holy Ghost, of pardon, of justification, of sanctification, of happiness, of a future state of rewards and punishments.

4. No revelation, as Mr Brown observes, relative to the redemption of mankind, could answer its respective ends, unless it were sufficiently marked with internal and external evidences. That the Bible hath internal evidence, is evident from the ideas it gives us of God's perfections, of the law of nature, of redemption, of the state of man, &c. As to its external evidence, it is easily seen by the characters of the men who composed it, the miracles wrought, its success, the fulfilment of its predictions, &c. (See SCRIPTURE.)

5. The contents of revelation are agreeable to reason. It is true there are some things above the reach of reason; but a revelation containing such things is no contradiction, as long as it is not against reason; for if everything be rejected which cannot be exactly comprehended, we must become unbelievers at once of almost everything around us. The doctrines, the institutions, the threatenings, the precepts, the promises, of the Bible, are every way reasonable. The matter, form, and exhibition of revelation, are consonant with reason. (See REASON.)

6. The revelation contained in our Bible is perfectly credible. It is an address to the reason, judgment, and affections of men. The Old Testament abounds with the finest specimens of history, sublimity, and interesting scenes of providence. The facts of the New Testament are supported by undoubted evidence from enemies and friends. The attestations to the early existence of Christianity are numerous from Ignatius, Polycarp, Irenæus, Justin Martyr, and Tatian, who were Christians; and by Tacitus, Suetonius, Serenus, Pliny, &c., who were heathens. (See CHRISTIANITY.)

7. The revelations contained in our Bible are divinely inspired. The matter, the manner, the scope, the predictions, miracles, preservation, &c., all prove this. (See INSPIRATION.)

8. Revelation is intended for universal benefit. It is a common objection to it, that hitherto it has been confined to few, and therefore could not come from God, who is so benevolent; but this mode of arguing will equally hold good against the permission of sin, the inequalities of providence, the dreadful evils and miseries of mankind, which God could have prevented. It must be further observed, that none deserve a revelation; that men have despised and abused the early revelations he gave to his people. This revelation, we have reason to believe, shall be made known to all mankind. Already it is spreading its genuine influence. In the cold regions of the north, in the burning regions of the south, the Bible begins to be known; and from the predictions it contains, we believe the glorious sun of revelation shall shine and illuminate the whole globe.

9. The effects of revelation which have already taken place in the world have been astonishing. In proportion as the Bible has been known, arts and sciences have been cultivated, peace and liberty have been diffused, civil and moral obligations have been attended to. Nations have emerged from ignorance and barbarity, whole communities have been morally reformed, unnatural practices abolished, and wise laws instituted. Its spiritual effects have been wonderful. Kings and peasants, conquerors and philosophers, the wise and the ignorant, the rich and the poor, have been brought to the foot of the cross; yea, millions have been enlightened, improved, reformed, and made happy by its influences. Let any one deny this, and he must be a hardened, ignorant infidel indeed. Great is the truth, and must prevail.

REVELATION, THE BOOK OF. See APOCALYPSE.

REVENGE, means the return of injury for injury, or the infliction of pain on another in consequence of an injury received from him, farther than just ends of reparation or punishment require. Revenge differs materially from resentment, which rises in the mind immediately on being injured; but revenge is a cool and deliberate wickedness, and is often executed years after the offence is given. By some it is considered as a perversion of anger. Anger, it is said, is a passion given to man for wise and proper purposes; but revenge is the corruption of anger, is unnatural, and therefore ought to be suppressed. It is observable that the proper object of anger is vice; but the object in general of revenge is man. It transfers the hatred due to the vice to the man, to whom it is not due. It is forbidden by the Scriptures, and is unbecoming the character and spirit of a peaceful follower of Jesus Christ. See ANGER.

REVENGER. See AVENGER OF BLOOD.

REVERENCE, a respectful, submissive disposition of mind, arising from affection and esteem, from a sense of superiority in the person revered. Hence children reverence their fathers, even when their fathers correct them by stripes (Heb. xii. 9); hence subjects reverence their sovereign (2 Sam. ix. 6); hence wives reverence their husbands (Eph. v. 33); and hence all ought to reverence God. We reverence the name of God, the house of God, the worship of God, &c.; we reverence the attributes of God, the commands, dispensations, &c., of God; and we ought to demonstrate our reverence by overt acts, such as are suitable and becoming to time, place, and circumstances; for though a man may reverence God in his heart, yet, unless he behave reverentially, and give proofs of his reverence by demeanour, conduct, and obedience, he will not easily persuade his fellow-mortals that his bosom is the residence of this divine and heavenly disposition; for, in fact, a reverence for God is not one of those lights which burn under a bushel, but one of those whose sprightly lustre illuminates wherever it is admitted. Reverence is, strictly speaking, perhaps, the internal disposition of the mind—(phobos, Rom. xiii. 7), and honour (timē), the external expression of that disposition. (See ADORATION—LORD'S NAME TAKEN IN VAIN.)

REVEREND, venerable; deserving awe and respect. It is a title of respect given to ecclesiastics. The religious abroad are called reverend fathers; and abbesses, prioresses, &c., reverend mothers. In England, bishops are right reverend, and archbishops most reverend, private clergymen reverend. In France, before the Revolution, their bishops, archbishops, and abbots, were all alike, most reverend. In Scotland, the clergy, individually, are reverend; a synod is very reverend; and the General Assembly is venerable. The Dissenters, also, in England, have the title of reverend, though some of them suppose the term implies too much to be given to a mere creature, and that of God only it may be said with propriety, "Holy and reverend is his name." Ps. cxi. 9.

REWARD, a recompense for service done. This word when used in Scripture is not to be taken in a legal sense, as if by the exercise of any Christian grace whatever we could merit acceptance with God. And yet there is a reward which is of grace and not of debt; for "God is not unrighteous to forget his people's work of faith and labour of love;" hence he has declared, "a cup of cold water given to a disciple shall not lose its reward."

REZIN, a king of Syria, who made an alliance with Pekah, son of Remaliah, king of Israel, to invade Judah during the reign of Ahaz. 2 Kings xv. 37, 38, xvi. 5, 6.

RIEGIUM, now called Reggio, a town in Italy, in the kingdom of Naples. It was at this place that Paul landed on his way to Rome, A.D. 61. Acts xxviii. 13, 14. He was obviously going in the regular track of vessels passing from Alexandria to Rome.

RHODES, an island in the Archipelago. It was remarkable among the ancients for the healthiness of its climate, the fame of its university, and the well-known colossus, or statue of brass, consecrated to the sun. This immense statue, which was seventy cubits high, bestrode the mouth of the harbour, so that the ships sailed between its legs. Paul, on his way to Jerusalem, visited Rhodes, as we are informed in Acts xxi. 1.

RIBLAH, a city of Syria, on the northern boundary of Canaan. It is mentioned in 2 Kings xxiii. 33. Burckhardt speaks of a village on the Orontes which still bears the name of Riblah, in the district of Homs, the ancient Emesa. Jerome with little probability regards the place as identical with Antioch of Syria.

RIDER. A person riding is expected, in Oriental countries, to dismount when he meets a person of elevated rank. This explains the reason that Achsah, the daughter of Caleb, and Abigail, the wife of Nabal, alighted from their asses; it was a mark of respect which the former owed to her father, and the latter to David, a person of high rank and growing renown. It was undoubtedly for the same reason that Rebecca alighted from the camel on which she rode, on the approach of Isaac; and that Naaman, the Syrian nobleman, alighted from his chariot at the approach of Gehazi, the servant of Elisha. Persons of rank and opulence, in Eastern countries, are distinguished from their inferiors by riding on horseback when they go abroad; while those of meaner station, and Christians of all ranks, with the exception of consuls from Christian powers, ride on asses or mules. Persons of the highest condition only enjoyed, in ancient times, the honour of riding in chariots.

RIGHTEOUSNESS, justice, holiness. The righteousness of God is the absolute and essential perfection of his nature; sometimes it is put for his justice. The righteousness of Christ denotes not only his absolute perfection, but is chiefly taken in Scripture for his perfect obedience to the law, and suffering the penalty thereof in our stead.

The righteousness of the law is that obedience which the law requires. As men have, at best, but a broken, damaged, and imperfect righteousness, this word is applied to men in a very limited and qualified sense; and also with respect to a better righteousness than merely human—that obtained by faith—that freely bestowed by God, and as bestowed, so received, through Christ. Righteousness denotes conformity to the ordinances of God. Matt. iii. 15, xxi. 32. Righteousness is sometimes much the same as holiness. Acts x. 35; Eph. v. 9. The righteousness of the Pharisees, which was in their own eyes excellent, was precise to superstition, yet was unsound in principle, and worthless before God. Luke xviii. 9; Matt. ix. 13.

The righteousness of faith is the righteousness of Christ as received by faith. See JUSTIFICATION.

Christians have a threefold righteousness. (1.) The righteousness of their persons, as in Christ, his merit being imputed to them, and they accepted on the account thereof. 2 Cor. v. 21; Eph. v. 27; Isa. xlv. 24. (2.) The righteousness of their principles, being derived from, and formed according to, the rule of right. Ps. exix. 11. (3.) The righteousness of their lives, produced by the sanctifying influence of the Holy Spirit, without which no man shall see the Lord. Heb. xiii. 14; 1 Cor. vi. 11. See IMPUTATION—JUSTIFICATION—SANCTIFICATION.

RIGHT HAND denotes power, or strength; whence Scripture generally imputes to God's right hand the effects of his omnipotence. Exod. xv. 6; Ps. xxi. 8, xlv. 3, &c.; Matt. xxvi. 64; Col. iii. 1; Heb. i. 3, x. 12.

The right hand commonly denotes the south, as the left hand denotes the north.

RIGHTS OF CONSCIENCE. Conscience having been implanted in man to be his guide in the distinction of right from wrong, it is plainly a transgression of man's natural liberty to constrain his conscience. He must have a right to worship God after the mode he thinks acceptable; or, in other words, he ought not in such matters to be compelled to consult any thing but his conscience. Various writers, as Mr Burke, have attempted to argue, that we surrender a portion of this natural liberty when we become members of society. There are no doubt certain liberties that are surrendered in exchange for the advantages of the social system, but the rights of conscience cannot possibly be surrendered without denying a necessarily inherent part of the constitution of man, and without proving disloyal to our God. In all matters pertaining to conscience, our duty is clearly to obey God rather than man.

RIMMON, the name of a city in the tribe of Zebulun, 1 Chron. vi. 77; also a city in the tribe of Judah or Simeon, Josh. xv. 32. It is the name also of a mountain referred to in Judg. xx. 45, and which has by some been considered as the scene of our Lord's temptation. Rimmon is the name of an idol anciently worshipped by the Syrians at Damascus, supposed by some authors to have been the sun, and by others to have been Saturn.

RINGS. These ornaments have been used from the earliest times. They consisted of different metals, as gold, silver, and even iron. Pliny mentions the iron ring worn by a person betrothed: Rings were often very valuable. Thus we find Judah leaving his ring with Tamar as a pledge. Gen. xxxviii. 18. In the passage now referred to, the ring is called a signet. They were engraved with some characters or devices like our seals; and when kings or great men signed a decree, they did so by inking the signet and stamping it on the paper. The ring given by Pharaoh to Joseph was of this sort, and indicated that he invested him with supreme authority. In profane history, an event of the same kind is recorded. Alexander the Great gave his ring to Perdiceas, thus nominating and appointing him his successor in office. Rings were worn by the Oriental ladies on the first, third, and fourth fingers, and corresponding toes. Rings were also worn in the lobe of the ears (see EAR-RINGS), and passing through the septum of the nose.

RITE, a solemn act of religion, an external ceremony. See CEREMONY—POSITIVE INSTITUTIONS.

RITUAL, a book directing the order and manner to be observed in performing divine service in a particular church, diocese, or the like.

RIVER. The Hebrews give the name of THE river, without addition, sometimes to the Nile, sometimes to the Euphrates, and sometimes to the Jordan. The tenor of the discourse must determine the sense of this uncertain and indeterminate way of speaking. They give also the name of river to brooks and rivulets that are not very considerable. The greatest inconvenience and danger incident to travelling in the East, is when the line of the road lies across a river, there being few or no bridges. Sometimes, if a river is swollen, they have to halt upon the bank for hours, or even days; and, at other times, the natural depth of the water is so great that a passage cannot be effected, with safety, except at particular localities. The lower orders generally wade through, while persons of higher rank employ servants to carry them across; and hence the degradation to which Isaiah represents Babylon as reduced, in being compelled, not only to travel on foot, bareheaded, and with dishevelled locks, but even to ford rivers, "making bare the leg," "uncovering the thigh," like the lowest of the people. The principal rivers of Palestine were, the JORDAN, the Arnon, the Jab-bok, the Karith, the Sorek, the Besor, the Kishon, the Belus, the brook of Jezreel, the Eleutherus, the brook of Reeds or of Kanah, the Barrady or Abana, and Pharpar, rivers of Damascus. See their proper articles.

The name of river is sometimes given to the SEA (which see).

RIZPAH, the daughter of Aiah, and concubine to Saul, celebrated in Scripture for her maternal love and sorrows. 1 Sam. xxi.

ROADS. In Eastern countries, in ancient times, when roads were almost unknown, travelling was very difficult. When an Oriental prince sets out on a journey, he sends forward messengers to clear the roads, and prepare for his approach. To this custom there is an evident allusion in the prediction: "The voice of him that crieth in the wilderness, Prepare ye the way of the Lord; make straight in the desert a highway for our God. Every valley shall be exalted, and every mountain and hill shall be made low: and the crooked shall be made straight, and the rough places plain. And the glory of the Lord shall be revealed, and all flesh shall see it together: for the mouth of the Lord hath spoken it." Isa. xl. 3-5. And again: "Go through, go through the gates; prepare ye the way of the people; cast up, cast up the highway; gather out the stones; lift up a standard for the people." Isa. lxii. 10. When a prince or great man is on a journey, it is reckoned a piece of indispensable etiquette for the people whom he is about to honour with a visit to meet him on the road, and escort him with a suitable equipage to the place of his destination. It was a common practice in the East to strew flowers and branches of trees in the way of conquerors and renowned princes. Hence the Jews who believed Christ to be the promised Messiah, and the king of Israel, cut down branches of trees and strewed them in the way as he entered Jerusalem.

ROBBERS. As wells were very scarce in every part of the East, robbers and banditti generally took their stations near tanks, pools, and springs, in order that they might suddenly fall upon those who came to drink; and when the country was badly governed, annoyances of this kind were very frequent. No travellers, unless in great force, dared encamp near a well, however pleasant and desirable it might be, from fear of meeting with robbers. To this there seems to be an allusion in Deborah's song: "They that are delivered from the noise of archers in the places of drawing water, there shall they rehearse the righteous acts of the Lord, even the righteous acts towards the inhabitants of his villages in Israel: then shall the people of the Lord go down to the gates." Judg. v. 11. Throughout the whole history of the Hebrews, thefts and robberies were far from being infrequent. More especially in the latter periods of their history, the country was dreadfully infested with bands of robbers. The road from Jerusalem to Jericho is said by Mr Buckingham to be the most dangerous in Palestine. Hence the peculiar propriety of its being selected as the scene of the parable of the good Samaritan.

ROCK. No country abounds more in rocks and mountains than the land of Palestine, and accordingly rocks and rocky caverns were often resorted to as places of shelter from the enemy, or indeed from danger of any kind. Such rocky fastnesses were also frequently the resort of robbers. It was a rock that was smitten in the wilderness to supply the thirsty Israelites with water; and we have the highest authority for declaring that rock to be a type of the Messiah, smitten for the sins of his own believing people, for the Apostle Paul says, "that Rock was Christ. He is said by Isaiah to be "as the shadow of a great rock in a weary land." The metaphor of a rock is frequently resorted to by the sacred writers, but never until the rock was smitten at Rephidim. From that time it becomes a favourite figure with Moses and David and the prophets. They all speak of God the Father, and of Christ the Son as a rock, the firm foundation on which every individual believer, and the whole church of God, rest their confidence and hopes.

The sepulchres of the Hebrews were caves or vaults excavated in the native rock by the art and exertions of men. The higher these tombs were cut in the rock, among perpendicular cliffs, so as to be almost inaccessible, or the more conspicuously they were situated, the greater was supposed to be the honour of reposing there. The vanity of Shebna, which so much displeased the Lord, was discovered in preparing himself a sepulchre in the face of some lofty rock. "What hast thou here? and whom hast thou here, that thou hast hewed thee out a sepulchre here, as he that heweth him out a sepulchre on high, and that graveth an habitation for himself in a rock?" Isa. xxii. 16.

The Greeks and Romans condemned some of their criminals to be cast down from the top of a rock. This punishment is mentioned in 2 Chron. xxv. 12:

"And other ten thousand left alive did the children of Judah carry away captive, and brought them unto the top of the rock, and cast them down from the top of the rock, that they all were broken in pieces." The same practice is alluded to by the Psalmist, where he speaks of judges being overthrown in stony places, or, as it may be rendered, "thrown down by the sides of the rock."

The name of Rock is also given to God, by way of metaphor, because God is the strength, the refuge, and defence of Israel, as those places were to the people who resided among them. Ps. xviii. 2, xxxi. 2, 3; Deut. xxxii. 15-18, 30, 31; Ps. lxi. 2, &c.

ROD, an instrument of correction. The empire of the Messiah is sometimes represented by a rod of iron, to show its power and its might. Ps. ii. 9; Rev. ii. 27, xii. 5, xix. 15. Rod is sometimes put, by a pastoral metaphor, to signify a tribe or a people: "Remember thy congregation which thou hast purchased of old, the rod of thine inheritance which thou hast redeemed." Ps. lxxiv. 2. "Israel is the rod of his inheritance." Jer. x. 16. The rod of Aaron is the staff commonly used by the high priest. This is the rod that budded and blossomed like an almond tree. ROMANS, EPISTLE TO THE. This, though fifth in order of time, is placed first of all the epistles. The occasion of writing this Epistle may be easily collected from the Epistle itself. It appears that Paul, who had been made acquainted with all the circumstances of the Christians at Rome by Aquila and Priscilla (Rom. xvi. 3), and by other Jews who had been expelled from Rome by the decree of Claudius (Acts xviii. 2), was very desirous of seeing them, that he might impart to them some spiritual gift (Rom. i. 8-13, xv. 14, xvi. 1); but, being prevented from visiting them, as he had proposed, in his journey into Spain, he availed himself of the opportunity that presented itself to him by the departure of Phœbe to Rome (Rom. xvi. 1, 2) to send them an epistle. Finding, however, that the church was composed partly of heathens who had embraced the gospel, and partly of Jews, who, with many remaining prejudices, believed in Jesus as the Messiah; and finding also that many contentions arose from the Gentile converts claiming equal privileges with the Hebrew Christians (which claims the latter absolutely refused to admit unless the Gentile converts were circumcised,) he wrote this Epistle to compose these differences, and to strengthen the faith of the Roman Christians against the insinuations of false teachers; being apprehensive lest his involuntary absence from Rome should be turned by the latter to the prejudice of the gospel.

In order fully to understand this Epistle, it is necessary that we should be acquainted with the tenets believed by those whose errors the apostle here exposes and confutes. It is clear that he wrote to persons who had been either Gentiles or Jews, and that his grand design was to remove the prejudices entertained by both these descriptions of persons.

The greater part of the Gentiles, who lived in gross ignorance, did not trouble themselves much concerning the pardon of their sins, or the salvation of their souls; and the rest believed that their virtues deserved the favour of their gods, either in this world or in the next, if there were any thing to expect after death. They also thought that their vices or sins were expiated by their virtues, especially if they were truly sorry for the crimes they had committed; for they declared a man to be innocent who repented of his fault. In order to expiate the most atrocious crimes, they had recourse to purifications and sacrifices, and sometimes offered human victims; but the wisest among them maintained that nothing was more fit to appease the Divinity than a change of life.

The Jews, on the other hand, divided all mankind into three classes. The first was composed of righteous men, whose righteousness exceeded their sins; the second comprised those whose righteousness was equal to their sins; and the third contained wicked men, whose sins were more in number than their good deeds. They thought, however, that there was no person so righteous as not to stand in need of pardon: but they believed that they should obtain it by repentance, by confession of their sins, by almsgiving, by prayer, by the afflictions which God set them, by their purifications, sacrifices, and change of life, and above all by the solemn sacrifice which was annually offered on the great day of atonement;—and if there yet remained any thing to be pardoned, every thing (they said) would be expiated by death. Further, the most zealous among the Jews entertained various erroneous opinions relative to their justification, to the election of their nation, and to the Roman government, which it is important to consider, as St Paul has refuted them at considerable length in this Epistle.

ROME, the capital city of Italy, and at one time the mistress of the world. It was founded by Romulus and Remus, B. C. 748, and gradually rose in population and importance until in process of time it became the seat of the fourth great empire referred to by Dan. ii. 40. The extent of ground which Rome covered was of course very limited at first, but at length it included seven hills,—a peculiarity which is plainly adverted to in Rev. xvii. 9, “And here is the mind which hath wisdom. The seven heads are seven mountains, on which the woman sitteth.” Paganism was the established religion of Rome until the days of Constantine the Great, who first appointed Christianity to be the established religion of the Roman empire. We are not informed when the gospel was first preached in Rome, but we learn from Acts ii. 10, that “strangers from Rome, Jews and proselytes,” were present at Jerusalem on the day of Pentecost. A Christian church was early formed in that city, to whom Paul addresses the ablest and most argumentative of his epistles. We have no evidence for the unfounded assertion that Peter was at Rome, and was bishop of the church formed there, but we know that Paul was there as a prisoner at large, and preached the gospel in that city. The church there appears to have been numerous and flourishing, and when Paul wrote to them, “their faith,” he says, “was spoken of through the whole world.”

ROOF. See HOUSE.

ROOT. The root metaphorically denotes the stock, the race, or the posterity. Prov. xii. 3. The root of the just shall not be disturbed, shall not fail. Paul says (Rom. xi. 16–18) that the Jews are, as it were, the root that bears the tree into which the Gentiles are grafted, inasmuch as from them Christ came according to the flesh, and among them the first Christian Church was collected. Jesus Christ is the root on which Christians depend, and from which they derive life and subsistence. Col. ii. 7; John xv. 1; Rev. xxii. 16.

ROSARY, a bunch or string of beads, on which the Roman Catholics count their prayers.

ROSE (chabatzzeleth—Cant. ii. 1; Isa. xxxv. 1). The rose, so much and so often sung by the poets of Persia, Arabia, Greece, and Rome, is, indeed, the pride of the garden for elegance of form, for glow of colour, and fragrance of smell. Tournefort mentions fifty-three kinds, of which the Damascus rose and the rose of Sharon are the finest. The beauty of these flowers is too well known to be insisted on; and they are at this day much admired in the East, where they are extremely fragrant. In what esteem the rose was among the Greeks, may be learned from the fifth and fifty-third odes of Anacreon. Among the ancients it occupied a conspicuous place in every chaplet; it was a principal ornament in every festive meeting, and at every solemn sacrifice; and the comparisons in the Apocrypha (Ecclus. xxiv. 14, l. 8) show that the Jews were likewise much delighted with it. The rose-bud, or opening rose, seems in particular a favourite ornament. The Jewish sensualists, in Wisd. ii. 8, are introduced as saying, “Let us fill ourselves with costly wines and ointments; and let no flower of the spring pass by us. Let us crown ourselves with rose-buds before they are withered.”

RUBY, a beautiful gem, whose colour is red, with an admixture of purple, and is, in its most perfect state, a gem of extreme value. In hardness it is equal to the sapphire, and second only to the diamond. It is mentioned in Job xxviii. 18; Prov. viii. 11, &c.

RUE (pēganon—Luke xi. 42), a small shrubby plant, common in gardens. It has a strong, unpleasant smell, and a bitterish, penetrating taste.

RUFUS, the individual who is mentioned in Mark xv. 21, as assisting our blessed Lord to carry his cross to Calvary. He is called the son of Simon the Cyrenian, who is supposed by some to have been the same person as the Simeon of Acts xiii. 1. The name of Rufus occurs among the salutations which Paul sends to Christians at Rome. Rom. xvi. 13, “Salute Rufus, chosen in the Lord, and his mother and mine.” From this passage it has sometimes been alleged, that Paul and Rufus were natural brothers or children of the same mother. But the probability is, that Paul refers to the motherly kindness and attention which, at some period or another, he had received from the mother of Rufus.

RUN, used in figure. “I therefore so run, not as uncertainly” (1 Cor. ix. 24–27)—not passing over the boundaries, the limits of the course. “So run that ye may obtain” the crown—the reward. Heb. xii. 1. “Let us run with patience,” perseveringly, steadily, “the race set before us.” (See GAMES—RACE.) To run to excess of riot (1 Pet. iv. 4) is to pursue with avidity, to follow with prolonged attention, sensual gratifications, indulgences. Persons of rank and distinction in the East had always couriers running before them, or alongside their chariot. Elijah performed this office to Ahab immediately after his memorable triumph over the priests of Baal.

RUTH. The scope of this book is, principally, to delineate part of Christ's genealogy in David's time. Compare Ruth iv. 28–22 with Matt. i. 5, 6.

It had been foretold to the Jews that the Messiah should be of the tribe of Judah, and it was afterwards further revealed that he should be of the family of David; and therefore it was necessary, for the full understanding of these prophecies, that the history of the family, in that tribe, should be written before these prophecies were revealed, to prevent the least suspicion of fraud or design. And thus this book, these prophecies, and their accomplishment, serve to illustrate each other. The adoption of Ruth, a heathen converted to Judaism, into the line of Christ, has generally been considered as a pre-intimation of the admission of the Gentiles into the church. A further design of this book is to evidence the care of Divine Providence over those who sincerely fear God, in raising the pious Ruth from a state of the deepest adversity to that of the highest prosperity. The whole narrative is written with peculiar simplicity; and the interviews between Boaz and Ruth display the most unaffected piety, liberality, and modesty; and their reverent observance of the Mosaic law, as well as of ancient customs, is portrayed in very lively and animated colours. In beauty, pastoral simplicity, and pathos, the book of Ruth is unrivalled.

S.

SABACHTHANI, a Syriac phrase, signifying, "Thou hast forsaken me." Mark xv. 34.

SABAOOTH, or rather ZABAOOTH, a Hebrew word, signifying hosts or armies; Jehovah sabaoth, the Lord of hosts. By this phrase we may understand the angels and ministers of the Lord, or the stars and planets, which, as an army ranged in battle array, perform the will of God, or both collectively. It is only with this comprehensive word that Jehovah is ever found in construction.

SABBATARIANS, those who keep the seventh day as the Sabbath. They are to be found principally, if not wholly, among the Baptists. They object to the reasons which are generally alleged for keeping the first day, and assert that the change from the seventh to the first was effected by Constantine on his conversion to Christianity. The three following propositions contain a summary of their principles as to this article of the Sabbath, by which they stand distinguished:—1. That God hath required the observation of the seventh, or last day of every week, to be observed by mankind universally for the weekly Sabbath. 2. That this command of God is perpetually binding on man till time shall be no more. And, 3. That this sacred rest of the seventh-day Sabbath is not (by divine authority) changed from the seventh and last to the first day of the week, or that the Scripture doth nowhere require the observation of any other day of the week for the weekly Sabbath, but the seventh day only.

SABBATH. The obligation of the Sabbath upon Christians, as well as the extent of it, has been the subject of much controversy.

It has been maintained by various authors well conversant with antiquity, that traces, however faint, of the original institution of the Sabbath are discernible in the writings of several ancient heathens. The seventh day is certainly spoken of by some of them as being distinguished from other days. One calls it the illustrious light of the sun; and another styles it sacred or holy. Josephus, in his answer to Apion, hints at the same fact, but appears to refer it to a more recent source. "Nay, such is the reputation," says that historian, "we have had a long time in the world for our piety and good government, that there is hardly any nation, either Greek or barbarian, that does not live in some sort of conformity to our example, either in the observation of our seventh day's Sabbath, the use of lamps, the celebration of fasts, abstinence from such and such certain meats." May not the conformity here alleged, however, have had its origin as to some points in traditional remains of a primeval revelation? It is, indeed, highly improbable, that Pagans, who affected to despise the Hebrews, would have directly adopted their rites and institutions. And if any nation of remote antiquity can be supposed to have possessed from tradition a knowledge of the Sabbath, the Egyptians, above all others, were likely to be acquainted with it. And if so, one obvious reply would be furnished to the insidious question, Did their Egyptian taskmasters allow the Hebrews to rest from their labours on the Sabbath? Should the opposite ground be taken, that no such institution existed in Egypt, a ready answer may yet be given. To say nothing of the immunities granted to the Israelites on their settlement in the land of Ham, might not a sense of their own interest, founded upon the beneficial effects of the weekly repose on the health of their slaves, or the yearnings of humanity, have, for a time at least, reasonably enough induced their oppressors to yield their acquiescence? But, even should the negative view be insisted on, namely, that it was a part of the cruel policy pursued towards the oppressed race, altogether to deny them any periodical respite from their arduous toil, still no real difficulty stands in the way. If the children of Israel acted from constraint in the matter, no proof can hence be derived that they had forgotten the God of their fathers, or ceased to regard the Sabbath as holy. May not rather the deprivation of its sacred exercises and observances, to which they were subjected, have constituted no inconsiderable part of the grievances under which they groaned, and from the intolerable pressure of which they so earnestly cried to God for deliverance? Of this we are certain, that the plea urged by Moses, when he petitioned Pharaoh to let the people go, expressly was, that they might observe, without restraint, the rites of their religion in the wilderness.

The alleged discrepancy between Exod. xx. 11 and Deut. v. 15 is merely apparent. In these two passages, the observance of the Sabbath is enforced by two different but perfectly consistent motives; the one drawn from the original consecration of the seventh day, the other from the occasion on which the institution was publicly and solemnly revived after a period of greater or less neglect of it.

The rest of the Sabbath, when observed most strictly, according to its original intention, was prepared for with seriousness and care. A portion of the preceding day was set apart for the purpose, and called the preparation. In accordance with the general method of computing time in use among the Hebrews, the seventh day began at sunset the previous night, and it lasted twenty-four hours. "From evening to evening shall ye celebrate the Sabbath." It was entirely devoted to religious purposes, though works of necessity and mercy were not forbidden. Prayer, meditation, and the reading and study of the sacred writings, formed the principal employment. A burnt-offering of two lambs was added to the daily sacrifice; the showbread was also changed. The work of creation was called to grateful remembrance, and the Omnipotent Creator reverently adored. Thanksgivings were devoutly offered up for all blessings received. National mercies were solemnly commemorated, and, in particular, the deliverance from Egyptian bondage; while from the recollection of that deliverance, and from other motives to benevolence, feelings of charity and good will were cherished and exemplified. In such exercises, especially in their "holy convocations" or public assemblies, the pious Israelites engaged with devout fervour, and derived from them the greatest delight. "This is the day," exclaimed David exultingly, "this is the day which the Lord hath made, we will rejoice and be glad in it." In order that their minds might be entirely disentangled from secular affairs, all work was suspended, and a moderate abstinence observed till sunset, after which it seems to have been customary to partake, with temperate and social freedom, of choice viands, and to exercise hospitality. Even travelling was limited to the small distance of two thousand cubits, or something less than a mile—the extent of the Sabbath-day's journey. The rigour with which a total cessation from worldly pursuits of business or of pleasure was enforced, has often been animadverted on as extreme and unnecessary. And the punishment of death, inflicted for disobedience, was, doubtless, severe in the last degree. This penalty, however, is not awarded in the fourth commandment; and we have no reason to think that any, except the most flagrant and impious breaches of the Sabbath, were visited with its infliction. But in considering these circumstances, with the view either to praise or blame, it ought always to be carefully remembered that the situation of the Israelites, as a chosen people, was very peculiar. Every act of resistance to the divine authority on their part, implied direct audacious rebellion against the Most High, as their King, as well as their God, and being committed in the face of the most signal manifestations of his visible miraculous interposition, became highly aggravated. The great object of their separation from the other kindreds of mankind, was to preserve alive on the earth the knowledge and worship of the true God, so as to prepare the way for the gospel dispensation. All the means employed for these ends, therefore, must have been vastly important. And since the prevalence of idolatry was so inveterate and extensive around them, and their proneness to fall into it so strong, the most rigorous checks were, humanly speaking, absolutely requisite.

As general corruption, however, grew up and spread among the ancient Hebrews, the neglect and desecration of the Sabbath ensued. They began to account it, as well as other parts of divine service, a weariness, saying in their hearts, "When will it be gone, that we may buy and sell and get gain,—that we may set forth wheat, making the ephah small and the shekel great, and falsifying the balances by deceit?" But it happened in this, as in many points of their religious declension, that the judgment of God, in the captivity, at length produced a salutary change. They never after that calamitous event relapsed into grossly idolatrous practices; neither did they, in general, again fail to manifest external respect for the Sabbath. That great national catastrophe was sent upon them, in part, as the punishment of their former remissness in reference to the duties of the seventh day; and the awful miseries they endured under it, and in consequence of it, had the proper effect, though not immediately, as we learn from Nehemiah's grievous complaint, yet eventually, to the extent, at least, of outward reformation.

But while they henceforth clung, with immovable steadfastness, to the form of the institution, they seem still, in too many cases, to have misunderstood or disregarded its holy design. In this, as in numberless other instances, we may see, exhibited in their conduct, the tendency there is in human nature to rest in the mere formal observance of a religious ordinance, and to lose sight of the important moral object it was intended to promote. Spiritual homage, proceeding from a lowly and submissive frame of mind, is a far costlier sacrifice to flesh and blood than any amount of bodily service; and the unrenewed heart would always gladly compound for the deficiency of the one by the abundance of the other. Under the strongest operation of this bias the Jews of later ages appear to have acted. They sought to render the burden of their ceremonial observances, in every branch, altogether intolerable. They racked invention to multiply minute directions for the scrupulous keeping, rather than the godly sanctification of the Sabbath. But these generally referred to points of the most frivolous description. It was enjoined to avoid walking upon grass so as to bruise it, because that partook of the nature of thrashing, according to the ancient Oriental process of treading out the corn. It was forbidden to kill even a troublesome insect, because such an act was a species of hunting. Such unmeaning and absurd prohibitions, when attended to, would often unavoidably interfere with the discharge of duties of the highest importance, in a religious and moral point of view.

This pharisaical tendency to strain at a gnat and swallow a camel had reached an almost incredible pitch in the days of our Lord. His disciples were censured for plucking the ears of corn on the seventh day, though suffering from hunger, on the ground that by so doing they virtually engaged in the operation of reaping. And Christ himself, when he mercifully healed the sick on the Sabbath, was condemned, under the pretext, so precise was their code of rules, that the diseases he cured were chronic and not acute, that is, of a long standing and lingering, not of a severely painful or suddenly fatal kind. Our Saviour, on all these occasions, expressed his marked disapprobation of such trifling and preposterous distinctions. He reminded the Jews of what had taken place in a purer age of their church. He directed their attention to an incident in the history of David, which, viewed in a strict light, implied a much greater violation of the divine commandment than the act of his followers, and yet was vindicated on the same plea of necessity. He also referred them to some of the more servile functions of the priestly office, which were regularly performed in the temple on the Sabbath-day. In reference to this subject, he charged their rulers and teachers with hypocrisy. He accused them of making void the law by their traditions. But in all his remarks he chiefly inculcated the great principle, "that mercy is better than sacrifice."

We are informed by Eusebius, that from the beginning the Christians assembled on the first day of the week, called by them "The Lord's-day," for the purposes of religious worship, "to read the Scriptures, to preach, and to celebrate the Lord's supper;" and Justin Martyr observes, "that on the Lord's-day all Christians in the city, or country, meet together, because that is the day of our Lord's resurrection, and then we read the writings of the apostles and prophets; this being done, the president makes an oration to the assembly, to exhort them to imitate, and to practise the things they have heard; then we all join in prayer, and after that we celebrate the sacrament. Then they who are able, and willing, give what they think proper; and what is collected is laid up in the hands of the president, who distributes it to orphans and widows, and other necessitous Christians, as their wants require." See 1 Cor. xvi. 2. A very honourable conduct and worship! would to God it were more prevalent among us; with the spirit and piety of primitive Christianity!

The evils arising from Sabbath-breaking are greatly to be lamented; they are an insult to God, an injury to ourselves, and an awful example to our servants, our children, and our friends. To sanctify this day, we should consider it—1. A day of rest; not, indeed, to exclude works of mercy and charity, but a cessation from all labour and care. (2.) As a day of remembrance, of creation, preservation, redemption. (3.) As a day of meditation and prayer, in which we should cultivate communion with God. Rev. i. 10. (4.) As a day of public worship. Acts xx. 7; John xx. 19. (5.) As a day of joy. Isa. lvi. 2; Ps. cxviii. 24. (6.) As a day of praise. Ps. cxvi. 12-14. (7.) As a day of anticipation; looking forward to that holy, happy, and eternal Sabbath, that remains for the people of God.

SABBATH DAY'S JOURNEY. Origen says that the journey of a Sabbath day is one mile, or two thousand cubits. The Jews also used to make a mile consist of two thousand cubits; so that their cubit must be two feet and a half, since their mile contains a thousand paces, or five thousand feet, taking their paces at five feet each. The Syriac translator of the Acts of the Apostles puts about seven stadia for a Sabbath day's journey; which is according to what some rabbins say, that a mile is seven stadia and a half.

SABBATICAL YEAR. The origin and design of this institution are to be found in Exod. xxiii. 10, 11, "And six years thou shalt sow thy land, and shalt gather in the fruits thereof: but the seventh thou shalt let it rest and lie still; that the poor of thy people may eat: and what they leave the beasts of the field shall eat. In like manner thou shalt deal with thy vineyard, and with thy oliveyard." It was appointed in the wilderness, but of course it could not be observed in many important particulars till after the settlement of the children of Israel in the promised land. The Sabbatical year was characterised by,—1. Total cessation from the labours of husbandry. 2. The spontaneous produce of the earth was used in common. 3. All debts due by one Israelite to another were remitted. 4. The public law was read during the feast of tabernacles.

SABEANS, a trading people referred to in Isa. xlv. 14, as "men of stature." There seem to have been different tribes bearing this name who dwelt in Arabia, and who, being of wandering habits, migrated in hordes to different places, and thus we are in danger of supposing them to have permanently occupied various localities. Thus even in the time of Job there were predatory tribes called Sabcans, who carried off the patriarch's flocks, i. 15. They are supposed to have been descended from Sheba, son of Cush (Gen. x. 7), and to have been nomadic tribes of Arabia Felix, who traded chiefly in spices. The Queen of Sheba is supposed to have come from that country to hear the wisdom of Solomon; and the kings of Sheba and Seba are predicted by the Psalmist as "offering gifts," which probably consisted of frankincense and myrrh, and other spices. Ps. lxxii. 10. Josephus, however, is of opinion that the Queen of Sheba came from Africa, probably the isle of Meroë.

SABELLIANS, a sect in the third century, that embraced the opinions of Sabellius, a philosopher of Egypt, who openly taught that there is but one person in the Godhead. The Sabellians maintained that the Word and the Holy Spirit are only virtues, emanations, or functions of the Deity; and held that He who is in heaven is the Father of all things; that he descended into the Virgin, became a child, and was born of her as a son; and that, having accomplished the mystery of our salvation, he diffused himself on the apostles in tongues of fire, and was then denominated the Holy Ghost. This they explained by resembling God to the sun; the illuminating virtue or quality of which was the Word, and its warming virtue the Holy Spirit. The Word, they taught, was darted, like a divine ray, to accomplish the work of redemption; and that, having re-ascended into heaven, the influences of the Father were communicated after a like manner to the apostles.

SABIANS, MENDAITES. See CHRISTIANS OF ST JOHN.

SABIANS, the name given to the earliest idolaters in the world, who worshipped the heavenly bodies. They first worshipped them per sacella, or by their tabernacles; and afterwards by images also.

SABTAH, the third son of Cush (Gen. x. 7), peopled part of Arabia Felix, where is a city called Sabta, and a people called Sabatheans.

SABTECHAH, fifth son of Cush, who also peopled, as is thought, part of Arabia, or some country towards Assyria, or Armenia, or Caramania: for in all these regions are found traces of the name Sabtecha. Gen. x. 7.

SACKCLOTH. Mr Harmer tells us that "it was a coarse kind of woollen cloth, such as they made sacks of, and neither haircloth nor made of hemp; nor was there that humiliation in wearing it which we suppose." This is incorrect, because the Scripture expressly mentions, "The sun became black as sackcloth of hair (Rev. vi. 12); and, "I clothe the heavens with blackness, I make sackcloth their covering." Isa. i. 3. Sackcloth, then, was made of hair, and it was black. The prophets wore it at particular times; and agreeably to that custom, the two witnesses (Rev. xi. 3) are represented as clothed in sackcloth; implying the resumption of the ancient prophetic habiliment. It was used in these cases to express mourning. It appears, also, to have been employed to enwrap the dead, when about to be buried; so that its being worn by survivors was a kind of assimilation to the departed; and its being worn by penitents was an implied confession that their guilt exposed them to death. This may be gathered from an expression of Chardin, who says, "Kel Anayet, the Shah's buffoon, made a shop in the seraglio, which he filled with pieces of that kind of stuff of which winding-sheets for the dead are made." And again, "The sufferers die by hundreds; wrapping-cloth is doubled in price." However, in later ages, some nations might bury in linen, yet others still retained the use of sackcloth for that purpose. This dress was the ordinary expression of grief and sorrow among the Orientals. Whenever a person was relieved from distress, or any joyful event occurred, this mourning dress was laid aside. Sometimes, on very mournful occasions, the very domestic animals were clothed with sackcloth. Thus we are told that, on the prediction of Jonah being reported to the king of Nineveh, "he arose from his throne, and he laid his robe from him, and covered him with sackcloth, and sat in ashes. And he caused it to be proclaimed and published through Nineveh (by the decree of the king and his nobles), saying, Let neither man nor beast, herd nor flock, taste anything; let them not feed, nor drink water. But let man and beast be covered with sackcloth, and cry mightily unto God: yea, let them turn every one from his evil way, and from the violence that is in their hands." Jonah iii. 6-8. The practice of sitting in sackcloth and ashes still prevails in the East.

SACRAMENT is derived from the Latin word sacramentum, which signifies an oath, particularly the oath taken by soldiers to be true to their country and general. The word was adopted by the writers of the Latin Church, to denote those ordinances of religion by which Christians came under an obligation of obedience to God, and which obligation, they supposed, was equally sacred with that of an oath. (See Vow.) Of sacraments, in this sense of the word, Protestant Churches admit of but two; and it is not easy to conceive how a greater number can be made out from Scripture. (See BAPTISM—LORD'S SUPPER.) The Romanists, however, add to this number confirmation, penance, extreme unction, ordination, and marriage, holding in all seven sacraments. (See POPERY.) The Socinians consider the sacrament merely as something external and material, designed to represent what is spiritual and invisible; and that they are to be used as means, like the reading of the Scriptures, for instance, for purposes of moral improvement. The true doctrine undoubtedly is, that a rite, in order to come up to the idea of a sacrament, should not merely present a vague and general resemblance between the external matter, which is the visible substance of the rite, and the thing thereby signified, but also words of institution, and a promise by which the two are connected together.

SACRAMENTARIANS, a general name given to all such as have held erroneous opinions respecting the Lord's supper. The term is chiefly applied among Roman Catholics, by way of reproach, to the Lutherans, Calvinists, and other Protestants.

SACRIFICE. Various have been the conjectures of the learned concerning the origin of sacrifices. Some suppose that they had their origin in superstition, and were merely the inventions of men; others, that they originated in the natural sentiments of the human heart; others imagine that God, in order to prevent their being offered to idols, introduced them into his service, though he did not approve of them as good in themselves, or as proper rites of worship. But there are strong reasons for believing that God saw meet to appoint sacrifices to point forward the faith of Old Testament saints to Jesus, who was decreed, in the fulness of time, to "take away sin by the sacrifice of himself." The institution of sacrifice was thus made to serve the purpose of a standing ordinance in the Jewish Church, typical of Him who "by his one offering hath perfected for ever them that are sanctified."

An objection to the divine origin of sacrifices has been drawn from the Scriptures themselves, particularly Jer. vii. 22, 23. Dr Doddridge, however, justly remarks, that, according to the genius of the Hebrew language, one thing seems to be forbidden, and another commanded, when the meaning only is, that the latter is generally to be preferred to the former. The text before us is a remarkable instance of this; as likewise Joel ii. 13; Matt. vi. 19, 20; John vi. 27; Luke xii. 4, 5; Col. iii. 2. And it is evident that Gen. xlv. 8; Exod. xvi. 8; John v. 30, vii. 19; and many other passages, are to be expounded in the same comparative sense; so that the whole may be resolved into the apophthegm of the wise man: "To do justice and judgment is more acceptable to the Lord than sacrifice." Prov. xxi. 3.

"It is indeed inconceivable," says Dr Dick, "that the mind of man should of itself have contrived sacrifices as the means of propitiating the Deity, because reason can perceive no connection between the slaying of an animal and the averting of his wrath; and it might rather seem to be a new offence to put an innocent creature to death, because we were doomed to die, and were desirous to make our escape. There is no doubt that our first parents were supernaturally guided to this mode of at once acknowledging their guilt and imploring the mercy of their Maker, with a reference to the future substitution and atonement of the Seed of the woman. Some have supposed that the coats of skin, with which God is said to have clothed Adam and Eve, because, by his direction, they used them as garments, were the skins of animals which had been offered on the altar. Be this as it may, we find their two sons, Abel and Cain, presenting their offerings, the one the firstlings of the flock, and the other the fruits of the ground. A remarkable difference in the reception of their oblations is pointed out by the sacred historian, when he says, 'the Lord had respect unto Abel, and to his offering; but unto Cain and to his offering he had not respect' Gen. iv. 4; and it is thus explained in the Epistle to the Hebrews: 'By faith Abel offered unto God a more excellent sacrifice, πλεονα θυσιαν, than Cain.' Heb. xi. 4. Much criticism has been employed about these words; but whether we translate them more sacrifice, a greater sacrifice, or a fuller sacrifice, the result is the same, that the sacrifice of Abel, being of a propitiatory kind, and presented in the faith of God's mercy through the promised Redeemer, was accepted; while Cain, neglecting to bring such an oblation, and contenting himself with a sacrifice of thanksgiving, met with the doom which every sinner may expect who presumes to draw near to God without an atonement. The faith for which Abel is celebrated, implies that his sacrifice was founded on a divine institution accompanied with a promise of acceptance, and that it bore a typical relation to the great Redeemer, who, by dying, was to restore life and happiness to our guilty race."

The term sacrifice is often used in a secondary or metaphorical sense, and applied to the good works of believers, and to the duties of prayer and praise, as in the following passages: "But to do good, and to communicate, forget not; for with such sacrifices God is well pleased." Heb. xiii. 16. "I beseech you, by the mercies of God, that ye present your bodies a living sacrifice, holy and acceptable to God; which is your reasonable service." Rom. xii. 1. "There is peculiar reason," says Dr Owen, "for assigning this appellation to moral duties; for in every sacrifice there was a presentation of something unto God. The worshipper was not to offer that which cost him nothing—part of his substance was to be transferred from himself to God. So it is in these duties; they cannot be properly observed without the alienation of something that was our own—our time, ease, property, &c., and a dedication of it to the Lord. Hence they have the general nature of sacrifices." See ABEL—ANIMAL—ATONEMENT—RECONCILIATION—REDEMPTION.

SACRILEGE, the crime of profaning sacred things, or things devoted to God. The ancient Church distinguished several sorts of sacrilege. 1. The first was the diverting things appropriated to sacred purposes to other uses. 2. Robbing the graves, or defacing and spoiling the monuments of the dead. 3. Those were considered as sacrilegious persons who delivered up their Bibles and the sacred utensils of the Church to the pagans, in the time of the Diocletian persecution. 4. Profaning the sacraments, churches, altars, &c. 5. Molesting or hindering a clergyman in the performance of his office. 6. Depriving men of the use of the Scriptures or the sacraments, particularly the cup in the eucharist. The Romish casuists acknowledge all these but the last.

SADDUCEES, a sect of the Jews to which there is frequent reference in the New Testament. The following account of them is given by the late Dr Welsh:—

"The Sadducees, according to their own account, derived their origin from an individual named Sadok, who in his zeal to give to virtue a character of entire disinterestedness, was led to deny altogether a future state of rewards and punishments. In the prosecution of this argument, he is said to have rejected the authority of all the sacred writings, with the exception of the Pentateuch, which might be supposed to favour his views as to a future state. Others derive the name of the sect from their character as just, their moral character being distinguished from that of the sanctimonious Pharisees. It may be easily imagined, without inquiring into the accuracy of these statements, that the multiplicity of rites added by hypocrisy or superstition to the Mosaic service, awakened a spirit of inquiry which could only determine the limits between what was authoritative and what of human device, by rejecting every thing as of divine authority, except the writings of the great prophet of their race. The danger of allegorical interpretation once perceived, they might proceed to the other extreme, refusing to receive any declaration but in its strictest and most literal meaning. In this way, the doctrine of a future state was set aside—and this might, in the first instance, and with individuals of a speculative character, be represented as favourable to the purity of virtue. It has often happened, however, that vicious principles which the ingenuity of those who have promulgated them has construed as favourable to virtue, have been practically employed by the followers of the sect, as an excuse for criminal indulgence. And we find the doctrine of the Sadducees chiefly prevailing among the richer and more luxurious classes, whose temporal advantages obscured the view of the future, or whose excesses made them dread a hereafter. The doctrine as to spirits was also rejected, upon the principle, apparently, that nothing is to be received as revealed that lies beyond the limits of our own experience."

SAFFRON, a well-known flower, of a blue colour, in the midst of which are small yellow threads, of a very agreeable smell. Solomon (Cant. iv. 14) joins it with other aromatics; and Jeremiah is made to speak of cloth of a saffron colour. Lam. iv. 5. The passage, however, rather signifies purple or crimson.

SAINT (from sanctus, holy), one of the New Testament designations of real Christians. It belongs to all who are "sanctified by the Spirit of our God." The word is generally applied to the apostles and other holy persons mentioned in the Scriptures; but the Romanists restrict its application to those who are canonized. See CANONIZATION.

SALAMIS, an ancient city of great note in the island of Cyprus, and in which Paul preached in the synagogues of the Jews, as we learn from Acts xiii. 5.

SALATHIEL, the son of Jeconiah and father of Zerubbabel, 1 Chron. iii. 17. He was one of the Jewish captives in Babylon, and appears to have died there. It is somewhat curious that the Evangelist Luke, in tracing the genealogy of our blessed Lord, makes Salathiel the son of Neri; but when we bear in mind the vague manner in which the word son is used among the Hebrews, we may have no difficulty in accounting satisfactorily for this apparent discrepancy, by supposing that, while Salathiel was the son of Jeconiah, he was, also, either by marriage or by adoption, the son of Neri. Nay, double names being very frequent among the Jews, it is quite possible that Neri and Jeconiah may be two different names for the same person.

SALEM. See JERUSALEM.

SALOME, the dancer, daughter of Herodias, and of Herod Philip. Nicephorus and Metaphrastes inform us that she accompanied her mother and Herod in their banishment into Gaul, where she is said to have been accidentally killed. The story, however, is altogether unsupported by the testimony of other writers. Josephus, indeed, whose statements are uniformly regarded as, in matters of contemporary history, worthy of all credit, tells us she first married Philip the tetrarch, son of Herod the Great and Cleopatra, who died about A.D. 33 or 34, and afterwards Aristobulus, son of Herod, king of Chalcis, her cousin-german, by whom she had several children. Thus she lived above thirty years after the exile of her father-in-law.

SALOME, wife of Zebedee, mother of James the Great and John the evangelist; one of those holy women who attended our Saviour in his journeys, and ministered to him. Matt. xxvii. 56. See also Mark xv. 40; Matt. xxvii. 55, 56; Mark xvi. 1, 2.

SALT. God appointed that salt should be used in all the sacrifices that were offered to him. Lev. ii. 13: "And every oblation of thy meat offering shalt thou season with salt; neither shalt thou suffer the salt of the covenant of thy God to be lacking from thy meat offering: with all thine offerings thou shalt offer salt." Salt is the symbol of wisdom (Col. iv. 6), of perpetuity and incorruption (Numb. xviii. 19), of barrenness and sterility (Judg. ix. 45). It is likewise the emblem of hospitality (Ezra iv. 14), where "maintenance from the king's table" should have been translated "salted with the salt of the palace," as it is in the Chaldee. And it is now a common expression of the natives of the East Indies, "I eat such a one's salt," meaning, I am fed by him. Hence, to have eaten of a man's salt, is to be bound to him by the ties of friendship. In the East, covenant arrangements were usually ratified by salt. An agreement thus ratified is called "a covenant of salt."

SALT SEA, a name given to the Dead Sea. See the preceding article.

SALT, VALLEY OF, on the south-west of the Dead Sea, where David overcame the Syrians (1 Chron. xviii. 3), and where, at a subsequent period, Amaziah defeated the Edomites. 2 Kings xiv. 7; 2 Chron. xxv. 11. David beat the Idumeans in the Valley of Salt, as he returned from Syria of Zobah. It is probable that this plain of salt is the Valley of Salt of Scripture.

SALUTATIONS. "The common phrases of salutation at meeting friends, and those which were used in parting from them, were of a religious character, expressing prayers for the blessing of God on those to whom they were spoken. 'Be thou blessed of Jehovah;' 'The blessing of Jehovah be upon thee;' 'God be with thee.' Such were usual forms in the most ancient times. A still more universal expression was, 'Peace be with you;' and this is the general salutation in eastern countries to this day. Thus our Saviour saluted his disciples, when he presented himself among them after his resurrection. When uttered by his lips, the words had real and rich signification, widely different from their empty value, as they were commonly used in the ceremonies of a frivolous world. To this difference he himself directed the attention of his afflicted followers, when he was about to be taken from them by death: 'Peace I leave with you, my peace I give unto you: not as the world giveth, give I unto you.'

"At the present day, eastern salutations take up a considerable time. When an Arab meets his friend, he begins, while he is yet some distance from him, to make gestures that may express his very great satisfaction in seeing him. When he comes up to him, he grasps him by the right hand, and then brings back his own hand to his lips, in token of respect. He next proceeds to place his hand gently under the long beard of the other, and honours it with an affectionate kiss. He inquires particularly, again and again, concerning his health and the health of his family; and repeats, over and over, the best wishes for his prosperity and peace, giving thanks to God that he is permitted once more to behold his face. All this round of gestures and words is, of course, gone over by the friend too with like formality. But they are not generally satisfied with a single exchange of the sort; they sometimes repeat as often as ten times the whole tiresome ceremony, with little or no variation. Some such tedious modes of salutation were common also of old, so that a man might suffer very material delay in travelling if he chanced to meet several acquaintances, and should undertake to salute each according to the custom of the country. On this account, when Elisha sent his servant Gehazi in great haste to the Shunamite's house, he said to him: 'If thou meet any man, salute him not; and if any salute thee, answer him not again.' 2 Kings iv. 29. So when our Lord sent forth his seventy disciples, among other instructions he bade them 'salute no man by the way'—meaning, that their work was too important to allow such a waste of time in the exchange of mere unmeaning ceremonies. Luke x. 4. We have presented to us, in the meeting of Jacob and Esau, a form of salutation which may give us some notion of the manners of their early age in this respect. Few instances, however, could equal that in the genuine and affecting interest which it displayed; and we may well suppose, that in common cases, where there was less of friendly feeling, there was, at the same time, more attention to formal ceremony. On that occasion, Jacob, we are told, 'bowed himself to the ground seven times, until he came near to his brother. And Esau ran to meet him, and embraced him, and fell on his neck, and kissed him: and they wept.'"—(Gen. xxxiii. 3, 4.)

SALVATION, deliverance of any kind, temporal or spiritual. But most frequently the term is applied to the great deliverance which Christ hath effected for his people,—a deliverance involving freedom from all evil, and possession of all bliss. It is of this salvation that Paul says, Heb. ii. 3: "How shall we escape, if we neglect so great salvation; which at the first began to be spoken by the Lord, and was confirmed unto us by them that heard him." It includes pardon, justification, adoption, sanctification, and eternal life. It is a free, a complete, an everlasting salvation. See ATONEMENT—PROPTIATION—REDEMPTION—RECONCILIATION—SANCTIFICATION.

SALVATION OF INFANTS. See INFANTS, SALVATION OF.

SAMARIA. The district of Canaan bearing this name "comprehended the territory formerly assigned to Ephraim and Manasseh, and it was situated so exactly in the centre of the country, between Judea and Galilee, that to a person passing from the one province to the other the direct road was through this district,—a fact which, when known, affords a satisfactory explanation of that passage in the Gospel of John, where it is said of our Lord, in travelling to Jerusalem, 'he must needs pass through Samaria.' John iv. 4. It was inhabited by the posterity of the colonists whom the Babylonish monarch brought from the East country to form a settlement in those parts of the Holy Land, whence the ten tribes were withdrawn. The language, manners, and, above all, the religion of the new settlers was of a mongrel character, made up of a mixture of their own native customs and opinions with those of their neighbours in their adopted country." This province is at present the most productive part of all Palestine. "The valleys are well watered and fruitful; the hills are lower, better rounded, and less sterile, than those of Judea and Galilee; among its woods the olive is most abundant. Here the animals are numerous, but the region is thinly inhabited by man, a circumstance which arises probably from the fact that the open character of the country affords less security against the oppression of the government. Shaw travelled from Carmel to Samaria, and thus describes the region: 'The landscape is every hour changed and diversified by groves of trees, or by the ruins, which are very numerous, of ancient villages. In deviating here from the beaten path, (which we generally did to avoid the Arabs), we were sometimes obstructed, or at least had difficulty enough to force our way through this rich campaign, which, through neglect and want of culture, was so thickly planted with the more luxuriantly-growing plants, such as teasels, mullein, charlock, thistles, and the like, that we had much ado to defend our faces from being every moment offended by them. The country begins to be rugged and uneven at Samaria.' 'In the course of the subsequent journey,' says Elliot, who had just entered the Samaritan hills on his way from Galilee, 'we saw several black Bedouin tents, and were charmed with the beautiful wooded hills of Samaria, exhibiting scenery so different from that of the mountains of Galilee. Among numerous venerable olive woods, towns and villages are scattered in every direction; and some of the views rival those of Switzerland.'

SAMARIA, the capital city of the kingdom of Israel. Omri, king of Israel, having purchased the hill of Samaria from Shemer for two talents of silver, built upon it the city of Samaria, naming it after the original owner of the hill. The following description of the hill of Samaria is given by Messrs Bonar and McCheyne:—"It is an oblong hill, sloping up toward the west, and has a considerable extent of table-land on the top. The plain, near the head of which it stands, stretches far to the west, and the mountains that enclose it are lofty. It is a hill in the midst of higher hills,—a noble situation for a royal city. A grove of olives covers the plain, and the lower part of the southern side of the hill. On the mountain to the right stands a picturesque village called Nakoura, and on the summit a white tomb of a Moslem saint. We read over the prophecy of Micah regarding Samaria as we drew near to it, and conversed together as to its full meaning. We asked Dr Keith what he understood by the expression, 'I will make Samaria as an heap of the field?' He replied, that he supposed the ancient stones of Samaria would be found, not in the form of a ruin, but gathered into heaps in the same manner as in cleaning a vineyard, or as our farmers at home clear their fields by gathering the stones together. In a little after we found the conjecture to be completely verified. We halted at the eastern end of the hill, beside an old aqueduct, and immediately under the ruin of an old Greek church which rises on this side above the miserable village of Subuste. The ruin is one of the most sightly in the whole of Palestine. We ascended on foot by a narrow and steep pathway, which soon divides into two, and conducts past the foundations of the ruined church to the village. The pathway is enclosed by rude dykes, the stones of which are large, and many of them carved, and these are piled rather than built upon one another. Some of them are loose and ready to fall. Many are peculiarly large, and have evidently belonged to ancient edifices. Indeed, the whole face of this part of the hill suggests the idea that the buildings of the ancient city had been thrown down from the brow of the hill.

"It was most affecting to look round this scene of desolation, and to remember that this was the place where wicked Ahab built his house of Baal, where cruel Jezebeel ruled, and where Elijah and Elisha did their wonders. But above all, it filled the mind with solemn awe to read over on the spot the words of God's prophet uttered 2500 years before—"I will make Samaria as an heap of the field, and as plantings of a vineyard; and I will pour down the stones thereof into the valley, and I will discover the foundations thereof." Every clause reveals a new feature in the desolation of Samaria, differing in all its details from the desolation of Jerusalem, and every word has literally come to pass. We had found both on the summit and on the southern valley, at every little interval, heaps of ancient stones piled up, which had been gathered off the surface to clear it for cultivation. There can be no doubt that these stones once formed part of the temples, and palaces, and dwellings of Samaria, so that the word is fulfilled, 'I will make Samaria as an heap of the field.' We had also seen how completely the hill has been cleared of all its edifices, the stones gathered off it as in the clearing of a vineyard, the only columns that remain standing bare, without their capitals, so that, in all respects, the hill is left like 'the plantings of a vineyard,' either like the bare vine-shoots of a newly planted vineyard, or like the well-cleared terraces where vines might be planted. Still farther, we had seen that the ruins of the ancient city had not been left to moulder away on the hill where they were built, as is the case with other ruined cities, but had been cleared away to make room for the labours of the husbandman. The place where the buildings of the city stood had been tilled, sown, and reaped; and the buildings themselves rolled down over the brow of the hill. Of this, the heaps in the valley, the loose fragments in the rude dykes that run up the sides, and the broken columns on their way down into the valley, are witnesses; so that the destroyers of Samaria (whose very names are unknown), and the simple husbandmen, have both unwittingly been fulfilling God's word, 'I will pour down the stones thereof into the valley.' And last of all, we had noticed that many of the stones in the valley were large and massy, as if they had been foundation-stones of a building, and that in many parts of the vast colonnade nothing more than the bases of the pillars remain. But especially we observed that the ruined church had been built upon foundations of a far older date than the church itself, the stones being of great size, and bevelled in a manner similar to the stones of the temple wall at Jerusalem, and those of the mosque at Hebron; and these foundations were now quite exposed. So that the last clause of the prophecy is fulfilled with the same awful minuteness, 'I will discover the foundations thereof.' Surely there is more than enough in the fulfilment of this fourfold prediction to condemn if it does not convince the infidel."

SAMARITANS, an ancient but still existing sect among the Jews, whose origin was in the time of king Rehoboam, under whose reign the people of Israel were divided into two distinct kingdoms—that of Judah and that of Israel. The capital of the kingdom of Israel was Samaria, whence the Israelites took the name of Samaritans.

Shalmaneser, king of Assyria, having besieged and taken Samaria, carried away all the people captives into the remotest parts of his dominions, and filled their place with Babylonians, Cutheans, and other idolaters. These, finding that they were exposed to wild beasts, desired that an Israelitish priest might be sent among them to instruct them in the ancient religion and customs of the land. They now embraced the law of Moses, with which they mixed a great part of their ancient idolatry: and in this state the sacred narrative leaves them, at least for some ages. Upon the return of the Jews from the Babylonish captivity, it is thought they had entirely quitted the worship of their idols. But though they were united in religion, they were not so in affection with the Jews; for they employed various calumnies and stratagems to hinder their rebuilding the temple of Jerusalem; and when they could not prevail, they erected a temple on Mount Gerizim, in opposition to that of Jerusalem. See 2 Kings xvii.; Ezra iv.—vi.

SAMARITAN PENTATEUCH, the collection of the five books of Moses, written in Samaritan or Phœnician characters; and, according to some, the ancient Hebrew characters, which were in use before the captivity of Babylon. This Pentateuch was unknown in Europe, till the seventeenth century, though quoted by Eusebius, Jerome, &c. Archbishop Usher was the first, or at least among the first, who procured it out of the East, to the number of five or six copies.

The generality of divines hold, that the Samaritan Pentateuch, and that of the Jews, are one and the same work, written in the same language, only in different characters; and that the difference between the two texts is owing to the inadvertency and inaccuracy of transcribers, or to the affectation of the Samaritans, by interpolating what might promote their interests and pretensions; that the two copies were originally the very same, and that the additions were afterwards inserted. And in this respect the Pentateuch of the Jews must be allowed the preference to that of the Samaritans. Certain critics have ventured to express a preference for the Samaritan, as an original, preserved in the same character and in the same condition in which Moses left it; but Professor Stuart regards this opinion as for ever exploded by the recent labours of Gesenius. The variations, additions, and transpositions which are found in the Samaritan Pentateuch, are carefully collected by Hottinger, and may be seen on confronting the two texts in the last volume of the English Polyglot, or by inspecting Kennicott's edition of the Hebrew Bible, where the various readings are inserted. Some of these interpolations serve to illustrate the text; others are a kind of paraphrase, expressing at length what was only hinted at in the original; and others, again, such as favour their pretensions against the Jews, namely, the putting Gerizim for Ebal.

SAMARITAN VERSION. See BIBLE.

SAMSON, son of Manoah, and remarkable for his bodily strength. His history, which is to be found in the Book of Judges, xiv.—xvi., is full of marvellous incident. The piety of his character is not very conspicuous, but he is ranked by the apostle in the catalogue of believers which he has given in Heb. xi.

SAMUEL, a prophet and judge of Israel, being the last in order of the judges. He was the son of Elkanah and Hannah, of the family of Kohath, and the tribe of Levi. He was called to the service of God, while yet a child, by a voice from heaven; and through a long protracted life, reaching to upwards of ninety years, he continued faithfully to follow the Lord, and to administer the affairs of his country. He was the author, it is supposed, of the Books of Judges and Ruth, and the First Book of Samuel, at least the first twenty-four chapters. It is remarkable that Samuel was honoured to be at once the last of the judges and the first of the prophets.

SANBALLAT, described by Josephus as a Cuthite, and governor of Samaria. It is doubtful, however, whether this be the same person with Sanballat mentioned by Nehemiah as joining with the Samaritans in dissuading and in every possible way discouraging the Jews from rebuilding the temple of Jerusalem, on their return from the seventy years' captivity in Babylon.

SANCTIFICATION, that glorious work of God's grace in the human soul by which we are renewed after the image of God, set apart for his service, and enabled to die unto sin and live unto righteousness. It must be carefully considered in a two-fold light. (1.) As an inestimable privilege granted us from God. 1 Thess. v. 23. And (2.) As an all-comprehensive duty required of us by his holy Word. 1 Thess. iv. 3.

It is distinguished from justification thus: Justification changeth our state in law before God as a judge; sanctification changeth our heart and life before him as our father. Justification precedes, and sanctification follows, as the fruit and evidence of it. The surety-righteousness of Christ imputed is our justifying righteousness; but the grace of God implanted is the matter of our sanctification. Justification is an act done at once; sanctification is a work which is gradual. Justification removes the guilt of sin; sanctification, the power of it. Justification delivers us from the avenging wrath of God; sanctification conforms us to his image. Yet justification and sanctification are inseparably connected in the promise of God (Rom. viii. 28–30), in the covenant of grace (Heb. viii. 10), in the doctrines and promises of the Gospel (Acts v. 31), and in the experience of all true believers. 1 Cor. vi. 11.

Sanctification is—(1.) A divine work, and not to be carried on by the power of man. Tit. iii. 5. (2.) A progressive work, and not to be perfected at once. Prov. iv. 18. (3.) An internal work, not consisting in external profession or bare morality. Ps. li. 6. (4.) A necessary work; necessary as to the evidence of our state, the honour of our characters, the usefulness of our lives, the happiness of our minds, and the eternal enjoyment of God's presence in a future world. John iii. 3; Heb. xii. 14. Sanctification evidences itself by—(1.) A holy reverence. Neh. v. 15. (2.) Earnest regard. Lam. iii. 24. (3.) Patient submission. Ps. xxxix. 9. Hence Archbishop Usher said of it, "Sanctification is nothing less than for a man to be brought to the entire resignation of his will to the will of God, and to live in the offering up of his soul continually in the flames of love, and as a whole burnt offering to Christ." (4.) Increasing hatred to sin. Ps. cxix. 33. (5.) Communion with God. Isa. xxvi. 8. (6.) Delight in his Word and ordinances. Ps. xxvii. 4. (7.) Humility. Job xlii. 5, 6. (8.) Prayer. Ps. cix. 4. (9.) Holy confidence. Ps. xxvii. 1. (10.) Praise. Ps. ciii. 1. (11.) Uniform obedience. John xv. 8.

SANCTIFY, often signifies to set apart, but oftener to prepare sacredly for the presence and service of God. Thus Joshua says to the people (chap. iii. 5), "Sanctify yourselves, for to-morrow the Lord will do wonders among you." In Isa. xlii. 3, the Lord calls the Medes his sanctified. I have appointed, and, as it were, consecrated, them to be the executioners of my vengeance against Babylon. See also Numb. xi. 18; Josh. vii. 13; Jer. vi. 4, xii. 3, li. 27, 28; Joel i. 14; Mic. iii. 5; Zeph. i. 7. (Comp. HOLY.)

We desire of God, that his name may be sanctified, or hallowed; that is, honoured, praised, and glorified throughout the world; especially by those who have the happiness of knowing him. Let them sanctify it by their good lives, their fidelity, their submission to his orders; and they who know him not, that they may obtain the knowledge of him, may hear his word, may become obedient to his instructions, &c. We may apprehend yet better what is meant by sanctifying the name of God, by the opposite to it; that is, profaning the name of God, by vain swearing, blaspheming, ascribing his name to idols; by furnishing wicked men and infidels with occasion of blaspheming it by our bad lives, and scandalous conversation, &c.

SANCTIONS, DIVINE, are those acts or laws of the Supreme Being which render any thing obligatory, or the promises and penalties attached to them. See LAW.

SANCTUARY. See TEMPLE.

SAND. A similitude taken from the aggregate sand of the sea is often used, to express a very great multitude, or a very great weight. See RAIN—PILLARS.

SANDALS. The Orientals use instead of shoes simply sandals, which are like the soles of shoes tied on the feet with bands or other fastenings. They were pulled off on entering a holy place, or on coming into the presence of a person of high rank. Exod. iii. 5; Josh. v. 15. It was always the custom when a guest arrived, that the servants should take off his sandals and wash his feet. Gen. xviii. 4, xix. 2, xxiv. 32; Luke vii. 44. This was in general done by the lowest servants, and it was accounted an act of extraordinary humility on the part of the master of a family if he did this office himself, as well as a great honour to the person for whom it was done. This serves to explain what John the Baptist said, Luke iii. 16.

SANHEDRIM. This council, or court of judicature, called by the Jews themselves the Sanhedrim, was superior to all others, both as to the condition and number of the judges who sat in it, and the authority and power with which it was vested. This, like the rest, was constituted by God himself in the law: and intended as a court of appeal, or last resort, if there should be occasion, from any of the inferior courts. It was kept first in Shiloh, and afterwards at Jerusalem; being limited to the place where the ark of God stood.

The method of proceeding in this court was as follows:—They who had a mind to implead any one, applied either to the king or the high-priest, or whoever filled the post of chief justice, and informed against him. Upon this, proper officers were sent to arrest him; and, if occasion required, a detachment from the temple guard went along with them. The person thus taken was examined by the justice, and then committed, either to prison or to the custody of the officer of the guard, till his trial came on.

When the court sat, those who brought the information against the criminal did it in these words, —This man having done so or so, is worthy to die. And they who were to defend him answered, —This man is not worthy to die, for he has only done so or so. And when the pleadings on both sides were finished, the judges gave their opinions singly whether he was guilty or not; and according to the majority of votes, one way or other, the culprit was acquitted or condemned.

Of the manner of laying the indictment and giving in the answer, we have an instance in the case of Jeremiah, who was informed against for prophesying the destruction of both the city and temple of Jerusalem, in case the Jews continued to neglect the observance of God's law. Jer. xxvi.

The form of condemnation was thus, (as we find it in the gospel),—"The high-priest rent his clothes, (which by the law he was forbidden ever to do), saying, He hath spoken blasphemy; what further need have we of witnesses? behold, now ye have heard his blasphemy. What think ye? They answered and said, He is guilty of death." But when Judea came to be subject to the Romans, these reserved the power of life and death to themselves, so that this council could proceed no further than to condemnation. For execution they were to apply to the Roman governor.

Some are of opinion that there were more courts of judicature at Jerusalem than this we have been speaking of; and that they were above each other in dignity, where causes were heard according to their importance before the higher or the inferior courts; and that each could inflict higher degrees of punishment than the other; and that our Saviour alludes to these when he says, "Whosoever is angry with his brother without a cause shall be in danger of the judgment; and whosoever shall say to his brother, Raca, shall be in danger of the council; but whosoever shall say, Thou fool, shall be in danger of hell-fire." Matt. v. 22.

Interpreters suppose that our Lord proportions the punishment in the next world, according to the different sentences which were usual in the different courts of judicature at Jerusalem. Therefore, they say, the judgment means that court where the judges were three and twenty, and could only sentence to death by the sword; the council alludes to the court where the seventy elders sat, which was the great sanhedrim, and could punish by stoning to death; and that by hell-fire the burning of the greatest malefactors in the valley of Hinnom is implied.

SAPPHIRE (saphir, beauty—Exod. xxiv. 10, xxviii. 18; Job xxviii. 6, 16; Cant. v. 14; Isa. liv. 11; Ezek. i. 26, x. 1, xxviii. 13; sappheiros, Rev. xxi. 19 only). That this is the sapphire, there can be no doubt. The Septuagint, the Vulgate, and the general run of commentators, ancient and modern, agree in this.

The sapphire is a pellucid gem. In its finest state it is extremely beautiful and valuable, and second only to the diamond in lustre, hardness, and value. Its proper colour is pure blue; in the choicest specimens it is of the deepest azure; and in others varies into paleness, in shades of all degrees between that and a pure crystal brightness, without the least tinge of colour, but with a lustre much superior to the crystal. The Oriental sapphire is the most beautiful and valuable. It is transparent, of a fine sky colour, sometimes variegated with veins of a white sparry substance, and distinct separate spots of a gold colour.

SARAH (a princess), the wife of Abraham, and his sister, as he himself informs us, by the same father, but not the same mother. Gen. xx. 12. See ABRAHAM.

SARDIS, now called Sart, the ancient metropolis of Lydia, and a city of great magnificence. To this day the grandeur and extent of the ruins are sufficient to impress the mind with some idea of the ancient splendour of this seat of government. It was beautifully situated on both sides of the river Pactolus, at the distance of thirty-three miles south of Thyatira, and continued to be the seat of government till the territory of Lydia was overrun by the Persians. It was afterwards conquered by the Greeks, and continued under them till the Romans became masters of Lesser Asia, and restored something of the original splendour of Sardis, by making it the seat of the provincial government. It enjoyed this distinction till it was overthrown by an earthquake; after which the seat of government was removed to Ephesus. A considerable part of it was rebuilt at the cost of Liberius, but it never regained its former splendour; and at present it consists of only a few mud-built cottages, surrounded by an extensive field of ruins.

SARDIUS (adam, so called from its redness—Exod. xxviii. 17, xxxix. 10; Ezek. xxviii. 13; sardios—Rev. xxi. 20), a precious stone of a blood-red colour. Calmet says it has a mixture of white, as a man's nail; and so differs from the ruby. If so, it seems to be the modern cornelian. It took its Greek name from Sardis, where the best of them were found.

SARDONYX (sardonius—Rev. xxi. 20), a precious stone, which seems to have its name from its resemblance partly to the sardius, and partly to the onyx. It is generally tinged with black and blood colour, which are distinguished from each other by circles or rows, so distinct that they appear to be the effect of art.

SATAN is a Hebrew word, and signifies an adversary, or enemy, and is commonly applied in Scripture to the devil, or the chief of the fallen angels. (See ADVERSARY—DEMONIACS.) "By collecting the passages," says Cruden, "where Satan, or the devil, is mentioned, it may be observed, that he fell from heaven with all his company; that God cast him down from thence for the punishment of his pride; that, by his envy and malice, sin, death, and all other evils, came into the world; that, by the permission of God, he exercises a sort of government in the world over his subordinates—over apostate angels like himself; that God makes use of him to prove good men and chastise bad ones; that he is a lying spirit in the mouth of false prophets, seducers, and heretics; that it is he, or some of his, that torment or possess men—that inspire them with evil designs, as he did David, when he suggested to him to number his people, to Judas to betray his Lord and Master, and to Ananias and Sapphira to conceal the price of their field; that he roves full of rage like a roaring lion, to tempt, to betray, to destroy, and to involve us in guilt and wickedness; that his power and malice are restrained within certain limits, and controlled by the will of God; in a word, that he is an enemy to God and man, and uses his utmost endeavours to rob God of his glory, and men of their souls." (See ANGEL—DEVIL—TEMPTATION.)

More particularly as to the temptations of Satan:—1. He adapts them to our temper and circumstances, 2. He chooses the fittest season to tempt: as youth, age, poverty, prosperity, public devotion, after happy manifestations; or when in a bad frame, after some signal service, when alone or in the presence of the object, when unemployed and off our guard, in death. 3. He puts on the mask of religious friendship. 2 Cor. xi. 14; Matt. iv. 6; Gen. iii. 4. He manages temptation with the greatest subtlety. He asks but little at first; leaves for a season, in order to renew his attack. 5. He leads men to sin with a hope of speedy repentance. 6. He raises suitable instruments, bad habits, relations. Gen. iii.; Job ii. 9, 10.

SATISFACTION, in general, signifies the act of giving complete or perfect pleasure. In the Christian system it denotes that which Christ did and suffered in order to satisfy divine justice, to secure the honours of the divine government, and thereby make an atonement for the sins of his people. Satisfaction is distinguished from merit thus: The satisfaction of Christ consists in his answering the demands of the law on man, which were consequent on the breach of it. These were answered by suffering its penalty. The merit of Christ consists in what he did to fulfil what the law demanded before man sinned, which was obedience. The satisfaction of Christ is to free us from misery, and the merit of Christ is to procure happiness for us. See ATONEMENT—PROPITIATION.

SAUL, the son of Kish, and first king of Israel. He belonged to the tribe of Benjamin. The Israelites, prompted by motives of different kinds, demanded a king. 1 Sam. xii. 12. Samuel the prophet was accordingly commissioned by God to anoint Saul to that office. This anointing was performed in private, but afterwards Saul was elected by lot at Mizpeh, to fill the office of king over Israel. No sooner did he ascend the throne than he went forth at the head of a large army to war with the Ammonites, whom he completely subdued. He now proceeded to Gilgal, where he was publicly proclaimed king in his fortieth year, as is generally supposed. His exaltation to the sovereignty seems to have exhibited the character and qualifications of Saul in no very favourable light. On the contrary, his conduct was so displeasing to God, under whom he held the kingdom, the government of the Israelites being a theocracy, that he was by divine authority rejected from the kingly office. Soon after he was invested with the royal functions, he appears to have so far lost sight of the distinction between civil and ecclesiastical things as to have intruded into the priest's office. 2 Sam. vi. 13; 1 Kings iii. 2–4. For this heinous sin the prophet Samuel was ordered to denounce the anger of God against him. For a number of years after this he was involved in continual wars against the various tribes of aboriginal inhabitants of Canaan, whom he greatly weakened, without, however, finally conquering them. The act, however, which led to the rejection of Saul from the kingly office was his determined rebellion against the divine command which he had received to extirpate the Amalekites. Although the divine injunction was explicit, he spared Agag the king, and thus brought upon himself his final rejection, which Samuel was ordered significantly to represent by the rending of his mantle. Saul being thus assured that he and his family were henceforth to be excluded from the kingdom, was not long in perceiving that David was to be his successor in the government. This roused the jealousy and resentment of the king, and both by his own hand and by exposing him to dangers of different kinds, he sought to put David to death. The crowning sin of Saul, and that which filled up the measure of his transgressions, was his consulting the witch of Endor, with the view of obtaining that direction which it was both his duty and his privilege to have sought from Jehovah. The day following the eventful battle of Gilboa was fought, in which his three sons perished in the field, and Saul himself fell by his own hand.

SAVIOUR, one who delivers from sin, danger, and misery. Thus Jesus Christ is called the Saviour, as he delivers us from the greatest evils, and brings us into possession of the greatest good. See JESUS CHRIST—LIBERTY—PROPITIATION—REDEMPTION—SALVATION.

SAVOUR—(1.) Scent or smell. Eccles. x. 1. (2.) That sharp quality in salt by which it renders other bodies agreeable to the taste. Matt. v. 13. (3.) Character, reputation; thus men's savour becomes abhorred, when their name becomes hateful and detested. Exod. v. 21.

The ancient sacrifices were of a sweet savour or savour of rest unto God: he accepted of and delighted in them, as typical of the obedience and sufferings of Christ, which sufficiently honour all his perfections, and more than balance our offences. Gen. viii. 21; Exod. xxix. 18; Eph. v. 2. The savour of the knowledge of Christ is the refreshing and pleasant nature of his truth, when known, and of the grace and virtue that proceed from him as our Mediator. 2 Cor. ii. 15; Cant. i. 3; Ps. xlv. 8. Faithful ministers are to God a sweet savour of Christ in their hearers—the faithful discharge of their duty is acceptable to God, whether men be saved by it or not; and are a savour of death unto death to some, and a savour of life unto life to others; they are the occasion of double destruction to unbelievers, and the means of eternal life here and hereafter to others. 2 Cor. ii. 15, 16. To savour the things of men, and not the things of God, is to contrive, choose, and delight in things agreeable to carnal ease or sinful lusts, and not what is commanded of God, and tends to his honour. Matt. xvi. 23.

SAW, an implement which seems to have been known at an early period. It was probably an invention of the Egyptians, and was made of iron. It was generally employed for the purpose of cutting wood, and also for cutting stone. Professor Paxton says that there is this difference between the Oriental saw and that in use with us, that the teeth incline towards the handle, while in ours they lie away from it.

SAWING. The Apostle Paul, in his Epistle to the Hebrews, says that some of the Old Testament saints were "sawn asunder;" and this punishment, which was suffered by the prophet Isaiah in the reign of Manasseh, is alluded to in Matt. xxiv. 50, 51: "The lord of that servant shall come in a day when he looketh not for him, and in an hour that he is not aware of, and shall cut him asunder, and appoint him his portion with the hypocrites; there shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth." Many instances occur in ancient writers of this mode of executing criminals; and from Dr Shaw, and other modern travellers, we learn that it is still in use among some nations, particularly the western Moors in Barbary.

SCANDAL, a snare, encumbrance, or obstacle to piety. In Scripture, and in ecclesiastical authors, it is put for anything that a man finds in his way, which may occasion him to trip. Thus Moses (Lev. xix. 14, apud LXX.) forbids to put a stumbling-block (or scandal) before the blind; that is, neither wood, stone, or anything else that may make him stumble or fall. Calmet remarks that the Greek word skandalon, or proskomma, or skolon, answers to the Hebrew micshol, which signifies fall, ruin, sin, what hinders from walking, and makes one fall; which comes from the root cashal, to fall, to tumble; and in the conjugation hiphil, signifies to cause to fall, to overthrow, to lay snares. (See OFFENCE.)

When we read that the Jews were scandalized at the mean family of Christ (Matt. xiii. 57; Luke vii. 23), it implies mistake, since his family was truly royal; at the doctrine of the cross (Gal. v. 11), it implies mistake, since the resurrection had removed that cause of scandal; and also at the persecutions suffered by Christians, since that was really their glory.

Christ has promised to remove out of his kingdom every thing that causeth scandal. Matt. xiii. 41.

SCAPE-GOAT. See GOAT.

SCARLET, a deep, bright, and shining red colour. Our translators have not everywhere rightly used this word. TOBAHH ought indeed to be rendered scarlet, but SHANI, or double dye, as well as CARMIL, ought to be rendered crimson; but as these colours are near of kin to one another, there is the less importance in mistaking the one for the other. Scarlet was much worn by great men. 2 Sam. i. 24. The scarlet colour of the horse and robes of Antichrist may typify his royal power, and his bloody persecution of the saints. Rev. xvii. 3, 4. Sin is likened to scarlet and crimson, to mark its horrible nature and aggravated heinousness. Isa. i. 18.

SCEPTIC (skeptikos, from skeptomai, "I consider, look about, or deliberate") properly signifies one considerative and inquisitive; it is used in a bad sense for one who is always weighing reasons on one side and the other, without ever deciding between them. An ancient sect of philosophers, founded by Pyrrho, who denied the real existence of all qualities in bodies, except those which are essential to primary atoms, and referred every thing else to the perceptions of the mind, produced by external objects, in other words, to appearance and opinion, were first designated sceptics. In modern times the word has been applied to Deists, or those who doubt of the truth and authenticity of the Sacred Scriptures.

SCEPTRE. The sceptre seems at first to have been simply a wooden rod, which afterwards came to be studded with nails of gold. At length sceptres were composed of harder materials. Hence, Ps. ii. 9, "Thou shalt break them with a rod of iron; thou shalt dash them in pieces like a potter's vessel;" and Ezek. xix. 11, "And she had strong rods for the sceptres of them that bare rule, and her stature was exalted among the thick branches, and she appeared in her height with the multitude of her branches." The sceptre of Saul appears to have been a soldier's spear. Golden sceptres in process of time were used, as more befitting royal dignity.

SCHISM, from schisma, a rent, cleft, fissure; in its general acceptation it signifies division or separation, but is chiefly used in speaking of separations happening from diversity of opinions among people of the same religion and faith. All separations, however, must not, properly speaking, be considered as schisms.

Schism, says Mr Archibald Hall, is, properly, a division among those who stand in one connexion of fellowship; but where the difference is carried so far that the parties concerned entirely break up all communion one with another, and go into distinct connexions for obtaining the general ends of that religious fellowship which they once did, but now do not, carry on and pursue with united endeavours, as one church joined in the bonds of individual society; where this is the case, it is undeniable there is something very different from schism; it is no longer a schism in, but a separation from, the body. Dr Campbell also supposes that the word schism in Scripture does not signify open separation, but that men may be guilty of schism by such an alienation of affection from their brethren as violates the internal union subsisting in the hearts of Christians, though there be no error in doctrine, nor separation from communion. See 1 Cor. iii. 3, 4, xii. 24-26.

The following have been proposed as remedies for schism:—"1. Be disposed to support your brethren by all the friendly attentions in your power, speaking justly of their preaching and character. Never withhold these proofs of your brotherly love, unless they depart from the doctrines or spirit of the Gospel. 2. Discountenance the silly reports you may hear to the injury of any of your brethren. Oppose backbiting and slander to the utmost. 3. Whenever any brother is sinking in the esteem of his flock, through their caprice, perverseness, or Antinomianism, endeavour to hold up his hands and his heart in his work. 4. Never espouse the part of the factious schismatics till you have heard your brother's account of their conduct. 5. In cases of open separation, do not preach for separatists till it be evident that God is with them. Detest the thought of wounding a brother's feelings through the contemptible influence of a party spirit; for through this abominable principle schisms are sure to be multiplied. 6. Let the symptoms of disease in the patients arouse the benevolent attention of the physicians. Let them check the forward, humble the proud, and warn the unruly, and many a schismatic distemper will receive timely cure. 7. Let elderly ministers and tutors of academies pay more attention to these things, in proportion as the disease may prevail; for much good may be accomplished by their influence.

The great schism of the West is that which happened in the times of Clement VII. and Urban VI., which divided the Church for forty or fifty years, and was at length ended by the election of Martin V. at the Council of Constance.

The Romanists number thirty-four schisms in their Church. They bestow the name English schism on the reformation of religion in that kingdom. Those of the Church of England apply the term schism to the separation of the Presbyterians, Independents, Baptists, and Methodists.

SCHISM BILL, THE, an act passed in the reign of Queen Anne, in virtue of which Nonconformists teaching schools were to be imprisoned three months. Each schoolmaster was to receive the sacrament and take the oaths. If afterwards present at a conventicle, he was to be incapacitated and imprisoned. He was bound to teach only the Church Catechism.

SCHOOLMASTER. In Gal. iii. 24, 25, it is said in reference to the connection between the law and Christ, "Wherefore the law was our schoolmaster to bring us unto Christ, that we might be justified by faith. But after that faith is come, we are no longer under a schoolmaster." The word here translated "schoolmaster," has a somewhat more extended meaning than the same word in our day. The word used by the apostle may be rendered "pedagogue," one who conducted the child along the road from home to the place of instruction; and when his period of instruction was ended, conveyed him safely home again. Such an office only lasted during the childhood and minority of the pupil. The law then acts to the believer as a "pedagogue," it conducts him along the way to Christ, shows him his need of a Saviour, for "by the law is the knowledge of sin," instructs them for a time in the one great point as to their sinful and undone condition by nature and wicked works, and their consequent need of a Saviour to deliver them at once from the punishment and the power of sin. The law which is our pedagogue brings us to the higher instructor, even to Christ, who completes our education in that knowledge which leads to eternal life. The pedagogue was often a freedman, and sometimes a slave. The Greek dramatists generally speak of them as persons of a humble condition. Schoettgen says, "Boys would seldom of their own accord go to the master unless they were urged by the pedagogue. Nor should we, many of us, come to Christ, did not the law, our pedagogue, urge us by compulsory methods." Paul uses the word also in 1 Cor. iv. 15: "For though ye have ten thousand instructors in Christ, yet have ye not many fathers: for in Christ Jesus I have begotten you through the gospel." This refers to the hireling character of a pedagogue, who may have some interest in his pupil, but cannot possibly have the tenderness and affection of a father.

SCORPION (akreb, Deut. viii. 15; 1 Kings xii. 11, xiv. 2; 2 Chron. x. 11, 14; Ezek. ii. 6; skorpios, Luke x. 19, xi. 12; Rev. ix. 3; Eccus. xxvi. 7, xxxix. 30). Parkhurst derives the name from ak, to press, squeeze, and reb, much, greatly, or kreb, near, close. Calmet remarks, that "it fixes so violently on such persons as it seizes upon, that it cannot be plucked off without difficulty."

The scorpion is generally two inches in length, and resembles so much the lobster in form, that the latter is called by the Arabs "akreb d'elbahar, the sea-scorpion." It has several joints or divisions in its tail, which are supposed to be indicative of its age; thus, if it have five, it is considered to be five years old. The poison of this animal is in its tail, at the end of which is a small, curved, sharp-pointed sting, similar to the prickle of a buckthorn tree; the curve being downwards, it turns its tail upwards when it strikes a blow.

The scorpion delights in stony places and in old ruins. Some are of a yellow colour, others brown, and some black. The yellow possess the strongest poison, but the venom of each affects the part wounded with frigidity, which takes place soon after the sting has been inflicted. Dioscorides thus describes the effect produced: "Where the scorpion has stung, the place becomes inflamed and hardened; it reddens by tension, and is painful by intervals, being now chilly, now burning. The pain soon rises high, and rages, sometimes more, sometimes less. A sweating succeeds, attended by a shivering and trembling; the extremities of the body become cold; the groin swells; the hair stands on end; the visage becomes pale; and the skin feels, throughout it, the sensation of perpetual pricking, as if by needles." This description strikingly illustrates Rev. ix. 3-5, 10, in its mention of "the torment of a scorpion, when he striketh a man."

SCOURGE, or WHIP. The use of the scourge as a mode of punishment was often resorted to by the Jews. It is expressly enacted, indeed, by Moses, Deut. xxv. 1-3: "If there be a controversy between men, and they come into judgment, that the judges may judge them; then they shall justify the righteous and condemn the wicked. And it shall be, if the wicked man be worthy to be beaten, that the judge shall cause him to lie down, and to be beaten before his face, according to his fault, by a certain number. Forty stripes he may give him, and not exceed : lest, if he should exceed, and beat him above these with many stripes, then thy brother should seem vile unto thee." Josephus relates that they were accustomed to remit one, probably lest they should exceed the legal number. Hence the statement of Paul in reference to his own treatment, 2 Cor. xi. 24 : "Five times received I forty stripes save one." The Rabbins infer, from thirty-nine being the number acted upon in practice, that three parts of the body were to be flagellated with an equal number of stripes. Calmet says, "There were two ways of giving the last; one with thongs or whips made of rope-ends or straps of leather; the other with rods or twigs. The offender was stripped from his shoulders to his middle, and tied by his arms to a low pillar, that he might lean forward, and the executioner the more easily strike his back."

SCRIBES, a term of very frequent occurrence in Sacred Scripture. They were a class of men of divers kinds, following literature. For generally all that were any way learned among the Jews were, in the time of our Saviour and his apostles, called scribes, but especially those who, by their skill in the law and divinity of the Jews, were advanced to sit in Moses' seat, either as judges in their sanhedrim, or teachers in their schools or synagogues. Both their name and profession began immediately after the Babylonish captivity, about five hundred years before the birth of Christ; for Ezra himself was one of the first. They were a body of the most learned men of the nation, and chiefly of the sect of the Pharisees, though some of them might possibly be Karaites, or anti-traditionists, as it seems to appear from one of them asking our Saviour, Mark xii. 28, "which was the first commandment of all," and being so highly pleased with his answer.

Those who were descended from the stock of Levi were usually called scribes of the clergy; but such as were sprung from any other tribe were named scribes of the people. The business of the latter was to take care to preserve the purity of the text in all the Bibles which they copied out, and to see that no corruption crept into the original. It was not held proper for every vulgar pen to transcribe the great mysteries of the law, and therefore this peculiar order of men was appointed to that purpose; but they did not so entirely apply themselves to it, as not to take in many other matters both of civil and religious concern, being public notaries in the sanhedrim and courts of justice, as well as registers in the synagogues. The office of the scribes of the clergy was to teach in public, and instruct the people, by expounding to them the law in their sermons and set discourses; by which practice they grew into such repute in the Jewish state, that it was hard to say whether the Pharisees or they were held in the greater veneration; for what the Pharisees gained among the common people by their pretences to extraordinary sanctity, these more justly obtained by their zeal for the written Word, in preserving it from the dangers of corruption, and expounding it in the ears of the people.

SCRIP, a wallet generally of leather, which was slung upon the shoulder, and used from the earliest ages by shepherds and travellers, for the reception of bread and other necessary provisions. See BAG.

SCRIPTURE, a word derived from the Latin scriptura, and in its original sense of the same import with writing, signifying "any thing written." It is, by emphasis, however, commonly used to denote the writings of the Old and New Testaments, which are called sometimes the Scriptures, sometimes the Sacred or Holy Scriptures, and sometimes Canonical Scriptures. These books are called the Scriptures by way of eminence, as they are the most important of all writings. They are said to be holy, or sacred, on account of the sacred doctrines which they teach; and they are termed canonical, because, when their number and authenticity were ascertained, their names were inserted in ecclesiastical canons, to distinguish them from other books, which, being of no authority, were kept out of sight, and therefore styled "Apocryphal." (See APOCRYPHA.)

Among other arguments for the divine authority of the Scriptures, the following may be considered as worthy of our attention:—

"1. The sacred penmen, the prophets and apostles, were holy, excellent men, and would not—artless, illiterate men, and therefore could not—lay the horrible scheme of deluding mankind. The hope of gain did not influence them, for they were self-denying men, that left all to follow a Master who had not where to lay his head, and whose grand initiating maxim was, 'Except a man forsake all that he hath, he cannot be my disciple.' They were so disinterested that they secured nothing on earth but hunger and nakedness, stocks and prisons, racks and tortures; which, indeed, was all that they could, or did, expect, in consequence of Christ's express declarations. Neither was a desire of honour the motive of their actions; for their Lord himself was treated with the utmost contempt, and had more than once assured them that they should certainly share the same fate; besides, they were humble men, not above working as mechanics, for a coarse maintenance, and so little desirous of human regard that they exposed to the world the meanness of their birth and occupations, their great ignorance and scandalous falls. Add to this, that they were so many, and lived at such a distance of time and place from each other, that, had they been impostors, it would have been impracticable for them to contrive and carry on a forgery without being detected. And, as they neither would nor could deceive the world, so they neither could nor would be deceived themselves; for they were days, months, and years, eye and ear witnesses of the things which they relate; and, when they had not the fullest evidence of important facts, they insisted upon new proofs, and even upon sensible demonstrations; as, for instance, Thomas, in the matter of our Lord's resurrection (John xx. 25); and, to leave us no room to question their sincerity, most of them joyfully sealed the truth of their doctrines with their own blood. Did so many and such marks of veracity ever meet in any other authors? (See RESURRECTION.)

"2. But even while they lived they confirmed their testimony by a variety of miracles wrought in divers places, and for a number of years; sometimes before thousands of their enemies, as the miracles of Christ and his disciples; sometimes before hundreds of thousands, as those of Moses. (See MIRACLE.)

"3. Reason itself dictates that nothing but the plainest matter of fact could induce so many thousands of prejudiced and persecuting Jews to embrace the humbling, self-denying doctrine of the cross, which they so much despised and abhorred. Nothing but the clearest evidence arising from undoubted truth could make multitudes of lawless, luxurious heathens receive, follow, and transmit to posterity, the doctrines and writings of the apostles; especially at a time when the vanity of their pretensions to miracles and the gift of tongues could be so easily discovered, had they been impostors; and when the profession of Christianity exposed persons of all ranks to the greatest contempt and most imminent danger. (See CHRISTIANITY.)

"4. When the authenticity of the miracles was attested by thousands of living witnesses, religious rites were instituted and performed by hundreds of thousands, agreeable to Scripture injunctions, in order to perpetuate that authenticity; and these solemn ceremonies have ever since been kept up in all parts of the world; the passover by the Jews, in remembrance of Moses' miracles in Egypt; and the eucharist by Christians, as a memorial of Christ's death, and the miracles that accompanied it, some of which are recorded by Phlegon, a heathen historian.

"5. The Scriptures have not only the external sanction of miracles, but the eternal stamp of the omniscient God, by a variety of prophecies, some of which have already been most exactly confirmed by the event predicted. (See PROPHECY.)

"6. The scattered, despised people, the Jews, the irreconcilable enemies of the Christians, keep, with amazing care, the Old Testament, full of the prophetic history of Jesus Christ, and by that means afford the world a striking proof that the New Testament is true; and Christians, in their turn, show that the Old Testament is abundantly confirmed and explained by the New. (See JEWS.)

"7. To say nothing of the harmony, venerable antiquity, and wonderful preservation, of those books, some of which are by far the most ancient in the world—to pass over the inimitable simplicity and true sublimity of their style, the testimony of the fathers and the primitive Christians—they carry with them such characters of truth as command the respect of every unprejudiced reader.

"They open to us the mystery of the creation; the nature of God, angels, and men; the immortality of the soul; the end for which we were made; the origin and connexion of moral and natural evil; the vanity of this world, and the glory of the next. There we see inspired shepherds, tradesmen, and fishermen, surpassing as much the greatest philosophers as these did the herd of mankind, both in meekness of wisdom and sublimity of doctrine. There we admire the purest morality in the world, agreeable to the dictates of sound reason, confirmed by the witness which God has placed for himself in our breast, and exemplified in the lives of men of like passions with ourselves. There we discover a vein of ecclesiastical history and theological truth consistently running through a collection of sixty-six different books, written by various authors, in different languages, during the space of above fifteen hundred years. There we find, as in a deep and pure spring, all the genuine drops and streams of spiritual knowledge which can possibly be met with in the largest libraries. There the workings of the human heart are described in a manner that demonstrates the inspiration of the Searcher of hearts. There we have a particular account of all our spiritual maladies, with their various symptoms, and the method of a certain cure—a cure that has been witnessed by multitudes of martyrs and departed saints, and is now enjoyed by thousands of good men, who would account it an honour to seal the truth of the Scriptures with their own blood. There you meet with the noblest strains of penitential and joyous devotion, adapted to the dispositions and states of all travellers to Zion. And there you read those awful threatenings and cheering promises which are daily fulfilled in the consciences of men, to the admiration of believers, and the astonishment of attentive infidels.

"8. The wonderful efficacy of the Scriptures is another proof that they are of God. When they are faithfully opened by his ministers, and powerfully applied by his Spirit, they wound and heal; they kill and make alive; they alarm the careless, direct the lost, support the tempted, strengthen the weak, comfort mourners, and nourish pious souls.

"9. To conclude: It is exceedingly remarkable, that the more humble and holy people are, the more they read, admire, and value the Scriptures; and, on the contrary, the more self-conceited, worldly-minded, and wicked, the more they neglect, despise, and asperse them.

"As for the objections which are raised against their perspicuity and consistency, those who are both pious and learned know that they are generally founded on prejudice, and the want of understanding in spiritual things; or on our ignorance of several customs, idioms, and circumstances, which were perfectly known when those books were written. Frequently, also, the immaterial error arises merely from a wrong punctuation, or a mistake of copiers, printers, or translators; as the daily discoveries of pious critics, and ingenuous confessions of unprejudiced inquirers, abundantly prove." SCRIPTURES, RULES FOR SEARCHING THE. To understand the Scriptures, says Dr Campbell, we should—1. Get acquainted with each writer's style. 2. Inquire carefully into the character, the situation, and the office of the writer; the time, the place, the occasion of his writing; and the people for whose immediate use he originally intended his work. 3. Consider the principal scope of the book, and the particulars chiefly observable in the method by which the writer has purposed to execute his design. 4. Where the phrase is obscure, the context must be consulted. This, however, will not always answer. 5. If it do not, consider whether the phrase be any of the writer's peculiarities; if so, it must be inquired what is the acceptance in which he employs it in other places. 6. If this be not sufficient, recourse should be had to the parallel passages, if there be any such, in the other sacred writers. 7. If this throw no light, consult the New Testament and the Septuagint, where the word may be used. 8. If the term be only once used in Scripture, then recur to the ordinary acceptance of the term in classical authors. 9. Sometimes reference may be had to the fathers. 10. The ancient versions, as well as modern scholiasts, annotators, and translators, may be consulted. 11. The analogy of faith, and the etymology of the word, must be used with caution.

Above all, let the reader unite prayer with his endeavours, that his understanding may be illuminated, and his heart impressed with the great truths which the Sacred Scriptures contain. See BIBLICAL INTERPRETATION—AFFECTIONS—SENSE OF SCRIPTURE.

SCYTHOPOLIS. See BETH-SHAN.

SEA, a word used often in Scripture to denote mere lakes or inland collections of water of a very limited extent. Thus we read of the Sea of Galilee, the Dead Sea; and even rivers are sometimes spoken of as seas, for example the Nile, the Euphrates, and others.

SEAH, a Hebrew measure, containing about two gallons and a half, liquid measure; or about a peck dry measure.

SEAL. In all ages, much importance has been attached to seals or signets. The Jews in ancient times wore them in rings on their fingers, or in bracelets on their arms. People of rank in the East are accustomed to have a seal suspended from the neck over the breast, having their name engraved on it, along with some appropriate device, or more frequently a miniature impression of some favourite object, as in Song viii. 6: "Set me as a seal upon thine heart, as a seal upon thine arm: for love is strong as death; jealousy is cruel as the grave: the coals thereof are coals of fire, which hath a most vehement flame." The latter clause refers to the seal being upon the bracelet, which is still preferred among ladies in the East. We find Pharaoh, king of Egypt, taking off his ring from his hand and putting it upon Joseph's hand. This was a token that he was invested with the office of vizier or prime minister, who bore the royal signet. "The king of Persia in the same way," says the editor of the Pictorial Bible, "gave his seal ring to his successive ministers, Haman and Mordecai; and in Esther, viii. 8, the use of such a ring is expressly declared: 'The writing which is written in the king's name, and sealed with the king's ring, may no man reverse.' The possession of such a ring, therefore, gave absolute power in all things to the person to whom it was entrusted. This may, in some degree, be understood by the use of a seal among ourselves to convey validity to a legal instrument or public document; and still more perhaps by the use of the great seal, the person who holds which is, at least nominally, the second person in the state. But our usages do not perfectly illustrate the use of the seal as it exists in the East, because we require the signature in addition to the seal, whereas, in the East, the seal alone has the effect which we give to both the seal and the signature. People in the East do not sign their names. They have seals in which their names and titles are engraven, and with which they make an impression with thick ink on all occasions for which we use the signature. To give a man your seal is, therefore, to give him the use of that authority and power which your own signature possesses. This explains the extraordinary anxiety about seals which is exhibited in the laws and usages of the East; it explains Judah's anxiety about the signet which he had pledged to Tamar (Gen. xxxviii.); and it explains the force of the present act of Pharaoh. In Egypt, the crime of counterfeiting a seal, was punished with the loss of both hands. In Persia, at the present day, letters are seldom written, and never signed, by the person who sends them; and it will thus appear that the authenticity of all orders and communications, and even of a merchant's bills, depends wholly on the seal. This makes the occupation of a seal-cutter one of as much trust and danger as it seems to have been in Egypt. Such a person is obliged to keep a register of every seal he makes, and if one be lost or stolen from the party for whom it was cut, his life would answer for making another exactly like it. The loss of a seal is considered a very serious calamity, and the alarm which an Oriental exhibits when his seal is missing, can only be understood by a reference to these circumstances. As the seal-cutter is always obliged to annex the real date at which the seal was cut, the only resource of a person who has lost his seal is to have another made with a new date, and to write to his correspondents to inform them that all accounts, contracts, and communications to which his former seal is affixed, are null from the day on which it was lost. That the ring in this case was a signet appears from other passages, which describe it as used for the purpose of sealing. It would seem that most of the ancient seals were rings; but they were not always finger-rings, being often worn as bracelets on the arm. Indeed, it is observable, that nowhere in the Bible is a signet expressly said to be worn on the finger, but on the hand, as in the present text; and although this may denote the finger, we may understand it literally as of a ring worn on the wrist. Finger seal-rings are now, however, more usual than bracelets; and very often seals are not used as rings at all, but are carried in a small bag in the bosom of a person's dress, or suspended from his neck by a silken cord. They are and were, whether rings or otherwise, made of gold or silver, or even inferior metals, such as brass. But an inscribed stone is frequently set in the metal; and that this custom was very ancient, appears from Exod. xxviii. 11, and other places, where we read of 'engraving in stone like the engraving of a signet.' The intelligent editor of Calmet (Mr C. Taylor) is mistaken in his explanation that such seals, used as stamps-manual to impress a name with ink upon paper, must have the characters raised, as in our printing and wood engraving, and not indented, as in our seals. The fact is, that they are cut in the same fashion as our seals, and the thick ink being lightly daubed with the finger over the surface, the seal is pressed upon the paper, where it leaves a black impression, in which the characters are left white or blank."

SEBAT, the fifth month of the Jewish civil year, and the eleventh of the ecclesiastical year. Zech. i. 7.

SECESSION, the act by which a numerous body of Presbyterians in Scotland withdrew from the communion of the Established Church.

In 1732, more than forty ministers presented an address to the General Assembly, specifying, in a variety of instances, what they considered to be great defections from the established constitution of the Church, and craving a redress of these grievances. A petition to the same effect, subscribed by several hundreds of elders and private Christians, was offered at the same time; but the Assembly refused a hearing to both, and enacted that the election of ministers to vacant charges where an accepted presentation did not take place, should be competent only to a conjunct meeting of elders and heritors, being Protestants. To this act many objections were made by numbers of ministers and private Christians, which led at length to their exclusion from the General Assembly, and from the Church of Scotland. This sentence being intimated to them, they protested that their ministerial office and relation to their respective charges should be held as valid as if no such sentence had passed; and that they were now obliged to make a secession from the prevailing party in the ecclesiastical courts; and, that it shall be lawful and warrantable for them to preach the gospel, and discharge every branch of the pastoral office, according to the Word of God, and the established principles of the Church of Scotland. Mr Ralph Erskine, minister at Dunfermline, Mr Thomas Mair, minister at Orwell, Mr John M'Laren, minister at Edinburgh, Mr John Currie, minister at Kinglassie, Mr James Wardlaw, minister at Dunfermline, and Mr Thomas Nairn, minister at Abbotshall, protested against the sentence of the Commission, and that it should be lawful for them to complain of it to any subsequent General Assembly of the Church.

The Secession properly commenced at this date. And accordingly the ejected ministers declared, in their protest, that they were laid under the disagreeable necessity of seceding, not from the principles and constitution of the Church of Scotland, to which, they said, they stedfastly adhered, but from the present Church courts, which had thrown them out from ministerial communion. The Assembly, however, which met in May 1734, did so far modify the above sentence, that they empowered the Synod of Perth and Stirling to receive the ejected ministers into the communion of the Church, and restore them to their respective charges; but with this express direction, "That the said Synod should not take upon them to judge of the legality or formality of the former procedure of the Church judicatories in relation to this affair, or either approve or censure the same." As this appointment neither condemned the act of the preceding Assembly, nor the conduct of the Commission, the seceding ministers considered it to be rather an act of grace than of justice; and, therefore, they said they could not return to the Church courts upon this ground; and they published to the world the reasons of their refusal, and the terms upon which they were willing to return to the communion of the Established Church. They now erected themselves into an ecclesiastical court, which they called the Associate Presbytery, and preached occasionally to numbers of the people, who joined them in different parts of the country. They also published what they called an Act, Declaration, and Testimony, to the doctrine, worship, government, and discipline of the Church of Scotland, and against several instances, as they said, of defection from these, both in former and in the present times. Some time after this, several ministers of the Established Church joined them, and the Associate Presbytery now consisted of eight ministers. But the General Assembly which met in 1738, finding that the number of Seceders was much increased, ordered the eight ministers to be served with a libel, and to be cited to the next meeting of the Assembly in 1739. They now appeared at the bar as a constituted presbytery, and having formally declined the Assembly's authority, they immediately withdrew. The Assembly which met next year deposed them from the office of the ministry; which, however, they continued to exercise in their respective congregations, who still adhered to them, and erected meeting-houses, where they preached till their death. Mr James Fisher, the last survivor of them, was, by an unanimous call, in 1741, translated from Kinclaven to Glasgow, where he continued in the exercise of his ministry among a numerous congregation, respected by all ranks in that large city, and died in 1775, much regretted by his people and friends. In 1745, the seceding ministers were become so numerous, that they were erected into three different presbyteries under one synod, when an unfortunate dispute divided them into two parties, the Burghers and Antiburghers. These two parties, after remaining separate for many years, at length reunited in 1820, and being afterwards joined by the Relief body, formed what is now called the UNITED PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH (which see), a large and very influential body in Scotland, which has already done, and we believe is yet destined to do, much for the advancement of religion both at home and abroad.

SECHEM, or SHECHEM, or SYCHAR, a town at the foot of Mount Gerizim in Samaria, and now called Nablous. "It is worthy of notice that whilst Capernaum and the other opulent cities on the shores of Tiberias, in which the ministry and the mighty works of Christ were rejected, are now in ruins, and these so greatly defaced that it is scarcely possible for the traveller to ascertain their site, Sychar, where our Lord was kindly received, is still a flourishing town. The charming situation of the city, and the rich beauty of the vale, watered with numerous rivulets, and overshadowed by the twin heights of Ebal and Gerizim, have excited the wonder of all travellers, and furnished them with a theme on which they are never weary of expatiating. Joliffe speaks of the 'romantic beauty of its position, the buildings appearing to rise amidst bowers blooming with all the varieties of vegetation, encircled by venerable groves, and refreshed by rills of purest water.' 'Nablous,' says Lord Lindsay, 'was far too lovely for entrance—we rode round the town, and encamped beyond it under the olive trees.' 'A beautiful stream,' says Stephens, 'was running through the valley, and a shepherd sat on its bank, playing a reed pipe, with his flock feeding quietly around him.' But the finest description of the town and vale of Shechem, is the well-known one of Clarke: 'There is nothing in the Holy Land,' says that traveller, 'finer than the view of Napolose from the heights around it. As the traveller descends towards it from the hills, it appears luxuriantly embosomed in the most delightful and fragrant bowers, half concealed by rich gardens and by stately trees collected into groves, all around the bold and beautiful valley in which it stands. Trade seems to flourish among its inhabitants.'" "Along the valley," he adds, "we beheld 'a company of Ishmaelites coming from Gilead,' as in the days of Reuben and Judah, 'with their camels bearing spicery, and balm, and myrrh,' who would gladly have purchased another Joseph of his brethren, and conveyed him as a slave to some Potiphar in Egypt. Upon the hills around, flocks and herds were feeding, as of old; nor in the simple garb of the shepherds of Samaria was there anything repugnant to the notions we may entertain of the appearance presented by the sons of Jacob." The celebrated well called Jacob's well, but which, with the inhabitants of Sechem, is known by the name of Bir Samaria, or the "well of Samaria," is situated about half an hour's walk east of the town. See JACOB'S WELL.

SECRET, hidden, or known only to a few. Mark iv. 22. In secret, is in such a place or manner as that few know it, or where one cannot be hurt. Job. xl. 13; Ps. xxvii. 5. The secret of God is—(1.) His purpose concerning persons and nations, and the reasons of his dispensing his mercy and judgment in such a manner and time. Deut. xxix. 29; Amos iii. 7. (2.) His secret favour and blessing—his instructing men in the mysteries of his Word and providence, and his directing, succeeding, and protecting them in their station and work. Ps. xxv. 14. The secrets of men are—(1.) Those things which few do or ought to know; such secrets tale-bearers reveal. Prov. xx. 19. (2.) The meaning of a dream or vision which is hard to be known. Dan. iv. 9. (3.) Their inward purposes, dispositions, aims, and acts, which are known only to God and one's self. 1 Cor. xiv. 25. Eccles. xii. 14. Rom. ii. 16. (4.) Those parts of the human body which modesty requires to be covered. Deut. xxv. 11. The secrets of wisdom are the unknown mysteries contained in the knowledge and practice of true religion, particularly those relating to the divine excellence. Job xi. 6. God's secret place is where his peculiar presence is, but is unseen, as amid the flames of Sinai (Ps. lxxxi. 7), and in the temple, chiefly its most holy place (Ezek. vii. 22); or Christ, and intimate fellowship through him, by which one has unseen instruction, and great happiness and safety. Ps. xci. 1; xxvii. 5.

SECT, a collective term, comprehending all such as follow the doctrines and opinions of some divine, philosopher, &c. The word sect, says Dr Campbell, among the Jews, was not, in its application, entirely coincident with the same term as applied by Christians to the subdivisions subsisting among themselves. We, if I mistake not, invariably use it of those who form separate communions, and do not associate with one another in religious worship and ceremonies. Thus, we call Papists, Lutherans, and Calvinists, different sects, not so much on account of their differences in opinion, as because they have established to themselves different fraternities, to which, in what regards public worship, they confine themselves; the several denominations above mentioned having no intercommunity with one another in sacred matters. High Church and Low Church we call only parties, because they have not formed separate communions. Great and known differences in opinion, when followed by no external breach in the society, are not considered with us as constituting distinct sects, though their differences in opinion may give rise to mutual aversion. Now, in the Jewish sects (if we except the Samaritans), there were no separate communities erected. The same temple and the same synagogues were attended alike by Pharisees and Sadducees: nay, they were often of both denominations in the sanhedrim, and even in the priesthood. Another difference also, was, that the name of the sect was not applied to all the people who adopted the same opinions, but solely to the men of eminence among them who were considered as the leaders of the party.

SECTARIANISM. See BIGOTRY.

SECULAR CLERGY. See CLERGY.

SECUNDIANS, a denomination in the second century, which derived their name from Secundus, a disciple of Valentine. He maintained the doctrine of two eternal principles, viz., light and darkness, whence arose the good and evil that are observable in the universe. See VALENTINIANS.

SECURE—(1.) Not exposed to apparent danger. Job xii. 6. (2.) Without fear of danger. Judg. viii. 11; Mic. ii. 8. And to secure one, is to keep him free from danger, and the fear of it. Matt. xxviii. 14. To take security of one, is to get bail for his good behaviour, or his appearance at court. Acts xvii. 9. Men's secure fearlessness of danger is either sinful, when not afraid of their bad state or condition, and of the just judgments of God; or holy, when one by a firm faith commits himself and all his concerns to God in Christ, as his own God. Job xii. 6, xi. 18.

SEDITION, a rebellious uproar in a city or country, contrary to the command and authority of the civil magistrate. Gal. v. 20.

SEDUCE, to decoy, or draw away one from correct principles or practice. 1 Tim. iv. 1. The way of the wicked seduceth them—leads them on to further impiety, and keeps their consciences quiet, while they hasten to eternal woe. Prov. xii. 26. God's people are seduced, when taught, advised, or commanded to forsake what is true and lawful, and to follow what is sinful. 2 Kings xxi. 9; Ezek. xiii. 10. The Egyptians were seduced by their rulers, when led to worship idols, work wickedness, and follow schemes ruinous to the nation. Isa. xix. 13. Evil men and seducers wax worse and worse, when God justly leaves them to proceed from one error or wicked way to another still worse, and to become more bold in their seducing work. 2 Tim. iii. 13.

SEDUCTION, the diabolical crime of ensnaring the affections of a virgin to destroy her chastity. See FORNICATION—MARRIAGE.

SEE, APOSTOLIC. A see is the seat of episcopal jurisdiction where the bishop has his throne. Thus we speak of the see of Canterbury, or of London, &c. An apostolic see again, is the see or throne of such bishoprics as were supposed to have been formed by an apostle. In process of time, the title came to be usurped by the ambitious bishops of Rome, who hold that they are the vicars of Christ, and the successors of Peter, who, they allege, was the chief of all the apostles. It is strange, indeed, that the apostles seem never to have been aware of any such primacy being possessed by Peter; neither does he himself ever refer to such a thing, either in his sermons recorded in the Acts, or in the two epistles which bear his name. Both Scripture and ecclesiastical history are silent as to his having been ever at any time in Rome, much less having been bishop of the Church there. Paul addresses an epistle expressly to that Church, and never mentions Peter in it; nay, though he sends salutations to no fewer than twenty-five persons in that Church, Peter is not one of them. Paul dwelt in Rome for a considerable period, and preached there, yet he never appears to have met with Peter during his residence in that city. All this is inexplicable, if we suppose that Peter was bishop of Rome.

SEED. The word "seed" is often used in Scripture for children. Thus Gen. iii. 15, the Redeemer is called "the seed of the woman." "And I will put enmity between thee and the woman, and between thy seed and her seed; it shall bruise thy head, and thou shalt bruise his heel." By the seed of the serpent is to be understood all wicked men, who are called "serpents, generation of vipers, children of their father the devil;" and as the seed of the woman is set in opposition to them, it must necessarily follow, since Eve is the natural mother both of good and bad men, that it denotes a limited portion of the human race, including, first and chiefly, the Lord Jesus Christ, who, in allusion to this promise, is called, by way of eminence, "the seed," Gal. iii. 16–19; and, secondly, all the members of Christ, his true people, the sincerely pious in every age and country. These constitute the spiritual body, here called "the seed of the woman," and they all bear the most implacable hatred to the wicked one; while he, on the other hand, is actuated by an equally deadly hatred against them, and is incessantly plotting their injury and ruin. The Jews are called the seed of Abraham, as being his natural descendants, and all true believers are also his seed, but spiritually, as being followers of his faith.

SEED-TIME. This busy season, called by the rabbins Tsero, commenced about the middle of the month Tisri, including all Marchesvan and the former half of Chisleu, corresponding to the period that intervenes between the commencement of October and the beginning of December. At the early part of this season the climate is agreeable—warm during the day, and cold during the night. Towards the end of seed-time, it becomes cool, and snow begins to cover the mountain-tops. About the end of October or the beginning of November, the former rain began in general to fall, and then the Jew commenced the labours of the field in right earnest; ploughing his ground, sowing his seed, and gathering in his latter grapes. Morier declares that in Persia the peasants begin to plough and irrigate the ground about the end of August.

The seed-time is attended with considerable danger to the husbandman, in Palestine and Syria. Volney tells us that “the countryman must sow with the musket in his hand;” and since his time, more recent travellers confirm his testimony. To the practice of robbing the sowers in the field the Psalmist probably alludes in Ps. cxxvi. 5, 6: “They that sow in tears shall reap in joy. He that goeth forth and weepeth, bearing precious seed, shall doubtless come again with rejoicing, bringing his sheaves with him.”

SEEING. This word is often equivalent in Scripture to “understanding, or to having a perception of a thing,” whether by means of the sense of seeing or any other. Thus, Exod. xx. 18, “And all the people saw the thunderings.” Rev. i. 12, “And I turned to see the voice that spake with me.” In this sense of understanding, may the language of John be interpreted, i. 18, “No man hath seen God at any time;” hath fully and perfectly known him; hath duly apprehended his nature. This made it necessary that the only-begotten Son which is in the bosom of the Father should declare him. Sometimes the “see” of the Hebrew language is translated “provide.” Thus Gen. xxii. 8, “God will provide for himself a lamb,” is in Hebrew “will see for himself the lamb.” 1 Sam. xvi. 1, “I have provided me a king;” in Hebrew, “I have seen me a king.” Gen. xli. 33, “Now therefore let Pharaoh look out a man;” in Hebrew, “let Pharaoh see a man.”

SEEK, to endeavour to obtain, whether by searching for (Gen. xxxvii. 16), asking by prayer (Ezra viii. 21), or by the use of any other means that tends to procure the enjoyment of a thing. Gen. xliii. 18. God seeks men, when he fixes his love on them, and by his Son’s righteousness and intercession, and by the ministry of his word, and the efficacy of his Spirit, he recovers them from their miserable state or condition. Ezek. xxxiv. 16; Ps. cxix. 176; Luke xv. 4–10, xix. 10. To seek God, or his name, or face, is to ask his direction, pray for his favours, and depend on him as our helper and portion. Ps. lxxiii. 1, lxxxiii. 16. Hypocrites seek him, when they pretend to be sensible of their wants, and to pray for and desire the enjoyment of himself and favours. Prov. i. 28. The Jews sought Christ after his ascension, but found him not; they had, to no purpose, an eager desire to enjoy the appearance of their Messiah. John viii. 21. To seek to an altar or temple, is to frequent it religiously. 2 Chron. i. 5; Deut. xii. 5;

Amos v. 4. To seek God’s works, is to endeavour to understand them. Ps. cxi. 2. To seek God’s precepts, is to endeavour to know and obey them. Ps. cxix. 115, 155. To seek judgment, or mischief, is to employ one’s self in practising justice, or doing mischief. Isa. i. 17; Prov. xi. 27, xvii. 11, 19. To seek peace, is to endeavour to promote it. Ps. xxxiv. 14; Jer. xxix. 7. To seek one’s soul, or life, is to desire and use all possible means for murdering or ruining him. Ps. xxxv. 4, xxxviii. 12. The gracious law of spiritual blessings Christ affirms to be, “Seek, and ye shall find.”

SEER. Prophets were in the earliest ages called “seers,” 1 Sam. ix. 9; 2 Sam. xxiv. 11; and a “prophecy” in Isa. i. 1 is called a “vision,” in accordance with what is said in Num. xii. 6: “And he said, Hear now my words: If there be a prophet among you, I the Lord will make myself known unto him in a vision, and will speak unto him in a dream.” There is great obscurity resting upon the modes of the divine communications to men; but when God is said to have appeared to any one, even in a vision, it does not necessarily follow that the recipient of such a revelation was properly asleep. Though the night season and the state of sleep was often chosen for that purpose, yet, in other cases, the prophet was thrown into a temporary trance in which the exercise of the senses on outward objects was suspended. In other instances, the will of heaven was imparted by the powerful agency of the Spirit of God, giving to the subject of it a strong perception and supernatural persuasion of the truth of the things revealed.

SEIR, the Horite. See next article.

SEIR, MOUNT. The mountainous country to which Esau retired from the presence of his brother Jacob is called Seir. It was originally inhabited by the Horites or Horims. Mount Hor exchanged its name for Seir, the name of a distinguished Horite. The Israelites were unable to pass through this mountain barrier, and, accordingly, they are said to “compass the land of Edom by the way of the Red Sea;” that is, to descend to its southern extremity at Ezion-geber, as they could not penetrate it higher up. To the southward of this place Burckhardt observed an opening in the mountains, where he supposed the Israelites to have passed. This passage brought them into the high plains on the east side of Mount Seir, which are so much higher than the valley on the west, that the mountainous territory of the Edomites was everywhere more accessible,—a circumstance which perhaps contributed to make them more afraid of the Israelites on this border, whom they had set at defiance on the opposite one. The mean elevation of this chain cannot be estimated at less than four thousand feet. In the summer it produces most of the European fruits, namely, apricots, figs, pomegranates, olives, apples, and peaches; while in winter deep snows occasionally fall, with frosts to the middle of March. The inhabitants, like those of most mountainous regions, are very healthy. Burckhardt says that there was no part of Syria in which he saw so few invalids.

SELA. This word is found in 2 Kings xiv. 7, and as it signifies a rock, it is supposed to be identical with Petra the celebrated capital of Edom. See PETRA.

SELAH, an expression which occurs no fewer than seventy-four times in the book of Psalms, and thrice in the Prophet Habakkuk. It has sometimes been supposed to be merely a musical note, but as it seems to follow uniformly a very striking remark, it is more probable that, as Calmet thinks, it calls for a pause, as if for solemn consideration.

SELEUCIA, a city near the mouth of the Orontes, in Syria. It is mentioned in Acts xiii. 4, as having been the place where Paul and Barnabas embarked for Cyprus.

SELEUCIANS, disciples of Seleucus, a philosopher of Galatia, who, about the year 380, adopted the sentiments of Hermogenes and those of Audæus. He taught, with the Valentinians, that Jesus Christ assumed a body only in appearance. He is said also to have maintained that the world was not made by God, but was co-eternal with him; and that the soul was only an animated fire created by the angels; that Christ does not sit at the right hand of the Father in a human body, but that he lodged his body in the sun, according to Ps. xix. 4; and that the pleasures of beatitude consisted in corporeal delight.

SELF-DECEPTION includes all those various frauds which we practise on ourselves in forming a judgment, or receiving an impression of our own state, character, and conduct; or those deceits which make our hearts impose on us in making us promises, if they may be so termed, which are not kept, and contracting engagements which are never performed.

Self-deception, as one observes, appears in the following cases:—"1. In judging of our own character, on which we too easily confer the name of self-examination, how often may we detect ourselves in enhancing the merit of the good qualities we possess, and in giving ourselves credit for others which we really have not! 2. When several motives or passions concur in prompting us to any action, we too easily assign the chief place and effect to the best. 3. We are too prone to flatter ourselves by indulging the notion that our habits of vice are but individual acts, into which we have been seduced by occasional temptations, while we are easily led to assign the name of habits to our occasional acts and individual instances of virtue. 4. We confound the mere assent of the understanding naturally, attended by some correspondent but transient sensibilities, with the impulses of the affections and determination of the will. 5. We are apt to ascribe to settled principles the good actions which are the mere effect of natural temper. 6. As sometimes, in estimating the character of others, we too hastily infer the right motive from the outward act; so, in judging of ourselves, we overrate the worth, by overvaluing the motives of our actions. 7. We often confound the non-appearance of a vicious affection with its actual extinction. 8. We often deceive ourselves by comparing our actual with our former character and conduct, and perhaps too easily ascribing to the extirpation of vicious or the implantation of virtuous habits, that improvement which is owing merely to the lapse of time, advancing age, altered circumstances, &c. 9. Another general and fertile source of self-deception is our readiness to excuse, or at least to extenuate, the vices of our particular station, while we congratulate ourselves on the absence of other vices which we are under no temptation to commit. 10. We deceive ourselves by supposing our remorse for sin is genuine when, alas! it does not lead to repentance. 11. By forming improper judgments of others, and forming our own conduct upon theirs." See SELF-EXAMINATION.

SELF-DEDICATION, the giving up of ourselves unreservedly to God; that we may serve him in righteousness and true holiness. Rom. vi. 13, xii. 1. See SANCTIFICATION.

SELF-DEFENCE, implies not only the preservation of one's life, but also the protection of our property, because without property life cannot be preserved in a civilized nation.

Some condemn all resistance, whatsoever be the evil offered, or whosoever be the person that offers it; others will not admit that it should pass any further than bare resistance; others say that it must never be carried so far as hazarding the life of the assailant; and others, again, who deny it not to be lawful in some cases to kill the aggressor, at the same time affirm it to be a thing more laudable and consonant to the gospel to choose rather to lose one's life in imitation of Christ, than to secure it at the expense of another's, in pursuance of the permission of nature.

"Self-defence may be with justice practised,—1. In case of an attempt made upon the life of a person, against which he has no other way of securing himself but repelling force by force. 2. It is generally esteemed lawful to kill in the defence of chastity, supposing there be no other way of preserving it." It should be maturely considered whether our Lord's maxim (Matt. v. 39), "Resist not evil," was intended to apply to these extreme cases, since his illustrations of the maxim are of a different order. His laws, after all, are our only safe rules of conduct.

SELF-DENIAL, a term that denotes our relinquishing every thing that stands in opposition to the divine command, and our spiritual welfare. Matt. xvi. 24. It does not consist in denying what a man is, or what he has; in refusing favours conferred on us in the course of providence; in rejecting the use of God's creatures; in being careless of life, health, and family; in macerating the body, or abusing it in any respect; but in renouncing all those pleasures, profits, views, connexions, or practices, that are prejudicial to the true interests of the soul.

The understanding must be so far denied as not to lean upon it, independent of divine instruction. Prov. iii. 5, 6. The will must be denied, so far as it opposes the will of God. Eph. v. 17. The affections, when they become inordinate. Col. iii. 5. The gratification of the appetites of the body must be denied when out of their due course. Rom. vi. 12, 13; 1 Cor. ix. 27. The honours of the world and praise of men, when they become a snare. Heb. xi. 24–26. Worldly emoluments, when to be obtained in an unlawful way, or when standing in opposition to religion and usefulness. Matt. iv. 20–22. Friends and relatives, so far as they oppose the truth, and would influence us to oppose it too. Gen. xii. 1. Our own righteousness, so as to depend upon it. Phil. iii. 8, 9. Life itself must be laid down, if called for in the cause of Christ. Matt. xvi. 24, 25. In fine, every thing that is sinful must be denied, however pleasant and apparently advantageous, since without holiness no man shall see the Lord. Heb. xii. 14.

To enable us to practise this duty, let us consider the injunction of Christ (Matt xvi. 24); his eminent example (Phil. ii. 5–8); the encouragement he gives (Matt. xvi. 25); the example of his saints in all ages (Heb. xi.); the advantages that attend it; and, above all, learn to implore the agency of that Divine Spirit without whom we can do nothing.

SELF-EXAMINATION, is the calling ourselves to a strict account for all the actions of our lives, comparing them with the Word of God, the rule of duty; considering how much evil we have committed, and good we have omitted. It is a duty founded on a divine command (2 Cor. xiii. 5), and ought to be done—1. Deliberately. 2. Frequently. 3. Impartially. 4. Diligently. 5. Wisely. And, 6. With a desire of amendment.

This, though some modern Christians would call it a legal duty, is essential to our improvement, our felicity, and interest. 1 Cor. xi. 28; Gal. vi. 4.

SELF-EXISTENCE OF GOD, is his entire existence of himself, not owing it to any other being whatsoever; and thus God would exist if there were no other being in the whole compass of nature but himself. See EXISTENCE, INDEPENDENCE, and ETERNITY OF GOD—JEHOVAH.

SELF-GOVERNMENT, the wise and conscientious regulation of all our appetites, affections, and habits, on Christian principles. See APPETITES—HEART—AFFECTIONS—HABIT—SELF-DENIAL.

SELFISHNESS, inordinate self-love. See SELF-LOVE—SELF-SEEKING.

SELF-KNOWLEDGE, the knowledge of one's own nature, character, abilities, duties, principles, prejudices, tempers, secret springs of action, thoughts, memory, taste, views in life, virtues and vices.

This knowledge is commanded in the Scriptures (Ps. iv. 4; 2 Cor. xiii. 5), and is of the greatest utility, as it is the spring of self-possession, leads to humility, stedfastness, charity, moderation, self-denial, and promotes our usefulness in the world.

To obtain it there should be watchfulness, frequent and close attention to the operations of our own minds, regard had to the opinions of others, conversation, reading the Scriptures, and dependence on divine grace. See the articles ADAM—MAN—SELF-EXAMINATION—SELF-DECEPTION—DEPRAVITY.

SELF-LOVE, is that instinctive principle which impels every animal, rational and irrational, to preserve its life and promote its own happiness.

"It is very generally confounded with selfishness, but the one is distinct from the other. Every man loves himself, but every man is not selfish. The selfish man grasps at all immediate advantages, regardless of the consequences which his conduct may have upon his neighbour. Self-love only prompts him who is actuated by it to procure to himself the greatest possible sum of happiness during the whole of his existence. In this pursuit, the rational self-lover will often forego a present enjoyment to obtain a greater and more permanent one in reversion; and he will as often submit to a present pain to avoid a greater hereafter. Self-love, as distinguished from selfishness, always comprehends the whole of a man's existence; and, in that extended sense of the phrase, every man is a self-lover; for, with eternity in his view, it is surely not possible for the most disinterested of the human race not to prefer himself to all other men, if their future and everlasting interests could come into competition. This, indeed, they never can do; for, though the introduction of evil into the world, and the different ranks which it makes necessary in society, put it in the power of man to raise himself in the present state, by the depression of his neighbour or by the practice of injustice, yet, in the pursuit of the glorious prize which is set before us, there can be no rivalry among the competitors. The success of one is no injury to another; and therefore, in this sense of the phrase, self-love is not only lawful but absolutely unavoidable.

Self-love, however, says Jortin, is vicious—1. When it leads us to judge too favourably of our faults. 2. When we think too well of our righteousness, and overvalue our good actions, and are pure in own eyes. 3. When we overvalue our abilities, and entertain too good an opinion of our knowledge and capacity. 4. When we are proud and vain of inferior things, and value ourselves upon the station and circumstances in which, not our own deserts, but some other cause, has placed us. 5. When we make our worldly interest, convenience, ease, or pleasure, the great end of our actions. See LOVE OF OUR NEIGHBOUR.

SELF-SEEKING, the aiming at our own interest only, or supremely, in everything we do. It must be distinguished from that regard which we ought to pay to the preservation of our health, the cultivation of our minds, the lawful concerns of business, and the salvation of our souls. It is called in Scripture covetousness.

Self-seeking, which is only another name for selfishness, evidences itself by parsimoniousness, oppression, neglect and contempt of others, rebellion, sedition, egotism, immoderate attempts to gain fame, power, pleasure, money, and frequently by gross acts of lying and injustice.

Its evils are numerous. It is directly opposed to Christian love or charity, which "seeketh not her own." 1 Cor. xiii. 5. It is highly dishonourable and debasing, transforming a man into anything, or everything, for his own interest. It is sinful, and the source of innumerable sins; as perjury, hypocrisy, falsehood, idolatry, persecution, and murder itself. It is dangerous. It excites contempt, is the source of tyranny, discord, war, and makes a man a slave, and exposes him to the just indignation of God.

The remedies to prevent or suppress this evil are these: Consider that it is absolutely prohibited (Jer. xlv. 5; Luke vi. 23; Heb. xiii. 5; Col. iii. 5); a mark of a wicked, degenerate mind; that the most awful curses are pronounced against it (Isa. v. 18; Hab. ii. 9, 12; Amos vi. 1; Mic. vii. 1, 2); that it is contrary to the example of all wise and good men; that the most awful examples of the punishment of this sin are recorded in Scripture, as Pharaoh, Achan, Haman, Gehazi, Absalom, Ananias and Sapphira, Judas, and many others.

SEMI-ARIANS were thus denominated because, in profession, they condemned the errors of the Arians, but in reality maintained their principles, only palliating and concealing them under softer and more moderate terms. They would not allow, with the orthodox, that the Son was omoousios, of the same substance, but only omoiousios, of a like substance, with the Father; and thus, though in expression they differed from the orthodox in a single letter only, yet in effect they denied the divinity of Jesus Christ.

The Semi-Arianism of the moderns consists in their maintaining that the Son was, from all eternity, begotten by the will of the Father, contrary to the doctrine of those who teach that the eternal generation is necessary. Such, at least, are the respective opinions of Dr Clarke and Bishop Bull.

SEMI-PELAGIANS, a name anciently, and even at this day, given to such as retain some tincture of Pelagianism.

Cassian, who had been a deacon of Constantinople and was afterwards a priest at Marseilles, was the chief of these Semi-Pelagians, whose leading principles were—1. That God did not dispense his grace to one more than another, in consequence of predestination—that is, an eternal and absolute decree—but was willing to save all men, if they complied with the terms of his gospel. 2. That Christ died for all men. 3. That the grace purchased by Christ, and necessary to salvation, was offered to all men. 4. That man, before he received grace, was capable of faith and holy desires. 5. That man was born free, and was, consequently, capable of resisting the influences of grace or of complying with its suggestion. The Semi-Pelagians were very numerous, and the doctrine of Cassian, though variously explained, was received in the greatest part of the monastic schools in Gaul, from whence it spread itself far and wide through the European provinces. As to the Greeks and other Eastern Christians, they had embraced the Semi-Pelagian doctrines before Cassian. In the sixth century, the controversy between the Semi-Pelagians and the disciples of Augustine prevailed much, and continued to divide the western Churches.

SENSATION. The medium of communication between man and the external world is his senses, viz., tasting, hearing, smelling, sight, and touch. When any one of the organs of sense is acted upon by an external object, a certain indescribable feeling is excited in the mind, varying in its nature according to the peculiar organ which has been affected. To this simple feeling the name of sensation has been given. This feeling gives us no information whatever in regard to outward objects, but conveys to us the simple consciousness of a change in our state of mind. By the presence of a rose a feeling is communicated to my mind which I cease to feel when the rose is removed. This is the utmost that can be affirmed with truth in regard to the nature of sensation—that feeling which forms as it were the connecting link between the world without us and the world within us. Thought in form of sensation merely, may be regarded as only in process of being formed. It scarcely amounts thus far to thought as we now understand it, necessarily implying not only a consciousness of thinking, but also a firm conviction as to the existence of an object of thought. There is nothing more in this rudimental state of the human mind than an indescribable feeling, accompanied, however, as it necessarily must be, by consciousness, as indispensable to its existence as a feeling.

SEPHAR. Gen. x. 30. See SEPHARVAIM.

SEPHARVAIM, a city of Assyria, from which people were brought to colonize the country called Samaria. 2 Kings xix. 13; Isa. xxxvii. 13.

SEPTUAGESIMA, the third Sunday before the first Sunday in Lent; so called because about seventy days before Easter.

SEPTUAGINT, the Alexandrian or most ancient Greek version of the books of the Old Testament, from its being supposed to be the work of seventy-two Jews, who are usually called the seventy interpreters, seventy being a round number.

Aristobulus, who was tutor to Ptolemy Physcon; Philo, who lived in our Saviour's time, and was contemporary with the apostles; and Josephus, speak of this translation as made by seventy-two interpreters, by the care of Demetrius Phalereus, in the reign of Ptolemy Philadelphus. All the Christian writers during the first fifteen centuries of the Christian era have admitted this account of the Septuagint as an undoubted fact; but since the Reformation, critics have boldly called it in question. But whatever differences of opinion there have been as to the mode of translation, it is universally acknowledged that such a version, whole or in part, existed; and it is pretty evident that most of the books must have been translated before our Saviour's time, as they are quoted by him. It must also be considered as a wonderful providence in favour of the religion of Jesus. It prepared the way for his coming, and afterwards greatly promoted the setting up of his kingdom in the world; for hitherto the Scriptures had remained locked up from all other nations but the Jews, in the Hebrew tongue, which was understood by no other nation; but now it was translated into the Greek language, which was a language commonly understood by the nations of the world. It has also been with great propriety observed, "that there are many words and forms of speech in the New Testament, the true import of which cannot be known but by their use in the Septuagint. This version also preserves many important words, some sentences, and several whole verses, which originally made part of the Hebrew text, but have long ago disappeared. This is the version, and this only, which is constantly used and quoted in the Gospels, and by the apostles, and which has thereby received the highest sanction which any writings can possibly receive."

"The Septuagint contains a translation of all the books of the Old Testament; but it is probable that the five books of the law alone were at first translated. Josephus speaks always of the translation of the law; and the books wished for were said to be the books of the Jewish laws. After the translation was finished, the Jews of Alexandria desired, we are informed, their rulers might also have leave to read the law, which had been translated; in other words, might be furnished with copies of the Greek version, to read in their synagogues: and at this time we also know that the law alone was read in their synagogues. The reading of the prophets commenced at an after period. Learned men have also observed a considerable difference of manner and excellence in the translations of the several books. The best translated are the five books of Moses. The book of Proverbs is also executed in a superior manner. The book of Isaiah is supposed by Bishop Lowth not to have been translated till a hundred years after the Pentateuch, and to be worse executed than most of the other books of Scripture.

"The most celebrated manuscripts of the Septuagint are the 'Codex Vaticanus,' and the 'Codex Alexandrinus.' From these the late editions have been printed.

"The collations of the Septuagint manuscripts have hitherto been made on a very limited scale. But in 1788, Dr Holmes published, we are informed, at Oxford, proposals for a collation of all the known MSS. of this celebrated version. A subscription was made for defraying the expense; and literary men were engaged in various places to assist in the collation. In 1798, Dr Holmes published, at Oxford, the book of Genesis; which was followed by the other books of the Pentateuch. From the preface to these, it appears that eleven Greek manuscripts in uncial letters, and more than a hundred in small letters, were collated for this edition. Dr Holmes died in 1806; but a short time before his death he published the book of Daniel, both according to the Septuagint version, and that of Theodotian. Since the death of Dr Holmes, Mr Parsons has continued this important work."

SEPTUAGINT CHRONOLOGY, the chronology which is formed from the dates and periods of time mentioned in the Septuagint translation of the Old Testament. It reckons fifteen hundred years more from the creation to Abraham than the Hebrew Bible. Dr Kennicott, in the dissertation prefixed to his Hebrew Bible, has attempted to show that it is very probable that the chronology of the Hebrew Scriptures, since the period just mentioned, was corrupted by the Jews between the years 175 and 200; and that the chronology of the Septuagint is more agreeable to truth. It is a fact, that during the second and third centuries, the Hebrew Scriptures were almost entirely in the hands of the Jews, while the Septuagint was confined to the Christians; and they had, therefore, a very favourable opportunity for this corruption; but no proof can be brought home to them; and the religious, or rather superstitious, veneration in which they have ever held their Scriptures, and which is clearly discoverable in the integrity of the rest of these writings, renders it in the highest degree improbable that they corrupted the chronology. See CHRONOLOGY.

SEPULCHRE. The primitive custom in the East was to provide a family sepulchre in a cave hollowed out in the brow of a mountain, and situated generally, either in some romantic part of a private garden, or on a dry and sequestered eminence. Hence the dying charge of Jacob, Gen. xlix. 29, 30, "And he charged them, and said unto them, I am to be gathered unto my people: bury me with my fathers in the cave that is in the field of Ephron the Hittite; in the cave that is in the field of Machpelah, which is before Mamre, in the land of Canaan, which Abraham bought with the field of Ephron the Hittite for a possession of a burying place." Carne, the traveller, tells us that "each respectable family has its own house of the dead; and often this is a little detached garden, and consists of a small stone building, where there is a rock resembling a house, which is called the sepulchre of the family; it has neither door nor window. This custom, which prevails particularly in the lonely parts of Lebanon, is of great antiquity, and may serve to explain some passages of Scripture. The prophet Samuel was buried in his house at Ramah; it could hardly be in his dwelling-house. Joab was buried in his own house in the wilderness." In the times of primitive Christianity, the tombs of the martyrs, as well as the sepulchres of ordinary Christians, were situated in wild and sequestered spots. But by far the greater number of the primitive Christians were buried in subterranean sepulchres. The following interesting description of these sepulchres is from the pen of the Rev. Dr Jamieson, in his valuable work, "The Manners and Trials of the Primitive Christians." "Among the monuments of Christian antiquity, none are more singular than these abodes of the dead; and one feels at a loss whether most to admire their prodigious extent, the laborious industry that provided them, or the interesting recollections with which they are associated. Like the Moorish caves in Spain, they were generally excavated at the base of a lonely hill, and the entrance so carefully concealed that no aperture appeared, and no traces were discernible—except by an experienced eye—of the ground having been penetrated, and of the vast dungeons that had been hollowed underneath. The descent was made by a ladder, the foot of which stood in a broad and spacious pathway, which extended like a street along the whole length of the place. This principal entrance opened, at intervals, into smaller passages, which again led into a variety of chambers; and on either side of them were several rows of niches, pierced in the wall, serving as catacombs, and filled with coffins. The chambers were painted, for the most part, like the churches, with passages of history from the Old and New Testaments. In the centre of the large street was an open square, large and commodious as a market-place, in which those who took refuge there, in those troublous times, were wont to congregate for worship; and the comfort of which, as a place of abode, was greatly promoted by the liberal use which the Christians made of spices and perfumes on their dead. In the more distant of these cemeteries, whose remoteness rendered them less liable to be disturbed, there were small apertures left in the surface of the ground, through which a dim twilight was admitted; but the others, where these were closed, were absolutely dark, and, except by the aid of lights, impassable; so that, on any sudden surprise, the refugees had only to extinguish their lamps to insure their safety from the invasion of their enemies. The depth of these vaults was sometimes so great, that two or three storeys were ranged one above another; and the whole aspect of the place conveyed the impression of a city under ground.

"To these spacious cemeteries, the primitive Christians had often for years to betake themselves for shelter; and security as well as custom reconciled them to a mode of life whose gloom and loneliness were unrelieved by scarcely any of the ordinary attractions that sweeten the life of man. Indeed they were so led, by the habitual disposition of their minds, to indulge in meditations among the tombs, that the transition from the ordinary course of the world to the unbroken solitude of the catacombs, was less felt by them than perhaps it would have been by any other class; and the fondness they contracted for these places of abode, as well as the moral influence they produced on the minds of the Christians, was such, that many severe edicts were issued by the emperors, to prohibit their frequenting them.

"But it was not only on anniversary occasions that the primitive Christians frequented the sepulchres of the martyrs. Unhappily, they were often driven to them by the sword of persecution; and at other times, when, though their lives were spared, they were denied the free exercise of their religion, they had no alternative between abandoning their worship and violating the laws, but by sheltering themselves in the obscurity of the cemeteries. While the vigilance of their pursuers was suspended by slumber, or relaxed in the downy lap of luxury, the followers of Jesus betook themselves to their subterranean asylum, to enjoy the valued privilege of worship. In these retreats multitudes lived for weeks and months, without seeing sun, moon, or stars. The aged and the poor were maintained by the munificent liberality of those whose affection to their cause had provided the sanctuary, or by the contributions of the young and vigorous, who poured the fruits of their industry into the common fund, as they returned, under the friendly protection of night, to the company of the proscribed believers. In these profound and spacious caverns, whose gloom and solitude were but ill relieved by the glimmer of a hundred tapers, and whose walls were lined with immense rows of catacombs, in which reposed the august remains of their fathers and brethren, who had died in the faith, they spent their midnight vigils in edifying one another with the things pertaining to the common salvation; and while the storeyed vaults echoed with the notes of praise, piety was fanned into a holier fervour, faith awakened the sublimest emotions, and the close contact of the living with the venerable dead, whose spirits were still in communion with their survivors on earth, gave to the hope of immortality all the strength and vividness of a present reality, filling the hearts of all with a 'joy unspeakable and full of glory,' far more than compensating for their banishment from the cheerful haunts of men. Long after their meetings had ceased to be clandestine, the cemeteries continued to be the favourite haunts of the Christians; and it was the more convenient to use them for the offices of devotion as well as burial, that the followers of Jesus required no consecrated temple, no gorgeous altar, no outward pomp, or emblems of religion."

SERAPHIM (burning ones), an order of angels, which encircle the throne of the Lord. Those described by Isaiah (vi. 2) had each six wings; with two of which he covered his face, with two his feet, and with the two others flew. They cried to one another, and said, "Holy, holy, holy, is the Lord of hosts! the whole earth is full of his glory." See ANGELS.

SERGIUS PAULUS, proconsul or governor of the isle of Cyprus, was converted by the ministry of Paul, A.D. 44 or 45. Acts xiii. 7.

SERIOUSNESS, a term often used as synonymous with religion, denotes a calm, earnest concentration of the mind. See GRAVITY.

SERMON, a discourse delivered in public for the purpose of religious instruction and improvement.

In order to make a good sermon, the following things must be attended to. The exordium or introduction should correspond with the subject on which we are about to treat. For this purpose the context often forms a source of appropriate remark. There are some subjects in which it is best to begin with some passage of Scripture apposite to the subject, or some striking observation. It has been debated, indeed, whether we should begin with anything particularly calculated to gain the attention, or whether we should rise gradually in the strength of remark and aptness of sentiment. As to this, we may observe, that although it is acknowledged that a minister should flame most towards the end, perhaps it would be well to guard against a low and feeble manner in the exordium. It has been frequently the practice to make apologies by way of introduction. Though this may be admitted in some singular cases, as on the sudden death of a minister, or disappointment of the preacher through unforeseen circumstances, yet it is often made use of where it is entirely unnecessary, and carries with it an air of affectation and pride. An apology for a man's self is often more a reflection than anything else. If he be not qualified, why have the effrontery to engage? and if qualified, why tell the people an untruth?

Exordiums should be short; some give us an abridgment of their sermon in their introduction, which takes off the people's attention afterwards; others promise so much, that the expectation thereby raised is often disappointed. Both these should be avoided, and a simple, correct, modest, deliberate, easy gradation to the text attended to.

As to the plan. Sometimes a text may be discussed by exposition and inference, sometimes by raising a proposition as the general sentiment of the text, from which several truths may be deduced and insisted on, sometimes by general observations, and sometimes by division. If we discuss by exposition, then we should examine, but not obtrude, the authenticity of the reading, the accuracy of the translation, and the scope of the writer. If a proposition be raised, care should be taken that it is founded on the meaning of the text. If observations be made, they should not be too numerous, foreign, nor upon every particular in the text. If by division, the heads should be distinct and few, yet have a just dependence on and connexion one with the other. It was common in the last two centuries to have such a multitude of heads, subdivisions, observations, and inferences, that hardly any one could remember them. It is the custom of the present day, among many, to run into the other extreme, and to have no division at all. This is equally injurious. We should ever remember that we are speaking to the plainest capacities; and as the arranging our ideas properly is necessary to our being understood, so the giving each division of our discourse its denomination of number has a happy effect to assist the attention and memory of our hearers.

As to the amplification. After having laid a good foundation on which to build, the superstructure should be raised with care. "Let every text have its true meaning, every truth its due weight, every hearer his proper portion." The reasoning should be clear, deliberate, and strong. No flights of wit should be indulged, but a close attention to the subject, with every exertion to inform the judgment and impress the heart. It is in this part of a sermon that it will be seen whether a man understands his subject, enters into the spirit of it, or whether, after all his parade, he be a mere trifler. Some, after having given a pleasing exordium and ingenious plan, have been very deficient in the amplification of the subject; which shows that a man may be capable of making a good plan and not a good sermon, which, of the two, perhaps, is worse than making a good sermon without a good plan. The best of men, however, cannot always enter into the subject with that ability which at certain times they exhibit. If in our attempts, therefore, to enlarge on particulars, we find our thoughts do not run freely on any point, we should not urge them too much, this will tire and jade the faculties too soon, but pursue our plan. Better thoughts may occur afterwards, which we may occasionally insert.

As to the application. There are also some doctrinal preachers who reject application altogether, and who affect to discharge their office by narrating and reasoning only; but such should remember that reasoning is persuasion, and that themselves, as often as any men, slide into personal application, especially in discussing certain favourite points in divinity. Application is certainly one of the most important parts of a sermon. Here both the judgment and the passions should be powerfully addressed. Here the minister must reason, expostulate, invite, warn, and exhort, and all without harshness and an insulting air. Here pity, love, faithfulness, concern, must be all displayed. The application, however, must not be too long, unnatural, nor concluded abruptly. We shall now subjoin a few remarks as to the style and delivery.

As to style. It should be simple, clear, and forcible. Singular terms, hard words, bombastic expressions, are not at all consistent. Quoting Latin and Greek sentences will be of little utility. Long argumentations, and dry metaphysical reasoning, should be avoided. A plain, manly style, so clear that it cannot be misunderstood, should be pursued. The Scriptures are the best model. Mr Flavel says, "The devil is very busy with ministers in their studies, tempting them to lofty language, and terms of art, above their hearers' capacities."

As to the use of illustration. "A noble metaphor, when it is placed to an advantage, casts a kind of glory round it, and darts a lustre through a whole sentence." The Scriptures abound with illustrations. Our Lord and his disciples constantly used them, and people understand a subject better when represented by a striking figure, than by learned disquisitions.

As to the delivery of sermons, we refer to the articles DECLAMATION and ELOQUENCE. See also MINISTER—PASTOR—PREACHING.

SERPENT. In Egypt, and other Oriental countries, a serpent was the common symbol of a powerful monarch; it was embroidered on the robes of princes, and blazoned on their diadem, to signify their absolute power and invincible might; and that as the wound inflicted by them is incurable, so the fatal effects of their displeasure were neither to be avoided nor endured.

This word, says the learned Gataker, is in the Hebrew a general term, common to all living creatures, in water or on land, that glide along, in the one or on the other, with a wriggling kind of motion, without the use of feet or fins.

Dr Adam Clarke, in his Note on Gen. iii. 1, has the following remarks: "The word, according to Buxtorf and others, has three meanings in Scripture: (1.) It signifies to view or observe attentively, to divine or use enchantments, because in them the augurs viewed attentively certain omens, &c., and under this head it signifies to acquire knowledge by experience. (2.) It signifies brass, brazen, and is translated in our Bible, not only 'brass,' but 'chains,' 'fetters,' 'fetters of brass,' and in several places 'steel;' see 2 Sam. xxii. 35; Job xx. 24; Ps. xviii. 34; and in one place at least, 'filthiness,' or fornication, Ezek. xvi. 36. (3.) It signifies a serpent, but of what kind is not determined. In Job xxvi. 13, it seems to mean the hippopotamus. In Eccles. x. 2, the creature, of whatever kind, is compared to the babbler; 'surely the serpent, nachash, will bite without enchantment; and a babbler is no better.' In Isa. xxvii. 1, the crocodile or alligator seems particularly meant by the original. And in Isa. lxxv. 25, the same creature is meant as in Gen. iii. 1, for in the words, 'and dust shall be the serpent's meat,' there is an evident allusion to the words of Moses. In Amos ix. 3, the crocodile is evidently intended. 'Though they be hid in the bottom of the sea, thence will I command the serpent, hanachash, and he shall bite them.' No person can suppose that any of the snake or serpent kind can be intended here; and we see from the various acceptations of the word, and the different senses which it bears in various places in the Sacred Writings, that it appears to be a sort of general term, confined to no one sense."

The fiery serpent, saraph, mentioned Numb. xxi. 6, 8; Deut. viii. 15, Isa. xiv. 29, and xxx. 6; was so called probably from the burning sensation which its bite occasioned. Plutarch speaks of a similar kind of reptiles. "The inhabitants of the country round the Red Sea (says he) were tormented in such a manner as was never heard of till that time. Little dragons bit their arms and legs: and if you touched them ever so lightly, they fixed themselves to the flesh, and their bite was intolerably painful, and like fire." The Hebrew original signifies also a winged serpent: and we are told that such were very common both in Egypt and Arabia. The learned Bochart describes them as short, spotted with divers colours, and with wings resembling those of the bat. He quotes a number of ancient and modern authors to prove that they are the same with the hydra of the Greeks or Latins.

The heathen writers concur in testifying that the deserts wherein the Israelites journeyed produced serpents of so venomous a kind, that their biting was deadly, beyond the power of any art then known to cure it. The ancients observed in general, that the most sandy and barren deserts had the greatest number and the most venomous of serpents. Diodorus makes this remark more particularly concerning the sands of Africa; but it was equally true of the wilderness through which the Israelites journeyed. Some writers have supposed that the serpents that bit the Israelites were of the flying kind.

The author of the Book of Wisdom (chap. xvi. 5) gives a most beautiful turn to the means of deliverance appointed by God, namely, looking up to the brazen serpent that the offending Israelites might be healed of the wounds made by these fiery serpents: 'For when the horrible fierceness of beasts came upon these (thy people), and they perished with the stings of crooked serpents, thy wrath endured not for ever: but they were troubled for a small season, that they might be admonished, having a sign of salvation to put them in remembrance of the commandment of thy law. For he that turned towards it was not saved by the thing that they saw; but by thee, that art the Saviour of all. And in this thou madest thine enemies confess that it is thou that deliverest from all evil; for them, the bitings of grasshoppers and flies killed, neither was there found any remedy for their life, for they were worthy to be punished by such: but thy sons, not the very teeth of venomous dragons overcome; for thy mercy was ever by them, and healed them. For they were stung that they should remember thy words, and were quickly saved, that not falling into deep forgetfulness, they might be continually mindful of thy goodness.'

The serpent was worshipped in Chaldea, and among several of the oriental nations. In the Egyptian language it was called 'oub,' and was the same in the Chaldee dialect: hence the Greek ophis. Thus we read, Lev. xx. 27, 'A man or a woman that hath a familiar spirit, oboth, or that is a wizard, shall surely be put to death.' So chap. xx. 6, Deut. xvii. 11; 1 Sam. xxviii. 3, 7, 9; 2 Kings xxi. 6; xxiii. 24; and 2 Chron. xxviii. 6. The woman at Endor, who had a familiar spirit, is called 'a mistress of ob,' and it is interpreted 'Pythonissa.' Kircher says that obion is still, among the people of Egypt, the name of a serpent. It is said that Jotham, king of Israel, built much on the wall of ophel, i.e., the serpent god.

SERVANT. This word in Scripture generally signifies a slave; because, among the Hebrews, and the neighbouring nations, the greater part of the servants were such, belonging absolutely to their masters, who had a right to dispose of their persons, goods, and, in some cases, even of their lives. (See SLAVE.)

Sometimes, however, the word merely denotes a man who voluntarily dedicates himself to the service of another. The servants of God are those who are devoted to his service, and obey his written word.

The business of servants is to wait upon, minister to, support and defend their masters; but there are three cases, as Dr Stennett observes, wherein a servant may be justified in refusing obedience:—1. When the master's commands are contrary to the will of God. 2. When they are required to do what is not in their power. 3. When such service is demanded as falls not within the compass of the servant's agreement.

The obligations servants are under to universal obedience are from these considerations:—1. That it is fit and right. 2. That it is the express command of God. 3. That it is for the interest both of body and soul. 4. That it is a credit to our holy religion. The manner in which this service is to be performed is—(1.) With humility. Prov. xxx. 21, 22; Eccles. x. 7. (2.) Fidelity. Tit. ii. 10; Matt. xxiv. 45. (3.) Diligence. Prov. x. 4, xxi. 5; 1 Thess. iv. 11. (4.) Cheerfulness.

SETH, the third son of Adam and Eve, born after the murder of Abel by Cain. From him were descended the great mass of the human family. He lived nine hundred and twelve years. The Rabbinical writers ascribe to Seth the invention of letters and the art of writing.

SETHIANS, heretics who paid divine worship to Seth, whom they looked upon to be Jesus Christ, the Son of God, but who was made by a third divinity, and substituted in the room of the two families of Abel and Cain, which had been destroyed by the deluge. They appeared in Egypt in the second century; and, as they were addicted to all sorts of debauchery, they did not want followers. They continued in Egypt above two hundred years.

SEVEN. We are told, Gen. ii. 2, that "on the seventh day God ended his work which he had made; and he rested on the seventh day from all his work which he had made." The original word for "seventh" comes from a root signifying to "be full, complete, entirely made up." Seven, therefore, is often called a perfect number, being used for "many" or for "a full number," however large, as Gen. xxxiii. 3; Lev. iv. 6; Jer. xv. 9. No number mentioned in the sacred volume occurs so frequently as this; and as it is plain that no particular number when viewed abstractly by itself, apart from the thing numbered, has any more virtue or significance than another, it is to be inferred that the incessant use of this numeral in the Scriptures carries in it some important allusions. What more probable than that it is founded upon the history of the creation, occupying with its Sabbath-rest the space of seven days, and shadowing out a sevenfold division of time to the end of the world? Hence a very general idea among the Rabbins was, that the world would last, including the millennium, seven thousand years.

SEVENTY. About the year B.C. 277, the Old Testament was translated into Greek by the united labours of about seventy learned Jews, and that translation has been since known as the version of the LXX. See SEPTUAGINT.

SEXAGESIMA, the second Sunday before Lent; so called because about the sixtieth day before Easter.

SHADDAI (all-sufficient), one of the Hebrew names of God, which the Seventy and Jerome generally translate Almighty. Job more frequently uses it than any other of the sacred writers. It is sometimes joined with El, which is another name of God, El-Shaddai, God-Almighty. Gen. xvii. 1.

The name is either derived from a root which signifies to destroy, and so is intended to convey an awful idea of God's omnipotence; or from a root which implies sufficiency, and then denotes that the Lord is all-sufficient and self-sufficient, and that whatever good is found among the creatures, it is wholly derived and poured forth by him. Our translators have uniformly rendered the name Almighty. It is never applied to angels, or men, or false gods, in any manner. Their power and sufficiency, if they have any, are wholly derived; nor could they subsist from moment to moment, but by that divine and inexhaustible fulness which produced them from nothing, and can with equal ease return them to nothing. Jehovah revealed himself to Abraham by the name El-Shaddai. "And when Abram was ninety years old and nine, the Lord appeared to Abram, and said unto him, I am the Almighty God; walk before me, and be thou perfect." Gen. xvii. 1. Isaac blesses his son Jacob in this name, Gen. xxviii. 3, "And God Almighty bless thee, and make thee fruitful, and multiply thee, that thou mayest be a multitude of people." And God revealed himself to Jacob, then surnamed Israel, under the appellation El-Shaddai: "And God said unto him, I am God Almighty: be fruitful and multiply; a nation and a company of nations shall be of thee, and kings shall come out of thy loins." Gen. xxxv. 11. The Lord appeared to Moses in the bush, and declared that he was the El-Shaddai, who appeared to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, and that henceforth he would be known chiefly under the name Jehovah: "And I appeared unto Abraham, unto Isaac, and unto Jacob, by the name of God Almighty, but by my name Jehovah was I not known to them." Exod. vi. 3. In heaven the saints adore Jehovah, as "the Alpha and the Omega, the beginning and the ending, who is, and who was, and who is to come, the Shaddai, or the Almighty."

SHADRACH, the Chaldean name given to Haniah, a companion of Daniel at the court of Nebuchadnezzar. Dan. i. 7. See ABEDNEGO.

SHAKERS, a sect which was instituted about the year 1774, in America. Anna Leese, whom they style the elect lady, is the head of this party. They assert that she is the woman spoken of in the twelfth chapter of Revelations, and that she speaks seventy-two tongues; and though those tongues are unintelligible to the living, she converses with the dead, who understand her language. They add farther that she is the mother of all the elect, and that she travails for the whole world; that, in fine, no blessing can descend to any person but only by and through her, and that in the way of her being possessed of their sins by their confessing and repenting of them, one by one, according to her direction. They vary in their exercises; their heavy dancing, as it is called, is performed by a perpetual springing from the house floor, about four inches up and down, both in the men's and women's apartment, moving about with extraordinary transport, singing, sometimes one at a time, sometimes more, making a perfect charm.

This elevation affects the nerves, so that they have intervals of shuddering as if they were in a strong fit of the ague. They sometimes clap hands, and leap so as to strike the joist above their heads. They throw off their outside garments in these exercises, and spend their strength very cheerfully this way. Their chief speaker often calls for their attention; then they all stop, and hear some harangue, and then fall to dancing again. They assert, that their dancing is the token of the great joy and happiness of the new Jerusalem state, and denotes the victory over sin. One of the postures which increase among them, is turning round very swift for an hour or two. This they say is to show the great power of God.

The numbers who adhere to this sect in America amount to somewhere between six and seven thousand. In their view, the millennial state of the Church has begun, and that they are the only Church on earth who enjoy its privileges, and are in possession of apostolic gifts. They teach that all outward ordinances, particularly baptism and the Lord's Supper, ceased in the age of the apostles.

SHALMANESER. See ASSYRIA.

SHAME, a painful sensation, occasioned by the quick apprehension that reputation and character are in danger, or by the perception that they are lost. It may arise, says Dr Cogan, from the immediate detection, or the fear of detection, in something ignominious. It may also arise from native diffidence in young and ingenuous minds, when surprised into situations where they attract the peculiar attention of their superiors. The glow of shame indicates, in the first instance, that the mind is not totally abandoned; in the last, it manifests a nice sense of honour and delicate feelings, united with inexperience and ignorance of the world. See MODESTY.

SHARON, PLAIN OF. This is a valley in Palestine, celebrated in ancient times for its beauty, and the great extent and richness of its pasture-grounds. It extends "from Carmel on the north to Gaza in the south, and from the coast to the mountains of Samaria, and Judea inland—an extent of territory of about an hundred miles in length, by about twenty in breadth. At least travellers sometimes apply the name of Sharon to the whole plain, although, we apprehend, the scriptural use of the term is more strictly referrible to those parts which bordered, or nearly so, on the high road which led from Joppa to the capital. The present aspect of the plain varies at different points. Flourishing woods; rich pastures, sprinkled with white clover, or enamelled with wild flowers; marshes; fields of thistles; sandy deserts; ruins of towns and villages,—such is the varied appearance which the surface of this plain presents at this day. Its general state is that of a luxuriant but uncultivated waste. The authorities here are rather scanty. Several have crossed the vale of Sharon; some few have tracked part of it from south to north, but we do not at this moment recollect of a single traveller who has ascended it the whole way from Gaza to Carmel, save Irby and Mangles. Those who have traversed part of this line have kept near the coast, and thus had little opportunity of examining the general or inland character of the plain." Eusebius gives the designation of Sharon to that part of the plain which lies between Cesarea and Joppa. There was another Sharon situated somewhere in the possessions of Israel, and most probably on the east of the Jordan, as it is mentioned in connection with the tribe of Gad. "And they dwelt in Gilead in Bashan, and in her towns, and in all the suburbs of Sharon, upon their borders." 1 Chron. v. 16.

SHASTER, the name of a book in high estimation among the idolaters of Hindustan, containing all the dogmas of the religion of the Brahmans, and all the ceremonies of their worship.

SHEAR-JASHUB (the remnant shall return), an allegorical name given by the prophet Isaiah to one of his sons.

SHEBA. See SABEANS.

SHEBA, QUEEN OF. We are told, Matt. xii. 42, "The queen of the south shall rise up in the judgment with this generation, and shall condemn it: for she came from the uttermost parts of the earth to hear the wisdom of Solomon; and, behold, a greater than Solomon is here." The incident to which our Lord here refers is recorded in 1 Kings x. 1–13. The royal personage termed by Jesus "the queen of the south," had come from Sheba, which is considered by some to be the same with Ethiopia or modern Abyssinia, and by others it is regarded as Arabia Felix. It lay far to the south or south-east of Jerusalem, and being the remotest point to which the commerce of Solomon's days extended, it is here described as "the uttermost parts of the earth." The servants of Solomon were accustomed, for purposes of trade, to travel far from their own land, so that the wisdom of the king of Israel became known even in the remotest countries. The Queen of Sheba, though a heathen princess, had been impressed by the tidings which reached her concerning the Israelitish monarch, and she resolved formally to visit this wonderful king, and to prove him with hard questions. The distance and the difficulty of the journey did not prevent this inquiring female from prosecuting her purpose. She travelled to Jerusalem, saw the splendour of Solomon's greatness, and tested the amazing extent of his knowledge and wisdom. Her doubts were resolved, and her difficulties fully explained. She yielded to the force of the evidence; she saw and believed. "It was a true report," she exclaimed, "that I heard in mine own land of thy acts and of thy wisdom. Howbeit I did not believe the words, until I came, and mine eyes had seen it: and, behold, the half was not told me: thy wisdom and prosperity exceedeth the fame which I heard." Sheba, according to Josephus, was the ancient name of the city of Meroe. The Ethiopians still claim this princess as their sovereign, and alleged that her posterity reigned there for a long time.

SHEBAT, or SHEBET, the fifth month of the civil year of the Hebrews, and the eleventh of the ecclesiastical year. They began in this month to number the years of the trees they planted, the fruits of which were esteemed impure till the fourth year. See MONTH.

SHEEP, scah, occurs frequently; and tsan, a general name for both sheep and goats, considered collectively in a flock; Arabic, zain.

The sheep is a well-known animal. The benefits which mankind owe to it are numerous. Its fleece, its skin, its flesh, its tallow, and even its horns and bowels, are articles of great utility to human life and happiness. Its mildness and inoffensiveness of temper strongly recommend it to human affection and regard, and have designated it the pattern and emblem of meekness, innocence, patience, and submission. It is a social animal. The flock follow the ram as their leader, who frequently displays the most impetuous courage in their defence; dogs, and even men, when attempting to molest them, have often suffered from his sagacious and generous valour.

In a domesticated state, the sheep is a weak and defenceless animal, and is, therefore, altogether dependent upon its keeper for protection as well as support. To this trait in their character there are several beautiful allusions in the Sacred Writings. Thus, Micaiah describes the destitute condition of the Jews, as a flock "scattered upon the hills, as sheep that have not a shepherd" (1 Kings xxii. 17; see also Matt. ix. 36); and Zechariah (xiii. 7) prophesied, that when the good Shepherd should be smitten and removed from his flock, the sheep should be scattered. To the disposition of these animals to wander from the fold, and thus abandon themselves to danger and destruction, there are also several allusions made by the inspired writers. David confesses that he had imitated their foolish conduct: "I have gone astray like a lost sheep;" and, conscious that, like them, he was only disposed to wander still farther from the fold, he adds, "Seek thy servant." Ps. cxix. 176. Nor was this disposition to abandon the paternal care of God peculiar to David, for the prophet adopts similar language to depict the dangerous and awful condition of the entire species: "All we like sheep have gone astray; we have turned every one to his own way." Isa. liii. 6. It was to seek these "lost sheep," scattered abroad, and having no shepherd, that the blessed Redeemer came into the world. He is "the good Shepherd, who gave his life for the sheep" (John x. 11); and his people, though formerly "as sheep going astray," have now "returned to the shepherd and bishop of their souls." 1 Pet. ii. 25. His care over them, and their security under his protection, are most beautifully and affectingly described in the chapter which we just now cited. See SHEPHERD.

SHEIKS, the name of preachers in the Mohammedan mosques.

SHEKEL. The word in Hebrew means weight-money, and is often used to denote the weight of any thing whatever. The money value of a shekel, according to Dr Arbuthnot, is 2s. 3½d. sterling, and a golden shekel is valued at £1, 16s. 6d. English money. One shekel is equal to twenty gerah, Numb. xviii. 16. Some have considered the shekel of the sanctuary to be double the common shekel, but Calmet thinks that they were the same. The sacred money, or capitation tax for the support of the temple, was half a shekel.

SHEKINAH, a bright shining cloud in the inner place of the Jewish temple, the symbol of the divine presence. It appeared as if resting between two figures or angelic representations called cherubims, upon an ark or chest called the mercy-seat, Exod. xl. 34-38, and 2 Chron. vii. 1, 2; and at times it filled all the sanctuary. From this bright cloud Jehovah is thought to have revealed himself, and given forth his oracles when consulted by the high priest. Accordingly the Psalmist addresses Jehovah thus in Ps. lxxx. 1: "Thou that dwellest between the cherubims, shine forth." It is asserted by the Rabbins that the Shekinah dwelt first in the tabernacle reared by Moses in the wilderness, and passed from thence into the temple on the day of its consecration by Solomon, continuing there until the destruction of the temple by the Romans, after which it finally disappeared.

The brightness of the Shekinah was seen in New Testament times at the baptism and transfiguration of Jesus, and called by Peter "the excellent glory."

SHEM, supposed to have been the second son of Noah. Gen. vi. 10. A very remarkable prophecy concerning Shem, by his father Noah, is found in Gen. ix. 26: "And he said, Blessed be the Lord God of Shem; and Canaan shall be his servant." On this passage Dr Candlish remarks: "In the case of Shem, the blessing is indirect and reflex; but on that very account it is the more precious. 'Blessed be Jehovah, the God of Shem.' The prophetic father, beholding afar off the highly favoured seed of his highly honoured son, fixes his devout eye, not on their prosperous and happy state, but on the glory of that great and holy name, with whose honour their welfare is to be inseparably blended. What prerogative can equal that which this form of salutation implies! I hail as blessed, not my son, but Him who condescends to be his God; it is not 'blessed be Shem;' but 'blessed be Jehovah, the God of Shem.' Jehovah, the God of Shem, is the blessed One; how blessed, then, he whose God Jehovah is! Blessed is that people whose God is the Lord. Evidently this blessing refers, in the first instance, to the line of Eber, who is singled out from all the other descendants of Shem, chap. x. 21; and ultimately to the family of Abraham, with whom the covenant was established. Chap. xii. It is the highest distinction of Israel that is here foretold. Jehovah was to be blessed in them as his peculiar people,—the people dwelling in his good land, and under his gracious government.

"But when the time came for the fulfilment of this prediction; when the race of Shem, in the line of Eber, and the family of Abraham, were to inherit the blessing; when Israel was to possess the Lord's land and assume his position as the Lord's people,—who stood in the way? Who, but Canaan, by whom the land was preoccupied? for 'the Canaanites were in the land.'"

SHEOL, the Hebrew word corresponding to HADES (which see.)

SHEPHERDS. The employment of a shepherd has been practised from the very earliest times, for we find that Abel, the younger son of Adam, was "a keeper of sheep." But Jabal, the son of Cain, seems to have been the first example of an oriental shepherd. "And Adah bare Jabal: he was the father of such as dwell in tents, and of such as have cattle." Gen. iv. 20. The same interesting occupation was followed at an after period by the posterity of Abraham; for the account which Joseph gave to Pharaoh, when his family came down into Egypt, was in these words: "And the men are shepherds, for their trade hath been to feed cattle; and they have brought their flocks, and their herds, and all that they have." Gen. xlv. 32. And he directed them to say to the king, "Thy servants' trade has been about cattle from our youth even until now, both we and also our fathers." The following judicious remarks on oriental shepherds are given by Professor Paxton:—

The flocks and herds of these shepherds were immensely numerous. So great was the stock of Abraham and Lot, that they were obliged to separate, because "the land was not able to bear them." From the present which Jacob made to his brother Esau, consisting of five hundred and eighty head of different sorts, we may form some idea of the countless numbers of great and small cattle which he had acquired in the service of Laban. In modern times, the numbers of cattle in the Turcoman flocks, which feed on the fertile plains of Syria, are almost incredible. They sometimes occupy three or four days in passing from one part of the country to another.

The care of such overgrown flocks, says Paxton, required many shepherds. These were of different kinds; the master of the family and his children, with a number of herdsmen who were hired to assist them, and felt but little interest in the preservation and increase of their charge. To these our Lord alludes in John x. 12. In such extensive pastoral concerns, the vigilance and activity of the master were often insufficient for directing the operations of so many shepherds, who were not unfrequently scattered over a considerable extent of country. An upper servant was therefore appointed to superintend their labours, and take care that his master suffered no injury. In the house of Abraham, this honourable station was held by Eliezer, a native of Damascus, a servant in every respect worthy of so great and good a master. The office of chief shepherd is often mentioned in classic writers; and being in pastoral countries one of great trust, of high responsibility, and of distinguished honour, is with great propriety applied to our Lord by the apostle Peter: "And when the chief shepherd shall appear, ye shall receive a crown of glory which fadeth not away." 1 Pet. v. 4. The same allusion occurs in these words of Paul: "Now the God of peace, that brought again from the dead our Lord Jesus Christ, that great shepherd of the sheep, through the blood of the everlasting covenant, make you perfect in every good work to do his will." Heb. xiii. 20.

SHESHACH. See BABYLON.

SHEW-BREAD. See BREAD OF THE PRESENCE.

SHIBBOLETH, a word used by the Gileadites as a test-word of the Ephraimites. It signifies an ear of corn, and also a stream, and was, perhaps, suggested by being the name of the object immediately before them—the banks of the river on which they stood. Sibboleth, on the other hand, denotes a burden, and how these different objects were distinguished in the pronunciation of the Ephraimites it is difficult to discover. It is well known that several nations cannot pronounce certain letters.

SHIELD, a piece of defensive armour. (See ARMS, MILITARY.) God is often called a shield, or defence of his people. Gen. xv. 1; Ps. v. 12.

SHILOH. This word, which is generally considered as to be understood of the Messiah, occurs in Gen. xlix. 10, "The sceptre shall not depart from Judah, nor a lawgiver from between his feet, until Shiloh come; and unto him shall the gathering of the people be." Both Jewish and Gentile writers are agreed upon its application to Jesus Christ. The word Shiloh is variously rendered, being sometimes translated "the Sent," and, at other times, "the Peace-maker." Both are strikingly applicable to the Messiah. But in what sense did the sceptre not depart from Judah until Shiloh came? "All the other tribes were to have a sceptre as well as Judah, but Judah's sceptre should continue longer with him than his brothers' sceptres should with them. Accordingly, we learn from history that Judah never lost his tribe, the greatest care having been exercised to preserve distinct this tribe and its families. Thus, in the days of Saul, the men of Judah were numbered apart, 1 Sam. xi. 8; the same also was the case in the time of David. 2 Sam. xxiv. 9. Prophets, also, were employed to record the genealogies of this tribe under the kings, 2 Chron. xii. 15, and xiii. 22; and the same care appears to have been exercised during the captivity in Babylon; for while there was difficulty in making out the genealogies of some of the other tribes, there was none in regard to this. Ezra ii. 62; Neh. vii. 64. And while, in fact, a large portion of the other ten tribes never returned at all to the land of their fathers, Judah, with Benjamin, its accessory, returned with its integrity unbroken, and so remained till the birth of Christ, the whole nation, as well as the land itself, receiving its denomination from Judah, the one being called "Jews," the other "Judæa." Thus it was that the sceptre, or the tribual constitution, did not depart from Judah before the predicted era. It is abundantly evident, however, that both the sceptre and what is called the lawgiver are long since lost in Judah; that the tribe of Judah has lost the record of its genealogies; and that none can discriminate the true descendants of the patriarch Judah from the descendants of Benjamin or of the other patriarchs. Either, then, this word of promise to Judah has failed for evermore, or Shiloh is come, and it is vain to look for another Messiah."

Mr Taylor's explanation is exceedingly ingenious:—"Our Lord was the ONLY branch of David's family entitled to rule, and he dying without issue, the ruling branch of David's family became extinct; so that, after his death, there was no longer any possibility of the continuance of the kingly office in the direct, proper line of David. The person who should have held the sceptre was dead; the direct descent of the family expired with him; and, consequently, the sceptre was bonâ fide departed, since (1.) it was actually swayed by a stranger and strangers (Herod and the Romans); and (2.) no one could possibly claim it, though he might have been of a collateral branch of David's house, could have been the direct legal claimant by birthright; for that person was crucified! Such is the language Providence put in the mouth of Pilate: 'SHALL I CRUCIFY YOUR KING?' 'Yes,' say the Jews; 'we reject the lineal descendant of David, and prefer Cæsar.' Rome triumphs; David expires, in the person of his Son; and with him expires all direct claim of right to the sceptre: the sceptre is departed from David, and if from David, from Judah—JESUS OF NAZARETH, THE KING OF THE JEWS!"

SHILOH. A celebrated city of the tribe of Ephraim, twelve miles from Shechem. Josh. xviii. 1, 8, 10.

SHIMEI, a kinsman of Saul, who was guilty of treating David with great cruelty, cursing the monarch as he left Jerusalem, and throwing stones at him. The incident is recorded in 2 Sam. xvi. 5-13. The followers of David wished to put Shimei to death, but David, looking upon the treatment which he experienced at the hands of Shimei, as permitted by his heavenly Father, forgave Shimei, although afterwards he charged Solomon to treat him as he should eventually deserve.

SHINAR. See BABYLON.

SHIP. Vessels of all kinds are so styled in Scripture. In the four Gospels we are to understand fishing vessels of a moderate capacity.

SHISHAK. A king of Egypt who, in the fifth year of the reign of Rehoboam, son of Solomon, invaded his dominions, and, having entered Jerusalem, took away all the money that was found in the king's treasury, and carried off the golden shields which Solomon had made. It may appear strange, as Bishop Patrick observes, that Shishak should have made war upon Rehoboam, being so nearly allied to him; but it must be remembered that Rehoboam was not the son of Pharaoh's daughter, and that he was probably instigated by Jeroboam, who had long resided in Egypt. Sir Isaac Newton thinks that Shishak was Sesostris, the greatest hero of antiquity, but this is improbable.

SHITTIM, SITIM, SHITTAH. Exod. xxv. 5, 10, 13, 23, 28, xxvi. 26, 32, 37, xxvii. 1, 6, xxx. 5, xxxv. 7, 24, xxxvi. 20, 31, 36, xxxvii. 1, 4, 10, 15, 25, 28, xxxviii. 1, 6; Deut. x. 3; Isa. xli. 19. What particular species of wood this is, interpreters are not agreed. The Seventy render it incorruptible wood. Jerome says, the shittim wood grows in the deserts of Arabia, and is like white thorn as to its colour and leaves; but the tree is so large as to furnish very long planks. The wood is hard, tough, smooth, and extremely beautiful. It is thought that this wood is the black acacia, because that, it is said, is the most common tree growing in the deserts of Arabia, and agrees with what the Scriptures say of the shittim wood. The acacia vera grows abundantly in Egypt in places far from the sea, in the mountains of Sinai near the Red Sea, and in the deserts. It is of the size of a large mulberry tree. The spreading branches and larger limbs are armed with thorns, which grow three together; the bark is rough; the leaves are oblong, and stand opposite each other; the flowers, though sometimes white, are generally of a bright yellow; and the fruit, which resembles a bean, is contained in pods like those of the lupine. "The acacia tree," says Dr Shaw, "being by much the largest and most common tree in these deserts, Arabia Petræa, we have some reason to conjecture that the shittim wood was the wood of the acacia; especially as its flowers are of an excellent smell; for the shittah tree is, in Isa. xli. 19, joined with the myrtle and other fragrant shrubs."

SHOES. See SANDAL.

SHOULDER. To give or lend the shoulder, for bearing a burden, signifies to submit to servitude. Gen. xl. 15. In a contrary sense, Scripture calls that a rebellious shoulder (Neh. ix. 29) which will not submit to the yoke. See Zeph. iii. 9.

SHOUT, a great noise of alarm (1 Thess. iv. 16); or of joy and triumph (Exod. xxxii. 18; Ps. xlvii. 1); or of lamentation and earnest prayer (Lam. iii. 8); of encouragement and excitement (1 Sam. xvii. 20); of terror given to affright an enemy (Jer. l. 15, li. 14); or of applause (1 Sam. x. 24; Acts xii. 22).

SHRINES, either small forms of the temple of Ephesus, with Diana's image in them, or medals with the figure of the temple impressed thereon. Acts xix. 24.

SHUMATHITES, were the inhabitants of Shema (Josh. xv. 26), or sons of Shobal. 1 Chron. ii. 53.

SHUNEM, a city of Issachar. Josh. xix. 18; 1 Sam. xxviii. 4. Eusebius places it five miles south of Tabor.

SHUR, a city in Arabia Petræa, which gave name to the desert of Shur. Gen. xvi. 7; Exod. xv. 22; 1 Sam. xv. 7, xxvii. 8.

SHUSHAN, or SUSA, on the banks of the River Ulai, and the capital of Susiana, or Shusistan, in Persia; and seems to have had its name from the abundance of lilies growing about it. It is said to have been built by Memnon a little before the Trojan war. It was the winter residence of the Persian kings from the time of Cyrus, as a high ridge of mountains sheltered it from the north-east wind; but the sun so scorched it in the summer that the inhabitants were obliged to cover their houses with earth to about the depth of a yard; and if a lizard or serpent crept out, it was likely to be burnt to death. Here Daniel had his vision of the ram and he-goat. Dan. viii. Darius Hystaspes, or Abasuerus, greatly adorned this place. From hence he issued his decree for finishing the rebuilding of the temple, in gratitude for which the Jews called the eastern gate of their temple the Gate of Shushan, and had a resemblance of that city carved thereon. Here also he kept his splendid feast. (Esth. i. 5.) When Alexander seized this city, he found in it fifty thousand talents of gold, besides jewels and golden and silver vessels to an immense value. For above eleven hundred years it has lain in ruins, and is called Valdak. Tavernier thinks that the present Shustera is built near to the site of Shushan.

Mr Kinneir says: "About seven or eight miles to the west of Dezphoul, commence the ruins of Shus, stretching not less, perhaps, than twelve miles, from one extremity to the other. Large blocks of marble, covered with hieroglyphics, are not unfrequently here discovered by the Arabs when digging in search of hidden treasure; and at the foot of the most elevated of the pyramids stands the tomb of Daniel." Of this tomb Sir John Malcolm observes, that "it is a small building, but sufficient to shelter some dervishes, who watch the remains of the prophet, and are supported by the alms of pious pilgrims who visit the holy sepulchre. These dervishes are now the only inhabitants of Susa; and every species of wild beast roams at large over that spot on which some of the proudest palaces ever raised by human art once stood." He also observes, respecting the authenticity of this tomb, that "although the building at the tomb of Daniel be comparatively modern, nothing could have led to its being built where it is, but a belief that this was the real site of the prophet's sepulchre."

SHUT, to close up, bar. Judg. ix. 51. The doors are shut in the streets, when the aged man's teeth are gone, or he can scarcely open his lips; or when, between his death and interment, business in the house is stopped. Eccles. xii. 4. Men shut up the kingdom of heaven, when they misrepresent the true mode of access to everlasting happiness, and hinder and discourage others from the use of the proper means of salvation. Matt. xxiii. 13. Men are shut up to the faith, when God's law, providence, ordinances, and influences, concur to promote their believing in Jesus as the only Saviour. Gal. iii. 23.

SHROVE TUESDAY, the day before Ash Wednesday or Lent, on which, in former times, persons went to their parish churches to confess their sins.

SIBYLLINE ORACLES, prophecies delivered, it is said, by certain women of antiquity, showing the fates and revolutions of kingdoms. We have a collection of them in eight books. Dr Jortin observes, that they were composed at different times by different persons; first, by Pagans, and then, perhaps, by Jews, and certainly by Christians. They abound with phrases, words, facts, and passages, taken from the Seventy, and the New Testament. They are, says the Doctor, a remarkable specimen of astonishing impudence and miserable poetry, and seem to have been, from first to last, and without any one exception, mere impostures.

SIDON, the first-born son of Canaan. Sidon was one of the most ancient cities in the world, and long the wealthiest and greatest of which Phœnicia could boast. It was very strong both by nature and art. On the north side, a citadel, built on an inaccessible rock, and environed on all sides by the sea, and on the south side another fort, defended the mouth of the harbour. Secured on all sides against the assaults of her enemies, and enriched by the extensive commerce which she carried on with the surrounding nations of Asia and Europe, her inhabitants lived in profound security, and indulged without restraint in every voluptuous gratification. So great was their luxury, that "to live after the manner of the Sidonians" became a sort of proverbial phrase for living quietly and securely in ease and pleasure. Judges xviii. 7. But their wealth and luxury do not seem, at least for several ages, to have enervated their minds, and destroyed their powers of exertion and habits of industry; for we know, from the testimony of an inspired writer, that in the days of Solomon, "none were skilled to hew timber like the Sidonians." They are represented by writers, both sacred and profane, as excellent artificers in several other professions or trades; and in proof of this fact, many of them were retained in the pay of Solomon, and employed as his principal workmen in building the temple of Jehovah. Sidon was taken by Nebuchadnezzar, who, however, consented to receive the submission of the Sidonians, and permitted them to retain their own kings. Entering afterwards into a league with Nectanebus, king of Egypt, against Darius Ochus, king of Persia, they were besieged by the latter; when in despair they burnt their ships and their city; in which latter was so great a quantity of gold and silver melted down by the fire, that Ochus sold the ashes for a considerable sum of money. The city was, however, soon rebuilt, as about eighteen years after we find it submitting to Alexander. It subsequently shared in the fortunes of the rest of Phœnicia, being alternately oppressed by the Grecian kings of Syria and Egypt; while its trade, together with that of Tyre, was diverted to Alexandria; though its declension was never so complete as that of the latter city. After the subversion of the Grecian empire by the Romans, Sidon fell into the hands of the latter, who, to put an end to the frequent revolt of the inhabitants, deprived it of its freedom. It then fell successively under the power of the Saracens, the Seljukian Turks, and the Sultans of Egypt, who, in 1289, that they might never more afford shelter to the Christians, destroyed both it and Tyre. But it again recovered, and has ever since been in the possession of the Ottoman Turks. Sidon, at present called Saide, is still a considerable trading town, and the chief mart for Damascus and Upper Syria; but the port is nearly choked up with sand. Though presenting an imposing appearance at a distance, as it rises from the water's edge, it is, like all Turkish towns, ill-built and dirty, and full of ruins; having still discoverable, without the walls, some fragments of columns and other remains of the ancient city. Mr Conner made the number of inhabitants 15,000; of whom 2000 are Christians, chiefly Maronites, and 400 Jews, who have one synagogue. They are principally employed in spinning cotton, which, with some silk, and boots and shoes, or slippers, of Morocco leather, form the chief articles of commerce.

SIGN, a token, or whatsoever serves to express, or represent, another thing. Thus the Lord gave to Noah the rainbow as a sign of his covenant (Gen. ix. 12, 13); and for the same purpose he appointed circumcision to Abraham. Gen. xvii. 11. See also Exod. iii. 12; Judg. vi. 17. In Isa. viii. 18, the word is used for a prophetic similitude: "Behold, I and the children whom the Lord hath given me, are for signs and for wonders in Israel." See also Ezek. iv. 3.

SIHOR. See EGYPT, RIVER OF.

SILAS, said to be contracted from Silvanus, a Roman name of frequent occurrence. The Silas of the New Testament was the companion of Paul in his journeys through Asia Minor and Greece. He is supposed to have been one of the seventy disciples whom our Lord sent forth. Peter calls him a "faithful brother," and sends his first epistle by his hands. He is thought to be the same person who is called Silvanus in the title of the two epistles which Paul addressed to the Thessalonians.

SILK (meshi—Prov. xxxi. 22; Ezek. xvi. 10-13; Rev. xviii. 12). It is certain that silk was imported into Europe ages before the silk-worm that produces it; and it much resembled the hanks known at present, in form, colour, and substance. In this state it was called holoserica, or whole silk; and a method was discovered of separating the threads, and working them up again in a thinner state, so that when woven, the web resembled the modern gauze. It appears that Pamphila, a woman of Coa, first practised this art; and that the Coan vests, which were so transparent as to be called by a poet "woven air," were of this manufacture; though it is possible that they might originally be of cotton, or fine muslin. Silk was manufactured and coloured at Tyre and Berytus, as well singly as intermixed with other materials; and hence it was often used as synonymous with purple.

Silk was first brought into Greece after Alexander's conquest of Persia, and came into Italy during the flourishing times of the Roman empire; but was long so dear in all these parts as to be worth its weight in gold.

SILLOAH (the same as Siloam—Neh. iii. 15; Luke xiii. 4), a beautiful fountain under the walls of Jerusalem, towards the east, between the city and the brook Cedron; perhaps the same with Enrogel. It was the nearest to the temple, and associated with it. Isa. viii. 6.

SILVER. See MONEY.

SIMEON, one of the sons of Jacob by Leah. On his death-bed Jacob made the solemn declaration, Gen. xlix. 5-7, "Simeon and Levi are brethren; instruments of cruelty are in their habitations. O my soul, come not thou into their secret; unto their assembly, mine honour, be not thou united: for in their anger they slew a man, and in their self-will they digged down a wall. Cursed be their anger, for it was fierce; and their wrath, for it was cruel: I will divide them in Jacob, and scatter them in Israel." Simeon and Levi were brethren, not only by nature, but they were brethren in wickedness. This was evinced by their being associated in the infamous murder of the Shechemites; and it is the uniform tradition of the Jews that Simeon and Levi were the principal movers of the wicked conspiracy against Joseph. Jacob predicts, "I will divide them in Jacob, and scatter them in Israel." The tribe of Simeon, as we learn from Josh. xix., was in great measure merged in that of Judah. The Jerusalem Targum thus paraphrases the clause of the prophecy referring to Simeon, "I will therefore divide the tribe of Simeon, that they may become scribes and teachers of the law in the synagogues of Jacob." There is another Simeon, who took the child Jesus in his arms in the temple, but nothing else is known concerning him.

SIMON, the Canaanite, so called, as some suppose, because he was a native of Cana in Galilee. Others, however, derive the word from its Hebrew root, signifying zealous, and thus make the name Simon the Canaanite identical with the name given to this apostle by Luke, "Simon called Zelotes," or the zealous, either from his zeal in the cause of his Master, or from his having belonged, before he became a follower of Christ, to a sect of the Jews mentioned by Josephus, called the zealots. This sect pretended to be the successors of Phinehas of old, who was so zealous for the honour of his God that he took immediate vengeance upon Zimri and Cozbi, an act which the Psalmist tells us "was counted to him for righteousness to all generations for evermore." Nothing is mentioned in Scripture concerning the apostle except the name. After the dispersion of the apostles, he is said to have travelled into different countries, and among others into Egypt and various parts of Africa. There is a tradition also that he came over to Britain and preached the gospel, and that he suffered martyrdom. Others again say that he was a fellow-martyr with the Apostle Jude in Persia.

SIMON, brother of our Lord (Matt. xiii. 55; Mark vi. 3); that is to say, his cousin-german, being son of Mary, sister to the Virgin Mary. He is thought to be the same with Simeon, bishop of Jerusalem, and son of Cleopas.

SIMON MAGUS. This remarkable individual, according to Justin Martyr, was a native of Gittim, in Samaria. But many continental commentators suppose this man to have been identical with Simon, a Cyprian, mentioned by Josephus. Simon is stated in the Acts of the Apostles to have professed to practise magical arts, and to have acquired great notoriety among the people of Samaria, where he dwelt. Acts viii. 9-11. Under the preaching of Philip the Evangelist, he seems to have made a profession of embracing Christianity, and in virtue of that outward profession was baptised by the apostles. The labours of Philip were followed up by those of Peter and John. "Manifestations now followed," to use the language of Neander, "similar to those on the day of Pentecost, and the believers were thus recognised and attested to be a Christian church, standing in an equal rank with the first church at Jerusalem. But Simon was naturally incapable of understanding the spiritual connection of these manifestations; he saw in all of them merely the workings of magical forms and charms, a magic differing not in nature but only in degree from what he practised himself. Hence he imagined that the apostles might communicate these magical powers to him also, by virtue of which all those on whom he laid hands would become filled with divine power, and with this view he offered them money. Peter spurned this proposal with detestation, and now first saw in its true light the real character of Simon, who, in joining himself to believers, had pretended to be what he was not. Peter's terrible rebuke presents him to us as a faithful preacher of the gospel, insisting most impressively on the supreme importance of disposition in every thing which is imparted by Christianity, in direct opposition to the art of magic, which disregards the necessary connection of the divine and supernatural with the disposition of the heart, drags them down into the circle of the natural, and attempts to appropriate to itself divine power by means of something else than that which is allied to it in human nature, and the only possible point of connection for it. These were Peter's words: 'Thy gold, with which thou attemptest to traffic in impiety, perish with thee. Do not deceive thyself, as if with this disposition thou couldst have any part in what is promised to believers. Thou hast no share in this matter, for God, who sees what is within, is not deceived by thy hypocritical professions. With sincere repentance for such wickedness, pray to God that he would be pleased to forgive thee this wicked design.' This rebuke made a great impression at the time on Simon's conscience, inclined more to superstition than to faith, and awakened a feeling, not of repentance for the sinfulness of his disposition, but of apprehension for the divine vengeance. He entreated the apostles that they would pray to the Lord for him, that what they had threatened him with might not come to pass.

"As is usual with such sudden impressions on the senses, the effect on Simon was only transient, for all the further notices we have of him show that he soon returned to his former courses. About ten or twenty years later, we meet with a Simon in the company of Felix, the Roman procurator of Palestine, so strikingly resembling this man, that we are tempted to consider them as identical. The latter Simon appears as a heartless magician, to whom all persons, whatever their character, were welcome, provided they gave credit to his enchantments. With equal arrogance he disclaimed all respect for the ancient forms of religion and for the law of morality. He was a confidant of the Roman procurator Felix, and therefore could never have opposed his vicious inclinations, but, on the contrary, made his magic subservient to their gratification; he thus bound him more closely to himself, as a single example will show. The immoral Felix had indulged a passion for Drusilla, sister of King Herod Agrippa, and wife of King Azizus of Emesa. Simon allowed himself to be the tool of Felix for gratifying his unlawful desires. He persuaded Drusilla that by his superhuman power he could ensure great happiness for her, provided she married Felix, and managed to overcome her scruples of conscience against marrying a heathen. The character of this Simon is stamped on the later theosophic goëtic sect of the Simonians, whose tenets were a mixture of the Oriental, Jewish, Samaritan, and Grecian religious elements. The germ of their principles may be plainly traced back to this Simon, though we cannot attribute to him the complete system of this sect as it existed in the second century."

SIMONY, is the corrupt presentation of any one to an ecclesiastical benefice, for money, gift, or reward. It is so called from the resemblance it is said to bear to the sin of Simon Magus, though the purchasing of holy orders seems to approach nearer to this offence. It was by the canon law a very grievous crime: and is so much the more odious, because, as Sir Edward Coke observes, it is ever accompanied with perjury; for the presentee is sworn to have committed no simony.

SIMPLE. This term is capable of a good, a bad, or an indifferent meaning. Simplicity of mind is piety, integrity, innocence of intention, &c. Rom. xvi. 19. Weak simplicity, on the contrary, is credulity, easily imposed on, easily deluded. Prov. xiv. 15, xxii. 3. "The simple believe every word," report, rumour: "The simple pass on and are punished;" they do not look before them, or take proper steps to avoid evil. Wisdom invites the simple, the uninform, the unstudied, to learn of her, to partake of her refreshments, and to be revived by her delicacies. Prov. ix. 4; see also Ps. xix. 7, cxvi. 6; Ezek. xlv. 20; 2 Cor. i. 12, xi. 3.

SIN, the transgression of the law, or want of conformity to the will of God. 1 John iii. 4. 1. Original sin, or native depravity, is that whereby our whole nature is disordered, and our inclinations rendered contrary to the law of God. This is sometimes called indwelling sin. Rom. vii. (See DEPRAVITY, HUMAN.) The imputation of the sin of Adam to his posterity is also what some divines, not very properly, call original sin. 2. Actual sin is a direct violation of God's law, and generally applied to those who are capable of committing moral evil; as opposed to idiots, or children, who have not the right use of their powers. 3. Sins of omission consist in the leaving those things undone which ought to be done. 4. Sins of commission are those which are committed against affirmative precepts, or doing what should not be done. 5. Sins of infirmity are those which arise from the infirmity of the flesh, ignorance, surprise, snares of the world, &c. (See INFIRMITY.) 6. Secret sins are those committed in secret, or those which we, through blindness or prejudice, do not see the evil of. Ps. xix. 12. 7. Presumptuous sins are those which are done boldly, and against light and conviction. (See PRESUMPTION.) 8. Unpardonable sin seems to consist in the malicious ascription of the dispensations, gifts, and influences of the Spirit to the power of Satan. The reason why this sin is never forgiven, is not because of any want of sufficiency in the blood of Christ, nor in the pardoning mercy of God, but because such as commit it despise and reject the only remedy—that is, the power of the Holy Spirit, applying the redemption of the gospel to the souls of men. There is, however, another view of this unpardonable offence, which deserves consideration. It is plain, says Bishop Tomline, that this sin against the Holy Ghost could not be committed while our Saviour was upon earth, since he always speaks of the Holy Ghost as not being to come till after his ascension into heaven. A few days after that great event, the descent of the Holy Ghost enabled the apostles to work miracles, and communicated to them a variety of other supernatural gifts. Hence it appears that the sin against the Holy Ghost consisted in finally rejecting the gospel as preached by the apostles, who confirmed the truth of the doctrine which they taught "by signs and wonders, and divers miracles, and gifts of the Holy Ghost." Heb. ii. 4. It was unpardonable, because this was the consummation of the proofs afforded to the men of that generation of the divine mission of Christ. This sin was manifestly distinct from all other sins; it indicated an invincible obstinacy of mind, an impious and unalterable determination to refuse the offered mercy of God. This view will serve to explain those passages in the Epistle to the Hebrews in which the hopeless case of Jewish apostates is described. See BLASPHEMY.

The sinfulness of man is—(1.) Universal as to the subjects of it. Rom. iii. 23; Isa. liii. 6. (2.) General, as to all the powers of man. Isa. i. 6. (3.) Awful, filling the mind with constant rebellion against God and his law. (4.) Hateful to God. Job xv. 16. And, (5.) Punishable by him with everlasting punishment. 1 Sam. ii. 9, 10; Rom. ii. 9. While we contemplate the nature, the evil, the guilt, the consequences of sin, it is our happiness to reflect, that the same holy and glorious Being against whom it is committed, has, in his unspeakable mercy, provided a remedy for it; and that he "so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life." See ATONEMENT—RECONCILIATION.

SIN, WILDERNESS OF, a district of country extending from the Gulf of Suez on the west, to the commencement of the Sinai range on the east. This, says the editor of the Pictorial Bible, is still a desolate wilderness, but more or less hilly and rocky, with valleys of various dimensions, but generally sandy or stony, strewn with the bones of camels, generally without plants or herbage, and also without water, except in the rainy season, when the valleys are traversed by the torrents that descend from the mountains. This wilderness was the tenth station at which the Israelites arrived, exactly a month after they had left Egypt. Here they murmured for bread, and the Lord sent manna, which he continued with them until they reached the promised land.

SINAI, one of a chain of mountains in Arabia Petræa, on which God gave the law to Moses. This range of mountains, now called El Tih, run from east to west along the breadth of the peninsula of Sinai. This mountainous region is comprehended within a diameter of about forty miles. Its general aspect is singularly wild and dreary, being composed almost entirely of naked rocks and craggy precipices, interspersed with narrow sandy defiles, nearly destitute of vegetation. Sir F. Henniker describes it as a sea of desolation. "It would seem," says he, "as if Arabia Petræa had once been an ocean of lava, and while its waves were running mountains high, it was commanded suddenly to stand still!" Mr Stephens says, "Among all the stupendous works of nature, not a place can be selected more fitted for the exhibition of almighty power. I have stood upon the summit of the giant Ætna, and looked over the clouds floating beneath it, upon the bold scenery of Sicily, and the distant mountains of Calabria; upon the top of Vesuvius, and looked down upon the waves of lava, and the ruined and half-recovered cities at its foot; but they are nothing compared with the terrific solitudes and bleak majesty of Sinai." The two most elevated and conspicuous summits of this peninsular group adjoin each other, and are respectively called Djebel Kate-riner, Mount St Catherine, and Djebel Mousa, or Mount of Moses; the former being for the most part locally identified with the Horeb of Scripture, and the latter with Sinai. Professor Robinson supposes a third still lower eminence, in the same vicinity, to be the true Horeb; while the editors of the "Modern Traveller" and the "Pictorial Bible" contend for Mount Serbal, several miles' distance, as the genuine Sinai.

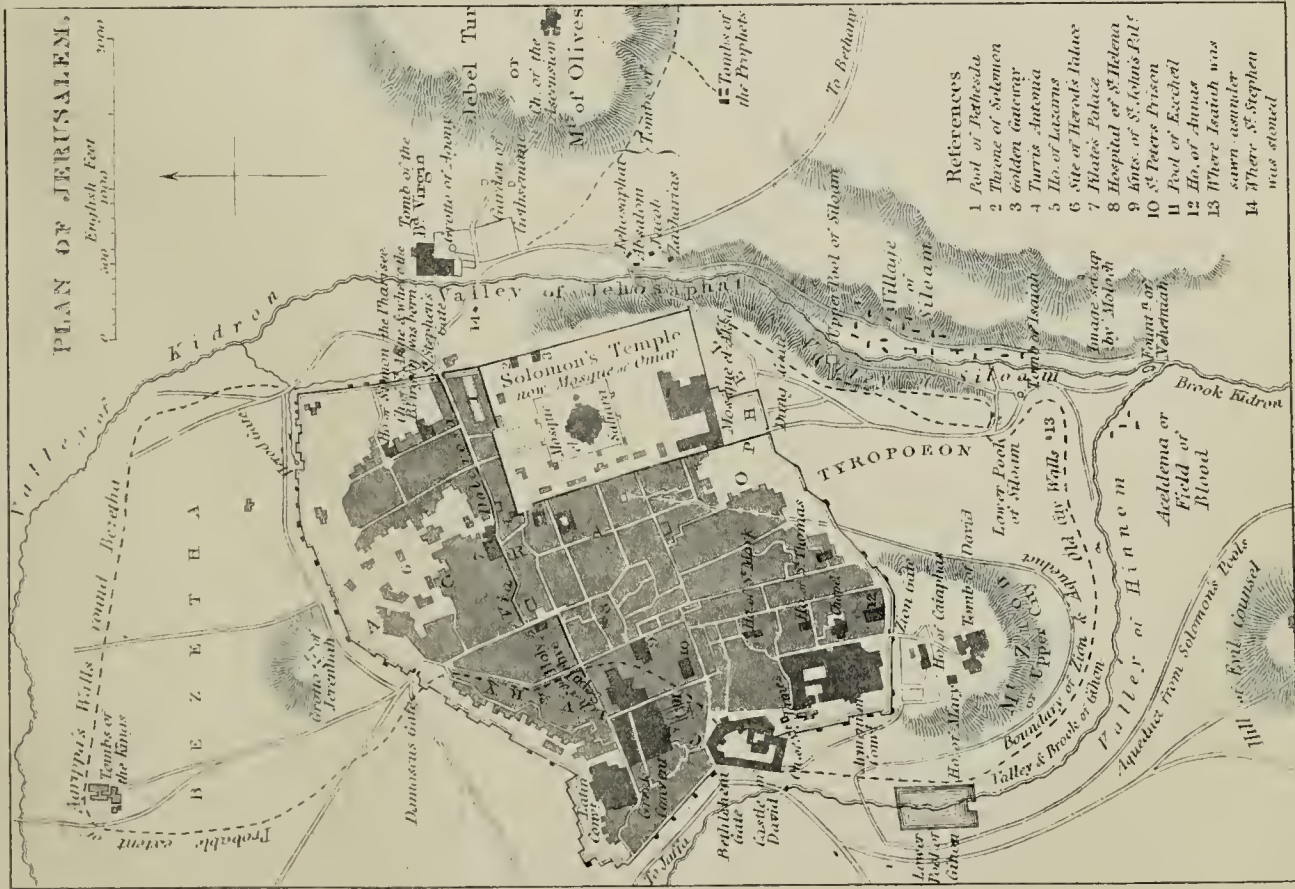

SINCERITY, freedom from hypocrisy or dissimulation. The Latin word sincerus, from which our English word sincere is derived, is composed of sine and cera, and signifies without wax, as pure honey,

THE DESERT OF SINAI.

"That great and terrible Wilderness"*

DEUT VIII 15

which is not mixed with any wax; thus denoting that sincerity is a pure and upright principle. The Greek word helekrineia translated sincerity in 2 Cor. i. 12, signifies properly a judgment made of things by the light and splendour of the sun; as, in traffic, men hold up goods they are buying to the light of the sun, to see if they can discover any defect in them. Thus, those who are truly sincere can bear the test of light, and are not afraid of having their principles and practices examined by it. This word, however, like many others, is abused, and often becomes a subterfuge for the ungodly and the indolent, who think that their practice is nothing; but that sincerity, or a good heart, as they call it, is all in all. But such deceive themselves, for a tree is known by its fruits; and true godly sincerity will evidence itself by serious inquiry, impartial examination, desire of instruction, unprejudiced judgment, devotedness of spirit, and uniformity of conduct.

SINGING, an ordinance of divine worship, in which we express our joy in God, and gratitude for his mercies. It has always been a branch both of natural and revealed religion, in all ages and periods of time. It was a part of the worship of the heathens. It was practised by the people of God before the giving of the law of Moses (Exod. xv.); also under the ceremonial law. Under the gospel dispensation it is particularly enjoined. Col. iii. 16; Eph. v. 19. It was practised by Christ and his apostles (Matt. xxvi. 30), and in the earliest times of Christianity. The praises of God ought to be sung privately in the family, but chiefly in the house of God; and should be attended to with reverence, sincerity, joy, gratitude, and with the understanding. 1 Cor. xiv. 15. It is to be lamented, however, that this ordinance has not that attention paid to it which it deserves. That great divine, President Edwards, observes, that "as it is the command of God that all should sing, so all should make conscience of learning to sing, as it is a thing that cannot be decently performed at all without learning. Those, therefore (where there is no natural inability), who neglect to learn to sing, live in sin, as they neglect what is necessary in order to their attending one of the ordinances of God's worship." We leave those who are wilfully dumb in God's house to consider this pointed remark. See MUSIC—PSALMODY.

SINIM (Isa. xlix. 12), is thought by Mr Taylor, Dr Morison, and other writers, to be China, which Dr Hagar, in two very learned tracts, has attempted to prove was well known to the Greeks in early ages; and that the trade in silk was the life and soul of their intercourse with it. See NOAH.

SION, one of the hills on which Jerusalem stood, the other being, as Josephus thinks, Mount Moriah. The following description is given by Mr Wylie: "This hill, formerly the residence of the ark, and the site of the palace of the kings of Judah, is now in part under cultivation, and in its usual state may be seen covered with barley, verifying Micah's prediction that Zion should be ploughed as a field. The whole of Mount Zion was within the ancient Jerusalem; the walls of the modern city are drawn over its summit, leaving thus the half of it unenclosed. On that part of the hill which is without the walls is a Turkish mosque, standing, as is believed, on the site of the chamber in which Christ celebrated the first supper: in the interior of the mosque is shown the tomb of David. Whether this be his tomb or not, it is possible that the resting-place of the 'man according to God's own heart' may be somewhere on this mount: for we are expressly told, that instead of being interred outside the walls, as is usual in oriental cities, 'David slept with his fathers, and was buried in the city of David.' The city of David was built on Mount Zion."

SISERA. See JABEL.

SISTER, in the style of the Hebrews, has equal latitude as brother. (See BROTHER.) In the law (Lev. xviii. 18) it is forbidden to take to wife the sister of a wife: literally, "Thou shalt not take a wife unto her sister to afflict her;" as if meaning to forbid polygamy. In the Gospels, the brothers and sisters of Jesus Christ are his cousins, children of the sisters of the Virgin Mary. Matt. xiii. 56; Mark vi. 3.

SITTING. See BED—EATING—ACCUBATION.

SIVAN, the name of a Hebrew month; the third of the holy year, the ninth of the civil year. See MONTH.

SLANDER, according to Dr Barrow, is uttering false speeches against our neighbour, to the prejudice of his fame, safety, welfare; and that out of malignity, vanity, rashness, ill nature, or bad design. The principal kinds of slander are these:—(1.) Charging others with acts they are not guilty of. (2.) Affixing scandalous names and odious characters which they deserve not. (3.) Aspersing a man's actions with foul names, importing that they proceed from evil principles, or tend to bad ends, when it doth not, or cannot appear. (4.) Perverting a man's words or acts disadvantageously by affected misconstruction. (5.) Partial or lame representation of men's discourse or practice, suppressing some part of the truth, or concealing some circumstances which ought to be explained. (6.) Instilling sly suggestions which create prejudice in the hearers. (7.) Magnifying and aggravating the faults of others. (8.) Imputing to our neighbour's practice, judgment, or profession, evil consequences which have no foundation in truth.

SLAVERY, compulsory servitude. Slavery has been defined by Dr Paley to be "the obligation to labour for the benefit of the master, without the contract or consent of the servant." This condition seems to have existed from very remote antiquity. "Five of the Canaanitish tribes were the vassals of Chedarlaomer for twelve years, and obtained their liberty by an open revolt. Abram was an inhabitant of Assyria, and at the time of his recovery of Lot from Chedarlaomer and his allies, he was the proprietor of several hundred 'trained servants, born in his house.' From the predatory nature of their wars, it is probable that the condition of slaves in Assyria was not essentially different from the condition of the same class of men in the surrounding countries. The manner in which slaves were treated among the Babylonians, the Persians, and other nations of remote antiquity, was such as 'excluded them from every privilege of society, and almost every blessing of life.' They were dependent on the caprice of imperious masters, and were unprotected by the laws. They might be tortured, maimed, or put to death, at the arbitrary will of their masters. In these early ages, in times of great public calamity, men often sold themselves for slaves. While Joseph was the prime minister of Pharaoh, and during the seven years' famine, the people came to him and said, 'Buy us and our land for bread, and we will be servants unto Pharaoh.' Joseph granted their request, and said unto them, 'Behold I have bought you this day, and your land for Pharaoh.' Before this time Egypt was a limited monarchy. The people were free, and had lands independent of the crown. Now they became vassals, feudatory tenants, and the government despotic. The condition of slaves in Egypt we know was sufficiently abject and degraded. We need no greater evidence of this than Pharaoh's treatment of the children of Israel, and more especially his cruel order to the midwives. Nor were they enemies, nor the children of enemies, who were subjected to this severe servitude, but the descendants of a family who had been the saviours of Egypt, and the builders up of royal power." Slavery existed extensively among the Jews even down to the days of the apostles. Tacitus mentions that there were 20,000 slaves in the army of Simon when Vespasian was marching against Jerusalem. The Mosaic law refers to the following ways in which a Hebrew might lose his liberty: In extreme poverty he might sell himself, Lev. xx. 39; a father might sell his children, Exod. xxi. 7; insolvent debtors became the slaves of their creditors, 2 Kings iv. 1; a thief might be sold in payment of the fine exacted from him by law, Exod. xxii. 3; prisoners of war were slaves, Deut. xx. 14; Numb. xxxi. 18, 35. In these seven ways slavery might originate among the Hebrews. The gospel of Christ is inimical in its whole genius and spirit to slavery, but it makes no sudden and violent inroads upon civil institutions of any kind. Christianity regenerates society as well as individuals, by a secret, gradual, but effective process.

SLIME. See BITUMEN.

SLING. See ARMS, MILITARY.

SMELL. See SCENT.

SMITE, to strike. The word is often used for to kill. To smite with the tongue, is to load with injuries and reproaches, with scandalous reflections. To smite the thigh, denotes indignation, trouble, astonishment. Jer. xxxi. 19.

SMOKE. In allusion to the burning of Sodom, the smoke of a land, or people, is said to rise up to heaven, when their judgments are conspicuous and terrible.

SMYRNA, an ancient city of Ionia in Asia Minor. It is of great commercial importance. It was at one time destroyed by the Lydians, but afterwards rebuilt, and at an early period in the history of Christianity it was not only a flourishing city, but the seat of a Christian church, being one of the seven churches in Asia mentioned in the book of Revelations, ii. 8-10. The martyr Polycarp was bishop or pastor of the church at Smyrna. This city was destroyed by an earthquake in A.D. 177, but it was afterwards rebuilt by Marcus Aurelius, the Roman emperor. Dr Wilson informs us that the present population of Smyrna, which the Turks call Esmir, is roughly calculated at 150,000, the great mass of them being Moslems; but the Christians are decidedly on the increase, chiefly through the labours of the American missionaries, who make Smyrna one of their head-quarters.

SNAIL. This word occurs only once in Scripture, viz., in Ps. lviii. 8: "As a snail which melteth, let every one of them pass away; like the untimely birth of a woman, that they may not see the sun." The Septuagint translates the word in this passage, which in our version is rendered "snail," by "bees' wax." But the connection in which the word is used seems rather to sanction the rendering of our authorized version.

SO, a king of Egypt, who was summoned by Hoshea, the last king of Israel, to help him in fighting against Shalmaneser, king of Assyria. 2 Kings xvii. 4.

SOAP. This word occurs twice in sacred Scripture. Thus Jer. ii. 22: "For though thou wash thee with nitre, and take thee much soap, yet thine iniquity is marked before me, saith the Lord God;" and, Mal. iii. 2: "But who may abide the day of his coming? and who shall stand when he appeareth? for he is like a refiner's fire, and like fullers' soap." The precise nature of the purifying substance here referred to does not appear, though the writer of the article BORITH in Kitto's Cyclopædia supposes it to refer to the ashes of plants, particularly those growing on the sea shore, as yielding carbonate of soda.

SOBRIETY, freedom from any inordinate passion. It is necessary on all occasions—when we read, when we hear, when we pray, when we converse, when we form schemes, when we pursue them, when we prosper, when we fail. Sobriety is necessary for all descriptions of character; it is necessary for the young and for the old, for the rich and the poor, for the wise and for the illiterate;—all need to "be sober."

The necessity of sobriety is especially obvious:—(1.) In our inquiries after truth, as opposed to presumption. (2.) In our pursuit of this world, as opposed to covetousness. (3.) In the use and estimate of the things of this world, as opposed to excess. (4.) In trials and afflictions, as opposed to impatience. (5.) In forming our judgment of others, as opposed to censoriousness. (6.) In speaking of one's self, as opposed to egotism.

Many motives might be urged to this exercise, as, (1.) The general language of Scripture. 1 Pet. v. 8; Phil. iv. 5; Tit. ii. 12; 1 Pet. iv. 7. (2.) Our profession as Christians. (3.) The example of Jesus Christ. (4.) The near approach of death and judgment. See DRUNKENNESS—MODERATION.

SOCINIANISM, the doctrines of the Socinians. In the middle of the sixteenth century the divinity of the Lord Jesus Christ began to be attacked, a sect having arisen which maintained that a plurality of persons in the Deity could not be proved from Scripture, though they acknowledged his divine origin, and professed to entertain feelings of the highest esteem for the man Jesus. It was in consequence of the labours of Laelius Socinus, and still more of his nephew Faustus Socinus, that the scattered friends of these principles were united into a distinct body, and adopted the name of Socinians. They were also called Racovians, from the Polish town Racow, where they published a catechism in which they laid down their principles. In that catechism strange views in reference to the nature of the Godhead are developed. Thus the immensity of God is defined to be "the highest perfection of his dominion, power, wisdom, and providence, extending to all things, and excluded from no place." It is observable that nothing is said in this definition of the immensity of his essence. Some of the elder Socinians appear to have fallen into the gross error of representing God as possessed of a bodily shape; and Biddle, against whom Dr Owen wrote his "Vindiciæ Evangelicæ," maintained that "God glistens with glory, and is resident in a certain place of the heavens, so that we may distinguish between his right and left hand by bodily sight." The doctrine of the Socinians in regard to the person of Christ is, that Jesus Christ was a mere man, the son of Joseph and Mary, who was commissioned by God to teach mo-

ality and to reveal clearly a future state, and that having sealed his testimony with his blood, he rose from the grave to give us the hope of immortality. They deny that Adam was the federal head of his posterity, and maintain that he acted for himself alone, and that the effects of his fall terminated upon himself. The elder Socinians taught, as we find in the Racovian Catechism, that Christ was ignorant at first of the doctrine which he was to teach, and before he entered upon his ministry was taken up into heaven, where he received all necessary instructions. They also held that Christ, when he appeared, perfected the moral law, which they alleged was imperfect before his coming. In reference to the sacrifice of Christ, the following summary of their doctrine is given by Dr Dick. They teach, he tells us, "that Jesus Christ is called a Priest, but is not such in reality; that he receives this title on account of some resemblance between what he does, and the ministration of the priests under the law; that he is a priest in the same metaphorical sense in which all Christians are said to be priests; and that his priesthood solely consists in the good offices which he performs towards us, and on our account. He properly entered upon it when he ascended to heaven, and received power from his Father to assist men in working out their salvation; his death upon the cross was no part of his duty, but merely a preparation for the services of the heavenly sanctuary; his priestly office is virtually the same with the kingly, both implying authority and ability to bestow blessings upon men, and differing only in this respect, that as a king he has power to help us, and as a priest he is willing. This was the doctrine of the elder Socinians, and has been generally adopted by their successors." Many Socinians believe that Christ did not offer his sacrifice upon earth but in heaven, by appearing before God in the body in which he suffered on the cross. Their own account of the design of the death of Christ is as follows:—"The great object of the mission and death of Christ was to give the fullest proof of a state of retribution, in order to supply the strongest motives to virtue; and the making an express regard to the doctrine of a resurrection to immortal life the principal sanction of the laws of virtue is an advantage peculiar to Christianity. By this advantage the gospel reforms the world, and the remission of sin is consequent on reformation; for although there are some texts in which the pardon of sin seems to be represented as dispensed in consideration of the sufferings, the merits, the resurrection, the life or the obedience of Christ, we cannot but conclude, upon a careful examination, that all those views of it are partial representations, and that, according to the plain general tenor of Scripture, the pardon of sin is in reality always dispensed by the free mercy of God, upon account of man's personal virtue, a penitent, upright heart, and a reformed exemplary life, without regard to the sufferings or merit of any being whatever." The same opinion is generally prevalent among Socinians which was held by Pelagius and his fellows, who denied original sin, and maintained that we came into the world as innocent as Adam was before the fall; that we have free will, and may do good if we please. The whole errors of the corrupt system of doctrine which bears the name of Socinianism have their foundation in the rationalistic views which they entertain, that the authority of Scripture is subordinate to that of reason, and its interpretation made to depend on the so-called truths of reason; and that Scripture cannot contain any thing that is either incomprehensible or above reason. This body has numerous adherents in some parts of England, chiefly in the manufacturing districts, while in Scotland it has the greatest difficulty in maintaining even the slightest footing.

SODOM, one of the five cities of the plain, which was destroyed by fire and brimstone from heaven, because of its wickedness. Gen. xix. The valley in which this and the other cities stood was very fruitful—so rich and beautiful that the sacred historian compares it to the garden of Paradise. Not only were the cities destroyed, but the country was, in a manner, blotted out of the map of Palestine, by converting it into a deep lake called the Salt or Dead Sea, or Lake of Sodom. To this awful catastrophe the sacred writers often allude in their denunciations of the divine judgments against apostate Israel.

SOLFIDIANS, those who rest on faith alone for salvation, without any connection with works, or who judge themselves to be Christ's because they believe they are.

SOLOMON, son of David by Bathsheba. He was born B.C. 1033. He was the subject of a remarkable prediction delivered to his father David before his birth, 1 Chron. xxii. 9, 10: "Behold, a son shall be born to thee, who shall be a man of rest; and I will give him rest from all his enemies round about: for his name shall be Solomon, and I will give peace and quietness unto Israel in his days. He shall build an house for my name; and he shall be my son, and I will be his father; and I will establish the throne of his kingdom over Israel for ever." No sooner was he born than we are told, "The Lord loved him. And he sent by the hand of Nathan the prophet; and he called his name Jedidiah, because of the Lord." 2 Sam. xii. 24, 25. He was appointed to the throne by the direction of God; and on that ground David caused him to be publicly consecrated and admitted to the regal office before his own death. His accession to the throne was opposed by his elder brother Adonijah, but soon defeated; and the kingdom was fully established in the hands of Solomon. Shortly after he succeeded to the kingdom, he held a solemn religious service at Gibeon. On that occasion, the Lord appeared to him in the visions of the night, and promised to grant him whatever he would ask. The young king asked wisdom and understanding, and the petition so pleased the Lord, that he not only gave him pre-eminent wisdom, but riches and honour in addition. The reign of Solomon is celebrated for its peace and prosperity, as well as for the wisdom and equity of his administration. One grand object to which he directed his attention was the building of the temple, and when he had completed the splendid edifice, he solemnly dedicated it to God. The king of Israel continued to increase in power, wealth, and magnificence, the envy and admiration of all the surrounding kingdoms. But towards the close of his reign he was guilty of melancholy apostasy. "For it came to pass, when Solomon was old, that his wives turned his heart away after other gods: and his heart was not perfect with the Lord his God, as was the heart of David his father." 1 Kings xi. 4. His backsliding brought distress upon himself. "The Lord was angry with him," and by an immediate revelation he testified his displeasure and his determination to rend a large share of the kingdom from the hands of his successor. Various temporal calamities also embittered the decline of his life. Yet it is generally supposed that he died a true penitent. The strongest proof of his repentance is the book of Ecclesiastes, which was evidently written in his old age, after a long experience of sin and folly. The writings of Solomon appear to have been numerous; but the only remaining works are Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, and Canticles, the two first characterised by practical wisdom, and the last by warm devotional feeling.

SOLOMON'S SONG. See CANTICLES.

SON, a word used in several analogical senses, both in the Old and New Testaments. It denotes—(1.) The immediate offspring. (2.) Grandson; so Laban is called son of Nahor (Gen. xxix. 5), whereas he was his grandson, being the son of Bethuel. Gen. xxiv. 29. Mephibosheth is called son of Saul, though he was the son of Jonathan, son of Saul. 2 Sam. xix. 24. (3.) Remote descendants; so we have the sons of Israel, many ages after the primitive ancestor. (4.) Son-in-law: "There is a son born to Naomi." Ruth iv. 17. (5.) Son by adoption, as Ephraim and Manasseh to Jacob. Gen. xlviii. (See ADOPTION.) (6.) Son by nation; sons of the East. 1 Kings iv. 30; Job i. 3. (7.) Son by education; that is, a disciple. Eli calls Samuel his son. 1 Sam. iii. 6. Solomon calls his disciple his son, in the Proverbs, often; and we read of the sons of the prophets (1 Kings xx. 35, et al.)—that is, those under a course of instruction for ministerial service. In nearly the same sense a convert is called son. 1 Tim. i. 2; Tit. i. 4; Philem. 10; 1 Cor. iv. 15; 1 Pet. v. 13. (8.) Son by disposition and conduct, as sons of Belial. Judg. xix. 22; 1 Sam. ii. 12.

SON OF GOD, a term applied in the Scriptures not only to magistrates and saints, but more particularly to Jesus Christ. Christ, says Bishop Pearson, has a fourfold right to this title. (1.) By generation, as begotten of God. Luke i. 35. (2.) By commission, as sent by him. John x. 34–36. (3.) By resurrection, as the first-born. Acts xiii. 32, 33. (4.) By actual possession, as heir of all. Heb. i. 2, 5.

But, besides these four, many think that he is called the Son of God in such a way and manner as never any other was, is, or can be, because of his own divine nature, he being the true, proper, and natural Son of God, begotten by him before all worlds. John iii. 16; Rom. viii. 3; 1 John iv. 7. See GENERATION, ETERNAL.

SONG. Songs were generally used on occasions of thanksgiving and triumph; such as the song of Moses at the deliverance of the Israelites from Pharaoh and his host, the song of Deborah, and others. A few, however, were sung on occasions of sorrow; such as that of David on Saul and Jonathan, the Lamentations of Jeremiah, and the song he composed on the death of Josiah.

SOOTHSAYER. one who pretended, from different omens, such as the flight of birds, the inspection of the entrails of animals, &c., to foretell future events.

SORCERY. Magic, conjuration. See CHARMS—WITCHCRAFT.

SOREK, a village of the Philistines, where Delilah resided. Judg. xvi. 4.

SORROW, uneasiness or grief, arising from the privation of some good we actually possessed. It is the opposite to joy.

Though sorrow may be allowable under a sense of sin, and when involved in troubles, yet we must beware of an extreme. Sorrow, indeed, becomes sinful and excessive when it leads us to slight our mercies; causes us to be insensible to public evils; when it diverts us from duty; so oppresses our bodies as to endanger our lives; sours the spirit with discontent, and makes us inattentive to the precepts of God's Word, and advice of our friends. In order to moderate our sorrows, we should consider that we are under the direction of a wise and merciful Being; that he permits no evil to come upon us without a gracious design; that he can make our troubles sources of spiritual advantage; that he might have afflicted us in a far greater degree; that, though he has taken some, yet he has left many other comforts; that he has given many promises of relief; that he has supported thousands in as great troubles as ours; finally, that the time is coming when he will wipe away all tears, and give to them that love him a crown of glory that fadeth not away. See AFFLICTION—RESIGNATION.

SOUL (Heb. nepesh—Greek, psuchē), the human mind—that vital, active principle in man, which perceives, remembers, reasons, loves, hopes, fears, compares, desires, resolves, adores, imagines, and aspires after immortality.

Various, indeed, have been the opinions of philosophers concerning its substance. The Epicureans thought it a subtle air, composed of atoms, or primitive corpuscles. The Stoics maintained it was a flame, or portion of heavenly light. The Cartesians make thinking the essence of the soul. The sacred writers themselves use the word with some latitude; sometimes for the vegetative; sometimes for the sensitive; sometimes, and indeed most frequently, for the rational principle, or spirit, originally created in the image of God, and formed to find its happiness in fellowship with him. In this superior principle the human nature properly and distinctively consists; and hence it is that in Scripture the word soul is so often used to express the whole man. This mode of speaking is never applied to any of the inferior animals—a distinction which interpreters have not properly observed. Hence, also, we see, by comparing Matt. xvi. 26 with Luke ix. 25, that our Lord uses the phrase, "lose his own soul," as equivalent to a man's losing "himself," or being "cast away." In this general sense, the word is used in the New Testament about thirty times, and in the specific sense of mind, distinct from the body, about fifty times. The rational soul is simple, uncompounded, and immaterial—that is, not composed of organized matter. (See MATERIALISM.)

The immortality of the soul may be argued from its vast capacities, boundless desires, great improvements, dissatisfaction with the present state, and desire of some kind of religion. It is also argued from the consent of all nations, the consciousness that men have of sinning, the sting of conscience, the justice and providence of God. How far these arguments are conclusive we will not say; but the safest, and, in fact, the only sure ground to go upon to prove this doctrine is the Word of God, where we at once see it clearly established. Matt. x. 28, xxv. 46; Dan. xii. 2; 2 Tim. i. 10; 1 Thess. iv. 17, 18; John x. 28.

SOUL, CARE OF. See CARE.

SOUL-SLEEPERS, a term sometimes applied to Materialists, because they admit no intermediate state between death and the resurrection. See MATERIALISM.

SOUND—(1.) Whole, healthy. Luke xv. 27. (2.) True and substantial. Prov. ii. 7, iii. 21. (3.) Free from error, pure, salutary. 2 Tim. i. 7; Tit.

i. 9. "From the sole of the foot even to the crown of the head, there is no soundness; but wounds and bruises and putrefying sores, that have not been closed, nor bound up, nor mollified with ointment." In the whole state, governors and governed, small and great, country and city, there is nothing but sin unrepented of, and miseries unredressed. Isa. i. 6.

SOUND—(1.) To make a noise with a trumpet, or otherwise. Neh. iv. 18. (2.) To examine the depth of a sea or pond. Acts xxvii. 28. (3.) To search out one's intentions and designs. 1 Sam. xx. 12. The sounding of God's bowels is the discovery of his compassion, mercy, and love. Isa. lxiii. 15. The gospel is called a joyful sound, in allusion to the proclamations at the Jewish feasts, or at the year of release or jubilee, by the sound of trumpets. It is preached far and wide, reaches men's hearts, and brings them the good tidings of peace, salvation, and happiness. Rom. x. 18; Ps. lxxxix. 15.

SOUTH. Sheba, Egypt, and Arabia, were the south in respect of Canaan. Matt. xii. 42; Dan. viii. 9, xi. 5, &c.; Numb. xiii. 29; Obad. 19. The south part of Judea, or Canaan, is called the south. Ezek. xx. 46; Gen. xiii. 1, 3.

SOUTHCOTIANS, the followers of Joanna Southcot, a well-known modern fanatic, in England. When a young woman, living in service at Exeter, she persuaded herself that she held converse with the devil, and communion with the Holy Ghost, by whom she pretended to be inspired. A Dissenting minister faithfully warned her of the delusion; but some clergymen in the Establishment giving credit to her claim, confirmed her in her pretensions.

In 1792, she assumed the character of a prophetess, and of the woman in the wilderness, and began to give sealed papers to her followers, which were called her seals, and which were to protect both from the judgments of the present and a future life; and, strange as it must appear, thousands fell into the snare, and placed as much confidence in her certificates, as if they had been issued by the pope himself.

Her predictions were delivered both in humble prose and doggerel rhyme; and related, besides some personal threatenings against her opponents, to the denunciation of judgments on the surrounding nations, and a promise of the speedy approach of the millennium.

SOVEREIGNTY OF GOD, is his power and right of dominion over his creatures, especially such as are guilty, to dispose and determine them as seemeth him good. Rom. ix. 14-29, xi. 33-36; 1 Cor. i. 21-31, iv. 7; Matt. xi. 25-30; John vi. 37-40. This attribute is evidently demonstrated in the systems of creation, providence, and grace; and may be considered as absolute, universal, and everlasting. Dan. iv. 35; Eph. i. 11. See DOMINION—GOVERNMENT—POWER—WILL OF GOD.

SOWING. In Palestine the usual period for commencing to sow was towards the end of October; it was not, however, too late to sow wheat in December; while January and even February was soon enough for the barley. The autumn rains cease towards the end of September, and the weather being for a month about that time of a favourable description, the opportunity is eagerly embraced for ploughing and sowing the ground. In the East, there being no enclosures, it is not uncommon for a beaten highway to pass through the midst of a field. Hence the sower often dropped seeds by the wayside, Matt. xiii. 4; and being thus exposed upon the surface of the common road, they were sure to be either trodden under foot by the passengers, or devoured by the birds. The "sowing beside all waters," probably refers to the sowing of rice on low grounds which have been flooded. In illustration of the sending thither the feet of the ox and the ass, Sir Gardner Wilkinson mentions that the ancient Egyptians, after throwing the seed upon the surface, drove a number of cattle, asses, pigs, sheep, or goats into the field to tread in the grain.

SPAN, a measure of three handbreadths, or nearly eleven inches. Exod. xxviii. 16. God's spanning, or measuring out the heavens, imports how easily he knows and governs the heavens, and all their contents. Isa. xl. 12, xlviii. 13.

SPARROW (tsephur—Gen. vii. 14, and afterwards frequently strouthion—Matt. x. 29; Luke xii. 6, 7), a little bird everywhere known. The Hebrew word is used not only for a sparrow, but for all sorts of clean birds, or for those the use of which was not forbidden by the law. That the sparrow is not intended in Ps. cii. 7, is evident from several circumstances; for that is intimated to be a bird of night, one that is both solitary and mournful; none of which characteristics is applicable to the sparrow, which rests by night, is gregarious and cheerful. It seems rather to mean a bird melancholy and drooping, much like one confined in a cage. See SWALLOW.

SPEECH. See LANGUAGE.

SPICE, SPICERY, any aromatic drug possessed of hot and pungent qualities, as ginger, pepper, nutmeg, cinnamon, cloves, cassia, frankincense, calamus, myrrh, &c. With spices the ancients seasoned their flesh (Ezek. xxiv. 10), gave their wine what flavour they pleased (Cant. viii. 2), perfumed their beds and clothes (Esth. ii. 12; Prov. vii. 17; Ps. xlv. 8), and seasoned and embalmed their dead bodies. Mark xvi. 1; 2 Chron. xvi. 14; Jer. xxxiv. 5. It seems they also burnt heaps of spices to honour the burial of their kings. The Arabians traded in carrying spices to Egypt, Gen. xxxvii. 25. The graces of saints are compared to spices; they season, preserve, and purify nations and Churches. Cant. iv. 12-14.

SPIDER (acabish—Job viii. 14; Isa. lix. 5), an insect well known, remarkable for the thread which it spins, with which it forms a web of curious texture, but so frail that it is exposed to be broken and destroyed by the slightest accident. To the slenderness of this filmy workmanship Job compares the hope of the wicked. This, says Dr Good, was "doubtless a proverbial allusion; and so exquisite, that it is impossible to conceive any figure that can more fully describe the utter vanity of the hopes and prosperity of the wicked."

"Deceiving bliss! in bitter shame it ends;
His prop a cobweb, which an insect rends."

So Isaiah says: "They weave the web of the spider; of their webs no garment shall be made; neither shall they cover themselves with their works."

SPIKENARD (nard). By this was meant a highly aromatic plant growing in the Indies, called "nardostachys" by Dioscorides and Galen; whence was made the very valuable extract, or unguent, or favourite perfume, used at the ancient baths and feasts. Mark (xiv. 3) mentions "ointment of spikenard very precious," which is said to be worth more than three hundred denarii; and John (xii. 3) mentions a pound of ointment of spikenard, very costly; the house was filled with the odour of the ointment; it was worth three hundred denarii. It is not to be supposed that this was a Syrian production, but the true "atar" of Indian spikenard—an unguent containing the very essence of the plant, and brought at a great expense from a remote country.

SPINOSISM. See PANTHEISM.

SPIRIT (Heb. ruach, Gr. pneuma), an incorporeal being or intelligence; in which sense God is said to be a Spirit, as are angels, and the human soul. (See SPIRITUALISTS.)

It is said (Acts xxiii. 8) that the Sadducees denied the existence of angels and spirits. Christ appearing to his disciples, said to them (Luke xxiv. 39), "Handle me, and see; for a spirit hath not flesh and bones, as ye see me have." Good angels are called "ministering spirits" (Heb. i. 14); and in the Gospel the devils are often called "unclean spirits," "evil spirits," "spirits of darkness," &c.

SPIRIT, HOLY. See HOLY GHOST.

SPIRITUALITY OF GOD is his immateriality, or being without body. It expresses an idea (says Dr Paley) made up of a negative part and of a positive part. The negative part consists in the exclusion of some of the known properties of matter, especially of solidity, of the vis inertiae, and of gravitation. The positive part comprises perception, thought, will, power, action; by which last term is meant the origination of motion. See next article, and INCORPORALITY OF GOD.

SPIRITUALISTS, those who, in opposition to the materialists, believe that the soul is not the result of material organization, but is a spiritual principle, capable of subsisting and exercising its faculties, independent of the bodily organs.

The spirituality of God is demonstrable from the contradictions necessarily resulting from the contrary supposition. No two particles of matter can exist in the same point of space; wherever, therefore, we admit of a material creature, we exclude the possibility of a material Deity, if such an expression may be at all allowed. Indeed, it seems absurd, if not impossible, to attribute any of the proper attributes of Deity, whether self-existence, eternity, or immensity (to name no more), to a material being, however pure or refined such material existence may be supposed. Indeed, Dr Priestley himself, zealous as he is for the doctrine of materialism, does not contend for the materiality of God, but only of the human soul or mind. All Christian materialists admit a resurrection and future judgment. Those who maintain (with Spinoza) the materiality of God, are Atheists. The question may, therefore, be here confined to the spirituality of mind, or the existence of created spirits.

That God is capable of creating spirits inferior to himself will hardly be denied, since that would be setting bounds to infinite power and wisdom; nor is their existence denied on the ground of their impossibility, but on the supposed deficiency of evidence.

It is hardly possible, however, to admit the truth of the Scriptures, either of the Old Testament or the New, and deny the existence of angels, or spirits of an order superior to mankind; and if we once admit their existence, we can set no limit to their number or variety. They may, for aught we know, be far more numerous than human beings.

Equally impossible is it to say, that similar spirits may not be united to the human frame; or even spirits of a lower order, to the corporeal forms of meaner animals. The latter, however, is merely conjectural: the point here argued is the immateriality of the human mind. The essential quality of mind is consciousness, which is not pretended to be an essential quality of matter. The only question is, Whether consciousness may not result from some mechanism, or modification of matter? But under whatever form it can exist, it is but matter still; and whatever accidents of form, or colour, &c., be added thereto, whether round or square, long or short, white or black, &c., none of these can have the least tendency to thought or consciousness. Again, if consciousness result from matter, it must exist in it; it cannot communicate what it does not possess. Further, if consciousness reside in matter, it must be subject to the same law of divisibility, and so one conscious particle may be divided indefinitely, if not infinitely; and one man possessing a thousand conscious particles (in the brain, suppose) would possess a thousand consciousnesses.

The great objection to the doctrine of a soul or immaterial spirit, arises from certain anatomists who, on dissection, cannot discover any spiritual principle lodged in the human brain. But on this point, the existence of a soul in man, the Word of God is explicit.

SPIRITUAL-MINDEDNESS, that disposition implanted in the mind by the Holy Spirit, by which it is inclined to love, delight in, and attend to spiritual things. The spiritual-minded highly appreciate spiritual blessings, are engaged in spiritual exercises, pursue spiritual objects, are influenced by spiritual motives, and experience spiritual joys. To be spiritually-minded, says Paul, is life and peace. Rom. viii. 6.

SPONSORS, are those persons who, in the office of baptism, answer, or are sureties, for the persons baptized. See GODFATHERS.

SPORTS, BOOK OF, a book or declaration, drawn up by Bishop Morton, in the reign of King James I., to encourage recreations and sports on the Lord's-day.

SPOUSE. See BETROTHMENT—MARRIAGE.

STACTE, a drug, which was one of the four ingredients composing the sacred perfume. Exod. xxx. 34, 35. It is understood to be the prime kind of myrrh—myrrh distilling, dropping from the tree of its own accord, without incision. So Pliny, speaking of the trees whence myrrh is produced, says, "Before any incision is made, they exude of their own accord what is called stacte, to which no kind of myrrh is preferable."

STADIUM. See GAMES.

STAR. This word was applied among the Hebrews to all the heavenly bodies excepting the sun and moon. From the immense number of these luminaries, the Psalmist, speaking of the omniscience of God, says, Ps. cxlvii. 4, "He telleth the number of the stars; he calleth them all by their names." The Jews do not appear to have cultivated astronomy to any great extent, and there is only one allusion to astrology, where it is said, "The stars in their courses fought against Sisera." In prophetic language, as in Dan. viii. 10, and Rev. viii. 10, 11, a star is used to denote a person of eminent rank and station. In Rev. i. 20, the pastors of the seven churches of Asia are called seven stars; and in Jude 13, false teachers are described as "wandering stars." Jesus Christ is termed, in Num. xxiv. 17, the "star out of Jacob;" and, in allusion to this title, a well-known Jewish impostor in the reign of Adrian, who pretended to be the Messiah, called himself "Bar-Cocab," or "son of a star."

STATER, a piece of money of the value of one shekel. Matt. xvii. 27. See MONEY.

STEDFASTNESS. See CONSTANCY.

STEEL. This word, which occurs in Job xx. 24, and Jer. xv. 12, should be rendered copper and brass; for it is mentioned as a metal wholly distinct from iron.

STEPHANAS, a Christian of Corinth, whose pious family Paul baptized (probably about A.D. 52, 1 Cor. i. 16), and they "addicted themselves to the ministry of the saints." He also was forward to the service of the Church, and came to Paul at Ephesus. 1 Cor. xvi. 15, 17.

STEPHEN, the first Christian martyr, and from his name supposed to have been a Hellenist Jew. He was full of the Holy Ghost, and such was the power and success with which he preached, that he was arrested and dragged before the Sanhedrim. The charge brought against him was, that he had spoken against the law and the temple, founded apparently upon a misrepresentation of the tenor of his preaching. The nature of this accusation was calculated to unite the two leading parties in the Sanhedrim against him; and, upon receiving it, the guilty purpose of the council was not to be mistaken. The proto-martyr saw that he was to be the victim of the blinded and malignant spirit which had been exhibited by the Jews in every period of their history. But his serenity was unruffled; his confidence in the goodness of his cause, and in the promised support of his heavenly Master, imparted a divine tranquillity to his mind; and when the judges fixed their regards upon him, anxious to hear how he would shape his defence, the light that was within beamed forth upon his countenance, and "they saw his face as if it had been the face of an angel."

The effect of his defence upon his auditors was terrible. Conscience smitten, they united in wreaking their vengeance on the faithful denouncer of their guilt. They drowned his voice with their clamorous outcries, they stopped their ears against him, they gnashed on him with their teeth, and running upon him with one accord in a tumultuous manner, they carried him forth, and without waiting for the authority of law, he was stoned to death as a blasphemer.

STEWARD, one who manages the affairs, or superintends the household of another. Thus Eliezer was the steward of Abraham's house (Gen. xv. 2), Christian ministers are the stewards of God over his Church or family (Tit. i. 7; 1 Cor. iv. 1, 2), and believers are stewards of his gifts and graces, to dispense the benefits of them to the world. 1 Pet. iv. 10. "Now it is required of stewards," says Paul, "that a man be found faithful."

STOICS, a sect of ancient Grecian philosophers, whose founder was Zeno. Paul is said, Acts xvii. 18, to have encountered some of them in argument. The following brief views of their tenets, given by Mr Douglas, will suffice to explain their system:—

"There are two principles, the passive and the active—matter and the Deity, who is the universal fire. They carefully distinguished the Deity, however, from the nature of common fire. He was rather to be considered as the purest and most liquid ether. He is everlasting, incorruptible, and unbegotten. Though residing chiefly in the outward circumference, he yet pervades the world of grosser matter. Fate and the divine will are the same, and constitute the laws of the universe. Matter is subject to these laws—it rose from, and will again be resolved into the divine essence, during successive periods of inflammation, (ecpurosis.) The burning of the world is a favourite catastrophe with the Stoics, an abundant topic for eloquence, and theme for philosophy. The genuine stoic dogma appears to be, that the soul perishes with the body, but some are willing to assign it a longer date, and if it had lived a heroic life, placed it amid the stars, till the general conflagration should re-unite it, with all other finite existence, to the divine essence.

"In ethics the Stoics followed the outline of Potho, and held that virtue consisted in a life conformable to nature—a phrase which has been ridiculed for its vagueness, but which appears to have been imperfectly apprehended. The conformity to nature is twofold—the conformity to our own nature, which is reason; and conformity to the laws of external nature and to God, who is the reason, or logos, of the universe; and these two conformities coincide, for the soul of the wise man, similar in its nature to the Deity, reflects the image of the divine wisdom. The Stoics exhausted all their distinctions in logic, and left none for morals, except the sole distinction of virtue and vice,—according to them, the only real good and evil. They had formed to themselves the model of an imaginary wise man, who was not only to be above the weaknesses, but also above the wants of humanity. In order to resemble this ideal perfection, all that was required was to extirpate the passions. Having attained to apathy, and guided by reason alone, their wise man resembled the Deity in every thing but the duration of his existence. Nor was this difference of much moment, for as time is not necessary to virtue, so neither is it necessary to happiness, which is inseparably conjoined with virtue."

STONES. In early ages, these were used instead of inscriptions, pyramids, medals, or histories. Jacob and Laban raised such a monument on Mount Gilead, in memory of their covenant. Gen. xxxi. 46. Joshua erected one at Gilgal, of stones taken out of the Jordan, to preserve the memorial of his miraculous passage (Josh. iv. 5–7); and the Israelites beyond Jordan raised one on the banks of that river, as a testimony that they constituted but one nation with their brethren on the other side. Josh. xxii. 10.

"A heart of stone," may be understood several ways. Job (xli. 24), speaking of the behemoth, says his heart is as hard as stone, as impenetrable as an anvil; as if he had said, he is insensible to fear or affection. Ezekiel says (xi. 19, xxxvi. 26), the Lord will take away from his people the heart of stone, and give them a heart of flesh; that is, he will convert them, and inspire them with spiritual affections. "I will give him a white stone" (Rev. ii. 17); that is, I will give him full and public pardon and absolution. It is spoken in allusion to an ancient custom of delivering a white stone to such as they acquitted in judgment. They used likewise to give a white stone to such as conquered in the Grecian games. Nearly in the same sense, John the Baptist said (Matt. iii. 9), God was able to raise up to Abraham children from the stones of the desert.

Daniel, speaking of the kingdom of the Messiah, compares it to a small stone loosened from the mountain, by no mortal power, that struck upon the feet of the colossus which Nebuchadnezzar saw in his dream, and which afterwards filled the whole earth. Dan. ii. 34.

CORNER-STONE, or head stone of the corner, is that put at the angle of a building, whether at the foundation or on the top of the wall. Our Saviour, though rejected by the Jews, was the corner-stone of the Church (Ps. cxviii. 22), and the stone that binds and unites the believing Jews and Gentiles in the union of one faith. Acts iv. 11; Isa. xxviii. 16; Eph. ii. 20; 1 Pet. ii. 6; Matt. xxi. 42; Mark xii. 10; Luke xx. 17. The Hebrews sometimes gave the name of stone, or rock, to kings or princes, and also to God himself. See STUMBLING.

STONING was a punishment much in use among the Hebrews; and the rabbins reckon all crimes as being subject to it which the law condemns to death, without expressing the particular mode. They say, that when a man was condemned to death, he was led out of the city to the place of execution, and there exhorted to acknowledge and confess his fault. He was then stoned in one of two ways—either stones were thrown upon him till he died; or he was thrown headlong down a steep place, and a large stone rolled upon his body. To the latter mode it is supposed there is a reference in Matt. xxi. 44.

STORK (chasidah—Lev. xi. 19; Deut. xiv. 18; Job xxxix. 13; Ps. civ. 17; Jer. viii. 7; Zech. v. 9), a bird similar to the crane in size, has the same formation as to the bill, neck, legs, and body, but is rather more corpulent. The colour of the crane is ash and black; that of the stork is white and brown. The nails of its toes are also very peculiar; not being clawed like those of other birds, but flat like the nails of a man. It has a very long beak, and long red legs. It feeds upon serpents, frogs, and insects, and on this account might be reckoned by Moses among unclean birds. As it seeks for these in watery places, nature has provided it with long legs; and as it flies away, as well as the crane and heron, to its nest with its plunder, therefore its bill is strong and jagged, the sharp hooks of which enable it to retain its slippery prey.

It has long been remarkable for its love to its parents, which it never forsakes, but tenderly feeds and cherishes when they have become old, and unable to provide for themselves. The very learned and judicious Bochart has collected a variety of passages from the ancients, in which they testify this curious particular. Its very name in the Hebrew language, chasidah, signifies mercy or piety; and its English name is taken, if not directly, yet secondarily, through the Saxon, from the Greek word storgē, which is often used for natural affection.

It is a bird of passage, and is spoken of as such in Scripture: "The stork knoweth her appointed time." Jer. viii. 7. Bochart has collected several testimonies of the migration of storks. Ælian says, that in summer time they remain stationary, but at the close of autumn they repair to Egypt, Libya, and Ethiopia. "For about the space of a fortnight before they pass from one country to another," says Dr Shaw, "they constantly resort together, from all the adjacent parts, in a certain plain; and there forming themselves, once every day, into a 'douwanne,' or council (according to the phrase of these Eastern nations), are said to determine the exact time of their departure, and the place of their future abode." See SWALLOW.

STRANGER. In the law of Moses there are various laws laid down in reference to strangers, which were obviously designed to inculcate and encourage tenderness and humanity. Thus it was expressly enjoined, "Thou shalt not vex a stranger nor oppress him; for ye were strangers in the land of Egypt." The motive by which the command is here enforced could not fail to impress deeply the hearts of the Israelites. Of the same general character is the injunction to leave the "forgotten sheaf" in the field in the time of harvest; "not to go over the boughs of the olive-tree a second time;" nor twice glean the grapes of their vineyard;" but that what remained after the first gathering should be left for "the stranger, the fatherless, and the widow." Stranger among the Hebrews was equivalent to foreigner among us, and also implied one that was destitute of a home.

STRANGLE. Animals strangled had not the blood properly separated from the flesh, and were not eaten by the primitive Christians, among other reasons, to prevent offence to the Jewish converts. Acts xv. 20. See BLOOD.

STREETS. The streets in oriental towns are very narrow, and hence the chief places of resort are the corners of the streets. Our Lord, therefore, reproves the Pharisees for praying in these as being public places. The same practice is still observed among the Hindus, Mussulmans, and other Orientals.

STRIVE—(1.) To contend in desires, in words, or with the hands. Gen. xxvi. 20. (2.) To endeavour earnestly. Rom. xv. 20. (3.) To be given to strife and debate. 2 Tim. ii. 24.

God strives with men, when, by the revelation of his will, the convictions of his Spirit, and the dispensations of his providence, he checks their progress in sin. Gen. vi. 3. Men strive with God, when they resist the motions of his Spirit, condemn the offers of his grace, rebel against his laws, and oppose his providence by going on in their wickedness. Isa. xlv. 9; Job xxxiii. 13. They strive to enter in at the strait gate, when, in the careful and earnest use of God's ordinances, they study to receive Christ, and be created anew in him. Luke xiii. 24. Saints strive together in prayer, when, with the utmost earnestness, they jointly ask and plead for the bestowal of good things on ministers and others. Rom. xv. 30. They strive for the faith, and against sin, when they do or suffer to the uttermost to maintain and promote the honour of gospel truth, and to shun and oppose sin in themselves and others. Phil. i. 27; Heb. xii. 4.

STUMBLING, STONE OF. "We set out from Argos very early in the morning," says Hartley, "and were almost eleven hours in reaching Tripolitza. The road is, for the most part, dreary; leading over lofty and barren hills, the principal of which is Mount Parthenius. In England, where the roads are so excellent, we do not readily perceive the force and just application of the scriptural figures derived from a 'stone of stumbling, and a rock of offence' (Isa. viii. 14), and similar passages; but in the East, where the roads are, for the most part, nothing more than an accustomed track, the constant danger and impediment arising to travellers from stones and rocks fully explain the allusion."

To this also there is an allusion in Isa. lxiii. 13, where the prophet is describing the remarkable deliverance which God wrought out for his people in leading them out of Egypt: "That led them through the deep, as an horse in the wilderness, that they should not stumble?" And, again, we find an allusion of the same kind in Jer. vi. 21: "Therefore thus saith the Lord, Behold, I will lay stumbling-blocks before this people, and the fathers and the sons together shall fall upon them; the neighbour and his friend shall perish."

SUB-DEACON, an inferior minister, who anciently attended at the altar, prepared the sacred vessels, delivered them to the deacons in time of divine service, attended the doors of the church during communion service, went on the bishop's embassies with his letters, or messages to foreign Churches, and was invested with the first of the holy orders. They were so subordinate to the superior rulers of the Church, that, by a canon of the Council of Laodicea, they were forbidden to sit in the presence of a deacon without his leave.

SUBLAPSARIANS, also sometimes called INFALAPSARIANS, those who hold that God suffered the first man to fall into transgression without absolutely predetermining his fall; or that the decree of predestination regards man as fallen, by an abuse of that freedom which Adam had, into a state in which all were to be left to necessary and unavoidable ruin, who were not exempted from it by predestination. See SUPRALAPSARIANS.

SUBMISSION TO GOD implies an entire giving up of our understanding, will, and affections to him; or, as Dr Owen observes, it consists in—1. An acquiescence in his right and sovereignty. 2. An acknowledgment of his righteousness and wisdom. 3. A sense of his love and care. 4. A diligent application of ourselves to his mind and will. 5. Keeping our souls by faith and patience from weariness and despondency. 6. A full resignation to his will. See SORROW—RESIGNATION.

SUBSCRIPTION, CLERICAL. Subscription to articles of religion is required of the clergy of every Established Church, and of some Churches not established. But it has been a matter of dispute whether it answers any valuable purpose as to religion, however necessary as a test to loyalty. All language is more or less ambiguous, so that it is difficult always to understand the exact sense, or the animus imponentis, especially when creeds have been long established.

It is to be feared, however, that many subscribe merely for the sake of emolument; and though it be professedly ex animo, it is well known that it is not so in reality; for when any one appears to entertain conscientious scruples on the subject, he is told it is a thing of no consequence, but only a matter of form. How such will answer to the great Head of the Church, we must leave them to judge. They who think subscription to be proper, should remember that it approaches very near the solemnity of an oath, and it is not to be trifled with. "Great care," says Doddridge, "ought to be taken that we subscribe nothing that we do not firmly believe. If the signification of the words be dubious, and we believe either sense, and that sense in which we do believe them is as natural as the other, we may, consistently with integrity, subscribe them; or if the sense in which we do believe them be less natural, and we explain that sense, and that explication be admitted by the person requiring the subscription in his own right, there can be no just foundation for a scruple. Some have added, that, if we have reason to believe (though it is not expressly declared) that he who imposes the subscription does not intend that we should hereby declare our assent to those Articles, but only that we should pay a compliment to his authority, and engage ourselves not openly to contradict them, we may, in this case, subscribe what is most directly contrary to our belief; or that, if we declare our belief in any book, as, for instance, the Bible, it is to be supposed that we subscribe other articles only so far as they are consistent with that; because we cannot imagine that the law would require us to profess our belief of contrary propositions at the same time. But subscription upon these principles seems a very dangerous attack upon sincerity and public virtue, especially in those designed for public offices."

SUBSTITUTION, the doctrine of Christ's dying in the stead of his redeemed. See REDEMPTION.

SUCCOTH-BENOTH. Calmet speaks of Succoth-benoth as an idol set up in Samaria, by the men brought from Assyria (2 Kings xvii. 30); but Mr Taylor and other writers have shown it more probably to denote tabernacles or booths consecrated to one of the forms of Venus.

SUFFERINGS OF CHRIST. To form an idea of Christ's sufferings, we should consider the poverty of his birth, the reproach of his character, the pains of his body, the power of his enemies, the desertion of his friends, the weight of his people's sins, the slow, ignominious, and painful nature of his death, and the hidings of his Father's face. All these rendered his sufferings extremely severe; yet some heretics said that the sufferings of Christ were only in appearance, and not real! But, as Bishop Pearson observes, "If hunger and thirst, if revilings and contempt, if sorrows and agonies, if stripes and buffeting, if condemnation and crucifixion, be sufferings, Jesus suffered. If the infirmities of our nature, if the weight of our sins, if the malice of men, if the machinations of Satan, if the hand of God, could make him suffer, our Saviour suffered. If the annals of time, if the writings of the apostles, if the death of his martyrs, if the confession of Gentiles, if the scoffs of the Jews, be testimonies, Jesus suffered." See DEATH OF CHRIST—ATONEMENT—REDEMPTION.

SUN, the glorious orb of day. In all probability, the earliest form of worship was that of the sun—the Baal, as is generally thought, of the Phœnicians; the Chemosh of the Moabites; and the Moloch of the Ammonites. Even as early as the days of Job we find an obvious allusion to this form of idolatry: "If I beheld the sun when it shined, or the moon walking in brightness; and my heart hath been secretly enticed, or my mouth hath kissed my hand: this also were an iniquity to be punished by the judge: for I should have denied the God that is above." Job xxxi. 26–28. Moses too warns the Israelites against the worship of the sun, Deut. iv. 19: "And lest thou lift up thine eyes unto heaven, and when thou seest the sun, and the moon, and the stars, even all the host of heaven, shouldst be driven to worship them, and serve them, which the Lord thy God hath divided unto all nations under the whole heaven." In oriental language the sun is the symbol of a king, and in Mal. iv. 2 Christ is called the Sun of Righteousness. A setting sun is the symbol of a declining political power; and a rising sun of a rising power or government.

SUNDAY, or the LORD'S-DAY, a solemn festival observed by Christians on the first day of every week, in memory of our Saviour's resurrection. (See SABBATH.)

It has been contended whether Sunday is a name that ought to be used by Christians. The words Sabbath and Lord's-day, say some, are the only names mentioned in Scripture respecting this day. To call it Sunday, is to set our wisdom before the wisdom of God, and to give that glory to a pagan idol which is due to him alone. The ancient Saxons called it by this name, because upon it they worshipped the sun; and shall Christians keep up the memory of that which was highly displeasing to God, by calling the Sabbath by that name rather than by either of those he hath appointed? It is, indeed, called Sunday only because it is customary; but this, say they, will not justify men in doing that which is contrary to the example and command of God in his Word.

Others observe, that, although it was originally called Sunday by the heathens, yet it may very properly retain that name among Christians, because it is dedicated to the honour of the true light, which lighteth every man that cometh into the world—of Him who is styled by the prophet “The Sun of Righteousness,” and who on this day arose from the dead. But although it was in the primitive times indifferently called the Lord’s-day, or Sunday, yet it was never denominated the Sabbath—a name constantly appropriated to Saturday, or the seventh day, both by sacred and ecclesiastical writers. See SABBATH.

SUPEREROGATION, what a man is supposed to do beyond his duty, or more than he is commanded to do. The Romanists stand up strenuously for works of supererogation, and maintain that the observance of evangelical counsels is such. By means hereof a stock of merit is laid up, which the Church has the disposal of, and which she distributes in indulgences to such as need.

This absurd doctrine was first invented towards the close of the twelfth century, and modified and embellished by St Thomas in the thirteenth: according to which, it was pretended that there actually existed an immense treasure of merit, composed of the pious deeds and virtuous actions which the saints had performed beyond what was necessary for their own salvation, and which were, therefore, applicable to the benefit of others; that the guardian and dispenser of this precious treasure was the Roman pontiff; and that, of consequence, he was empowered to assign to such as he thought proper a portion of this inexhaustible source of merit, suitable to their respective guilt, and sufficient to deliver them from the punishment due to their crimes.

SUPERINTENDENT, an ecclesiastical superior in several Reformed Churches where Episcopacy is not admitted, particularly among the Lutherans in Germany, and the Calvinists in some other places. The superintendent is similar to a bishop, only his power is somewhat more restrained than that of our diocesan bishops. He is the chief pastor, and has the direction of all the inferior pastors within his district or diocese.

SUPERSTITION (deisidaimonia, demon-worship—Acts xxv. 19; Col. ii. 23) may be described to be either the careful and anxious observation of numerous and unauthorized ceremonies in religion, under the idea that they possess some virtue to propitiate God and obtain his favour; or, as among pagans and others, the worship of imaginary deities, and the various means of averting evil by religious ceremonies, which a heart oppressed with fears, and a perverted fancy, may dictate to those ignorant of the true God, and the doctrines of salvation.

“Superstition,” says Claude, “usually springs either (1.) from servile fear, which makes people believe that God is always wrathful, and invent means to appease him; (2.) or from a natural inclination we all have to idolatry, which makes men think they see some ray of the Divinity in extraordinary creatures, and on this account worship them; or (3.) from hypocrisy, which makes men willing to discharge their obligations to God by grimace, and by zeal for external services; or (4.) from presumption, which makes men serve God after their own fancies.

SUPPER, LORD’S, so called as having been instituted by the Lord Jesus Christ on the night in which he was betrayed into the hands of his enemies. The Supper may be viewed as consisting of two parts, the sacramental elements and the sacramental actions. The sacramental elements are bread and wine, representing the body and the blood of Christ. He took the bread, and in describing it, he said, “This is my body;” and in like manner he took the cup, and said, “This is my blood.” In speaking of his body, Jesus evidently refers to his human nature, and the one being spoken of separately from the other is designed to refer to the violent death which he endured as the substitute of sinners. A participation in this death, he elsewhere alleges to be as essential to the life of the soul in this world, and its growing preparation for eternal life in the world to come, as eating and drinking are to the preservation and continuance of our natural life. “Except ye eat the flesh of the Son of man, and drink his blood, ye have no life in you. For my flesh is meat indeed, and my blood is drink indeed.” John vi. 53, 55. In what sense, then, is it that we eat the body and drink the blood of Jesus in the sacrament of the Supper? We answer, our doing so is not a natural but a spiritual act. The Jews, no doubt, on one occasion imagined, in their carnality of mind, that Jesus was inculcating upon them that they must really and literally eat the flesh of the Son of man, and drink his blood. Hence they said among themselves, “Can this man give us his flesh to eat?” The Romish Church also, ministering to the same carnal notion even in our own day, teach the people that in the sacrament of the Supper, the priest, by the utterance of the words, “This is my body,” straightway converts the bread into the real body of Christ, and that communicants have no more to do but to put the bread into their mouths, and thus Christ is partaken of. But this is a manifest and most unreasonable perversion of the language of Christ. It is losing sight of the great mystery of faith, by which, and by which alone, the believer can eat the body and drink the blood of Christ. He eats the bread by sense, and he receives Christ by faith. “If, however,” the Romanist replies, “nothing more was meant than that the elements represented the body and blood of Christ in a symbolical manner, why does our Lord say in express language, This is my body, This is my blood?”

We reply, 1. That he could not possibly mean an actual conversion of bread and wine into the real body and blood of Christ, is evident from the testimony of our senses. The elements are set before us on the sacramental table. They can be touched, and seen, and tasted. And even after the words of institution have been spoken, our senses still bear testimony to the fact that the bread is bread, and the wine simply wine. Were we to believe otherwise, our faith would not be going beyond our senses, but in direct opposition to them; and once destroy the evidence of the senses, and all reasoning in reference to outward objects is at an end. Besides, to express the symbolical character of the elements, Jesus could express himself in no other way than he has done. It must be remembered, that our blessed Lord being a Jew, spoke to his disciples in a dialect of the Hebrew language, and in that language there is no word which expresses, to denote, to mean, to signify, and hence a figure is uniformly employed, and they say, "it is," for "it signifies." Thus it is said concerning the Paschal lamb, "It is the Lord's Passover." And God says of circumcision, "This is my covenant." And in the New Testament itself, which was written in Greek, the same idiom often occurs, "The field is the world." "The good seed are the children of the kingdom, but the tares are the children of the wicked one."

If our Lord's words in the institution of the Supper must necessarily be understood literally and not figuratively, then are we compelled to adopt a rule of interpretation the most extraordinary and inconsistent. Has not Christ said in plain language, "I am the true vine," and again, "I am the door;" then are we compelled to admit that Christ must be a tree and a literal door? Paul says of the rock at Meribah, "That rock was Christ." So then we must believe that the bold projecting crag from which the Israelites drank the miraculous stream was literally the Son of God.

Looking at the matter, then, in all its different aspects, we are brought to the conclusion, that when Jesus says, "This is my body, this is my blood," he meant nothing more than that the bread and the wine were symbols or representations of his body and his blood. In these expressive emblems of bread and wine, therefore, we must view the Saviour set forth as a partaker of flesh and blood, or of the nature of man; as it is written, "Forasmuch, then, as the children are partakers of flesh and blood, he also himself likewise took part of the same." Heb. ii. 14. The person of Christ is exhibited in the Supper as mediator, and we are taught that he who was in the form of God thought it no robbery to be equal with God, but took upon himself the form of a servant, and was found in fashion as a man. But when we pass from the sacramental elements to the sacramental actions, the field of believing contemplation becomes wider still. The bread is broken and the wine is poured out, indicating that the God-man Christ Jesus suffered and died for sinners. "This is my body," says Jesus, adding, as Luke has it, "which is given for you," and "this is my blood shed for many for the remission of sins." How expressive these emblematic actions of the glorious truth that He who was found in fashion as a man became obedient unto death, even the death of the cross!

And why are these elements, the broken body and poured out wine, put into the hands of the disciples of Jesus? His own words explain the reason, "broken for you," "shed for you," "shed for many for the remission of sins." In the Supper there is a representation not only of the fact that Christ suffered and died, but of the additional and glorious fact that "he bore our sins in his own body on the tree." We are thus forcibly reminded of our sins, which formed the procuring cause of the sufferings of Christ, of the hatred of Jehovah against sin, and of the wondrous love of Christ in consenting to put away sin by the sacrifice of himself.

But not only do we behold, in the significant emblematic action of the Lord's Supper, a representation of the sacrifice of Christ in the room of sinners;

we behold also the triumphs of his cross. He himself declares, "This is my blood of the new testament, which is shed for many for the remission of sins." The blood of Christ, then, is symbolically set before us in the Supper, as sanctioning, confirming, and sealing the covenant of grace, that sure, that everlasting covenant which God in Christ hath made with all believers, that for his sake, through faith in his name, they shall be his people, and he will be their God, he will bestow on them pardon, holiness, and life eternal, he will justify, he will sanctify, he will glorify and bless them for evermore. The Supper is not only a sign, then, but to all believers it is a seal of the everlasting covenant. All these objects, as set forth in the Lord's Supper, faith contemplates, and, what is more wonderful still, faith receives and appropriates as its own. "Take, eat," said Jesus to his disciples, "Drink ye all of it." The broken bread is eaten, the outpoured wine is drunk; O wondrous mystery! I eat the bread broken, and I drink the wine poured forth, those expressive symbols of the person and the work of Christ, and so with my mind and heart I solemnly declare that I embrace Christ as my own, my only, my all-sufficient Saviour. I take himself as my Saviour, his service as my chief end, his salvation as my desired inheritance. He is all my salvation and all my desire. Lord, I am thine, no longer my own, but bought with a price! Such is the nature of the institution of the Lord's Supper, as set forth in the sacramental elements and sacramental actions.

SUPRALAPSARIANS, persons who hold that God, without any regard to the good or evil works of men, has resolved, by an eternal decree (supra lapsum), antecedently to any knowledge of the fall of Adam, and independent of it, to save some and reject others; or, in other words, that God intended to glorify his justice in the condemnation of some, as well as his mercy in the salvation of others; and, for that purpose, decreed that Adam should fall.

Dr Gill gives us the following account of Supralapsarianism. The question which he proposes to discuss, is, "Whether men were considered in the mind of God in the decree of election as fallen or unfallen—as in the corrupt mass through the fall, or in the pure mass of creatureship, previous to it, and as to be created?" There are some who think that the latter so considered were the objects of election in the Divine mind. These are called Supralapsarians, though of these, some are of opinion that man was considered as to be created or creatable, and others as created but not fallen. The former seems best, that, of the vast number of individuals which came up in the Divine mind whom his power could create, those whom he meant to bring into being he designed to glorify himself by them in some way or other. The decree of election respecting any part of them may be distinguished into the decree of the end and the decree of the means. The decree of the end respecting some is either subordinate to their eternal happiness, or ultimate, which is more properly the end, the glory of God; and if both are put together, it is a state of everlasting communion with God, for the glorifying of the riches of his grace. The decree of the means includes the decree to create men, to permit them to fall, to recover them out of it through redemption by Christ, to sanctify them by the grace of the Spirit, and completely save them; and which are not to be reckoned as materially many decrees, but as making up one formal decree; or they are not to be considered as subordinate, but as co-ordinate means, and as making up one entire complete medium; for it is not to be supposed that God decreed to create man, that he might permit him to fall, in order to redeem, sanctify, and save him; but he decreed all this that he might glorify his grace, mercy, and justice. And in this way of considering the decrees of God, they think that they sufficiently obviate and remove the slanderous calumny cast upon them with respect to the other branch of predestination, which leaves men in the same state when others are chosen, and that for the glory of God. Which calumny is, that, according to them, God made man to damn him, whereas, according to their real sentiments, God decreed to make man, and made man neither to damn him nor save him, but for his own glory, which end is answered in them some way or other. Again: they argue that the end is first in view before the means, and the decree of the end is, in order of nature, before the decree of the means; and what is first in intention is last in execution. Now, as the glory of God is last in execution, it must be first in intention, wherefore men must be considered in the decree of the end as not yet created and fallen; since the creation and permission of sin belong to the decree of the means, which in order of nature is after the decree of the end. And they add to this, that if God first decreed to create man, and suffered him to fall, and then out of the fall chose some to grace and glory, he must decree to create man without an end, which is to make God to do what no wise man would; for when a man is about to do any thing, he proposes an end, and then contrives and fixes on ways and means to bring about that end. They think, also, that this way of conceiving and speaking of these things best expresses the sovereignty of God in them, as declared in the 9th chapter of Romans, where he is said to will such and such things, for no other reason but because he wills them.

SUPREMACY, OATH OF. See OATH.

SUPREMACY OF THE POPE, a doctrine held by the Roman Catholics, who believe that the Bishop of Rome is, under Christ, supreme pastor of the whole Church; and, as such, is not only the first bishop in order and dignity, but has also a power and jurisdiction over all Christians. This doctrine is chiefly built upon the supposed primacy of Peter, of whom the Bishop of Rome is the pretended successor—a primacy we nowhere find commanded or countenanced, but absolutely prohibited, in the Word of God. Luke xxii. 24–27; Mark ix. 35. See INFALLIBILITY—PRIMACY—POPE—POPERY.

SURETY, in common speech, is one who gives security for another; and hence it has become prevalent among theological writers to confound it with the terms substitute and representative, when applied to Christ. “By so much was Jesus made a surety of a better testament.” Heb. vii. 22. It is certainly true that the Son of God, in all that he has done or is still doing as Mediator, may be justly viewed as the surety of the new and everlasting covenant, and as affording the utmost security to believers that, as the Father hath given all things into his hands, they will be conducted with effect, and all the exceeding great and precious promises of that covenant assuredly be accomplished. But this does not appear to be the precise idea which the apostle has in view in the above passage. This has been sufficiently evinced by many critics and commentators, particularly by Pierce, Macknight, and M’Lean, in their notes on the place, who show that the word “surety” in this place is equivalent with that of mediator or high priest.

SUSPICION consists in imagining evil of others without proof. It is sometimes opposed to charity, which thinketh no evil. “A suspicious temper checks in the bud every kind affection: it hardens the heart, and estranges man from man. What friendship can we expect from him who views all our conduct with distrustful eyes, and ascribes every benefit we confer to artifice and stratagem? A candid man is accustomed to view the characters of his neighbours in the most favourable light, and is like one who dwells amidst those beautiful scenes of nature on which the eye rests with pleasure; whereas the suspicious man, having his imagination filled with all the shocking forms of human falsehood, deceit, and treachery, resembles the traveller in the wilderness, who discerns no objects around him but what are either dreary or terrible—caverns that open, serpents that hiss, and beasts of prey that howl.”

SWALLOW, a bird too well known to need description. Our translators of the Bible have given this name to two different Hebrew words. The first, being deror, in Ps. lxxxiv. 3 and Prov. xxvi. 2, is probably the word which Forskal mentions among the migratory birds of Alexandria, by the name of dururi, and the second being ogur, Isa. xxxviii. 14, and Jer. viii. 7, is the crane: but the other word sis, in the two last places, rendered in our version, “crane,” is really the swallow. So the Septuagint, Vulgate, and two ancient manuscripts, Theodotian and Jerome, render it; and Bochart and Lowth follow them. Bochart assigns the note of this bird for the reason of its name, and ingenuously remarks that the Italians about Venice call a swallow “zizalla,” and its twittering “zizillare.”

It is said that the goddess Isis was changed into a swallow; and it is worthy of remark, that thirteen of Dr Kennicott’s codices in Jeremiah read also isis, as five more did originally. The swallow being a plaintive bird, and a bird of passage, perfectly agrees with the meaning of Isaiah and Jeremiah. The annual migration of the swallow has been familiarly known in every age, and perhaps in every region of the earth. Anacreon, in one of his odes, addresses her thus: “Friendly swallow, thou indeed, coming annually, buidest thy nest in the summer, but in winter disappearst.” And Aristotle (lib. viii. c. 12) remarks, in the sober language of history,—“Both the swallow and the turtle leave us, to spend the winter in other climes.” The swallow, says Ælian, announces the most delightful season of the year; she remains in the northern latitude six months, and the thrush and the turtle only three.

SWEARING. See OATH.

SWEDENBORGIANS, or NEW JERUSALEM CHURCH, the followers of Emanuel Swedenborg, a Swedish uobleman, born at Stockholm in 1689. He appears to have had a good education, for his learning was extensive in almost every branch. He professed himself to be the founder of the New Jerusalem Church, alluding to the New Jerusalem spoken of in the book of the Revelation. He asserts that, in the year 1743, the Lord manifested himself to him by a personal appearance, and at the same time opened his spiritual eyes, so that he was enabled constantly to see and converse with spirits and angels. From that time he began to print and publish various wonderful things, which he says were revealed to him, relating to heaven and hell, the state of men after death, the worship of God, the spiritual sense of the Scriptures, the various earths in the universe, and their inhabitants, with many other strange particulars.

Swedenborg lived and died in the Lutheran communion, but always professed the highest respect for the Church of England. He carried his respect for the person and divinity of Jesus Christ to the highest point of veneration, considering him altogether as "God manifested in the flesh, and as the fulness of the Godhead united to the man Christ Jesus." With respect, therefore, to the sacred Trinity, though he rejected the idea of three distinct persons, as destructive of the unity of the Godhead, he admitted three distinct essences, principles, or characters, as existing in it; namely, the divine essence or character, in virtue of which he is called the Father or Creator; the human essence, principle, or character, united to the divine in the person of Jesus Christ, in virtue of which he is called the Son and Redeemer; and, lastly, the proceeding essence or principle, in virtue of which he is called the Holy Ghost. He farther maintains, that the sacred Scripture contains three distinct senses, called celestial, spiritual, and natural, which are united by correspondences; and that in each sense it is divine truth accommodated respectively to the angels of the three heavens, and also to men on earth. This science of correspondences (it is said) has been lost for some thousands of years, viz., ever since the time of Job, but is now revived by Emanuel Swedenborg, who uses it as a key to the spiritual or internal sense of the sacred Scripture, every page of which, he says, is written by correspondence, that is, by such things in the natural world as correspond unto and signify things in the spiritual world. He denies the doctrine of atonement, or vicarious sacrifice, together with the doctrines of predestination, unconditional election, justification by faith alone, the resurrection of the material body, &c.; and, in opposition thereto, maintains that man is possessed of free will in spiritual things; that salvation is not attainable without repentance, that is, abstaining from evils, because they are sins against God, and living a life of charity and faith, according to the commandments; that man, immediately on his decease, rises again in a spiritual body, which was inclosed in his material body, and that in this spiritual body he lives as a man to eternity, either in heaven or in hell, according to the quality of his past life. That all those passages in the Scripture generally supposed to signify the destruction of the world by fire, and commonly called the last judgment, must be understood according to the above-mentioned science of correspondences, which teaches that, by the end of the world, or consummation of the age, is not signified the destruction of the world, but the destruction or end of the present Christian Church, both among Roman Catholics and Protestants of every description or denomination; and that this last judgment actually took place in the spiritual world in the year 1757, from which era is dated the second advent of the Lord, and the commencement of a new Christian Church, which, they say, is meant by the new heaven and new earth in the Revelation, and the New Jerusalem thence descending.

The adherents of this sect are found chiefly in England, Sweden, and America. Their number is small in Britain, the congregations, according to the last census, being fifty, of which the greater number were in Lancashire and Yorkshire.

SWINE. The flesh of this animal was expressly forbidden the Jews by the Levitical law; undoubtedly on account of its filthy character, as well as because the flesh, being strong and difficult to digest, afforded a very gross kind of aliment, apt to produce cutaneous, scorbutic, and scrofulous disorders, especially in hot climates. Maimonides says, "The principal reason wherefore the law prohibited the swine was because of their extreme filthiness, and their eating so many impurities. For it is well known with what care and precision the law forbids all filthiness and dirt, even in the fields and in the camp, not to mention the cities: now had swine been permitted, the public places and streets and houses would have been made nuisances." Tacitus tells us that the Jews abstained from the flesh of swine in consideration of a leprosy by which they had formerly suffered, and to which this animal has a disposition. Plutarch affirms, that those who drink of the milk of the sow become blotchy and leprous; and Ælian quotes from Manetho, that whoever drinks sow's milk is quickly covered with scabs and leprous itches. Michaelis observes that throughout the whole climate under which Palestine is situated, and for a certain extent both south and north, the leprosy is an endemic disease; and with this disease, which is pre-eminently an Egyptian one, the Israelites left Egypt so terribly overrun, that Moses found it necessary to enact a variety of laws respecting it; and that the contagion might be weakened, and the people tolerably guarded against its influence, it became requisite to prohibit them from eating swine's flesh altogether.

The prophet Isaiah (lxv. 4) charges his degenerate people with eating swine's flesh, and having a broth of abominable things in their vessels. They had not yet neglected to bring their sacrifices to the altar of Jehovah; but they no longer served their God in sincerity and truth: "He that killeth an ox is as if he slew a man; he that sacrificeth a lamb, as if he cut off a dog's neck; he that offereth an oblation, as if he offered swine's blood; he that burneth incense, as if he blessed an idol. Yea, they have chosen their own ways, and their soul delighteth in their abominations." Isa. lxvi. 3. Conduct so contrary to their solemn engagements, so hateful in the sight of the Holy One, though long endured, was not always to pass with impunity. "They that sanctify themselves, and purify themselves in the gardens, behind one tree in the midst, eating swine's flesh, and the abomination, and the mouse, shall be consumed together, saith the Lord." Isa. lxvi. 17. Such a sacrifice was an abomination to the Lord, because the eating of the blood was prohibited, and because the sacrifice consisted of swine's flesh; and, to aggravate the sin of the transgressor, such a sacrifice is compared with the killing of a human victim, or the immolation of a dog; both of which Jehovah regarded with abhorrence. To these precepts and threatenings, which were often supported by severe judgments, may be traced the habitual and unconquerable aversion of that people to the use of swine's flesh; an aversion which the most alluring promises and the most cruel sufferings have been found alike insufficient to subdue.

In such detestation was the hog held by the Jews that they would not so much as pronounce its name, but called it "the strange thing;" and we read in the history of the Maccabees, that Eleazer, a principal scribe, being compelled by Antiochus Epiphanes to open his mouth and receive swine's flesh, spit it forth, and went of his own accord to the torment, choosing rather to suffer death than to break the law of God, and give offence to his nation.

It is observed that when Adrian rebuilt Jerusalem, he set up the image of a hog, in bas-relief, upon the gates of the city, to drive the Jews away from it, and to express the greater contempt for that miserable people.

It was avarice, a contempt of the law of Moses, and a design to supply the neighbouring idolaters with victims, that caused whole herds of swine to be fed on the borders of Galilee. Whence the occasion is plain of Christ's permitting the disorder that caused them to fling themselves headlong into the lake of Gennesareth. Matt. viii. 32.

SWORD, in the style of the Hebrews, is often used for war. "The Lord shall send the sword into the land;" that is, war. The "sword of the mouth" (Job v. 15; Ps. lvii. 4), is, pernicious discourse, accusations, slander, calumny.

"They that take the sword shall perish with the sword" (Matt. xxvi. 52); they that employ the sword by their own authority, and would do themselves justice, deserve to be put to death by the sword of authority. Or, this is a kind of proverb: Those who take the sword to smite another, generally suffer by it themselves. "The word of God is quick and powerful, and sharper than any two-edged sword" (Heb. iv. 12); it is the word of a Being whose eye and whose anger penetrate even to the bottom of the soul, into the heart and mind.

SYCAMINE (sukaminos, in Arabic, sokam—Luke xvii. 6). This is a different tree from the sycamore, mentioned Luke xix. 4. Dioscorides says that this tree is the mulberry, though he allows that some apprehend that it is the same with the sycamore.

SYCAMORE (sephmut, sephmim—1 Kings x. 27; 1 Chron. xxvii. 28; 2 Chron. i. 15; Ps. lxxviii. 47; Isa. ix. 10; Amos vii. 14; sukomereā—Luke xix. 4), a large tree, according to the description of Theophrastus, Dioscorides, and Galen, resembling the mulberry tree in the leaf, and the fig in its fruit; hence its name, compounded of sukeē, fig, and moros, mulberry; and some have fancied that it was originally produced by ingrafting the one tree upon the other. Its fruit is palatable. When ripe it is soft, watery, somewhat sweet, with a little of an aromatic taste. The trees are very common in Palestine, Arabia, and Egypt; grow large, and to a great height; and, though their grain is coarse, are much used in building.

"The sycamore," says Mr Norden, "is of the height of a beech, and bears its fruit in a manner quite different from other trees; it has them on its trunk itself, which shoots out little sprigs, in form of grape stalks, at the end of which grow the fruit close to one another almost like clusters of grapes."

To change sycamores into cedars (Isa. ix. 10), means, to render the buildings of cities, and the state of the nation, much more magnificent than before. Dr Shaw remarks, that as the grain and texture of the sycamore is remarkably coarse and spongy, it could therefore stand in no competition at all with the cedar for beauty and ornament.

The wood of this tree, however, is very durable. "The mummy chests," says Dr Shaw, "and whatever figures and instruments of wood are found in the catacombs, are all of them of sycamore, which, though spongy and porous to appearance, has, notwithstanding, continued entire and uncorrupted for at least three thousand years. From its value in furnishing wood for various uses, from the grateful shade which its wide-spreading branches afforded, and on account of the fruit, which Mallet says the Egyptians live upon and hold in the highest estimation, we perceive the loss which the ancient inhabitants of Egypt must have felt when their vines were destroyed with hail, and their sycamore trees with frost." Ps. lxxviii. 47.

One curious particular in the cultivation of the fruit must not be passed over. Hasselquist, describing the ficus sycamorus, or Scripture sycamore, says, "It buds the latter end of March, and the fruit ripens in the beginning of June. At the time when the fruit has arrived to the size of an inch diameter, the inhabitants pare off a part at the centre point. They say that without this paring it would not come to maturity."

The sycamore strikes its large diverging roots deep into the soil; and on this account, says Paxton, our Lord alludes to it as the most difficult to be rooted up, and transferred to another situation. "If ye had faith as a grain of mustard-seed ye might say unto this sycamore tree, Be thou plucked up by the root, and be thou planted in the sea; and it should obey you." Luke xvii. 6. The stronger and more diverging the root of a tree, the more difficult it must be to pluck it up, and insert it again so as to make it strike root and grow; but far more difficult still to plant it in the sea, where the soil is so far below the surface, and where the restless billows are continually tossing it from one side to the other; yet, says our Lord a task no less difficult than this to be accomplished, can the man of genuine faith perform with a word, for with God nothing is impossible, nothing difficult or laborious. In the parallel passage (Matt. xvii. 20) the hyperbole is varied, a mountain being substituted for the sycamore tree. The passage is thus paraphrased by Rosenmüller. "So long as you trust in God and me, and are not sufficient in self-reliance, you may accomplish the most arduous labours undertaken for the furthering my religion."

SYCHAR. See SECHEM.

SYENE, a city on the southern frontiers of Egypt towards Ethiopia, between Thebes and the Cataracts of the Nile (Ezek. xxix. 10, xxx. 6), and now called Assonan. Pliny says it stands in a peninsula on the eastern shore of the Nile; that it is a mile in circumference, and had a Roman garrison. It is five hundred miles from Alexandria to Syene, being nearly the whole length of Egypt.

SYMBOL, an abstract or compendium, a sign or representation, of something moral, by the figures or properties of natural things. Hence symbols are of various kinds—as hieroglyphics, types, enigmas, parables, fables, &c.

SYNAGOGUE, a Jewish place of worship. The following account of these ancient synagogues is extracted from a series of papers by the Rev. Dr Duncan Macfarlan:—

"The word synagogue, which is properly Greek, as well as the Hebrew expression, of which the Greek is a translation, cannot perhaps be better turned into English, than by calling it, when applied to the building, the Meeting House, and when applied to the assembly, the Meeting, or Congregation. Now, this term occurs in the seventy-fourth Psalm, which is applicable to an age preceding the captivity. But on the return of Israel to their own land, a general change seems to have taken place. The writings of the Old Testament were now collected and set forth by Ezra; and as the people had very much lost both the language and religious habits cultivated in earlier times, and as they were now disposed to give themselves very fully to the worship of the true God, it was found necessary to new model the general platform of religious worship and discipline.

"I. When Built.—It seems to have been observed as a general rule, that no synagogue could be built unless there were ten Batehnim—men of leisure. Lightfoot understands by these, men qualified to become office-bearers, or at least to take part in conducting public-worship. But this has been thought doubtful; and the only thing agreed upon is, that they must have been persons so much at leisure as to be able to attend all the ordinary meetings of the synagogue, and which took place on three days of the week. The statement of Maimonides is simply to this effect: 'Every place where there are ten men of Israel, there it is requisite to build a house, whither they may resort to prayer at every time of prayer; and this place is called a synagogue: and the men of the city are to urge one another to build a synagogue, and to buy them a book of the law, prophets, and hagiographa.' We are also told, with regard to the necessity of at least ten being present, that 'the Divine Majesty dwelleth not among fewer than ten;' and that wherever this number could be assembled for purposes of worship, the Divine Being was specially present. It is apparently in reference to this that our Lord said to his disciples, 'Again I say unto you, that if two of you shall agree on earth, as touching any thing that ye shall ask, it shall be done for them of my Father which is in heaven.' 'For where two or three are gathered together in my name, there am I in the midst of them.' Matt. xviii. 19, 20. It is as if he had wished to show his disciples that the principle of church communion, with all its privileges, is to be carried farther out under the Christian dispensation than it had before been; that wherever it should be found even to exist, as in the case of two persons, the privilege was secured. And this surely renders the Christian even more inexcusable than the Jew, if, after all, he be found among such as forsake the assembling of themselves together. And yet how high is the example which the Jews have set us! They allowed not even ten qualified individuals to live without a synagogue; and we allow hundreds, it may be thousands, including men of all circumstances.

"II. The Buildings.—These are so concisely, and on the whole so well described by Horne, in the third volume of his Introduction, that we can scarcely do better than copy his account. 'It does not appear,' says he, 'from the New Testament, that the synagogues had any peculiar form. The building of them was regarded as a mark of piety, Luke vii. 5, and they were erected within or without the city, generally in an elevated place, and were distinguished from the proseuchæ by being roofed. Each of them had an altar, or rather table, on which the book of the law was opened; and on the east side there was an ark or chest, in which the volume of the law was deposited. The seats were so disposed, that the people always sat with their faces towards the elders, and the place where the law was kept; and the elders sat in the opposite direction, that is to say, with their backs to the ark, and their faces to the people. The seats of the latter, as being placed nearer the ark, were accounted the more holy; and hence they are in the New Testament termed the chief seats in the synagogue, which the Pharisees affected, and for which our Lord inveighed against them. Matt. xxiii. 6. A similar proceeding seems to have crept into the places of worship, even of the first Christians; and hence we may account for the indignation of the Apostle James (ii. 3) against the undue preference that was given to the rich. The women were separated from the men, and sat in a gallery inclosed with lattices, so that they could distinctly see and hear all that passed in the synagogue, without themselves being exposed to view.' To this account we shall only add, that the synagogue, at least in favourable circumstances, was usually accompanied with a school for children, a Beth Michash, or Divinity School, and a Beth Din, or Hall of Judgment.

"III. The Office-Bearers.—According to Vitringa, whose authority in all matters of this kind stands deservedly high, these varied in different circumstances. In large cities they were numerous, and consisted, in all the higher offices, of learned men duly set apart; whereas in cases of less importance, they were fewer and not so fully qualified. And this is perhaps the true explanation of discrepancies among writers of the highest reputation. And with this explanation we now proceed to detail these in order.

"1. Elders or Rulers of the Synagogue.—On some occasions there was probably but one ruling elder, and hence the phrase 'the ruler of the synagogue' (see Mark v. 35); but in other cases, and perhaps more generally, there were more than one (see Acts xiii. 15). And it is affirmed by Jewish writers, that the proper number was three. In certain matters of judgment, three appear to have been necessary. These, as their name imports, sat in judgment. They did so with regard to matters of discipline and worship, but they did so also in a variety of offences, both civil and criminal. They judged in money matters, in matters of theft, of losses, of restitution, of violence done to females, in the admission of proselytes, and the laying on of hands, &c.

"2. The Sheliach Zibbor, or Angel of the Synagogue.—The person bearing this name was the chief minister of religion, and in particular he offered up the prayers of the congregation. And as in this he acted for the people, he was called their Angel or Messenger. And hence, as is believed, the name applied in the book of Revelation to the presiding minister in each of the seven Churches of Asia—'the Angel of the Church.' It is also probable that the angel of the synagogue sat with the ruling elders as one of their number, and that he came in this way to be distinguished from them only by his labouring also 'in the word and doctrine.'

"3. The Chazan or Overseer.—The person bearing this title is held by some to be the same with the angel of the synagogue; and Jewish authorities have been cited in support of this opinion. But Vitringa has examined the whole question at great length, and has shown, on evidence very satisfactory, that the office of the Chazan was subordinate; and hence the name, and also the duty assigned him in the synagogue at Nazareth. Luke iv. 20. He is there called minister or attendant; receiving also the book from the officiating minister. And according to Jewish writers, he had a general charge of the synagogue with its sacred utensils, and of the order of worship.

"4. The Readers.—These were usually seven in number; but they were not so properly office-bearers as simply members of the congregation, who were from time to time called out for the purpose. The first chosen was, if such were present, a priest; the second, a Levite; and the other five simply Israelites. The portions of Scripture read, were, as will afterwards appear, large; and they were read from a scroll in the original Hebrew, which had become in the days of our Saviour very much a dead language. This will of itself show that the persons chosen for Readers must have been men of education.

"5. The Interpreter.—The Readers stood each in turn in the place appointed, and read distinctly from the Hebrew scroll verse by verse, the Chazan meanwhile looking on. At the end of each verse he made a pause, and then the Interpreter rendered it into the vernacular language, adding such glosses as were fitted to make the original better understood. He was accordingly, a regular office-bearer of the synagogue.

"6. The Teacher or Doctor.—Under this name we mean the Teacher in the Michash or Divinity School, and who had also his interpreter. But we are not sure whether the duties of the school were not in most cases discharged by the office-bearers of the synagogue proper. It is even stated, that the President of the Eldership sat as chief Doctor in the Beth Michash. Still, the duties of the two offices are so distinct, according to our apprehension, that they will in this way be best conceived of; and they are so stated by Lightfoot himself. Moreover, we have in this distinction of duty, whether of office or not, the probable origin of the distinction 'Pastor and Teacher.'

"7. The Pamasin or Deacons.—These were but little connected with either the worship or discipline of the synagogue. They collected money, sometimes apparently by a kind of assessment, for the maintenance of the poor, and, where other means were wanting, for the general support of the synagogue, including the stipends of the office-bearers. And they have accordingly been associated with the Deacons of the Christian Church. And their office, and that of the seven who were elected to relieve the Apostles of the duty of serving tables, are certainly like each other. At the same time, as they are both matters of controversy, which may come afterwards to be reviewed, it is enough for our present object to notice them in this general manner.

"IV. The Forms of Worship.—On three days of the week, besides special holidays, public worship was observed. These were the second, fifth, and seventh, or Sabbath. The Sabbath was so observed on the authority of the written Word, but the other two days were probably appointed subsequent to the completing of the canon of the Old Testament, although, to give them greater authority, they were usually ascribed to Ezra. On these two days also, besides the proper services of the synagogue, a session was held for the hearing of causes. On each of the three days there were three meetings,—one in the morning during the time of the morning sacrifice, another at noon, and a third during the time of the evening sacrifice.

"The parts of worship, at each of these meetings, and particularly on Sabbath, were chiefly three,—prayer, reading of the Scriptures, and preaching, which consisted partly of exposition and partly of exhortation.

"V. Government and Discipline.—The government of the synagogue was conducted by the synodicon or eldership; subject to the approval, however, and general superintendence of the Sanhedrim at Jerusalem. This synodicon, or eldership, consisted of not fewer than three; these being most probably the angel of the synagogue, and two rulers. But it is likely that other office-bearers were joined with them, as the common number, in large towns, was twenty-three. There they sat in judgment on certain classes of questions, on the second and fifth days of the week; these being the additional days of worship, besides the Sabbath: and now, before detailing their procedure in discipline, let it be borne in mind, that all Jews were, in virtue of their descent, and of circumcision, members of the synagogue; and that proselytes became so by circumcision and baptism. 'A person is not a proselyte,' says the Talmud, 'till he be both circumcised and baptized.' 'And an Israelite,' says Maimonides, 'that takes a little heathen child, or that finds a heathen infant, and baptizeth him for a proselyte, behold, he is a proselyte.'

Mr Allen, in his "Modern Judaism," gives a very interesting account of synagogues, as they at present exist among the Jews:—

"To constitute a congregation for the performance of public worship, requires, according to the decisions of the rabbins, at least ten men, who have passed the 13th year of their age. In all places in which this or a larger number of Jews can be stately assembled, they procure a synagogue. For a small congregation they content themselves with a hired room, but where they are numerous they often erect a large and respectable building for the purpose.

"They prefer the highest ground that can be obtained in a convenient situation, and suffer no Jew to build a dwelling-house in the neighbourhood of superior or even of equal height. The accommodations are not always equally handsome or plain; but every synagogue is furnished with a suitable number of long forms or benches, generally with backs. Closets and presses are also provided for keeping books and cloaks. Lamps and chandeliers are affixed and suspended in different parts, to give light to the whole. Near the door or doors are placed little boxes, to receive voluntary contributions for the poor.

"Wherever the Jews live, they turn their faces, in prayer, towards the land of Canaan. The door, or if there be more than one, the principal door of a synagogue is therefore placed at or near the opposite point of the compass. In this and the neighbouring countries, all structures for that purpose are built as nearly east and west as the situation will admit.

"At the end opposite to the entrance is a closet or chest, which they call the ark, in allusion to the ark of the covenant in the ancient temple; and in which they deposit the book of the law used in reading the lessons in the public service. Every copy of the pentateuch for the use of a synagogue is required to be in manuscript. The rabbins have furnished their disciples with numerous rules of transcription, which are required to be most accurately observed, and a failure in any of which frustrates all the labour. It is to be written with ink made of certain prescribed ingredients, in the square character, without points. It is not to be in the form of modern books, but in a volume or roll, according to the custom of ancient times. The roll consists of long pieces of parchment, sewed together with thongs cut out of the skin of some clean animal; and is rolled up from both ends on two wooden staves. For its preservation it is cased with linen or silk; another silk covering is added as an ornament. The ends of the staves are more or less ornamented, according to the ability of the owner: some are covered with silver, in the shape of pomegranates; some have at the top a coronet of silver, to which little bells are appended. To make such a transcript of the law and present it to a synagogue, is deemed a very meritorious service; and the number of them varies, in different congregations, according to the number, wealth, generosity, and reputed sanctity of their members.

"Near the middle is a desk or altar, formed by a raised platform surrounded by a wooden rail, and generally large enough to receive several persons, either standing or sitting. From this place the law is regularly read, and lectures or sermons are sometimes delivered. No benches or seats are admitted between the altar and the ark.

"The women are not allowed to mix with the men, but a separate part is allotted to them on the same floor; or, where there is a gallery, it is exclusively appropriated to their use; but, whatever be their station, they are screened from the observation of the men by a wooden lattice.

"Every synagogue has a chazan, or reader and chanter; one or more clerks for the management of pecuniary and other matters; and one or more persons whose duty it is to keep the place clean and in good order, to trim the lamps, light the candles, open and shut the doors, keep the keys, and attend at all times of prayer. These persons receive salaries out of the public stock of the synagogue to which they belong. There are also wardens appointed, who form a kind of committee of elders to superintend and direct the financial, eleemosynary, and other general business of the congregation.

"Folding and unfolding the law, bearing it in procession through the synagogue, elevating it on the altar to be seen by all the people present, reading certain lessons on particular days, and other public services, are performed by various Israelites at different times. But each of these functions is accounted a high honour, and whenever it occurs, the privilege of discharging it is put up to public auction, and assigned to the best bidder. One of the clerks of the synagogue acts the part of an auctioneer, and the monies arising from these sales are paid into the general stock."

It is affirmed, that, in the city of Jerusalem alone, there were anciently four hundred and sixty or four hundred and eighty synagogues. Every trading company had one of its own, and even strangers built some for those of their own nation. Hence we find synagogues of the Cyrenians, Alexandrians, Cilicians, and Asiatics, appointed for such as came up to Jerusalem from those countries. Acts vi. 9.

SYNOD, a meeting or assembly of ecclesiastical persons to consult on matters of religion. Of these there are four kinds, viz.—(1.) General, where bishops, &c., meet from all nations. These were first called by the emperors; afterwards by Christian princes; till, in later ages, the Pope usurped to himself the greatest share in this business, and, by his legates, presided in them when called. (2.) National, where those of one nation only come together to determine any point of doctrine or discipline. The first of this sort which we read of in England was that of Herudford, or Hertford, in 673; and the last was that held by Cardinal Pole, in 1555. (3.) Provincial, where those only of one province meet, now called the convocation. (4.) Diocesan, where those of but one diocese meet to enforce canons made by general councils, or national and provincial synods, and to consult and agree upon rules of discipline for themselves. These were not wholly laid aside till, by the Act of Submission, 25 Henry VIII. c. 19, it was made unlawful for any synod to meet but by royal authority. See COUNCIL—CONVOCATION.

SYNOD is also used to signify a Presbyterian Church court, composed of ministers and elders from the different presbyteries within its bounds, and is only subordinate to the General Assembly.

SYNOD OF DORT. See DORT, SYNOD OF.

SYNOD, REFORMED PRESBYTERIAN, otherwise known by the names, Cameronians, from Richard Cameron, one of their preachers, who fell in an action with the troops in 1680; Mountain-men, because they originally worshipped on the mountains and moors of Scotland, during the persecution under Charles II.; M'Millanites, from the name of the first minister that espoused their cause after the Revolution; and Covenanters, because they immovably adhere to the Scottish covenant. They profess to hold no new opinions, but only contend for the very same things which were generally received by all ranks of men in the purest time of reformation, between 1638 and 1649.

SYRACUSE, the celebrated capital of Sicily, on the eastern coast (Acts xxviii. 12), where Paul spent three days on his voyage to Rome.

SYRIA, a large district of country in Western Asia, between the river Euphrates on the East, and the Mediterranean Sea on the West. According to Josephus, the Syrians, anciently called Aramites, were descended from Aram, the youngest son of Shem. Damascus, the capital of Syria, is spoken of as early as the days of Abraham, and in the time of Jacob we find mention made of Laban the Syrian. In the course of the history, the Syrians may be observed frequently joining the enemies of Israel, and during the reign of Solomon, Syria was subject to Israel. It was Solomon who founded Tadmor or Palmyra, the celebrated city whose splendid ruins are still so much admired. After the death of Solomon, the Syrians revolted and maintained their independence until the reign of Ahaz, when the king of Syria combined with the king of Israel in a confederacy against Ahaz, who in his turn solicited the aid of the king of Assyria, and the consequence was that the Syrians were conquered, many of them taken captive, and the country made subject to Assyria. They successively passed into the hands of the Chaldeans, the Persians, and Macedonians. After the death of Alexander, Syria rose into higher importance than ever. It became the seat of the Syro-Macedonian empire, under the Seleucidae, Antioch being the capital. At length, B.C. 66, Syria became a Roman province, and in the time of our Lord, Cyrenius was the Roman governor of Syria. It was at Antioch in Syria that believers were first called Christians. The possessors of Syria after the Romans have been the Saracens and Turks, from the latter of whom it was wrested by Mohammed Ali, Pacha of Egypt, in 1830. Often did the Syrians attempt to throw off the yoke of the Egyptians, but in 1840, in consequence of a treaty between England and the continental powers, the Egyptians were compelled to evacuate the whole of Syria, and the supremacy of the Turks was once more established in Syria.

SYRO-PHœNICIA, a name given to Phœnicia (which see) in consequence of its annexation to Syria as a conquered province. The Syro-Phœnician woman who applied to Christ for the cure of her daughter (Mark vii. 26), is called by Matthew a Canaanitish woman (Mat. xv. 22-24), because that country was originally peopled by Canaanites.

T.

TAANACH, a city of Canaan, situated on the west of Jordan. The king of this city is mentioned (Josh. xii. 21) as one of the thirty-one kings conquered by the Israelites. It originally formed a part of the inheritance of Manasseh, but was afterwards assigned by lot to the Levites.

TABERAH, or TABEERA (burning), an encampment of Israel in the desert north-west of Mount Sinai (Numb. xi. 3; Deut. ix. 22), and so called, because here a fire from the tabernacle of the Lord burned a great part of the camp.

TABERNACLE, that magnificent, divine pavilion, the emblem of heaven itself (Heb. ix. 24), which Moses built for God, by his express command, partly to be the place of his visible residence as King of Israel (Exod. xl. 34, 35), and partly to be the centre and medium of that solemn worship which the people were to render to him. Verses 26-29.

The tabernacle was the only place where the public ritual of national worship was to be celebrated. The directions how it was to be constructed were given by the Lord to Moses, Exod. xxvi. This place is mentioned under different names in the Old Testament. It is called a tent, a habitation, a sanctuary, a house, the dwelling-place of Jehovah's glory, Jehovah's tent, and the tent of the congregation, and sometimes the palace, although these names are not always preserved distinctly in our English version. There was another tabernacle created a short time before, see Exod. xxxiii. 7, called the tabernacle of the congregation, probably a large tent where Moses transacted public business. Some have supposed that was the tent where Moses and his family dwelt, but more probably it was erected for public purposes; but as no particulars are given respecting this erection, it is unnecessary to waste time in conjectures about it.

The outer enclosure was the court of the tabernacle, about one hundred and fifty feet long and seventy-five broad. This was surrounded on all sides with linen curtains, hanging from silver rods which extended from one column to another. On the east and west sides were ten columns, and twenty on the north, and as many on the south. These columns were of shittim wood, probably a sort of acacia; some, however, think it was cedar. Each post was fixed in a socket, or large piece of brass. Near the top of the columns silver hooks were fixed, on which the curtain-rods rested. The entrance was on the east. A curtain, or piece of tapestry richly wrought with blue, purple, and scarlet, hung on the four middle columns of that side which was drawn up, and thus left three entrances adjoining each other.

The tabernacle or tent was placed about the middle of the western side of the court. It was an oblong square, about fifty-four feet long from west to east, and eighteen from north to south.

The walls or sides were formed of forty-eight wooden planks, of shittim wood, each rather more than two feet and a half broad, and eighteen feet long. Twenty of these boards formed the north side, as many were used for the south, and six on the west, an additional board being placed at each western corner. The planks were covered with plates of gold, their ends were fixed by mortices and tenons, in blocks of silver, weighing about one hundred pounds weight, two to each board; bars covered with gold extended along each side, to unite the whole firmly together. The eastern end was left for the entrance, and was closed by a curtain of worked linen cloth, hanging from silver rods, which rested upon five columns covered with gold. The roof, some think, was a frame of wood resting upon the upright planks, and over these were four coverings of different materials made up in several curtains, joined together by loops and couplings. Others considered that the coverings formed the only roofing. The undermost was of fine twined linen; it hung down to about two feet from the earth, and had figures of the cherubim wrought upon it with blue, purple, and scarlet. The next covering was of goats' hair, woven into a sort of cloth; the third was a covering of rams' skins dyed red; the fourth of what is called in our translation badgers' skins, but what animal is meant is not certain. The three outer coverings reached to the ground. The tabernacle was divided into two unequal parts; the first occupied about two-thirds of the length, or nearly thirty-five feet. This was called the Holy Place, or the First Tabernacle. Heb. ix. 2. The inner apartment was only half the length; it was separated from the outer by a wrought curtain or vail, and was called the Most Holy Place. The height of each apartment was the length of the planks, or eighteen feet.

"Tabernacle" is sometimes put for heaven, for the dwelling-place of the blessed: "I will abide in thy tabernacle for ever." Ps. xv. 1, lxi. 4. "How amiable are thy tabernacles, O Lord of hosts!" Ps. lxxxiv. 1. Paul says to the Hebrews (chap. viii. 2), that Jesus Christ was "a minister of the sanctuary, and of the true tabernacle, which the Lord pitched, and not man;" and that, "being come an high priest of good things to come, by a greater and more perfect tabernacle, not made with hands, that is to say, not of this building," &c. Heb. ix. 11; see also Rev. xiii. 6, xxi. 3. The tabernacle of David that God was to raise (Amos ix. 11, Acts xv. 16) is the Church of Christ, the offspring of David, and heir of the promises made to that patriarch.

TABERNACLES, FEAST OF, a solemn festival of the Hebrews, observed after harvest, on the fifteenth day of the month Tisri. Lev. xxiii. 33-44. The feast of tabernacles continued for a week. It was to keep in the memory of the Israelites their dwelling in tents in the desert. Lev. xxiii. 34-43. It is also called the feast of ingatherings. Exod. xxiii. 16. At this time was the vintage, and the gathering of the fruits of other trees. The sacrifices for this occasion are directed, Numb. xxix. They were very numerous, but diminished each day the festival lasted. In the whole, seventy bullocks, fourteen rams, seven goats, and ninety-eight lambs were offered during the seven days. During this week the people were to dwell in tents, or in arbours of trees, which latterly were made upon the flat roofs of their houses. They carried in their hands branches of palm and of other trees, singing, "Hosanna," that is, "Save, I beseech thee." Lev. xxiii. 40; Neh. viii. 15. But the most remarkable of the later ceremonies was the pouring out of water upon the altar. A golden pitcher was filled at the pool of Siloam, and brought into the temple, through the water-gate, with much ceremony. The water was then mixed with wine, and poured upon the sacrifice as it lay upon the altar. It seems to have been adopted as an emblem of future blessings, perhaps in allusion to Isa. xii. 3, "Therefore with joy shall ye draw water out of the wells of salvation,"—a passage to which our blessed Lord evidently alluded in his interesting and instructive interview with the woman of Samaria. John iv. 10, 14. They called this day Hosanna Rabbah, or, "the Great Hosanna." The views of this festival entertained by the Jews are thus beautifully stated by Dr Candlish:—

"1. The Jews themselves connected the observance of this feast with the glorious advent of Messiah, their King—the presence of Jehovah their God among them. When they pitched their tents, it was in memory of the time when the tabernacle of the Lord stood in the midst, and in preparation for the time when again he was to dwell among them. The very erection of their booths was a token of their firm faith and confident expectation. Their cry, as they walked in procession, was, 'Hosanna, save now, I beseech thee, O Lord.' And the psalms appointed for that sacred season, the portion called by them Hallel (113-118), had respect to the Lord's returning to visit them, and bore this burden: 'Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord to save.' But the most remarkable proof, on this point, is the fact, that when they conducted our Lord in triumph into the city, hailing him, for the time, as their King, they adopted in the procession, so far as haste permitted, the very pomp of the Feast of Tabernacles. It was not then the Feast of Tabernacles, but the Feast of Passover. Still they knew well, that when Messiah, the King, the Lord, did come, it was the Feast of Tabernacles that was to welcome and celebrate his coming. The branches of palm trees in their hands, the boughs spread on the way, their acclamations, 'Hosanna to the Son of David—Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord—Hosanna in the highest,' these usages all belonged to the Feast of Tabernacles. The multitude, in their enthusiasm, believing, for the moment, that their King was come, deemed the Feast of the Passover superseded, and the ceremonies of another feast more appropriate. Here, as in every instance, they overlooked the necessity of the Messiah's coming first of all to fulfil the type of the Passover, as he did at that very Passover when he died a sacrifice for sin, and rose again as the first sheaf of the great crop to be reaped. But, substantially, they were right in thinking, that had he been, as they hoped, coming in glory to dwell among them, it was the Feast of Tabernacles, whose real end he would then accomplish; and our Lord, by receiving their homage at a time when he certainly meant to represent the triumph of his second coming to reign, virtually sanctions the view which we have given of the ultimate scope and meaning of this harvest festival.

"2. The Jews farther connected this festival with the glorious descent of the Holy Ghost. To signify this, they had invented a ceremony of their own, which they added to the appointed forms. During all the days, and chiefly on the eighth day, the great day of the feast, they went with much solemnity to the stream or pool of Siloam, and bringing its water in pitchers, with much rejoicing, to the temple, they mixed it with wine, and poured it out devoutly upon and before the altar. They thus, as it was understood, expressed their prayer, that on the dry and thirsty soil the rain might be poured out; and the vulgar idea was, that as this festival was a thanksgiving for one year's abundant crop, so on it was determined the amount of propitious influence which God was to grant for the next seed time and harvest. But the ceremony was regarded as significant of something more. The softly flowing waters of Siloam are made by Isaiah the type of the sovereignty of David's house. For, addressing the ten tribes, in reference to their apostasy from that house, he uses this figure (chapter viii. 6): 'This people refuseth the waters of Shiloah that go softly;' fit emblem this of the happy reign of Immanuel, David's son, of which these Israelites had virtually, by their rebellion, renounced the hope. These waters were thus understood by the Jews to represent the peaceful and holy blessings of Messiah's reign, especially the spiritual gifts and graces which he was to confer. Hence, in bringing their pitchers from Siloam, and pouring them out before the Lord, they were accustomed to say, that from thence they drew the Holy Ghost, and to quote, as their authority, that prediction of Isaiah, 'With joy shall ye draw water from the wells of salvation.' They had a tradition, that in this very ordinance, the Spirit had been known to descend on their prophets, and they had distinctly respect, in the ceremony of the water, to the promises of the Spirit being abundantly poured out in the day of Messiah's glory."

TABITHA, a Christian widow, who lived at Joppa, and who, having fallen sick and died, was restored to life through the intercession of the apostle Peter. Acts ix. 36. She was celebrated for her charity to the poor.

TABLE. The tables in Eastern countries were constructed of three different parts or separate tables. One was placed at the upper end crossways, and the two others joined to its ends, one on each side, so as to leave an open space between, by which the attendants could wait at all the three. Round these tables were placed couches, one to each table, called a clinium, and the three couches together received the name of a triclinium. These couches were formed of mattresses, and supported on frames of wood often highly ornamented; the mattresses were covered with cloth or tapestry, according to the rank of the entertainer. The mode of reclining at table has been already described at length under the article ACCOMMODATION.

TABLES OF THE LAW. Those that were given to Moses upon Mount Sinai were written by the finger of God, and contained the decalogue or ten commandments of the law, as they are rehearsed in Exod. xx.

TABOR, a mountain in the confines of Issachar, having the lands of Zebulon on the north. It stands apart, rising about a thousand feet from the plain; and its figure, according to Burekhardt, is that of a truncated cone. Tabor commands the finest prospect which is anywhere to be had of the great plain of Esdraelon; the condition of the fields around, as seen from its summit, is such as powerfully to remind the spectator of the denunciation of the prophet: "I beheld, and, lo, the fruitful place was a wilderness, and all the cities thereof were broken down at the presence of the Lord, and by his fierce anger." Jer. iv. 26. Since the time of Jerome, this has generally been believed to be the Mount of Transfiguration.

Van Egmont and Heyman give the following account: "This mountain, though somewhat rugged and difficult, we ascended on horseback, making several circuits round it, which took up about three quarters of an hour. It is one of the highest in the whole country, being thirty stadia, or about four English miles, a circumstance that rendered it more famous. And it is the most beautiful I ever saw, with regard to verdure, being every where decorated with small oak trees, and the ground universally enamelled with a variety of plants and flowers, except on the south side, where it is not so fully covered with verdure. On this mountain are great numbers of red partridges, and some wild boars; and we were so fortunate as to see the Arabs hunting them. We left, but not without reluctance, this delightful place, and found at the bottom of it a mean village, called Deboura, or Tabour—a name said to be derived from the celebrated Deborah mentioned in Judges."

"From the top of Tabor," says Maundrell, "you have a prospect which, if nothing else, will reward the labour of ascending it. It is impossible for man's eyes to behold a higher gratification of this nature. On the north-west you discern at a distance the Mediterranean, and all round you have the spacious and beautiful plains of Esdraelon and Galilee. Turning a little southward, you have in view the high mountains of Gilboa, fatal to Saul and his sons. Due east you discover the Sea of Tiberias, distant about one day's journey. A few points to the north appears that which they call the Mount of Beatitudes. Not far from this little hill is the city of Saphet: it stands upon a very eminent and conspicuous mountain, and is seen far and near." Beyond this is seen a much higher mountain, capped with snow—a part of the chain of Antilibanus. To the south-west is Carmel, and on the south the hills of Samaria.

This mountain is thus described by Messrs Bonar and M'Cheyne: "Tabor is about a thousand feet above the plain, answering well to the description, 'An high mountain apart.' Its level top, about a mile in circumference, covered with groups of fine trees and brushwood, affords a spot of complete retirement in the very midst of the land. If this was really the scene of the transfiguration, there is a difficulty arising from the fact, that both a fortress and a village once stood on its top, though otherwise it would not be easy to find a spot in this world more suitable for that heavenly transaction. It is a solemn thing to feel that you are treading the very ground on which holy beings have walked; and here we believed we were on ground called by Peter 'The holy mount,' hallowed by the visit of Moses and Elias, by the presence of the transfigured Saviour himself, and by the voice of God the Father, when he spake from the excellent glory, 'This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased: hear ye him.' Barak assembled his ten thousand men on this hill, in company with Deborah; and in the plain at its foot, not a few learned men have supposed that the armies of Antichrist (gathered together to the place called Armageddon) are to be destroyed by the Lamb, when the great day of his wrath is come."

TABORITES, the followers of John Huss, so called from the fortified city of Tabor, erected on a mountain, in the circle of Bechin, in Bohemia, which had been consecrated by the field-preaching of Huss.

TABRET, one of the musical instruments in use among the Jews. It seems to have been the same with the timbrel, and to have resembled the modern tambourine. Both among the Jews and the Egyptians it seems to have been most commonly played on by females, and was generally employed on festive occasions. Thus, Exod. xv. 20: "And Miriam the prophetess, the sister of Aaron, took a timbrel in her hand; and all the women went out after her with timbrels and with dances."

TACHES, hooks, clasps, or latches of gold and brass, for fastening together the curtains of the tabernacle. Exod. xxvi. 6, 11.

TADMOR, which signifies a palm-tree, anciently the principal city of Arabia Deserta. It is called by Europeans Palmyra, and by the Arabs Thadmor. It was built by Solomon, probably as a fortified place, on the borders of his dominions. It is still famous for its architectural ruins. The Scriptures term it "Tadmor in the Wilderness." 1 Kings ix. 18; 2 Chron. viii. 4. Josephus says that it was selected by Solomon as a site for building a city on account of its springs of water and its verdure. Such has been the ancient splendour and magnificence of this city, that it is termed the "Queen of the Desert." Mr Burekhardt represents the first view of this city, now a mass of ruins, as beautiful beyond description. "In the space covered by these ruins," says Volney, "we sometimes find a palace of which nothing remains but the court and walls; sometimes a temple, whose peristyle is half thrown down; and now a portico, a gallery, or a triumphal arch. Here stand groups of columns, whose symmetry is destroyed by the fall of many of them; there we see them ranged in rows of such length, that, similar to rows of trees, they deceive the sight, and assume the appearance of continued walls. If from this striking scene we cast our eyes upon the ground, another almost as varied presents itself. On all sides we behold nothing but subverted shafts, some whole, others shattered to pieces or dislocated in their joints; and on which side soever we look, the earth is strewed with vast stones half buried, with broken entablatures, mutilated friezes, disfigured reliefs, effaced sculptures, violated tombs, and altars defiled by dust."

TAHPANHES, an Egyptian city, supposed to be Daphnæ Pelucie, situated sixteen miles from Pelusium. It seems to have been a place of considerable importance, and the burial place of Jeremiah.

TALENT, a weight among the Jews containing three thousand shekels; which, if a shekel of silver be reckoned at three shillings, a talent of it will amount to four hundred and fifty pounds sterling, and one of gold to sixteen times as much, viz., seven thousand two hundred pounds. But we, supposing a shekel of silver to be considerably less, viz., two shillings three pence and three-eighths, compute the talent of silver at three hundred and forty-two pounds three shillings and nine pence; and a talent of gold at five thousand four hundred and ninety-five pounds sterling. Exod. xxxviii. 24, 27. The weight of a Jewish talent for weighing silver was one hundred and thirteen pounds ten ounces one pennyweight ten grains and two-sevenths; but their talent used in weighing other things was perhaps a fifth part heavier. The Egyptian talent was eighty-six pounds and almost nine ounces. They had a talent at Antioch that weighed three hundred and ninety pounds and about three ounces and a half. (See MONEY.) Whatever means of grace and usefulness God gives to men, are called pounds and talents; and to some he gives these in greater, and to others in less proportion; but all ought to improve what they receive, and must give account of their use thereof. Matt. xxv. 15–29; Luke xix. To mark the infinite disproportion between the injuries done by us to God and those done by men to us, the former are called ten thousand talents, and the latter one hundred pence. Matt. xviii. 24, 28; Zech. v. 7; Rev. xvi. 21.

TALMUD (from the Hebrew, lamad, to teach), the great depository of the doctrines and opinions of the Jews. There are two works which bear this name, the Talmud of Jerusalem and the Talmud of Babylon. Each of these is composed of two parts—the Mishna, which is the text, and is common to both; and the Gemara, or commentary.

The Mishna, which comprehends all the laws, institutions, and rules of life (which, besides the ancient Hebrew Scriptures, the Jews thought themselves bound to observe), was composed, according to the unanimous testimony of the Jews, about the close of the second century. It was the work of Rabbi Jehuda (or Juda) Hakkadosh, who was the ornament of the school of Tiberias, and is said to have occupied him forty years. The commentaries and additions which succeeding rabbies made, were collected by Rabbi Jochanan Ben Eliezer, some say in the fifth, others say in the sixth, and others in the seventh century, under the name of Gemara; that is, completion, because it completed the Talmud. A similar addition was made to the Mishna by the Babylonish doctors in the beginning of the sixth century, according to Enfield; and in the seventh according to others.

The Mishna is divided into six parts, of which every one which is entitled order is formed of treatises; every treatise is divided into chapters, and every chapter into Mishnas or aphorisms. In the first part is discussed whatever relates to seeds, fruits, and trees; in the second, feasts; in the third, women, their duties, their disorders, marriages, divorces, contracts, and nuptials; in the fourth, are treated the damages or losses sustained by beasts or men, of things found, deposits, usuries, rents, farms, partnership in commerce, inheritance, sales and purchases, oaths, witnesses, arrests, idolatry; and here are named those by whom the oral law was received and preserved; in the fifth part are noticed what regards sacrifices and holy things; and the sixth treats on purifications, vessels, furniture, clothes, houses, leprosy, baths, and numerous other articles: all this forms the Mishna.

As the unlearned reader may wish to obtain some notion of rabbinical composition and judgment, we shall gratify his curiosity sufficiently by the following specimen: “Adam’s body was made of the earth of Babylon, his head of the land of Israel, his other members of the other parts of the world. R. Meir thought he was compact of the earth gathered out of the whole earth, as it is written, ‘Thine eyes did see my substance.’ Now it is elsewhere written, ‘The eyes of the Lord are over all the earth.’ R. Aha expressly marks the twelve hours in which his various parts were formed. His stature was from one end of the world to the other; and it was for his transgression that the Creator, laying his hand in anger on him, lessened him; ‘for before,’ says R. Eleazer, ‘with his hand he reached the firmament.’ R. Jehuda thinks his sin was heresy; but R. Isaac thinks that it was nourishing his foreskin.”

The Talmud of Babylon is most valued by the Jews; and this is the book which they mean to express when they talk of the Talmud in general. An abridgment of it was made by Maimonides in the twelfth century, in which he rejected some of its greatest absurdities. The Gemara is stuffed with dreams and chimeras, with many ignorant and impertinent questions, and the style is very coarse. The Mishna is written in a style comparatively pure, and may be very useful in explaining passages of the New Testament, where the phraseology is similar. This is, indeed, the only use to which Christians can apply it; but this renders it valuable. Lightfoot has judiciously availed himself of such information as he could derive from it. Some of the popes, with a barbarous zeal, and a timidity of spirit for the success of the Christian religion, which the belief of its divinity can never excuse, ordered great numbers of the Talmud to be burned. Gregory IX. burned about twenty cart-loads; and Paul IV. ordered twelve thousand copies of the Talmud to be destroyed. (See MISHNA.) The last edition of the Talmud of Babylon was printed at Amsterdam, in twelve vols. folio; the Talmud of Jerusalem is in one large volume, folio.

TAMAR. See JUDAH.

TAMMUS, the tenth month of the Hebrew civil year, and the fourth of the sacred year. See MONTH—YEAR.

TAMMUZ, a pagan idol, mentioned in Ezek. viii. 14, where the women are represented as weeping for it. It is generally thought that Tammuz was the same deity as ADONIS; to which article the reader is referred, as also to the article IDOLATRY.

TAPESTRY, cloth beautifully figured in the loom, or with the needle. It was used in the East as early as the age of Solomon. The crusaders seem to have introduced the art of making it into Europe about five or six hundred years ago. The English and Flemish first distinguished themselves in making it, but the French knew little of it till within one hundred and fifty years back. It is used to cover beds, and to hang fine rooms. Its figures are frequently formed with threads of gold. Prov. vii. 16.

TAPPUAH, or the apple city, belonging to the tribe of Ephraim, and probably the same as En-tappuah mentioned in Josh. xvii. 7, 8. There was another city of this name belonging to the tribe of Judah.

TARES. (Matt. xiii. 25–30.) It is not easy to determine what plant or weed is here intended, as the word zizania is neither mentioned in any other part of Scripture, nor in any ancient Greek writer. Some Greek and Latin fathers have made use of it, as have also Suidas and Phavorinus; but it is probable that they have all derived it from this text. As this gospel was first written in Syriae, it is probably a word belonging to that language. Buxtorf in his Rabbinical Lexicon gives several interpretations. Parkhurst and Dr Campbell render it "the darnel;" "lolium temulentum." The same plant is called "zizania" by the Spaniards; as it appears to be "zuva" by the Turks and Arabs. "It is well known to the people of Aleppo," says M. Forskal. "It grows among corn. If the seeds remain mixed with the meal, they occasion dizziness to those who eat of the bread. The reapers do not separate the plant; but after the threshing, they reject the seeds by means of a van or sieve." Other travellers mention, that in some parts of Syria the plant is drawn up by the hand in the time of harvest, along with the wheat, and is then gathered out, and bound up in separate bundles. In the parable of the tares, our Lord states the very same circumstances. They grew among the grain; they were not separated by the tillers, but suffered to grow up together till the harvest; they were then gathered from among the wheat with the hand, and bound up in bundles. This is referred to by our Lord in allusion to God's sparing mercy towards the wicked in this life.

TARGUM, a name given to the Chaldee paraphrases of the books of the Old Testament. They are called paraphrases or expositions, because they are rather comments and explications, than literal translations of the text. They are written in the Chaldee tongue, which became familiar to the Jews after the time of their captivity in Babylon, and was more known to them than the Hebrew itself; so that when the Hebrew text was read in the synagogue, or in the temple, they generally added to it an explication in the Chaldee tongue for the service of the people, who had but a very imperfect knowledge of the Hebrew tongue. It is probable that even from the time of Ezra this custom began, since this learned scribe, reading the law to the people in the temple, explained it, with the other priests that were with him, to make it understood by the people. Neh. viii. 7, 9.

But though the custom of making these sorts of expositions in the Chaldee language be very ancient among the Hebrews, yet they have no written paraphrases, or Targums, before the era of Onkelos and Jonathan, who lived about the time of our Saviour. Jonathan is placed about thirty years before Christ, under the reign of Herod the Great. Onkelos is something more modern. The Targum of Onkelos is the most of all esteemed, and copies are to be found in which it is inserted verse for verse with the Hebrew. It is so short, and so simple, that it cannot be suspected of being corrupted. This paraphrast wrote only upon the books of Moses; and his style approaches nearly to the purity of the Chaldee, as it is found in Daniel and Ezra. This Targum is quoted in the Mishna, but was not known either to Eusebius, Jerome, or Origen.

The Targum of Jonathan, son of Uziel, is upon the greater and lesser prophets. He is much more diffuse than Onkelos, and especially upon the lesser prophets, where he takes greater liberties, and runs on in allegories. His style is pure enough, and approaches pretty near the Chaldee of Onkelos. It is thought that the Jewish doctors, who lived above seven hundred years after him, made some additions to him.

The Targum of Joseph the Blind is upon the Hagiographa. This author is much more modern, and less esteemed, than those we have now mentioned. He has written upon the Psalms, Job, the Proverbs, the Canticles, Ecclesiastes, Ruth, and Esther. His style is a very corrupt Chaldee, with a great mixture of words from foreign languages.

The Targum of Jerusalem is only upon the Pentateuch; nor is that entire or perfect. There are whole verses wanting, others transposed, others mutilated; which has made many of opinion that this is only a fragment of some ancient paraphrase that is now lost. There is no Targum upon Daniel, or upon the books of Ezra and Nehemiah.

These Targums are of great use for the better understanding, not only of the Old Testament, on which they are written, but also of the New. As to the Old Testament, they serve to vindicate the genuineness of the present Hebrew text, by proving it to be the same that was in use when these Targums were made, contrary to the opinion of those who think the Jews corrupted it after the time of our Saviour. They help to explain many words and phrases in the Hebrew original, and they hand down to us many of the ancient customs of the Jews; and some of them, with the phraseology, idioms, and peculiar forms of speech which are found in them, do, in many instances, help as much for the illustration and better understanding of the New Testament as of the Old, the Jerusalem Chaldee dialect, in which they are written, being the vulgar language of the Jews in our Saviour's time. They also very much serve the Christian cause against the modern Jews, by interpreting many of the prophecies of the Old Testament respecting the Messiah in the same manner as the Christians do. The best edition of these Targums is that in Buxtorf's great Hebrew Bible, Basle, 1610.

TARSHISH, or TARSUS, the son of Javan, and who probably founded Tarshish, or Tarsus, in Cilicia, and gave his name to the country. He was, perhaps, the father of the Etrusci in Italy. Probably different places are called TARSHISH. Sometimes Tarshish seems to denote the sea in general, so called from its greenish colour, as Isa. lx. 9; Ps. xlviii. 7. Sometimes it seems to mean Carthage in Africa, or Tartessus in Spain (Isa. xxiii. 6); for in vain would the Tyrians have fled from Nebuchadnezzar or Alexander to Tarsus in Cilicia. Hiller will have Tarshish to signify the country of the Celtæ in Gaul, Spain, &c. Ps. lxxii. 10. But there must still be another Tarshish, to which Solomon traded from the Red Sea, and for which Jehoshaphat fitted out his fleet.

TARSUS, in Cilicia, was the capital city of the country, and built on the river Cydnus, about six miles from the sea, and which, Strabo says, was built by Sardanapalus, the king of Assyria. It is said once to have equalled Athens and Alexandria in polite learning. Julius Cæsar bestowed on it the same privileges as Rome had; and hence Paul, from being born here, was free-born. To show their gratitude, the inhabitants changed the name of the city into Julio polis, or the city of Julius. During the wars of the Greek emperors with the Persians and Saracens, this city suffered much; and it is at present of no importance. Christianity was planted here by Paul, and has never since been wholly extinct. Perhaps this is the Tarshish for which Jonah set out. Jonah i. 3.

TAVERNS, THE THREE, a place on the Appian Way, about thirty-three miles south from Rome, where there appears to have been three taverns or small inns. It is mentioned, Acts xxviii. 15.

TEACHER. See MINISTER OF THE GOSPEL—PASTOR.

TEACHING is an important branch of the commission which Christ gave to his apostles before he left the earth. "Go," said he, "teach all nations;" or, as we have it recorded by another of the evangelists, "Preach the gospel to every creature." In this way they were to make disciples, as the word mathetēusate imports. It is one of the precious promises of the new covenant, that all its subjects shall be "taught of the Lord." Isa. liv. 13. The Lord Jesus quoted these words in the days of his public ministry (Johu vi. 45), and describes the effect of this teaching thus: "Every man, therefore, that hath heard, and hath learned of the Father, cometh unto me;" which he afterwards explains to mean neither more nor less than believing on him.

TEARS. The prayer of David, "Put my tears into thy bottle," is unintelligible without an acquaintance with ancient customs. "This passage," says Burder, "seems to intimate, that the custom of putting tears into the anpullæ, or urnal lachrymals, so well known amongst the Romans, was more anciently in use among the Eastern nations, and particularly the Hebrews. These urns were of different materials—some of glass, some of earth, as may be seen in the work of Moutfaucon, where also may be seen the various forms or shapes of them. These urns were placed on the sepulchres of the deceased, as a memorial of the distress and affection of their surviving relations and friends. It will be difficult to account for this expression of the Psalmist but upon this supposition. If this be allowed, the meaning will be, 'Let my distress, and the tears I shed in consequence of it, be ever before thee, excite thy kind remembrance of me, and plead with thee to grant the relief I stand in need of.'"

TEBETH, the Babylonish name of the tenth ecclesiastical month of the Hebrews. See MONTH.

TE DEUM, the title of a well-known hymn used in the morning service of the Church of England, and also by the Roman Catholic Church. Its authorship has been much disputed. Some attribute it to Jerome and Augustine jointly, others to Ambrose. Its use in the Church can be traced no higher than the middle of the sixth century, and accordingly it has sometimes been ascribed to Nicetius, Bishop of Triers, in A.D. 535, but it is impossible to speak with confidence on this point.

TEKEL (he was weighed), one of the words that appeared written on the wall at the sacrilegious feast of Belshazzar; indicating that this wretched prince had been weighed in the balance of heaven, and was found wanting. Dan. v. 25. See BELSHAZZAR—DANIEL.

TEKOA, a city of Judah (2 Chron. xi. 6), which Eusebius and Jerome place twelve miles south from Jerusalem. The wilderness of Tekoa, mentioned 2 Chron. xx. 20, is not far from the Red Sea.

TEL-ABIB, a place of Chaldea, situated between the rivers Chebar and Saoceras. Ezek. iii. 15.

TELEM, a city in the south of Judea, where Saul mustered his forces to march against the ancient Amalekites.

TELEOLOGY, the science of final causes. Bacon compares them to the vestal virgins. "Like them," says he, "they are dedicated to God and are barren." Commenting on this, Dr Whewell remarks, "They are barren, not by imperfection of their nature, but that they might be kept pure and undefiled, and fit ministers in the temple of God." See CREATION—EXISTENCE OF GOD.

TEMA, a son of Ishmael, Gen. xxv. 15, who is supposed to have peopled the northern part of the Arabian desert, which still bears this name among the Arabs.

TEMAN, a grandson of Esau, Gen. xxxvi. 11, 15, who seems to have given origin to a people on the east of Idumea. According to Eusebius, it was situated five miles from Petra in Arabia Petrea. See EDM.

TEMPER, the disposition of the mind, whether natural or acquired. The word is seldom used by good writers without an epithet; as, a good or a bad temper. Temper must be distinguished from passion. The passions are quick and strong emotions, which by degrees subside. Temper is the disposition which remains after these emotions are past, and which forms the habitual propensity of the soul.

TEMPERANCE, that virtue which a man is said to possess who moderates and restrains his sensual appetite. It is often, however, used in a much more general sense, as synonymous with moderation, and is then applied indiscriminately to all the passions.

"Temperance," says Addison, "has those particular advantages above all other means of health, that it may be practised by all ranks and conditions, at any season, or in any place. It is a kind of regimeu into which every man may put himself without interruption to business, expense of money, or loss of time. Physic, for the most part, is nothing else but the substitute of exercise or temperance."

In order to obtain and practise this virtue, we should consider it—1. As a divine command. Phil. iv. 5; Luke xxi. 34; Prov. xxiii. 1-3. 2. As conducive to health. 3. As advantageous to the powers of the mind. 4. As a defence against injustice, lust, imprudence, detraction, poverty, &c. And, lastly, the example of Christ should be a most powerful stimulus to it. See ABSTINENCE—INTEMPERANCE—SOBRIETY.

TEMPLARS, TEMPLERS, or KNIGHTS OF THE TEMPLE, a religious order instituted at Jerusalem in the beginning of the twelfth century, for the defence of the holy sepulchre and the protection of Christian pilgrims. They were first called The Poor of the Holy City, and afterwards assumed the appellation of Templars, because their house was near the temple. The order was founded by Baldwin II., then king of Jerusalem, with the concurrence of the pope; and the principal articles of their rule were, that they should hear the holy office throughout every day; or that, when their military duties should prevent this, they should supply it by a certain number of paternosters; that they should abstain from flesh four days in the week, and on Fridays from eggs and milk meats; that each knight might have three horses and one squire; and that they should neither hunt nor fowl. After the ruin of Jerusalem, about 1186, they spread themselves through Germany, and other countries of Europe, to which they were invited by the liberality of the Christians. In the year 1228, this order acquired stability by being confirmed in the council of Troyes, and subjected to a rule of discipline drawn up by St Bernard. In every nation they had a particular governor, called Master of the Temple, or of the militia of the temple. Their grand master had his residence at Paris. The order of Templars flourished for some time, and acquired, by the valour of its knights, immense riches, and an eminent degree of military renown; but, as their prosperity increased, their vices were multiplied; and their arrogance, luxury, and cruelty rose at last to such a great height, that their privileges were revoked, and their order suppressed with the most terrible circumstances of infamy and severity.

TEMPLE, a public building erected for religious worship; more especially, the temple at Jerusalem.

According to the opinion of some writers, there were among the Jews three temples; namely, the first, erected by Solomon; the second, by Zerubbabel, and Joshua the high priest; and the third by Herod, a few years before the birth of Christ. But this opinion is, very properly, rejected by the Jews, who do not allow the third to be a new temple, but only the second temple repaired and beautified: and this opinion corresponds with the prophecy of Haggai (ii. 9), that "the glory of this latter house," the temple built by Zerubbabel, "should be greater than of the former:" which prediction was uttered with reference to the Messiah's honouring it with his presence and ministry.

The temple stood upon Mount Moriah, a hard limestone rock, nearly surrounded by precipices, on the eastern side of Jerusalem. The summit was levelled to erect it, and as the extent even then was not sufficient for the building and its courts, a terrace was raised from the valley beneath, by constructing a wall in some places not less than seven hundred feet high. Thus the temple and its courts were placed on the brow of a terrific precipice. But much of the valley has been filled up during the two thousand five hundred years which have elapsed since the building was first erected.

The attentive reader of Scripture cannot view even the picture of this remarkable site, without having his mind drawn to considerations similar to those suggested by Lightfoot. This bank was once well stored with bushes and brambles, Gen. xxii. 13, and afterwards with worse briers and thorns, the Jebusites, who had it in possession till David purchased it for divine use and the structure we have described. Here was then a poor threshing floor of Ornan, the Jebusite, but afterwards the habitation of the God of Jacob; a place and fabric as sumptuous and eminent as it was possible for man, and art, and cost to make it; the glory of the nation where it was, and the wonder of all the nations round about it; but at last as great a wonder and monument of desolation and ruin, as ever it had been of beauty and glory.

From the particulars given in the Bible, and those related by Jewish writers, we learn that the plan of the temple was similar to that of the tabernacle, but it was considerably larger. There were also similar utensils and articles for the sacred services, but they were, in some instances, larger or more numerous. This superb edifice, as constructed by Solomon, consisted of the holy place, and a holy of holies, as in the tabernacle; the main building being about one hundred and ten feet long, thirty-six wide, and fifty-four high. This pile was surrounded on each side, except the entrance, by three storeys of small rooms, about eight feet square, which reached to about half the height of the body of the temple. The east end, or front, was a magnificent portico, which rose to the height of two hundred and twenty feet. Thus the form of the whole pile would not be unlike that of some ancient churches, which have a lofty tower in front, and a low aisle extending along each side of the main building. The principal structure was surrounded by several courts and a variety of other buildings, some of which are mentioned in the books of Kings and Chronicles; but of which it is impossible now to give any correct plan or complete account. The daily services in Solomon's temple are briefly stated by Abijah, in his remonstrance to Jeroboam and the Israelites, 2 Chron. xiii. 10, 11, "The priests, which minister to the Lord, are the sons of Aaron, and the Levites wait upon their business: and they burn unto the Lord, every morning and every evening, burnt sacrifices and sweet incense: the shew-bread also set they in order upon the pure table; and the candlestick of gold, with the lamps thereof, to burn every evening." From this passage we see that the daily services of Solomon's temple were the same as those of the tabernacle; and we shall see, from the Jewish writers, that the same services were continued after the captivity.

The beautiful temple, certainly the richest and most highly finished edifice the world ever saw, though not the largest, continued in its original splendour only about thirty years. Shishak, king of Egypt, then took Jerusalem and plundered the temple. Many other circumstances connected with its history are recorded in the books of Kings and Chronicles, and we read that it was burned by the Chaldeans, when it had stood about four hundred and thirty years. See 2 Kings xxv. 13-15; 2 Chron. xxxvi. 17-20.

After the captivity, one of the first cares of the Jews who returned to their beloved country was to rebuild the temple. Various hindrances and delays retarded the progress. It was begun by Zerubbabel, but their means were so scanty, that the aged men who had seen the first house wept with a loud voice when they saw the foundations laid. Ezra iii. 12. Yet the people in general praised the Lord with shouts of joy. To those who had not enjoyed the divine ordinances in their greater glory, the renewal of these services was felt as an especial blessing. Let us learn hence that the day of small things is not to be despised, and let us especially be thankful for the great mercies we now enjoy as to the worship of God.

This second temple stood for about five hundred years, when, being much decayed, Herod the Great undertook to rebuild it. He employed eighteen thousand workmen, for more than nine years, in the work. But, although in that time the main building was completed, other works were undertaken. The courts were farther enlarged, and additional buildings erected, so that in our Saviour's time the Jews could say that forty-six years had passed during its construction. It is calculated that the courts were sufficiently spacious to contain more than half a million of persons at the same time. No expense was spared to render this temple equal, if not superior, in size, as well as in beauty and splendour, to any thing ever seen among mankind.

This temple was destroyed by Titus Vespasian, the Roman general, A.D. 70, and, according to the prediction of our Lord, "not one stone was left upon another." It was attempted to be rebuilt by the Emperor Julian, but he was prevented from accomplishing his purpose.

The word temple denotes, sometimes, the Church of Christ: Paul says, that Antichrist "as God sitteth in the temple of God, showing himself that he is God." 2 Thess. ii. 4. Sometimes it imports heaven: "The Lord is in his holy temple: the Lord's throne is in heaven." Ps. xi. 4. "Him that overcometh will I make a pillar in the temple of my God." Rev. iii. 12. The martyrs in heaven are said to be "before the throne of God, and to serve him day and night in his temple." Rev. vii. 15. The soul of a righteous man is the temple of God, because it is consecrated to his service, and inhabited by the Holy Spirit. 1 Cor. iii. 16, 17, vi. 19; 2 Cor. vi. 16.

TEMPORAL, a term often used for secular, as a distinction from spiritual or ecclesiastical; likewise for anything belonging to time in contrast with eternity. 2 Cor. iv. 18.

TEMPORALITIES OF BISHOPS, are the revenues, lands, tenements, and lay fees, belonging to bishops, as they are barons and lords of parliament.

TEMPTATION, trial, proof. It is used in both a good and a bad sense, according to the design of the agent. God tempted Abraham, by commanding him to offer up his son Isaac (Gen. xxii. 1), intending to prove his obedience and faith, to confirm and strengthen him by this trial, and to furnish in his person an example and pattern of perfect obedience to all succeeding ages. In a different sense it is said (James i. 13), "Let no man say when he is tempted, I am tempted of God: for God cannot be tempted with evil, neither tempteth he any man: but every man is tempted when he is drawn away of his own lust, and enticed." In this sense Satan is called the Tempter. Matt. iv. 3.

Paul says, "God will not suffer us to be tempted above what we are able to bear." 1 Cor. x. 13; see Heb. ii. 18.

Men are said to tempt the Lord, when they unseasonably require proofs of the divine presence, power, or goodness. Without doubt, we are allowed to seek the Lord for his assistance, and to pray him to give us what we need; but it is not allowed us to tempt him, nor to expose ourselves to dangers from which we cannot escape, unless by miraculous interposition of his omnipotence. Exod. xvi.; Numb. xx. 12; Ps. lxxviii. 18, 41, &c.

Men tempt or try one another, when they would know whether things are really what they seem to be; whether men are such as they are thought or desired to be. The queen of Sheba came to prove the wisdom of Solomon, by proposing riddles for him to explain. 1 Kings x. 1; 2 Chron. ix. 1.

By temptation is most usually understood the enticement of a person to commit sin by offering some seeming advantage. There are four things, says one, in temptation: 1. Deception; 2. Infection; 3. Seduction; 4. Perdition.

The sources of temptation are, Satan, the world, and the flesh. We are exposed to them in every state, in every place, and in every time of life. They may be wisely permitted to show us our weakness, to try our faith, to promote our humility, and to teach us to place our dependence on a superior power: yet we must not run into them, but watch and pray; avoid sinful company; consider the love, sufferings, and constancy of Christ, and the awful consequences of falling a victim to them.

The following rules have been laid down, by which we may in some measure know when a temptation comes from Satan: 1. When the temptation is unnatural, or contrary to the general bias or temper of our minds. 2. When it is opposite to the present frame of the mind. 3. When the temptation itself is irrational, being contrary to whatever we could imagine our own minds would suggest to us.

4. When a temptation is detested in its first rising and appearance. 5. Lastly, when it is violent. See SATAN.

TEMPTATION OF CHRIST. The temptation of Christ, of which we read in the 4th chapter of Matthew, has been much the subject of infidel ridicule; and some ingenious writers, to avoid the difficulties of a literal interpretation, have reduced the whole to vision and allegory. But this has increased rather than removed those difficulties. Is it not best always to adhere as closely as possible to the language of inspiration, without glossing it with fancies of our own? And, after all, what is there so inconsistent with reason in this account? That, when our Lord retired to the interior part of the wilderness, the enemy of mankind should assume a disguise (whether human or angelic is not important), and present the most plausible temptation to our Redeemer, under these trying circumstances, is perfectly consistent with the malevolence of his character; but how far he was permitted to exert his power in forming them is not necessary to be inquired. The grand objection is, Why was Satan suffered thus to insult the Son of God? Wherefore did the Redeemer suffer his state of retirement to be thus disturbed with the malicious suggestions of the fiend? May it not be answered, that herein—1. He gave an instance of his own condescension and humiliation. 2. He hereby proved his power over the tempter. 3. He set an example of firmness and virtue to his followers. And, 4. He here affords consolation to his suffering people, by showing not only that he himself was tempted, but is able to succour those who are tempted. Heb. ii. 18, iv. 15.

TEMPTER, an appellation applied by the inspired writers to Satan, the grand adversary of the human race. Matt. iv. 3; 1 Thess. iii. 5. (See the articles DEVIL—SATAN—TEMPTATION.) We have a striking exemplification of the manner in which he carries on his work of tempting the human race, or enticing them to sin, in his conduct towards our first parents (Gen. iii. 1-6); and also in his manner of tempting the Son of God. Matt. iv. 1-11. In both instances we see him labouring to induce others to call in question the divine goodness and veracity.

TENTH. See TITHES.

TENTS. These appear to have been of very early invention. We are told that Jabal was the father of such as dwell in tents. The Arabs are the most remarkable of the wandering tribes, and to understand, therefore, this temporary dwelling-place, we quote from Dr Jamieson's "Eastern Manners" the following account of an Arab tent:—

"It is a rude structure, consisting generally of a row of stakes, twelve or fifteen feet high, stuck into the ground, and converging at the top—on these are laid others in a horizontal position, and over the whole is thrown a covering of goat or camel's hair, forming an inclined plane for the rain to run off—and kept firm by having its extremities stretched down by cords fastened to hooked wooden pegs driven into the ground. The poles on which this simple building rests are full of hooks, on which are hung the few utensils which their habits require—consisting of large bags for water made of tanned camel-skins, goat-skins for milk and butter, a mortar, a hand-mill, wooden bowls, and iron chains for fastening the feet or knees of the cattle. Such are the materials of the tent, which is generally of an oblong figure, not unlike the inverted hull of a ship, or an oblong umbrella. It varies in size according to the amount of persons requiring accommodation in it; and, by simply dropping a curtain at each of the divisions, it may be turned into a number of separate apartments,—an expedient always resorted to where there are women, with whom Eastern manners make it a crime for strangers to mingle. Beneath this canopy of skins or black haircloth, scarcely sufficient to exclude the rain and the dew, the Arab shepherd finds, wherever he wanders, a home in which his attachments centre; supplies the few wants of a nature that is a stranger to the luxuries of artificial life; and, in the proud consciousness of a liberty unbounded as the desert, enjoys a pleasure and elasticity of soul, often unknown to the possessor of a lordly palace. The residence of the chiefs, though consisting of the same slender and movable structure, is as much superior to the squalid tent of a common Arab, as the stately mansion of a noble among us is to the hut of his meanest retainer. Known at once by its position in the centre of the camp, and by a piece of coloured cloth suspended as a flag from the top, it is conspicuous also by its superior dimensions, by the fineness and varied colours of the covering without, and by the air of greater convenience and elegance that reigns within. Besides having a tent of audience, in which they receive those they intend to honour, and separate tents for their wives and domestics, these petty sovereigns, rich, like the patriarchs, in gold and silver, have their residence fitted up in a style corresponding to their rank and their ideas of ornament, and when visited by strangers of importance, display their hospitality with all the parade of splendour and royal ceremony. Around the dwelling of the chief, the tents of his followers are ranged in a line, or more frequently in form of a crescent or a square, the circuit of which varies in size, according to the strength of the tribe, and the area of which serves the double purpose of affording an enclosure to the cattle from the attacks of ravenous beasts by night, and a space for the people to assemble in to receive the commands of the chief, when he gives the signal for departure, or summons them to arms in cases of danger. There is not a more interesting spectacle for the traveller to witness, or the imagination to paint, than one of these portable villages, pitched on a spot where the wild and boundless solitude exhibits nowhere else the slightest traces of life or motion,—with here a group of the swarthy wanderers, with their turbaned head-dress and flowing drapery, squatted on the ground, partaking of their simple repast, or listening with silent curiosity to a tale of wonder; while there others are leading the sheep and the camels to graze or to water."

TENTMAKER. We are informed in Acts xviii. 3, that the Apostle Paul followed the occupation of a tentmaker. It was customary among the Jews for families, even of the higher classes, to train up their children to particular trades. It is not surprising, therefore, that Paul should have learned to work with his hands. Some doubt, however, has existed among the learned, as to the precise nature of the trade which the apostle followed. Luther, Morus, and others, take it to mean a weaver of tapestry; others a maker of mathematical instruments. Others again, as Dindorf and Rosenmüller, admitting that the Greek word employed means tentmaker, suppose that he made those portable tents formed of leather or thick cloth which travellers still use in the East.

Such he might surely manufacture as well as military tents.

TEPHILIM. See FRONTLETS.

TERAH, the father of Abraham. Gen. xi. 24. See ABRAHAM.

TERAPHIM. They seem to have been images—sometimes very small and sometimes large—apparently in the human figure, or at least with a human head; and the Jewish writers say that they were placed in niches, with lamps burning before them. "From the passages of Scripture in which they are mentioned," say the editors of the Pictorial Bible, "it would seem that they were not idols in the worst sense of the word, no primary worship being rendered to them. They were certainly used by persons who had professed the worship of the true God; but as they proved a snare to take away the heart from him, and to divide or supersede that exclusive confidence and trust which he required, we find them denounced by the prophets; and they were doubtless included in the general interdiction of images by the law of Moses. No doubt they often became objects of positively idolatrous homage; but in their general use, before and after the deliverance of the law, they seem to have been popularly considered as not being incompatible with the allegiance due to Jehovah; and there are instances in which we find teraphim connected, in some way or other, with the family and public worship rendered to him. So far as this matter can be understood, it seems to us that these images were considered to fix a protecting and guiding presence to the places in which they were set—protecting, perhaps, as an Oriental talisman is considered to protect; and guiding, as an oracle, which in some way or other was considered to indicate the course that ought to be pursued on occasions of doubt and difficulty. Thus the Danites desired the Levite, who had charge of Micah's teraphim, to ask counsel for them, and he gave them a response as from the Lord. Judges xviii. 5, 6. The prophets also mention them as oracles. Ezekiel, chap. xxi. 21, describes the king of Babylon as using divination—consulting with teraphim; and Zechariah, chap. x. 1, tells the Jews that their teraphim 'have spoken vanity, and the diviners have seen a lie.' Our translation sometimes retains the original word, and at other times renders it 'images' or 'idols.' The Seventy have generally rendered the word by 'oracles;' but in Sam. xvi. 13, 16, they have cenotaphia, as if they thought that the teraphim there meant images placed as sepulchral monuments. Some, however, render this Greek word by 'vain figures.'" The "teraphim" may be defined divining images, and there can be little doubt that they were regarded as a kind of penates, lares, or household gods. They appear to have been employed in false worship for a purpose similar to that of the ephod in the true. Accordingly, the prophet Hosea, chap. iii. 4, in a prediction of the future desolate condition of the Jews, says, "They shall be without an image, and without an ephod, and without teraphim," or, as it should probably be rendered, "without an ephod, even teraphim,"—the word "without" not occurring in the original; as if in their degenerate state the ephod were in God's sight no better than the teraphim. The drift of the passage is to predict that they should be reduced to such extremities, that they should neither have the implements of the worship of the true God nor of idols.

TERTIUS, Paul's amanuensis in writing his epistle to the Romans. Rom. xvi. 22. Lightfoot conjectures that he was the same as Silas, this Syriac name signifying the same as the Latin Tertius.

TESTAMENT is commonly taken in Scripture for the covenant, the law, the promises. See COVENANT.

TESTAMENT, NEW. The religious institution of Jesus Christ, says Dr Campbell, is frequently denominated kainē diathēkē, which is almost always rendered the new testament; yet the word diathēkē by itself is generally translated covenant. It is the Greek word whereby the Seventy have uniformly translated the Hebrew word berith, which our translators have invariably translated covenant. That the Hebrew term corresponds much better to the English word covenant than to testament, there can be no question; yet the word diathēkē, in classical use, is more frequently rendered testament. The proper Greek word for covenant is sunthēkē, which is not found in the New Testament, and occurs only thrice in the Septuagint, where it is never employed for rendering the word berith.

The term New is added to distinguish it from the old covenant, that is, the dispensation of Moses. The two covenants are always in Scripture the two dispensations: that under Moses is the old, that under the Messiah is the new. In the latitude wherein the term is used in holy writ, the command, under the sanction of death, which God gave to Adam, may, with sufficient propriety, be termed a covenant; but it is never so called in Scripture; and when mention is made of the two covenants, the old and the new, or the first and the second, there appears to be no reference to any thing that related to Adam. In all such places, Moses and Jesus are contrasted—the Jewish economy and the Christian—Mount Sinai, in Arabia, where the law was promulgated, and Mount Zion, in Jerusalem, where the gospel was first published.

These terms, from signifying the two dispensations, came soon to denote the books wherein they were written, the sacred writings of the Jews being called the Old Testament, and the writings superadded by the apostles and evangelists, the New Testament. An example of the use of the former appellation we have in 2 Cor. iii. 14: "Until this day remaineth the veil untaken away in the reading of the Old Testament."

TESTAMENT, OLD. See BIBLE—SCRIPTURE.

TESTIMONY, and TESTIMONIES, are terms often used by the scriptural writers to denote the whole revelation which God hath graciously given to the children of men, as the rule of their faith and practice. Ps. xix. 7. In this extensive sense the Psalmist uses the latter term throughout the whole of the 119th Psalm. See verses 2, 14, 22, 24, 31, 36, 46, 59, 79, 99, 111, 119, 125, 129, 138, 144, 152, 157, 168, &c. The two tables of stone, on which the law or ten commandments were written, are also called the testimony (Exod xxv. 16–22, xxxi. 18), because they were a witness of the covenant between God and his people; and hence the ark in which they were deposited is termed "The ark of the testimony." Exod. xxv. 22. And in the New Testament, the gospel is frequently termed "The testimony." It is the testimony of God, for it contains that which he hath testified of his Son, namely, that in him he is well pleased, as the substitute and representative of all his guilty people, and as delivered for their offences, and raised again for their justification. Matt. iii. 17, xvii. 5; John iii. 32. It is the testimony of Christ also, and of his apostles. 1 Cor. i. 6; 2 Thess. i. 10; 2 Tim. i. 8. See the articles EVIDENCE—INSPIRATION—FAITH—GOSPEL—TRUTH, &c.

TETRARCH, a sovereign of the fourth part of a state, province, or kingdom. Matt. xiv. 1; Luke iii. 1, 19, ix. 7; Acts xiii. 1. It was a title frequent among the descendants of Herod the Great, to whom the Roman emperors distributed their dominions at their pleasure. But the word tetrarch ought not to be understood rigorously, as it was occasionally given to a prince who possessed, perhaps, a half, or a third part, of a state.

THADDEUS, the surname of Jude the apostle. See JUDE.

THANKFULNESS. See GRATITUDE—THANKSGIVING.

THANKSGIVING, that part of divine worship wherein we acknowledge benefits received.

"It implies," says Dr Barrow, "1. A right apprehension of the benefits conferred. 2. A faithful retention of benefits in the memory, and frequent reflections upon them. 3. A due esteem and valuation of benefits. 4. A reception of those benefits with a willing mind, a vehement affection. 5. Due acknowledgment of our obligations. 6. Endeavours of real compensation; or, as it respects the Divine Being, a willingness to serve and exalt him. 7. Esteem, veneration, and love of the benefactor."

The blessings for which we should be thankful are—1. Temporal; such as health, food, raiment, rest, &c. 2. Spiritual; such as the Bible, ordinances, the gospel and its blessings; as free grace, adoption, pardon, justification, calling, &c. 3. Eternal, or the enjoyment of God in a future state. Also for all that is past, what we now enjoy, and what is promised; for private and public, for ordinary and extraordinary blessings; for prosperity, and even adversity, so far as rendered subservient to our good.

The excellency of this duty appears, if we consider—1. Its antiquity: it existed in paradise before Adam fell, and therefore prior to the graces of faith, repentance, &c. 2. Its sphere of operation; being far beyond many other graces which are confined to time and place. 3. Its felicity: some duties are painful; as repentance, conflict with sin, &c.; but this is a source of sublime pleasure. 4. Its reasonableness. And, 5. Its perpetuity. This will be in exercise for ever, when other graces will not be necessary, as faith, repentance, &c.

The obligation to this duty arises—1. From the relation we stand in to God. 2. The divine command. 3. The promises God hath made. 4. The example of all good men. 5. Our unworthiness of the blessings we receive. And, 6. The prospect of eternal glory.

THARSHISH. See TARSHISH.

THEBET, the tenth month of the Hebrew holy year; the fourth of the civil year. See YEAR—MONTH.

THEBEZ, a city of Ephraim, in the neighbourhood of Shechem, about thirteen miles west from BETHLEHEM (which see). According to Eusebius and Jerome, it continued till their time, or to about four hundred years after Christ, but at the present day it has wholly disappeared. Judg. ix. 50.

THEFT, the taking away the property of another without his knowledge or consent. This is not only a sin against our neighbour, but a direct violation of that part of the decalogue which says, "Thou shalt not steal."

This law requires justice, truth, and faithfulness, in all our dealings with men; to owe no man any thing, but to give to all their dues; to be true to all engagements, promises, and contracts; and to be faithful in whatever is committed to our care and trust. It forbids all unjust ways of increasing our own and hurting our neighbour's substance, by using false balances and measures; by overreaching and circumventing in trade and commerce; by taking away by force or fraud the goods, persons, and properties of men; by borrowing and not paying again; by oppression, extortion, and unlawful usury. It may include in it, also, what is very seldom called by this name, namely, the robbing of ourselves and families, by neglecting our callings, or imprudent management thereof; lending larger sums of money than our circumstances will bear, when there is no prospect of payment; by being profuse and excessive in our expenses; indulging unlawful pleasures, and thereby reducing our families to poverty; or even, on the other hand, by laying up a great deal for the time to come, while our families are left to starve, or reduced to the greatest inconvenience and distress. See FRAUD—THIEF.

THEODICY, a word which, since the times of the celebrated German philosopher Leibnitz, who published a work on the subject, has been employed to denote the justification of God in the existence of physical and moral evil—a problem of extreme difficulty, and which has occupied the attention of the most profound and able theologians of every age. See SIN.

THEOLOGY (from theos, God, and logos, doctrine, the doctrine or science of God and divine things) signifies that science which treats of the being and attributes of God, his relations to us, the dispensations of his providence, his will with respect to our actions, and his purposes with respect to our end.

THEOLOGY, APOLOGETIC. This is the department of theology which is preliminary to the study of theology proper, or the contents of the divine record. There are three grand questions, which may be said to embrace the whole of this department of study. They are thus clearly stated by Dr Bannerman:—1. Can reason, unaided from above, by means of its own discoveries of divine truth, supersede the possibility, or at all events the necessity, of a supernatural revelation from God? or, on the contrary, does reason by what it accomplishes supply the basis, and by what it does not accomplish provide room, for such a revelation? 2. Have we sufficient evidence of the fact that a supernatural revelation from God has been actually communicated to man? 3. Have we a complete and infallible record of that revelation?

THEOLOGY, EXEGETICAL. The great design of exegetical theology, or the study of the Scriptures in their original form, is that the mind of the student, and eventual instructor of the people in the knowledge of divine truth, may be brought into a state of close and habitual contact with the minds of the inspired writers themselves, in the first instance, by the medium of the identical expressions in which the revelation of the will of God was directly imparted to their minds, and by them committed to writing in that very form in which they received it, and in which it has been transmitted to ourselves. In this view, we have the means of receiving the divine truths into our own minds by direct communion with the minds of those who themselves received them from the primary source of all truth; there is nothing interposed between our minds and theirs, but the very phraseology itself in which they were divinely directed to impart the knowledge which they were appointed to convey; and as the words in which they consigned it to writing, and which we still find in the inspired documents that have been preserved safe and entire, are the very words of the Spirit of God, we are thus brought by human instrumentality into direct communion with the very source itself of inspiration, and have thus the means of receiving the divine communication into our own minds from the pure fountain without any risk of that contamination that would unavoidably result if the reception were to take place through a variety of subordinate and successive channels of transmission.

THEOLOGY, NATURAL. By natural theology is understood that knowledge of God which the light of nature teaches, or which is acquired by our unassisted powers, by the exercise of reason, and the suggestions of conscience. It is not meant that there is in the human mind an innate idea of God,—a supposition manifestly absurd, and contradicted by experience, for individuals have been found in a savage state in whom there was no such idea; but that man, by contemplating the objects around him, is led to infer the existence of an invisible Being by whom they were created, possessed of certain perfections, the signatures of which are perceived upon his works; and from this first principle deduces other doctrines of religion, as that this God governs the world; that it is our duty to honour and please him, by the practice of piety, and justice, and benevolence; that the soul is immortal; and that there is a future state, in which the righteous will be rewarded, and the wicked will be punished. These are the great articles of natural theology; and much reason and eloquence have been employed in illustrating them, and demonstrating their truth in opposition to the objection of Atheists. Upon this subject, however, there is a diversity of sentiment. It has been disputed, not only whether these are the only articles, but also whether there is such a thing as natural theology; or, in other words, whether the system which bears that name is discoverable by unassisted reason. There is no doubt that its truths, when proposed, are approved by reason, which supplies the most convincing arguments in support of them; but the question is, whether men, left to themselves, could arrive, by the observation of external things and the reflections of their own minds, at the conclusion that there is one living and eternal Being who created and governs the world, and would connect with it the other doctrines in a regular series.

THEOLOGY, POLEMIC, that department of theology which treats of the controversies or discussions which have taken place in the history of the Church. The leading objects to be kept in view in this branch of study are: 1. To ascertain whether or not the Scripture does afford any materials for deciding the questions that may have been broached or discussed; and if so, to point out what its decision is. 2. To estimate the true value or weight of the topics that may have been brought under discussion, and of the truths and errors that may have been maintained, and to indicate the lessons which the survey may be fitted to suggest as to the way and manner in which the truths may be most successfully defended and the errors most successfully exposed.

THEOLOGY, SYSTEMATIC or DOGMATIC. The object of this department of theology is to state and explain the several doctrines of religion, and to point out the proofs. "In treating this part of the subject," says Dr Dick, "the theologian proceeds in the same manner as a teacher of any other science, who lays before his pupils its constituent principles, and the conclusions which have been drawn from them, together with the train of reasoning upon which they are founded. Having examined the subject with attention and patience, and, as he trusts, with success, he imparts to others the result of his inquiries, to facilitate their progress, and to lead them to the same views which he has adopted from conviction. It is his business, not only to bring forward the several doctrines of religion, and the proofs, but also to exhibit them in their order and connection. It is granted that the Scriptures do not deliver religion to us in that artificial form which we find in the writings of the schoolmen, and of those modern divines who have trodden in their steps, although there is certainly an approach to it in some parts of the Bible, particularly in the Epistle to the Romans; but no man, who is in possession of his senses, and understands what he is saying, will deny that religion is systematic. The Word of God is not an assemblage of writings which have no other relation to each other but juxtaposition, or collocation in the same volume, but a continued revelation of his eternal counsels, 'in which he has abounded towards us in all wisdom and prudence.' There is arrangement here, as well as in his other works, although it may require time and patience to discover it. Religion has a beginning, a middle, and an end. It has first principles, and secondary truths derived from these principles, and precepts founded upon both. The study of the Scriptures is not recommended to us, that we may load our memories with a multitude of unconnected ideas, but that we may bring together and combine the truths which are scattered up and down in them, and thus 'understand what the will of the Lord is.' In the mind of every intelligent reader of the Scriptures, a system is formed, the parts of which, by their union, reflect a new light upon one another; and certainly the utility of this system is not destroyed or diminished by its being committed to writing, or being communicated to others by oral instruction."

THEOPHILUS. To a person of this name the evangelist Luke addresses both his Gospel and the Acts of the Apostles. The name signifies a lover or beloved of God; and the individual appears to have borne a high Christian character, for Luke calls him "most excellent." This title, however, was frequently bestowed on persons of high rank. Thus it is given to Felix, in Acts xxiii. 26, and to Festus, in Acts xxvi. 25. Theophilus, therefore, was probably not only a Christian, but a nobleman.

THERAPEUTÆ, a sect among the Alexandrian Jews, who, as their name imports, strove after a life abstracted from worldly things, and consecrated to the contemplation of God. Neander gives the following account of this sect:—

"Their principal seat was in a quiet and pleasant district on the border of lake Mœris, not far from Alexandria. Here they lived, like the later anchorites, shut up singly in their cells, their only employment being prayer and the contemplation of divine things. The basis of their contemplation was an allegoric interpretation of Scripture, and they had old theosophic writings, which served to guide them in their more profound investigations of Scripture, according to the principles of the Alexandrian Hermeneutics. Bread and water constituted their only diet, and they practised frequent fasting. They ate nothing until evening, for, through contempt of the body, they were ashamed, so long as sunlight was visible, to take sensible nourishment, to acknowledge this dependence on the world of sense. Many of them fasted for three or even six days in succession. Every Sabbath they came together, and as the number seven was particularly sacred with them, they held a still more solemn convocation once in every seven weeks. They celebrated, on this occasion, a simple love-feast, consisting of bread seasoned with salt and hyssop; mystic discourses were delivered, hymns which had been handed down from old tradition were sung, and amidst choral music, dances of mystic import were kept up late into the night."

THESSALONIANS, EPISTLES TO THE. The first Epistle to the Thessalonians is generally admitted to have been one of the earliest written (if indeed it be not the very first) of all St Paul's letters, and we find that he was anxious that it should be read to all the Christian churches in Macedonia. In chap. v. 27, he gives the following command: "I adjure you by the Lord that this Epistle be read unto all the holy brethren." Its genuineness has never been disputed. Polycarp has probably referred to it, and it is certainly quoted and recognised as St Paul's production (together with the second Epistle) by Irenæus, Clement of Alexandria, Tertullian, Caius, Origen, and all subsequent ecclesiastical writers.

The second Epistle to the Thessalonians was evidently written soon after the first (A.D. 52), and from the same place: for Silvanus or Silas, and Timothy, are joined together with the apostle in the inscription of this Epistle as well as of the former. This Epistle was occasioned by the information communicated to Paul by the person who had conveyed his first letter to the Thessalonians, respecting the state of their church. Among other things he was informed, from some expression in it, that many of them expected that the day of judgment would happen in that age: and that such of them as thought the advent of Christ and the end of the world to be at hand, were neglecting their secular affairs, as being inconsistent with a due preparation for that important and awful event. As soon, therefore, as the state of the Thessalonians was made known to Paul, he wrote this second Epistle, to correct their misapprehension, and to rescue them from an error which (appearing to rest on apostolical authority) must ultimately be injurious to the spread of the gospel. This idea seems to have prevailed in some places during the life of the apostle; but he eagerly embraces every opportunity of checking an imagination which, besides being unfounded, was calculated to weaken the diligence of Christians.

THESSALONICA, a chief city of Macedonia, and the capital of Macedonia Secunda. It was anciently called Therma, and is now known by the name of Salonica. In this city, by the labours of the Apostle

Paul, a Christian church was early planted, to which the same apostle addressed two epistles. The modern town is one of the most noted places of trade in Turkey in Europe, and contains a population of about 70,000 souls.

THEUDAS, the name of two impostors who appeared among the Jews, in A.D. 33 and A.D. 45, and who occasioned the death of many who were led away by them. Acts v. 36.

THIEF, one who robs another of his property, whether by fraud or violence. According to the Law of Moses, the thief was compelled to restore many times the value of that which he had stolen. The most gentle punishment was twofold restitution to the owner, who thus obtained a profit for his risk or loss. This punishment was applicable to every case in which the article stolen had neither been sold nor slaughtered. If, however, either of these were the case, the punishment was more severe, being fourfold restitution in the case of a sheep or goat, and probably of other animals except an ox, in which case it was fivefold. The laws in regard to theft are laid down in Exod. xxii. 1-4. Should the thief be too poor to make the required restitution, his whole property was sold, and if necessary he himself was sold for a slave.

THIGH, that part of the body on which the sword of a warrior is hung. A very ancient form of swearing was by putting the hand under the thigh. This was the form observed by Abraham when he took an oath of his servant before he sent him to Padan-Aram to procure a wife for his son Isaac. We find Jacob adopting the same form long afterwards. Gen. xlvii. 29: "And the time drew nigh that Israel must die: and he called his son Joseph, and said unto him, If now I have found grace in thy sight, put, I pray thee, thy hand under my thigh, and deal kindly and truly with me; bury me not, I pray thee, in Egypt." It is probable that the patriarchs put the left hand under the thigh, and stretched out the right hand towards heaven. An ancient mode of expressing sorrow was by smiting upon the thigh. Hence, Jer. xxxi. 19: "Surely after that I was turned, I repented; and after that I was instructed, I smote upon my thigh: I was ashamed, yea, even confounded, because I did bear the reproach of my youth." The sword, according to ancient custom, was hung in a belt put round the shoulders, and reaching down to the thighs. It was suspended on the back part of the thigh, almost to the ground, but was not girded upon it. It is still the practice in the East to wear swords in this manner.

THIRST. One of the most dreadful punishments which can be inflicted on criminals in warm countries, is to expose them to perish by thirst. In the lamentation for Moab there is an allusion to this painful calamity. Jer. xlviii. 18: "Thou daughter that dost inhabit Dibon, come down from thy glory, and sit in thirst; for the spoiler of Moab shall come upon thee, and he shall destroy thy strongholds." The greatest of all the hardships to which travellers in the East are exposed arises from thirst; and proportionally exhilarating is the refreshment which he receives on arriving at a stream of pure water. To this there are various references in Scripture. Thus, Ps. cx. 7, "He shall drink of the brook in the way: therefore shall he lift up the head." Isa. xxxv. 6, "Then shall the lame man leap as an hart, and the tongue of the dumb sing: for in the wilderness shall waters break out, and streams in the desert." Ps.

lxxxiv. 6, "Who passing through the valley of Baca make it a well; the rain also filleth the pools." To be thirsty in the desert without water, exposed to the burning sun, without shelter, and no hopes of finding either, is one of the greatest sufferings a human being can endure.

THISTLE, a well known plant. There are several kinds of thistles in the East, and as different words are used in Scripture denoting plants of this description, it is probable that more than one kind of thistle is referred to. It is difficult, however, to distinguish them, from our imperfect acquaintance with the botany of the Hebrews. The dardar of Gen. iii. 18, and Hos. x. 8, is translated by the Septuagint tribolos, which, in Heb. vi. 8, is rendered in our version "brier." It appears, at all events, to have been a prickly shrub. The word baseh, in Job xxix. 40, is commonly regarded by modern critics, on the authority of Hasselquist, as the "night-shade," a plant very common in the East. Celsius thinks that the word rendered "thistle," in 2 Kings xiv. 9, and 2 Chron. xxv. 18, is the black thorn or sloe tree.

THOMAS, the apostle, otherwise called DIDYMUS, which in Greek signifies a twin. Matt. x. 3; Luke vi. 15. We know no particulars of his life till A.D. 33. John xi. 16, xiv. 5, 6, xx. 24-29, xxi. 1-13. Ancient tradition says, that, in the distribution which the apostles made of the several parts of the world wherein they were to preach the gospel, the country of the Parthians fell to the share of Thomas. It is added, that he preached to the Medes, Persians, Carmanians, Hircanians, and Bactrians. Several of the fathers inform us that he also preached in the East Indies.

THOMSON, ANDREW, D.D. In preparing the following imperfect sketch of the life of this distinguished individual, we have been considerably indebted to the short, but excellent, Memoir prefixed to the posthumous volume of his Sermons and Sacramental Exhortations.

Dr Andrew Thomson was born on the 11th July 1779, at Sanquhar, in Dumfriesshire, of which parish his father, the late Rev. Dr John Thomson of Edinburgh, was at that time minister.

After going through the usual course of classical and theological study, he was, in the beginning of the year 1802, licensed to preach the gospel by the presbytery of Kelso; and having soon after received a presentation to Sprouston, in Roxburghshire, he was ordained on the 11th of March following, and immediately commenced his ministerial labours in that parish.

Dr Thomson's ministry, during his incumbency at Sprouston, was characterized by the same faithfulness which marked his subsequent labours. The Catechism on the Lord's Supper, which he published at that time for the use of the young people in his parish, has been of great service to many besides those for whom it was originally intended; and as a proof of the general estimation in which it is held, it may be mentioned, that it has passed through upwards of thirty editions, and more than forty-two hundred thousand copies of it have been sold. Besides devoting unremitting attention to the immediate duties of his parish, he also began at this early period to take an active part in the important business of the Church courts.

After remaining for a period of about six years at Sprouston, he received a presentation to the East Church, Perth, to which he removed in the year

1808; and there his ministry was equally acceptable as in his former charge. It was not long, however, before, his talents becoming more extensively known, he was promoted to the vacant charge of the New Greyfriars' Church, in the city of Edinburgh. On commencing, in the spring of 1810, his stated labours in this important situation, he made a most favourable impression on the minds of his hearers. Many who were attracted by the brilliancy of his talents and the eloquence of his preaching, became regular attendants on his ministry, and not a few owe their earliest religious impressions to the sound, practical, and efficient instructions which they were at this time privileged to receive from him. The peculiar doctrines of Christianity which he saw it his duty to bring most prominently forward in his discourses, were not at that period so generally acceptable as at present; but it is almost needless to state, that these doctrines were laid before his hearers with all that candour and faithfulness by which he was ever distinguished. Indeed, no feature in his character was more strongly developed than his aversion to any improper compromise or concealment; and though this circumstance was occasionally, in controversy, productive of consequences by no means agreeable to himself, he was thereby often enabled to render eminent service to the cause of truth, while others shrunk back from the unpleasant but salutary duty. St George's church, which had been for some years building, having been opened for public worship in the month of June 1814, Dr Thomson was selected by the Magistrates and Town-Council as the most suitable minister for so influential and important a station. The difficulties to be encountered in collecting and retaining a large congregation in this new sphere of usefulness, situated as it then was at the extremity of the city, were not few. His was a mind, however, not to be discouraged, but rather stimulated to exertion, by difficulty. And while he at once devoted all the energies of his powerful mind to the discharge of his multifarious duties, he soon had the satisfaction of finding the pleasure of the Lord prospering in his hands, and of seeing his labours crowned with abundant success. The congregation by whom he began to be surrounded, was of the highest respectability, and to many of them he was enabled, under the blessing of God, to be of great spiritual service. The respect shown to him by his people was gratifying in the highest degree, and over them he soon acquired an influence scarcely ever possessed by any preacher. "Nor," says the author of the Memoir, "is it necessary to say, that he owed this enviable ascendancy to no compromise of principle—to no unworthy accommodation of divine truth to the prejudices of his audience. In addressing himself to a congregation peculiarly exclusive and sensitive, he stood upon the high ground of his office as an ambassador for Christ; and with the apostle of the Gentiles, to whose bold unfearing character his own, in many points, bore a striking resemblance, he determined to know nothing, as the subject of his ministry, but Jesus Christ, and him crucified. How fully, effectively, and perseveringly he adhered to his system, the recollection of his hearers, as well as the strain of his published discourses, amply testify. The peculiar qualifications which he brought to his task are, at the same time, not to be overlooked. To a manner of great animation and fire, yet restrained and dignified, he added a style of uncommon simplicity and spirit, which nature enabled him to set off to advantage by the tones of a voice remarkable for compass and harmony. He delighted in argument, but his arguments were of that direct, palpable, practical character which stimulate attention, and admit of being appreciated and followed by the most ordinary understanding; while the truths he laboured to establish were all of acknowledged importance, bore so intimate a relation to the system which, as a Christian minister, it was his province to illustrate and enforce, and came so closely and powerfully home to every man's heart and conscience, that nothing could appear more natural than the pains he took to explain and defend them. As in the clear fountain of his thoughts there were no turbid elements, no confusion of ideas, no obscure images, no surface on which a wayward fancy could paint the fluctuating figures of its own changeful extravagance; so, in his discourses, all was simple, perspicuous, unaffected, and intelligible. Imagination was not, perhaps, his distinctive faculty; yet even of the glow and peculiar effect of a well disciplined imagination, his compositions were not destitute. When he chose, he could be tender, descriptive, and impassioned; and when he indulged neither in declamation addressed to the fancy, nor in appeals which went to the heart, he uniformly commanded attention by the clearness of his statements, the force of his reasonings, and the pointed and practical strain of his exhortations. It has been well remarked of him, that few men, and especially few public instructors, ever displayed a greater acquaintance with human nature, or could turn their knowledge to better account. His hearers, accordingly, however secular their habits, could not but feel that they were addressed by one intimately conversant with life and manners; they could not evade the force of his arguments and lessons, by ascribing them to the ignorance or austerity of their instructor; they could not but perceive in his delineations of character, a faithful mirror, in which their own modes of thinking and acting were exhibited to the life; nor could they be insensible to the value of warnings and of counsels, in which the acuteness of the man of liberal ideas and of general observations, was blended with the wisdom of the moralist, and the sanctity of the Christian and the divine. To causes such as these, accordingly, we are to ascribe the high place which Dr Thomson acquired and held in the estimation of the religious public of Edinburgh. Nor, in any review of the religious history of the period, will the deserved fame of Dr Thomson be overlooked, as one of the causes of the revived taste for the faithful preaching of the gospel, which has happily characterized Edinburgh for the last fifteen or twenty years."

By the young people of his congregation he was more than usually beloved, and their affection was responded to on his part by the most laborious and diligent exertions for their spiritual improvement. Many of them still bear in mind the affectionate addresses and sound and wholesome advices which, from time to time, they received from him, both publicly and in private, and look back with melancholy satisfaction on those pleasant hours which, in Sunday classes and week-day meetings, he so unremittingly devoted to their spiritual instruction.

But these labours among the young were not confined to the congregation. He soon found there were many in the parish whom his Sabbath ministrations could not reach, either from their not attending church, or requiring more instruction than could be given them on that day. To meet their case, he collected funds for the erection of a school in Young Street, where the children of the poorer classes of his parishioners might receive the elementary principles of education and religion at a cheap rate. To this school it was Dr Thomson's practice to devote entire days of his valuable time, and, till a teacher was trained by himself, and qualified to follow out efficiently his own plans of instruction, he regularly attended at nine o'clock every morning, and commenced his self-imposed but laborious task. In no circumstances, perhaps, did he appear more truly great than when thus unostentatiously engaged in these labours of love; and so completely did he accommodate himself to the understandings of the children, that instead of being awe-struck in his presence, they seemed apparently as happy under his instructions as when engaged in their innocent amusements. For the use of the children attending this school, he prepared several excellent manuals of education, one of which, a "Collection" for the highest class, contains many original compositions, and is justly held in very high estimation.

It is known to many that Dr Thomson took also a great interest in the improvement of the psalmody of the congregation of St George's. Possessed of a fine ear and taste for music, he was well qualified to effect a salutary change in this important part of the services of the sanctuary. He drew up a collection of the most approved psalm tunes, all of which he carefully revised, and added several original compositions, and a few of his own of great beauty. The improvement which within these few years has taken place in this part of public worship, in many of the congregations in Edinburgh, and throughout the country, may, in no small degree, be ascribed to the unremitting exertions made by him in this respect.

With the assistance of some friends, Dr Thomson had commenced, in the month of August 1810, the publication of the Edinburgh Christian Instructor. Of this periodical he continued, for the twenty years which elapsed from its establishment till the time of his death, its only and unassisted editor, except on occasions when necessarily absent from town. The amount of labour which he thus voluntarily undertook was very great, and it is known that he spent many an almost sleepless night in making the necessary preparations for its publication. In the course of his career both as an editor and a minister of the gospel, Dr Thomson found himself often reluctantly dragged into controversies which occasionally exposed him to calumny and reproach. To use the language of Dr McCrie, who has also since gone to his eternal rest, "he was not exposed to the woe denounced against those of whom all men speak well. He had his detractors and enemies, who waited for his halting, and were prepared to magnify and blazon his faults. Of him it may be said, as of another Christian patriot, no man ever loved or hated him moderately. This was the inevitable consequence of his great talents, and the rough contests in which he was involved. His generous spirit raised him above the indulgence of envy and every jealous feeling, but it made him less tolerant of those who displayed these mean vices. When convinced of the justice of a cause, and satisfied of its magnitude, he threw his whole soul into it, summoned all his powers to its defence, and assailed its adversaries, not only with strong arguments, but with sharp, pointed, and poignant sarcasm; but unless he perceived insincerity, malignity, or perverseness, his own feelings were too acute and too just to permit him, gratuitously, to wound those of others. That his zeal was always reined by prudence; that his ardour of mind never hurried him to a precipitate conclusion, or led him to magnify the subject in debate; that his mind was never warped by party feeling; and that he never indulged the love of victory, or sought to humble a teasing or pragmatic adversary—are positions which his true friends will not maintain. But his ablest opponents will admit, that in all the great questions in which he distinguished himself, he acted conscientiously; that he was an open, manly, and honourable adversary; and that, though he was sometimes intemperate, he was never disingenuous. Dr Thomson was by constitution a reformer; he felt a strong sympathy with those great men who, in a former age, won renown by assailing the hydra of error, and of civil and religious tyranny; and his character partook of theirs. In particular, he bore no inconsiderable resemblance to Luther, both in excellencies and defects; his leonine nobleness and potency, his masculine eloquence, his facetiousness and pleasantry, the fondness which he showed for the fascinating charms of music, and the irritability and vehemence which he occasionally exhibited, to which some will add the necessity which this imposed on him to make retractations, which, while they threw a partial shade over his fame, taught his admirers the needful lesson, that he was a man subject to like passions and infirmities with others. But the fact is, though hitherto known to few, and the time has now come for revealing it, that some of those effusions which were most objectionable, and exposed him to the greatest obloquy, were neither composed by Dr Thomson, nor seen by him, until they were published to the world; and that in one instance, which has given rise to the most unsparing abuse, he paid the expenses of a prosecution, and submitted to make a public apology, for an offence of which he was innocent as the child unborn, rather than give up the name of the friend who was morally responsible for the deed—an example of generous self-devotion which has few parallels."

Dr Thomson at all times took an interest in the business of many of the public charities and societies connected with Edinburgh. He was never unwilling to give his powerful assistance, either in aiding in their management or pleading their cause from the pulpit. It is, indeed, matter of surprise how he found time for the multifarious duties which he was, in this and other respects, called to perform, no less than of admiration at the apparent ease and cheerfulness with which he went through them all. Superadded to his other labours, must, in particular, be mentioned the leading part which he took in the business of the ecclesiastical courts. In these courts, indeed, he was, for many years preceding his death, acknowledged as the leader of the Evangelical party, to which he was, from principle, attached. The amount of personal labour and anxiety which was thus devolved upon him it would not be easy to estimate, and few men, it is believed, could have so long sustained the unceasing demands which, in addition to his other duties, were thus made on his time and exertions. He was, however, admirably qualified to occupy such an important and commanding station. Not only was he well acquainted with the laws of the Church, and the different forms requisite in conducting business, but for ability and readiness in debate he stood almost unrivalled. Many will recollect the bursts of eloquence which they have heard from his lips in the General Assembly, and the ability, dignity, and ease with which, even on the spur of the moment, he could reply to the arguments of an opponent. The important objects which he often had in view were, no doubt, sometimes thwarted by large majorities, but his intrepidity and fortitude never forsook him, and want of success only produced in him redoubled exertion.

This is not the place, nor have we any wish to enter on the protracted discussion to which the proceedings of the directors of the British and Foreign Bible Society, regarding the circulation of the Apocrypha, unfortunately gave rise, and in which Dr Thomson took so prominent a part. While, however, some of the consequences which ensued from these discussions were deeply regretted, and by none more than Dr Thomson himself, it will be admitted by every unprejudiced mind, at all acquainted with the circumstances of the case, that the practice complained of called most loudly for redress, and that the great principles maintained in this controversy, on his part, had for their only object the preservation and purity of the Word of God, without mixture, diminution, or addition.

The discourses which Dr Thomson delivered, and afterwards published, the winter preceding his death, on the doctrine of "Universal Pardon," were highly seasonable and useful at the time, and contain a triumphant refutation of the errors they are intended to expose. These discourses are regarded by many as the best specimen of the diversified talents of their author; and certainly display his ability to great advantage, not only as an acute reasoner, but as a profound theologian and Scripture critic.

The leading part which he took in regard to the important subject of the abolition of negro slavery, must not be passed over without notice. This was the last public question to which he devoted the energies of his powerful and versatile mind. With characteristic boldness and magnanimity he set his face against all partial measures for the improvement of this system of bodily and mental oppression, and, in the midst of much opposition, stood fearlessly forward, the avowed, determined, and able advocate of immediate emancipation.

A meeting of the Anti-Slavery Society having been held in the month of October 1830, Dr Thomson attended, and after some other speakers had addressed the meeting, and stated their views as to the proper time for abolition, he rose from the centre of the room, and craved permission to explain the conclusions at which he had arrived. "With a power of argument, and an earnestness and elevation of tone which can never be forgotten, he entered on the subject, and in a brief speech explained the points in which he differed from the former speakers, as well as those in which he agreed with them. Never was the triumph of truth and eloquence more complete. Before he had concluded, the majority of the meeting was with him; the confidence of the directors of the society, in the measures they had come forward to recommend, was shaken; and, in the rapturous acclamations of a crowded assembly, he had the satisfaction of listening to the first echo which Great Britain, through all her provinces, has since sent back to the call of justice and religion, in behalf of the injured children of her colonies."

At a subsequent meeting of the friends of immediate abolition, Dr Thomson attended along with the directors of the Anti-Slavery Society, who now almost unanimously coincided in his views. The speech which he delivered on that occasion was perhaps the most splendid effort of his genius, abounding in high and elevated feeling, and carrying conviction irresistibly home to the understanding and the heart. Rarely have we witnessed such unequivocal symptoms of admiration and enthusiasm as this brilliant effusion of his eloquence produced on the densely crowded meeting assembled on the occasion. The concluding paragraph of his address is so beautiful and so characteristic of the determined views which he entertained on this great question, that we cannot resist recalling it to the recollection of our readers:—"If," said he, "there must be violence, let it even come, for it will soon pass away—let it come, and rage its little hour, since it is to be succeeded by lasting freedom, and prosperity, and happiness. Give me the hurricane rather than the pestilence. Give me the hurricane, with its thunder, and its lightning, and its tempest;—give me the hurricane, with its partial and temporary devastations, awful though they be;—give me the hurricane, with its purifying, healthful, salutary effects;—give me that hurricane, infinitely rather than the noisome pestilence, whose path is never crossed, whose silence is never disturbed, whose progress is never arrested, by one sweeping blast from the heavens; which walks peacefully and sullenly through the length and breadth of the land, breathing poison into every heart, and carrying havoc into every home, enervating all that is strong, defacing all that is beautiful, and casting its blight over the fairest and happiest scenes of human life, and which, from day to day, and from year to year, with intolerant and interminable malignity, sends its thousands and its tens of thousands of hapless victims into the ever-yawning and never-satisfied grave!"

Dr Thomson was thus busily engaged in the discharge of the duties of his situation, greatly beloved by his congregation, and generally respected by his fellow-citizens. And though, to all human appearance, he had the prospect of long remaining in the commanding and elevated station which he occupied, and of being continued for many years a bright ornament of the Church to which he belonged, a blessing to his people and a benefit to the community, it pleased God, in the mysterious arrangements of his providence, to remove him suddenly by death, in the midst of his usefulness, in the prime of his life, and in the zenith of his popularity. It is believed by many of his friends that his death was hastened by the incessant labours in which he was called to engage, and that the mournful event, though unexpected by others, was not altogether unlooked for by himself. It is certain, at all events, that during the latter days of his life there was perceptible an increasing earnestness, richness, and variety in his prayers, both in the public services of the sanctuary and in the private devotions of his own family; and when urged, on more than one occasion, to relieve himself of some of the heavy duties which pressed upon him, he replied, with affectionate solemnity, "I must work the work of Him that sent me while it is day: the night cometh when no man can work."

The circumstances of his lamented death are thus narrated in the Memoir already mentioned:—"On the 9th of February 1831, the day on which he died, he appeared to his family in his usual health. As was his custom, he rose and breakfasted at an early hour. During the devotions of the family, which he conducted as usual, he read the last three Psalms, and he concluded the service by a prayer remarked at the time for its spirituality and fervour. After baptizing a child, he left his house to pay some visits to the sick; and at a later hour he appeared in his place at a meeting of the presbytery of Edinburgh, specially convened for the purpose of ordaining a minister to one of our West India settlements. During his attendance at the presbytery, he displayed his usual interest, and took his usual share in the business of the court. At the close of the meeting, about five in the afternoon, he proceeded homeward; and with a friend, who met him by the way, he conversed with animation and cheerfulness till he reached his own door, on the threshold of which, without a struggle or a groan, he suddenly fell, overtaken by that summons which recalls the 'good servant' from his labour to his reward."

It would not be easy adequately to describe the deep sensation which this mournful event produced, not only in Edinburgh, but throughout all parts of the country. The eminence of the man, the high place which he occupied in the Church, and the great value of his public and ministerial labours, were every way calculated to make his name extensively known, and his loss deeply felt. There are many who can never forget the bitterness of the feeling which entered their souls when the tidings of the distressing and afflicting bereavement first reached them. They could scarcely believe that he who had so lately been seen and listened to and admired in all the strength and maturity of his character, and in the enjoyment apparently of excellent health and spirits, was in reality so suddenly brought down from his commanding station—the ties which united him to an affectionate family, an extensive circle of friends, and an attached congregation, all cut asunder in a moment—and the well-known voice which had so often, so eloquently, and withal so recently, been lifted up in the Redeemer's cause, hushed for ever in the unbroken silence of death. Under the stunning heaviness of such a bereavement, many, in the bitterness of their hearts, were ready to exclaim, "Help, Lord, for the godly man ceaseth; for the faithful fail from among the children of men!"

On the day of the funeral, ministers assembled from all parts of the country to pay the last tribute of respect to one whom, in life, they regarded with so much affection and esteem. The students of divinity requested permission to attend in a body; and not only the members of the congregation, but multitudes of the most respectable inhabitants of Edinburgh, took this last opportunity of testifying their sense of his high character and numerous virtues; and, amid the deep seriousness that sat on every countenance, bespeaking, "not the pageantry, but the whole power and reality of woe," his earthly remains were borne along the densely-crowded streets, and consigned to their last resting-place, in sure and certain hope of a glorious resurrection.

THORN, a general name for several kinds of prickly plants. In the curse denounced against the earth (Gen. iii. 18), its produce is threatened to be "thorns and thistles"—Heb. kutz udardar, or, in the Septuagint, akanthas kai tribolous. Paul uses the same words (Heb. vi. 8), where the last is rendered "briers." They are also found Hosea x. 8. The word kutz is put for "thorns," in other places; as Exod. xxii. 6; Judg. viii. 7; Ezek. ii. 6, xxviii. 24: but we are uncertain whether it mean a specific kind of thorn, or may be a generic name for all plants of a thorny kind. In the present instance it seems to be general for all those obnoxious plants, shrubs, &c., by which the labours of the husbandman are impeded, and which are only fit for burning. If the word denote a particular plant, it may be the "rest-harrow," a pernicious prickly weed, which grows promiscuously with the large thistles in the uncultivated grounds, and covers entire fields and plains, in Egypt and Palestine. Judges viii. 16, barkanim. There is no doubt but this word means a sharp, jagged kind of plant: the difficulty is to fix on one, where so many offer themselves. The Septuagint preserves the original word. There is a plant mentioned by Hasselquist, whose name and properties somewhat resemble those which are required in the barkanim of this passage: "Nabka paliurus Athenæi is the nabka of the Arabs. There is every appearance that this is the tree which furnished the crown of thorns which was put on the head of our Lord. It is common in the East. A plant more proper for this purpose could not be selected; for it is armed with thorns, its branches are pliant, and its leaf of a deep green, like that of ivy. Perhaps the enemies of Christ chose this plant in order to add insult to injury, by employing a wreath approaching in appearance that which was used to crown emperors and generals." In the New Testament, the Greek word translated "thorns" is akantha. Matt. vii. 16, xiii. 7, xxvii. 29; John xix. 2. See GARDEN.

THOUGHT, the one single property which can be discovered as essential to mind. Mind is the thinking principle, and no other definition can be given of it. But how do we ascertain this single property which we attach to mind? We answer, by consciousness. When we think of any thing, we know that we are thinking, and to this knowledge the term consciousness is applied. It is inseparable from every act of thought, and, in fact, strictly speaking, is identical with thought itself, it being a contradiction in terms to say that we think, and yet we are not conscious of thinking. The peculiarity, then, belongs to thought, that it is at once the instrument and the object of investigation. Thus we see that thought may be viewed under two aspects—as contemplating itself, and as itself contemplated. The consideration of thought under these two views forms the only legitimate mode of studying the science of mind, or mental philosophy.

THRASHING. In the early periods of the Jewish commonwealth, the husbandman employed the staff or flail in thrashing all his crop. Isaiah mentions four different instruments used for thrashing—the flail, the drag, the wain, and the feet of the ox. The staff or flail was used for the smaller seeds, which were too tender to be treated in the other methods. The drag consisted of a sort of strong planks, made rough at the bottom with hard stones or iron; it was drawn by oxen or horses over the corn sheaves spread on the floor, the driver sitting upon it. The wain or cart had wheels with iron teeth or edges like a saw. These different instruments are referred to in Isa. xxviii. 26–28: "For his God doth instruct him to discretion, and doth teach him. For the fitches are not thrashed with a thrashing instrument, neither is a cart-wheel turned about upon the cummin; but the fitches are beaten out with a staff, and the cummin with a rod. Bread corn is bruised; because he will not ever be thrashing it, nor break it with the wheel of his cart, nor bruise it with his horsemen." But one of the most common methods of thrashing in the East was by the feet of oxen, or other beasts of burden. Hence the Mosaic enactment: "Thou shalt not muzzle the ox when he treadeth out the corn." Deut. xxv. 4. There is an allusion to this custom in Micah iv. 13: "Arise and thrash, O daughter of Zion: for I will make thine horn iron, and I will make thy hoofs brass: and thou shalt beat in pieces many people: and I will consecrate their gain unto the Lord, and their substance unto the Lord of the whole earth." The time of thrashing out and winnowing the corn was a season of rejoicing and festivity. See HARVEST—FLOOR—AGRICULTURE.

THRESHOLD. See GATE.

THRONE, the official seat of a sovereign, and often used in Scripture to indicate royalty. The throne of Solomon, which seems to have been of the richest and most magnificent kind, is described in 1 Kings x. 18-20: "Moreover, the king made a great throne of ivory, and overlaid it with the best gold. The throne had six steps, and the top of the throne was round behind: and there were stays on either side on the place of the seat, and two lions stood beside the stays. And twelve lions stood there on the one side and on the other upon the six steps: there was not the like made in any kingdom."

THUMMIM. See URIM.

THYATIRA, a city in Asia Minor, forty-eight miles south-east from Pergamos. It was the seat of one of the seven churches of Asia. To this place Lydia belonged, who was converted by means of the preaching of the Apostle Paul.

THYINE. This kind of wood is mentioned only in Rev. xviii. 12. It is a fragrant wood, and some have thought it to be the same with the sandal-wood of the East Indies. The general opinion is, that the tree referred to is the Thuja odorata, the wood of which, Jackson says, in his account of Morocco, is somewhat like the cedar, having a similar smell, and being impenetrable to the worm.

TIARA, the name of the Pope's triple crown. The tiara and keys are the badges of the Papal dignity—the tiara of his civil rank, and the keys of his spiritual; for as soon as the Pope is dead, his arms are represented with the tiara alone, without the keys. The ancient tiara was a round high cap. John XIII. first encompassed it with a crown; Boniface VIII. added a second crown; and Benedict XII. a third.

TIBERIAS, a town standing on a small plain on the shores of the sea of Galilee. It was built by Herod, and the site of the ancient city may still be traced by the granite columns and other remains with which the shore is strewn for a mile to the south of the modern town. Mariti has given a very gloomy description of this town:—"Had not the serenity of the sky rendered it almost impossible for me to be deceived, I should have imagined when I entered it that I was descending to the habitation of the dead, as its walls are built of brown iron-coloured stones, like those which the poets say compose the palace of Pluto. . . . On one side you see ruins half buried in the earth; and on the other some shattered edifices converted into huts. About a hundred shadows, who, I was told, were the inhabitants of the place, flock with great eagerness around the traveller, whom they survey with an air of astonishment that is little calculated to inspire him with confidence."

TIBERIAS, SEA OF. See GALILEE, SEA OF.

TIDAL, king of nations, or of Gentiles (goim). Gen. xiv. 1. Some think he was king of Galilee of the Gentiles beyond Jordan (Matt. iv. 15); and Joshua speaks of a king of the nations of Gilgal, or of Galilee, according to the Septuagint. Josh. xii. 23. Others, however, think that he was the head of a mixed multitude of people who had come from different nations.

TIEL. This tree is mentioned in Scripture only once, viz., in Isa. vi. 13: "But yet in it shall be a tenth, and it shall return, and shall be eaten: as a tiel-tree, and as an oak, whose substance is in them, when they cast their leaves: so the holy seed shall be the substance thereof." The linden or tiel-tree is valuable in all its parts, and is a favourite resort of bees. Hence, in Judea, a land flowing with milk and honey, this tree could not fail to be much prized for its usefulness.

TIME, mode of duration marked by certain periods. The general idea which time gives in everything to which it is applied, is that of limited duration. Thus we cannot say of the Deity that he exists in time, because eternity, which he inhabits, is absolutely uniform, neither admitting limitation nor succession.

Time is said to be redeemed or improved, when it is properly filled up, or employed in the conscientious discharge of all the duties which devolve upon us, as it respects the Divine Being, ourselves, and our fellow-creatures. Time may be said to be lost, when it is not devoted to some good, useful, or, at least, some innocent purpose; or when opportunities of improvement, business, or devotion, are neglected. Time is wasted by excessive sleep, unnecessary recreations, indolent habits, useless visits, idle reading, vain conversation, and all those actions which have no good end in them. We ought to improve the time, when we consider—1. That it is short. 2. Swift. 3. Irrecoverable. 4. Uncertain. 5. That it is a talent committed to our trust. And, 6. That the improvement of it is advantageous and interesting in every respect.

TIMNA, concubine to Eliphaz, Esau's son. Gen. xxxvi. 12.

TIMNATH, or TIMNAH, a city in the tribe of Judah (Josh. xv. 57), not far from the sea, nor far from Adullam. It was for a long time in possession of the Philistines, and here Samson met with Delilah, his betrayer.

TIMNATH-SERAH, a city situated among the mountains of Ephraim, on the north side of the hill of Gaash. It was the property of Joshua, and there he was buried. Josh. xxiv. 30. In Judges ii. 9, this city is called Timnath-heres; and as "heres" signifies "the sun," it is not improbable, as the Jews imagine, that it was so called by reason of some memorial connected with Joshua's sepulchre, of the sun's miraculously standing still at his command.

TIMOTHEUS, commonly called TIMOTHY, a disciple of Paul. He was a native of Lystra, in Lycaonia. His father was a Gentile; but his mother, whose name was Eunice, was a Jewess (Acts xvi. 1), and educated her son with great care in her own religion. 2 Tim. i. 5, iii. 15. To this young disciple Paul addressed two epistles; in the first of which he calls him his "own son in the faith" (1 Tim. i. 2); from which expression it is inferred that Paul was the person by whom he was brought to the knowledge of the truth as it is in Jesus. His conversion probably took place when Paul first preached at Lystra in A.D. 46. Before leaving Lystra, Paul caused Timothy to be circumcised, lest the Jews should be offended, knowing that his father was a Gentile. He was regularly ordained to the office of the ministry and generally accompanied Paul in his travels. The tradition is that he was bishop of Ephesus and suffered martyrdom there, in the year A.D. 97, while preaching against idolatry in the vicinity of the temple of Diana at Ephesus. His supposed remains were conveyed to Constantinople with great pomp in A. D. 356.

TIMOTHY, EPISTLES TO. These Epistles were written by the Apostle Paul to the young evangelist, chiefly with the view of warning him against the false doctrines of the Judaizing teachers of the time (Michaelis thinks they were Essenes), who by their subtle distinctions and endless controversies had corrupted the simplicity of the gospel. There has been considerable dispute among the learned about the date at which Paul wrote the first Epistle to Timothy, but all are agreed that the second Epistle must have been written very shortly before Paul's martyrdom, which happened at Rome in A. D. 66.

TIN (bedil, Numb. xxxi. 22; Isa. i. 25; Ezek. xxii. 18, 20, xxvii. 12), a well-known coarse metal, harder than lead. Mr Parkhurst observes, that Moses, in Numb. xxxi. 22, enumerates all the six species of metals. The Lord, by the prophet Isaiah, having compared the Jewish people to silver, declares, "I will turn my hand upon thee, and purely purge away thy dross, and take away bedelin—thy particles of tin;" where Aquila, Symmachus, and Theodotian have kassiteron sou, and the Vulgate, stannum tuum, "thy tin;" but the Septuagint, anomous—"wicked ones." This denunciation, by a comparison of the preceding and following context, appears to signify that God would, by a process of judgment, purify those among the Jews who were capable of purification, as well as destroy the reprobate and incorrigible. Jer. vi. 29, 30, ix. 7; Mal. iii. 3; Ezek. xxii. 18, 20.

In Ezek. xxvii. 12, Tarshish is mentioned as furnishing bedil; and Bochart proves, from the testimonies of Diodorus, Pliny, and Stephanus, that Tartessus in Spain, which he supposes the ancient Tarshish, anciently furnished tin. As Cornwall in very ancient times was resorted to for this metal, and probably first by the Phenicians, some have thought that peninsula to be the Tarshish of the Scriptures—a subject which, however, from the vague use of the word, is involved in much uncertainty. See TARSHISH.

TIPHSAH, a city in the tribe of Ephraim, situated about six miles from Samaria. Menahem, king of Israel, took it by storm, and massacred its inhabitants without mercy.

TIRHAKAH. See CUSH—ETHIOPIA—SENNACHERIB.

TIRZAH (pleasant), a city of Ephraim, and the royal seat of the kings of Israel, from the time of Jeroboam to the reign of Omri, who built the city of Samaria, which then became the capital of this kingdom. 2 Kings xv. 14, 16.

TISHBE, a city of Gilead, east of the Jordan, and the country of the prophet Elijah, who from hence was called the TISHBITE. 1 Kings xvii. 1.

TISRI, the first Hebrew month of the civil year, and the seventh of the ecclesiastical year. See MONTH.

TITHES, the tenth part of the profits accruing from the produce of estates, applied to the maintenance of the clergy. The payment of tithes seems to have been observed long before the giving of the Mosaic law. Thus we find Melchisedec, the priest of the Most High God, receiving tithes or the tenth part from Abraham. Jacob also vowed to God that he would pay the tenth of all. Under the Mosaic law, as the Levites had no landed property, the Jews were commanded to pay a tenth of all the fields and flocks for the support of the Levites, and these again paid a tenth of their incomes to the priests. In addition to the tenth thus required from every Jew, another tenth was demanded for the maintenance of feasts and sacrifices. Under the Christian dispensation, as developed in the New Testament, the regular tithe is no longer required, but the general principle is laid down as binding upon the consciences of all Christians that "they who preach the gospel should live of the gospel, and they who are taught in the word ought to communicate to him that teacheth in all good things." The history of the Tithe System in England is thus given by Dr Hook:—"It is probable that tithes were paid by our Saxon ancestors, as soon as they were converted from heathenism; for King Ethelbert made a law against taking away Res Ecclesiæ, which they called God's fees; but this was not a general law to oblige the whole nation, because Ethelbert was only king of Kent: and the laws of King Ina long before that time enjoin the payment of church-shot. And several other Saxon kings made laws that the church should have its revenue, and that the clergy should have the first fruits; all which may be expounded of tithes, because they were paid to the church. This appears by the practice of Eadbert, who was Bishop of Lindisfarne, in the beginning of King Ina's reign: it is true he could pay no tithes himself, because he was a clergyman, and therefore he gave them every year to the poor. About fifty years after him, Boniface, Bishop of Mentz, wrote an epistle to Cuthbert, Archbishop of Canterbury, wherein he expressly mentions tithes as usually paid in those days; and in Archbishop Egbert's canons, we read of priests who were commanded to teach the people to pay tithes; that the receiver was to register the names of such as paid, and that no man should take them from ancient churches, nor any secular service be done for them. But it was above thirty years afterwards that the first canon was made here for the payment of tithes, and that was in the synod at Calcuith, which was held here in the reign of King Offa, enjoining the payment of tithes according to the Scriptures, and exhorting all men to pay the same, because it is the special command of God himself. It is likewise true, that in obedience to these and other canons, tithes were paid here in some particular places; but King Ethelwolf, who was the first hereditary monarch of the English Saxons, made a voluntary donation of tithes to be paid throughout the kingdom; and this was done in a general council, with the free consent of the spiritual and temporal lords and a multitude of other people. Edward the Confessor made a law, that the tenth of all corn shall be paid to God, as due to him, and tells us in what manner both prædial and personal tithes ought to be paid; and that if any person should disobey that law, he should be compelled to pay this duty by the king and the bishop, and thus it stood till the conquest. Henry VIII. confirmed those canons relating to tithes, which were made in the reigns of his predecessors. This he did after he renounced the Pope's supremacy by a particular statute made for that purpose; and by which it was enacted, that tithes should be paid according to the ecclesiastical laws of the Church of England, and according to the customs in every parish where they shall grow due; and the reason is given in the purview of the act, viz., because they are due to God and his Holy Church. And it is to be observed, that before laymen had any grants of monastery lands to hold them discharged of tithes, in the same manner as they were held before the dissolution, care was taken to alienate the tithes of those lands, by the consent of the bishop, and that due payment might be made thereof to the particular rectors."

TITUS. Little is known concerning this individual, who was probably a convert of the Apostle Paul. It would appear that he was a Greek. Gal. ii. 3. When he returned from Antioch to Jerusalem, Paul would not allow him to be circumcised, as he was born of Gentile parents. He seems to have aided Paul in diffusing the gospel, as he calls him "his partner and fellow-helper." During Paul's second imprisonment at Rome, Titus went into Dalmatia, and after the apostle's death he removed to Crete, where he laboured as pastor of the church until his death, at the advanced age of ninety-four.

TITUS, EPISTLE TO. Titus having been left in Crete to settle the churches in the several cities of that island according to the apostolical plan, Paul wrote this epistle to him, that he might discharge his ministry among the Cretans with the greater success, and to give him particular instructions concerning his behaviour towards the Judaizing teachers, who endeavoured to pervert the faith and disturb the peace of the Christian church.

TOB, a district, the precise locality of which is not known, but from the facility of communication it was doubtless in the near vicinity of Gilead. It was in this region, eastward of the Jordan, that Jephthah took refuge when expelled by his brethren; and there the elders of Gilead found him when they sought his assistance.

TOBIAH, an Ammonite who joined with Sanballat in endeavouring to prevent the Jews from rebuilding the temple after they had returned from the Babylonish captivity. He had obtained considerable influence in consequence of having formed an alliance by marriage with one of the principal Jews in Jerusalem.

TOGARMAH, the third son of Gomar, and the grandson of Japhet. Gen. x. 3. There is the utmost difficulty in deciding what country this descendant of Japhet peopled. It seems to have been a district of country between Syria and the Black Sea. Eusebius supposes it to have been Armenia; Josephus and Jerome, Phrygia; and Bochart, Cappadocia.

TOLERATION. The fundamental principles on which an enlightened toleration of different religions sects in a free country rests, are thus beautifully pointed out by the celebrated Robert Hall:—

"The liberty of worshipping God in that manner which the conscience of every individual dictates, provided nothing be introduced into worship incompatible with good morals, may be justly claimed as an inalienable right. The relation which subsists betwixt man and his Maker, and the consequent obligation to worship him, is prior to the civil relation between magistrates and subjects. It is a more important relation, since all the good a creature can enjoy is derived from it, and all his reasonable hopes of happiness on the goodness of the Almighty. It differs, too, from every other, in that it is invisible, perpetual, and eternal. A man may or may not be the member of a civil community, but he is always the creature of God. For these reasons, political duties, or those which result from the relation of the subject to the prince, must, in their nature, be subordinate to religious. When the commands of a civil superior interfere with those which we conscientiously believe to be the laws of God, submission to the former must be criminal; for the two obligations are not equipollent, but the former is essential, invariable, and paramount to every other. 'Whether it be right,' said the apostles, 'to obey God or man, judge ye.' But if an active obedience in such circumstances be criminal, to prescribe it cannot be innocent, since it would be absurd to affirm that exercise of authority to be right to which it is wrong to submit. Rights and duties are correlatives. A right to command necessarily implies the enforcing that which is right with respect to those to whom the duty of submission belongs. Nor is it to any purpose to allege that the worship prescribed is rational and scriptural, and far more excellent than that which is prohibited. For if we remember that worship is no other than the outward expression of the love and fear of God, we must perceive, that, to become acceptable, it is above all things necessary that it be such as approves itself to the mind of the worshipper; such as he sincerely believes will be pleasing to God. It is impossible to please God without a sincere intention to please him. We may hope, from Him who knows our frame, for a merciful indulgence to the imperfections which spring from involuntary ignorance or latent prejudice. It agrees with his benignity to suppose he will graciously accept that worship which is not the best in itself, providing it be the best we know how to present. But to worship with those rites and ceremonies which our conscience does not approve, however excellent in themselves, is an insult to the Deity. A Jew, for example, who joined in the worship of a Christian Church, while he retained the incredulity which distinguished his nation, would be guilty of the highest impiety; nor would it be any extenuation of his fault to allege that the worship in which he assisted was founded on Scripture, and commanded by God, while his conviction was contrary. He who is utterly careless of the favour of God, and without any solicitude respecting a future world, will naturally follow the stream of authority or fashion, and adopt any mode of religion which happens to have the ascendancy. But the sincere worshipper of God will find it impossible to comply with any religious injunctions which appear to him to interfere with the will of God.

"Besides, as is urged with great force by Mr Locke, if the magistrate of one country has a right to impose his religion under pains and penalties, the magistrates of all other countries must have an equal right. Religious truth will vary with the boundaries of nations; and with equal justice the Pope will be revered in Spain, Mohammed in Turkey, and Brahma in India. It is easy to see to what these principles tend, which imply that there is nothing determinate, nothing sacred in religion, and that all modes of worship are equally pleasing to God, and equally useful. The principles of persecution, pushed to their just consequence, terminate in Hobbism.

"It is worth while to consider what is likely to be the effect of enacting coercive laws in religion. If the men at whom they are aimed are conscientious, they will still persevere. They will reply to the injunction of silence what the apostles did to the chief priest: 'Whether it be right to obey God or man, judge ye.' They will still persist in their attempts to evangelize the poor. This will necessitate the exercise of greater severities, the failure of which will be considered as a demand for punishments still heavier, until the magistrate has proceeded to banishment, confiscation, and death. For it is the inconvenience attending persecution, that it is necessarily progressive. Small punishments only irritate. It commences with an intention of suppressing error; baffled in its first attempt, and stung with disappointment, it soon loses sight of its original design; it soon degenerates into a settled resolution to subdue contumacy, and strike terror. It becomes a fearful struggle betwixt power and fortitude; the power of inflicting suffering, and that of enduring, which shall wear the other out."

TOMB. See SEPULCHRE.

TONGUE. This word is taken in three different senses:—1. For the material tongue, or organ of speech. James iii. 5. 2. For the tongue or language that is spoken in any country. Deut. xxviii. 49. (See LANGUAGE.) 3. For good or bad discourses. Prov. xii. 18, xvii. 20. Tongue of the sea signifies a gulf. To gnaw the tongue (Rev. xvi. 10), is a token of fury, despair, and torment. The tongue of angels, a kind of hyperbole made use of by Paul. 1 Cor. xiii. 1. To draw out the tongue is an expression of contempt in the East, as in other countries. Thus, Isa. lvii. 4: "Against whom do ye sport yourselves? against whom make ye a wide mouth, and draw out the tongue? are ye not children of transgression, a seed of falsehood?"

TONGUE, DUTIES OF THE. "1. To glorify God by magnifying his name. 2. To sing his praises. 3. To declare to others God's goodness. 4. To pray to him for what we want. 5. To make open profession of our subjection to him. 6. To preach his word. 7. To defend the truth. 8. To exhort men to particular duties. 9. To confess our sins to God. 10. To crave the advice of others. 11. To praise that which is good in others. 12. To bear witness of the truth. 13. To defend the cause of the innocent and just. 14. To communicate to others the same good impressions we have received."

TONGUES, GIFT OF. See GIFT OF TONGUES.

TOPAZ. The Hebrew pîdath (Exod. xxviii. 17, xxxix. 10; Job xxviii. 19; Ezek. xxviii. 13), translated topaz, is now generally thought to be the same as our CHRYSOLITE (which see).

TOPHET. See GEHENNA—MOLOCH—HELL.

TORTOISE (Lev. xi. 29), or LAND TURTLE, a class of animals strongly allied to the reptile kinds. The Hebrew word, however, does not signify a tortoise, but a lizard.

TOWER. The towers of the watchmen, or of the shepherds, stood alone in the midst of the plain, in which the shepherds and herdsmen who looked after the flocks, or watchmen, might lodge. King Uzziah caused several towers to be built for the shepherds in the desert, and made many cisterns there; because he had a great number of flocks. 2 Chron. xxvi. 10. The tower of the flock (Micah iv. 8), and that which Isaiah (v. 2) notices, which was built in the midst of a vineyard, were of the same kind. See ADAR.

TOWER OF BABEL. See BABEL.

TOWER OF SHECHEM, was a citadel, or fortress, standing upon a higher ground than the rest of the city, and capacious enough to contain above a thousand persons.

TRACHONITIS (rocky or rugged), a province of Arabia, having Arabia Deserta east, Batanea west, Iturea south, and the country of Damascus north. Josephus says it is situated between Palestine and Cœlo-Syria, and was peopled by Hush, or Cush, a son of Aram. Of this province Herod Philip was tetrarch. Luke iii. 1.

TRADITION (Gr. paradosis), something handed down from one generation to another. Thus the Jews pretended, that, besides their written law, contained in the Old Testament, Moses had delivered an oral law, which had been conveyed down from father to son (see CABALA); and thus the Roman Catholics are said to value particular doctrines, supposed to have descended from the apostolic times by tradition.

"Common sense teaches every man," says Mr Wylie, "that there is no comparison between a written and an oral account of a matter, as regards the degree of reliance to be placed on each. Every time the latter is repeated, it acquires a new addition, or variation, or corruption. It is inconceivable that the truths of salvation should have been conveyed to us through a medium so inaccurate, fluctuating, and doubtful. Was it not one main design of Christ and his apostles, in committing their doctrine to writing, to guard against the uncertainties of tradition? In places innumerable, are not traditions, as a ground of faith, explicitly and pointedly condemned, and the study of the Scriptures strenuously enjoined? Besides, why should the Church of Rome offer proofs from Scripture on this or any other point? Does she not act inconsistently in doing so, inasmuch as she at the same instant forbids and requires the exercise of private judgment?"

"But, in the second place, from the Church, say the Romanists, you received the Bible; she transmitted it to you, and you take her authority for its authenticity and genuineness. We admit the Church, that is, the universal Church, and not exclusively the Church of Rome, to be a main witness as to the authenticity and genuineness of the Scriptures, on the ground that they have come down to us through her; but that is another question altogether from her right to solely and infallibly interpret Scripture. The messenger who carries a letter may be a very competent witness as to its authenticity and genuineness. He had it from the writer; it has not been out of his possession since; and he can speak very confidently and authoritatively as to its expressing the will of the person whose signature it bears; but is he only, therefore, entitled to interpret its meaning? He may be a very competent authority on its authenticity, but a very incompetent authority on its sense. The Church of Rome has confounded the question of authenticity and the question of interpretation. Because the Church carried this divine letter to us, we will listen to what she has to say on its authenticity; but inasmuch as this letter is addressed to us, and touches questions which involve our eternal welfare, and contains not the slightest hint that it needs to be either interpreted or supplemented by the bearer, we will use the right and responsibility of interpreting it for ourselves."

TRANSFIGURATION. This word is used to indicate the miraculous change which took place in the appearance of Christ on a mountain, which is supposed to be Tabor. Peter, James, and John were elected to be the sole witnesses of this wonderful transformation.

TRANSLATION, in the ecclesiastical sense of the word, is the removing of a bishop or pastor from one charge to another. It is also used for the version of a book or writing into a different language from that in which it was written.

In translating the Scriptures, great knowledge and caution are necessary. Dr Campbell lays down three fundamental rules for translating—1. The translation should give a complete transcript of the ideas of the original. 2. The style and manner of the original should be preserved. 3. The translation should have all the ease of original composition. He observes, that the difficulties found in translating the Scriptures arise—1. From the singularity of Jewish customs. 2. From the poverty (as appears) of their native language. 3. From the fewness of the books extant in it. 4. From the symbolical style of the prophets. 5. From the excessive influence which a previous acquaintance with translations has occasioned. And, 6. From prepossessions, in what way soever acquired, in regard to religious tenets.

Notwithstanding these difficulties, however, the divines employed by King James to translate the Old and New Testaments have given us a translation which, with a very few exceptions, can scarcely be improved. These divines were profoundly skilled in the learning, as well as in the languages of the East; whilst some of those who have presumed to improve their version, seem not to have possessed a critical knowledge of the Greek tongue, to have known still less of the Hebrew, and to have been absolute strangers to the dialect spoken in Judea in the days of our Saviour, as well as to the manners, customs, and peculiar opinions of the Jewish sects. "Neither," as one observes, "metaphysical acuteness, nor the most perfect knowledge of the principles of translation in general, will enable a man who is ignorant of these things to improve the authorized version either of the Gospels or Epistles; for such a man knows not accurately, and therefore cannot give a complete transcript of the ideas of the original work." See BIBLE.

TRANSUBSTANTIATION, the conversion or change of the substance of the bread and wine in the Lord's Supper into the body and blood of Jesus Christ, which the Romish church supposes to be wrought by the consecration of the priest.

Nothing can be more contradictory to Scripture, or to common sense, than this doctrine. It must be evident to every one who is not blinded by ignorance and prejudice, that our Lord's words, "This is my body," are merely figurative expressions; besides, such a transubstantiation is so opposite to the testimony of our senses, as completely to undermine the whole proof of all the miracles by which God hath confirmed revelation. According to such a doctrine, the same body is alive and dead at once, and may be in a million of different places whole and entire at the same instant of time; accidents remain without a substance, and substance without accidents; and a part of Christ's body is equal to the whole. It is also contrary to the end of the sacrament, which is to represent and commemorate Christ, not to believe that he is corporeally present 1 Cor. ix. 24, 25. But we need not waste time in attempting to refute a doctrine which, by its impious consequences, refutes itself.

TRAVAIL, the pains of child-bearing. The word is applied metaphorically to any severe suffering, especially if endured for the good of others. It is applied to the sufferings of Christ. Isa. liii. 11, lxvi. 7, 8.

TREASURE. Whatever a man peculiarly values is to him a treasure. He delights in it, he watches over it, he adopts every means to preserve it in safety. In the unsettled countries of the East, men found it necessary, for greater security, to bury their treasures, whether of gold and silver, or jewels and provisions, in some field which was not likely to be cultivated, and where, therefore, their treasure was likely to remain undisturbed. This practice appears to have prevailed as far back as the days of Solomon. Hence we find him saying in the Book of Proverbs, "If thou seekest her as silver, and searchest for her as for hid treasure." In allusion to the same custom, our blessed Lord related the parable of the hid treasure. Matt. xiii. 44. "Again, the kingdom of heaven is like unto treasure hid in a field; the which when a man hath found, he hideth, and for joy thereof goeth and selleth all that he hath, and buyeth that field."

TREE OF LIFE. See LIFE.

TRENCH, a word which occurs only once in the New Testament, namely in Luke xix. 43, where our Lord, speaking of the approaching destruction of Jerusalem, predicts,—"Thine enemies shall cast a trench about, and shall compass thee round on every side." The word here translated a "trench," may signify not only a ditch or fosse, but also a wall or rampart. Josephus tells us accordingly that to cut off all hope of escape from the Jews, Titus the Roman general ordered a wall to be built round the city. The length of the wall was thirty-nine furlongs, or nearly five miles. And at this wall without were erected thirteen castles, the circumference of which put together amounted to ten furlongs. The whole was completed in three days: so that what would naturally have required some months was done in so short an interval as is incredible.

TRENT, COUNCIL OF. See COUNCIL.

TRESPASS. See OFFENCE—SIN.

TRIALS. The afflictions of the righteous are often called in Scripture trials, probably because, as metals are tried in the fire, so the time of trouble is a time in which the faith of the Christian is peculiarly tried. Hence Job says, in reference to his own severe and complicated afflictions, "When he hath tried me, I shall come forth as gold."—See ADVERSITY—AFFLICTION.

TRIBE, a name applied to each collective body of families descended from each of the twelve patriarchs. The Hebrew word properly signifies a rod, probably because the rod was the symbol of authority. Though, properly speaking, the tribes of Israel were only twelve in number, yet in reality they were thirteen, as the tribe of Joseph was divided into two, Manasseh and Ephraim. In the division of the land of Canaan, the tribe of Levi received no inheritance, and when the tribes were numbered in the wilderness, Levi was not included. When Jacob was on his deathbed he predicted the future fortunes of his descendants. This prophecy concerning each tribe is contained in Gen. xxix. For a long period the twelve tribes formed one kingdom; but in the reign of Rehoboam, son of Solomon, a division took place, ten of the tribes forming the kingdom of Israel, and two, those of Judah and Benjamin, forming the kingdom of Judah. The latter kingdom was destroyed by the Babylonians under Nebuchadnezzar, who carried the Jews into captivity to Babylon. There they remained for seventy years, at the end of which they were liberated by Cyrus, and returned to their own land, where they rebuilt their temple. The ten tribes, however, shared a different fate. They were carried captive into Assyria, but what was their after history is still involved in obscurity. Sir William Jones supposed that he found traces of them among the Afghans, who call themselves Beni-Israel, or sons of Israel, a number of whom are found at Bombay. Others think they still exist, some of them in Ethiopia, others in Daghistan, on the shores of the Caspian Sea, and others among the Nestorians. It is impossible to speak with any certainty on the subject.—ED.

TRIBULATION expresses in our version much the same as trouble or trial; importing afflictive dispensations to which a person is subjected, either by way of punishment, or by way of experiment. For tribulation, by way of punishment, see Judg. x. 14; Matt. xxiv. 21, 29; Rom. ii. 9; 2 Thess. i. 6. For tribulation by way of trial, see John xvi. 33; Rom. v. 3; 2 Thess. i. 4. See AFFLICTION—TRIAL.

TRIBUNAL, the place where judicial proceedings are administered. See PAVEMENT.

TRIBUTE. In all ages the payment of tribute has been regarded as an acknowledgment of subjection on the part of those who paid it. The Jews under the theocracy paid a capitation-tax of half-a-shekel as an act of homage to their sovereign lord. This tax was devoted to the support of the tabernacle worship. It was assessed upon all Jews who were twenty years old and upwards; women, minors, and probably very old men being exempted. When the Jews were reduced under the subjection of the Romans, and though when our Lord exercised his public ministry, Judea had been for more than a hundred years a mere appendage of the Roman empire, the Pharisees proudly declared, "We were never in bondage to any man." The Herodians, on the other hand, maintained the entire rightfulness of the Roman jurisdiction, and were wont to enforce upon the Jews unlimited and unqualified subjection in all respects to the authority of the Roman emperor. These two parties, though opposed to each other, combined in tempting Christ on the question of paying tribute (Matt. xxii. 15-22), and the doctrine which he inculcated plainly was the duty of paying tribute to the Romans, to whom they were undeniably in subjection. The same duty is enforced by Paul in Rom. xiii. 8, and by Peter, 1 Pet. ii. 13.

TRINITARIANS, those who believe in the Trinity. See next article.

TRINITY, the union of three in one; generally applied to the ineffable mystery of three persons in one God—Father, Son, and Holy Spirit.

The doctrine of the Trinity is rejected by some because it is incomprehensible; but, as Mr Scott observes, if distinct personality, agency, and divine perfections be in Scripture ascribed to the Father, and to the Son, and to the Holy Spirit, no words can more exactly express the doctrine, which must unavoidably be thence inferred, than those commonly used on this subject, namely, that there are three distinct persons in the unity of the Godhead. The sacred oracles most assuredly teach us, that the one living and true God is, in some inexplicable manner, triune, for he is spoken of as one in some respects, and as three in others. Gen. i. 26, xi. 6, 7; Isa. xxxiv. 16, xlviii. 16; 2 Cor. xiii. 14; John xiv. 23; Matt. xxviii. 19; 2 Thess. iii. 5; Acts v. 3, 4.

The trinity of persons in the Deity consists with the unity of the divine essence, though most Trinitarians pretend not to explain the modus of it, and deem those reprehensible who have attempted it, as the modus in which any being subsists, according to its distinct nature and known properties, is a secret to the most learned men to this present day, and probably will always continue so. But if the most common of God's works, with which we are the most conversant, be in this respect incomprehensible, how can men think that the modus existendi (or manner of existence) of the infinite Creator can be level to their capacities?

The doctrine of the Trinity is indeed a mystery, but no man hath yet shown that it involves in it a real contradiction. Many have ventured to say that it ought to be ranked with transubstantiation, as equally absurd. But Archbishop Tillotson has shown, by the most convincing arguments imaginable, that transubstantiation includes the most palpable contradictions; and that we have the evidence of our eyes, feeling, and taste, that what we receive in the Lord's supper is bread, and not the body of a man; whereas we have the testimony of our eyes alone that the words, "This is my body," are at all in the Scriptures. Now this is intelligible to the meanest capacity; it is fairly made out, and perfectly unanswerable. But who ever attempted thus to prove the doctrine of the Trinity to be self-contradictory? What testimony of our senses, or what demonstrated truth, does it contradict? Yet, till this be shown, it is neither fair nor convincing to exclaim against it as contradictory, absurd, and irrational. See articles JESUS CHRIST—HOLY GHOST.

TRIUMPH. It has been customary in almost all ages and nations to celebrate success in war by triumphal processions of great pomp and splendour. It was when Melchisedec was thus returning from the slaughter of the kings that Abraham met him. Hymns of thanksgiving to God for the victory obtained was usual on such occasions, and beautiful specimens of such triumphal hymns are to be found in the song of Moses after Pharaoh and his host had been drowned in the Red Sea, and the song of Deborah after Barak had been overthrown. The bearing of palm-branches was a common form of expressing triumphal joy. Hence when our Lord entered Jerusalem, the people met him bearing branches of palm-trees, and strewed them in the way; and not only does John in the Apocalypse represent the Redeemed as singing the triumphal song of Moses and of the Lamb, but as carrying palms in their hands. Rev. vii. 9. The highest military honour which could be obtained in the Roman state was a triumph, or solemn procession, in which a victorious general and his army advanced through the city to the capitol. He set out from the Campus Martius, and proceeded along the Via Triumphalis, and from thence through the most public places of the city. The streets were strewed with flowers, and the altars smoked with incense. First went a numerous band of music, singing and playing triumphal songs; next were led the oxen to be sacrificed, having their horns gilt, and their heads adorned with fillets and garlands; then, in carriages, were brought the spoils taken from the enemy; also golden crowns sent by the allied and tributary states. The titles of the vanquished nations were inscribed on wooden frames, and images or representations of the conquered countries and cities were exhibited. The captive leaders followed in chains, with their children and attendants; after the captives came the lictors, having their fasces wreathed with laurel, followed by a great company of musicians and dancers, dressed like satyrs, and wearing crowns of gold; in the midst of whom was a pantomime, clothed in a female garb, whose business it was, with his looks and gestures, to insult the vanquished; a long train of persons followed, carrying perfumes; after them came the general, dressed in purple, embroidered with gold, with a crown of laurel on his head, a branch of laurel in his right hand, and in his left an ivory sceptre, with an eagle on the top, his face painted with vermillion, and a golden ball hanging from his neck on his breast; he stood upright in a gilded chariot, adorned with ivory, and drawn by four white horses, attended by his relations, and a great crowd of citizens, all in white. His children rode in the chariot along with him; his lieutenants and military tribunes commonly by his side. After the general, followed the consuls and senators, on foot; and the whole procession was closed by the victorious army drawn up in order, crowned with laurel, and decorated with the gifts which they had received for their valour, singing their own and their general's praises. The triumphal procession was not confined to the Romans: the Greeks had a similar custom; for the conquerors used to make a procession through the middle of their city, crowned with garlands, repeating hymns and songs, and brandishing their spears; the captives followed in chains, and all their spoils were exposed to public view."

"The great apostle of the Gentiles alludes to these splendid triumphal scenes in his Epistle to the Ephesians, where he mentions the glorious ascension of his Redeemer into heaven: 'When he ascended up on high, he led captivity captive, and gave gifts unto men.' Eph. iv. 8; Ps. lxxviii. 17, 18. Knowing the deep impression which such an allusion is calculated to make on the mind of a people familiarly acquainted with triumphal scenes, the apostle returns to it in his Epistle to the Colossians, which was written about the same time: 'Having spoiled principalities and powers, he made a show of them openly, triumphing over them in it.' Col. ii. 15. After obtaining a complete victory over all his enemies, he ascended in splendour and triumph into his Father's presence on the clouds of heaven, the chariots of the Most High, thousands of holy angels attending in his train; he led the devil and all his angels, together with sin, the world, and death, as his spoils of war and captives in chains, and exposed them to open contempt and shame, in the view of all his angelic attendants, triumphing like a glorious conqueror over them, in virtue of his cross, upon which he made complete satisfaction for sin, and by his own strength, without the assistance of any creature, destroyed him that had the power of death, that is, the devil. And as mighty princes were accustomed to scatter largesses among the people, and reward their companions in arms with a liberal hand, when, laden with the spoils of vanquished nations, they returned in triumph to their capital; so the Conqueror of death and hell, when he ascended far above all heavens, and sat down in the midst of the throne, shed forth blessings of his grace and Holy Spirit upon people of every tongue and of every nation." We quote from Professor Paxton.

TROAS, a city of Phrygia, or of Mysia, upon the Hellespont, having the old city of Troy to the north, and that of Assos to the south. Sometimes the name of Troas is put for the province wherein the city of Troy stood. Acts xx. 5, 6; 2 Cor. ii. 12; 2 Tim. iv. 13.

TROGYLLIUM, a promontory and town of Asia Minor, between Ephesus and Miletus. There was a Christian Church here at a very early period; and Paul remained in Trogyllium one day in the course of his travels.

TROUGH. In Eastern countries, where wells are highly prized, there are often troughs and flights of steps down to the water, to facilitate the labour of watering the cattle. To this convenience there is an allusion in Gen. xxiv. 20: "And she hasted, and emptied her pitcher into the trough, and ran again unto the well to draw water, and drew for all his camels." A trough was also placed beside the Arabian well from which the daughters of Jethro watered their flocks. Exod. ii. 16.

TRUMPET. Among the Hebrews this musical instrument was used on many occasions, religious, civil, and military. It was employed in proclaiming the return of the jubilee, the commencement and end of the Sabbath, and to give notice of the burnt-offerings and peace-offerings, new moons, and other festivals. There was a festival instituted among the Jews, called "The feast of trumpets," celebrated in the beginning of the civil year, in the month Tizri, answering to our September. The day was kept solemn, all servile business suspended, and particular offerings were enjoined: "And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying, Speak unto the children of Israel, saying, In the seventh month, in the first day of the month, shall ye have a sabbath, a memorial of blowing of trumpets, an holy convocation. Ye shall do no servile work therein: but ye shall offer an offering made by fire unto the Lord." Lev. xxiii. 23-25.

TRUST IN GOD signifies that confidence in or dependence we place on him. This trust ought to be—(1.) Sincere and unreserved; not in idols, in men, in talents, riches, power, in ourselves part, and him part. Prov. iii. 5, 6. (2.) Universal; body, soul, circumstances. 1 Pet. v. 7. (3.) Perpetual. Isa. xxvi. 4. (4.) With a lively expectation of his blessing. Micah vii. 7.

The encouragement we have to trust in him arises—(1.) From his liberality. Rom. viii. 32; Ps. lxxxiv. 11. (2.) His ability. James i. 17. (3.) His relationship. Ps. ciii. 13. (4.) His promise. Isa. xxxiii. 16. (5.) His conduct in all ages to those who have trusted in him. Gen. xlviii. 15, 16; Ps. xxxvii. 25.

The happiness of those who trust in him is great, if we consider—(1.) Their safety. Ps. cxxv. 1. (2.) Their courage. Ps. xxvii. 1. (3.) Their peace. Isa. xxvi. 3. (4.) Their character and fruitfulness. Ps. i. 3. (5.) Their end. Ps. xxxvii. 37; Job v. 26.

TRUTH, a term used in opposition to falsehood, and applied to propositions which answer or accord to the nature and reality of the thing whereof something is affirmed or denied. Natural or physical truth is said to be the agreement of our sentiments with the nature of things. Moral truth is the conformity of our words and actions to our sentiments. Evangelical or gospel truth is taken for Christ; the doctrines of the gospel; substance or reality, in opposition to the shadows and ceremonies of the law. John i. 17. For this truth we ought to be sincere in seeking, zealous in defending, and active in propagating; highly to prize it, constantly to rejoice in it, and uniformly to be obedient to it.

"The love of truth is among the noblest characters of the Christian; and as genuine piety, wherever it prevails, will banish falsehood, so we find a real love of truth, the comparison of a man's conduct with the regulations of truth, and a conformity to those regulations, are always among the most desirable, the most favorable, and the most decisive proofs of genuine religion; which being itself a system of truth, delights in nothing more than in truth, whether of heart, discourse, or conduct. Of this the apostle John is an instance, who expresses to the elect lady his delight at seeing her children walk in the truth." See LYING—SINCERITY.

TUBAL, fifth son of Japheth, who is commonly united with Meshech; whence it is thought that they peopled countries bordering on each other. Bochart thinks, that by Meshech and Tubal are intended the Muscovites and the Tibarenians.

TUBAL-CAIN, son of Lamech and of Zillah. Gen. iv. 22. Scripture calls him the father, that is, inventor or master, of the art of forging and managing iron, and of making all kinds of iron-work. It has been thought that he gave occasion to the Vulcan of the heathen.

TURTLE (tur, trugōn—Gen. xv. 9; Lev. i. 14, v. 7, 11, xii. 6, 8, xiv. 22, 30, xv. 14, 29; Numb. vi. 10; Ps. lxxiv. 19; Cant. ii. 12; Jer. viii. 7; trugōn—Luke ii. 24). We have the authority of the Septuagint, the Targum, and of all the ancient interpreters, for understanding this of the turtle, or turtle-dove. Indeed, it is one of those evident instances in which the name of the bird is by onomatopœia formed from its note or cry.

The turtle is mentioned among migratory birds by Jeremiah (viii. 7), and in this sense differs from the rest of its family, which are all stationary. The fact to which the prophet alludes is attested by Aristotle in these words: "The pigeon and the dove are always present, but the turtle only in summer: that bird is not seen in winter." And, in another part of his work, he asserts that the dove remains, while the turtle migrates. Varro, and other ancient writers, make the like statement. Thus Solomon (Cant. ii. 12) mentions the return of this bird as one of the indications of spring: "The voice of the turtle is heard in the land." See DOVE.

TYCHICUS, a disciple employed by the apostle Paul to carry his letters to several Churches. He was of the province of Asia, and accompanied Paul in his journey from Corinth to Jerusalem. Acts xx. 4. He carried the epistle to the Colossians, that to the Ephesians, and the first to Timothy. The apostle calls him his dear brother, a faithful minister of the Lord, and his companion in the service of God (Eph. vi. 21, 22; Col. iv. 7, 8); and had intentions of sending him into Crete, to preside there in the absence of Titus. Tit. iii. 12. It is thought also that he was sent to Ephesus, while Timothy was at Rome, when he carried a letter to the Ephesians from this apostle. The Greeks made him one of the Seventy, and Bishop of Colophon, in the province of Asia.

TYPE. "Understanding the word type," to quote from Mr Fairbairn's able work on Typology, "in the theological sense,—for, as employed in Scripture, it is used with greater latitude, as may be seen by consulting in the original, Heb. viii. 5; 1 Cor. x. 6; Phil. iii. 17; 1 Thess. i. 7; 1 Pet. v. 3; Rom. vi. 17, —it is admitted by common consent, first, that in the character, action, or institution, which is denominated the type, there must be a resemblance of some kind to what corresponds to it under the gospel; and, second, that the former must not be any character, action, or institution, occurring in Old Testament Scripture, but such only as had their ordination from God, and were designed by him to foreshadow the gospel antitype. These two conditions enter as essential elements into the constitution of a type, and must meet together in every thing to which the name can with truth and justice be applied. For, as Bishop Marsh has justly remarked, 'to constitute one thing the type of another, something more is wanted than mere resemblance. The former must not only resemble the latter, but must have been designed to resemble the latter. It must have been so designed in its original institution. It must have been designed as something preparatory to the latter. The type as well as the antitype must have been pre-ordained; and they must have been pre-ordained as constituent parts of the same general scheme of divine providence. It is this previous design, and this pre-ordained connection, which constitute the relation of type and antitype.'

"The existence, then, of such a relation, evidently pre-supposes and implies two important facts, viz., that the things of the gospel, which constitute the antitypes, are the great objects on which the mind of God was from the first directed for the good of his church; and that, to prepare the way for the introduction of these grand and ultimate objects, he placed the church under a course of training, which included among other things instruction by types, or designed and fitting resemblances of what was to come. Both of these facts are so plainly declared in the Word of God, and so universally admitted, that there can be no need for doing more than simply referring to the scriptural proof of them. In respect to the former, the times of the gospel are called 'the ends of the world,' without which all its preceding parts were imperfect, and 'the dispensation of the fulness of times,' implying that under it alone were the great objects of faith and hope properly realised. 1 Cor. x. 11; Heb. xv. 40; Eph. i. 10. It is only with its commencement also, we are told, that the clear light began to shine upon the church, and that the long-concealed mystery of God was made manifest, the things which concerned the work of salvation having been hitherto wrapt in comparative darkness, and scarcely so much as entering into the imaginations of men in their proper greatness and magnitude. 1 John ii. 8; Rom. xvi. 25, 26; Col. i. 27; 1 Cor. ii. 7–10. Hence the most important and precious ordinances before the coming of Christ, were only as shadows of the sublime and living realities presented in the gospel (Col. ii. 17; Heb. viii. 5); and the most eminent in spiritual light and privilege before were inferior to the comparatively little and less distinguished members of the Messiah's kingdom. The Messiah himself is the beginning and the end, the heart and centre, of the whole scheme of God for the salvation of man; the glorious object for whose coming every true child of God waited and longed, to whose person, work, and kingdom all the prophets gave witness, and on the ground of whose prevailing mediation, foreseen and calculated on, all forgiveness of sin and gifts of grace had from the first proceeded. Rev. i. 8; Luke ii. 25; Acts x. 43, iv. 12; Rom. iii. 25; 1 Pet. i. 20; Rev. xiii. 8. In Christ, therefore, and the things of his salvation, every principle and purpose of the divine mind respecting the people of God terminates and is made perfect; these may be said to be the highest, and, indeed, the only good for sinful men, because on them, from first to last, every thing is made to depend; and as all that concerns a fallen world dates from the fatal transgression of Adam, so all that concerns a restored world has at once its rise and its consummation in the perfect work of Christ, the second Adam.

"The other fact, which is presupposed and implied in the doctrine of types, viz., that God subjected the church to a course of preparatory training before he introduced the realities of his final dispensation, stands out with equal clearness and prominence in the page of inspiration. It is scarcely possible, indeed, to separate even in idea the one fact from the other; for without such a course of preparation being meanwhile in progress, the long delay which took place in the bringing in of redemption, and its paramount objects, would be utterly inexplicable. Accordingly, the church of the Old Testament is constantly represented as in a state of comparative childhood, supplied with such measures of instruction and such means of discipline as were suited to its imperfect condition; its law a schoolmaster to bring men to Christ, and its prophetic scriptures ever opening out in gradual and growing developments the testimony of Heaven concerning him. Up till the coming of Christ, the church was in a state of minority, passing through successive stages of advancement, and in them all undergoing preparation for the glorious light and liberties which were to distinguish its condition when arrived at the season of manhood. Gal. iii. 24, iv. 1-3; Heb. viii. 7-13.

"Now, in this course of preparation for the realities of Christ's kingdom, the types held an important, though not the only place. The church from the first enjoyed the advantage of direct instruction, communicated either personally by God, or by the instrumentality of his appointed messengers; and in so far as the spirit of prophecy mingled with these communications, as its great theme was the testimony of Jesus, so its leading object and design could not fail to be, the preparation of the church for the reception of his work, and the institution of his kingdom. But whatever was effected in this way, it did not, as we may judge from the course actually pursued, supersede the necessity of types; for these also entered as an essential and important part into the course of preparation. In this respect they possessed so much in common with the intimations of prophecy, that there was a real pre-ordained connection between them and the things of Christ's kingdom; it was to these they pointed as the ultimate end and reason of their institution. But they differed, inasmuch as they spake of the things of the kingdom, not by words, but by outward palpable resemblances; they stood for the time being in the room of the facts and realities of the gospel, and by certain resemblances which they bore to these, were designed and fitted to prepare the way for their introduction. And if we inquire concerning these resemblances, of what kind or nature they behaved to be, and actually were, a very little reflection must convince us, that they must somehow have exhibited the same great elements of truth with the things they represented, and that too in a form more level to the comprehension, more easily and distinctly cognizable by the minds of men."

TYRE, the capital of ancient Phœnicia, situated on the coast of the Mediterranean Sea. It was built by the Sidonians, and hence it is called by the prophet, Isa. xxiii. 12, "the daughter of Sidon." "After the taking of Sidon by the Persians, the city of Tyre rapidly increased in wealth and greatness, and became, in a short time, the capital of Phœnicia, and the mart of the whole earth. At the time it was besieged by Alexander, it was, in every respect, the greatest commercial city in the world. Including ancient Tyre, it was nineteen miles in circuit: the houses were spacious, magnificent, consisting of several storeys, and higher than those of Rome. Pre-eminent in riches and splendour, rose the magnificent temples of Olympian Jove, Astarte, and other deities adored by the Tyrians, constructed by Hiram, adorned with pillars of gold, glittering with precious stones, and enriched with the splendid offerings of many kings. The city was defended by a wall an hundred and fifty feet in height, of huge stones cemented with lime. Two harbours received its innumerable vessels, one looking towards Sidon, the other to Egypt. Strabo places it nearly at the distance of twenty-five miles from Sidon, its renowned parent. The inhabitants of Tyre, like the Sidonians from whom they derived their origin, were distinguished for the acuteness and versatility of their genius. They were skilled in arithmetic and astronomy: but in the mechanical arts they were scarcely equalled, certainly not surpassed, by any people. For the brilliant colour known to the ancients by the name of the Tyrian purple, the kings of the east were indebted to the ingenuity of that people. The fabrics produced in the Sidonian looms rivalled the fine linen of Egypt; while the productions of the artificer in iron, in brass, and in crystal, were not less remarkable for the beauty of the device than for the delicacy of the execution. It is, therefore, a true account which the inspired prophet has given of the greatness and splendour of Tyre. Isaiah calls her 'a mart of nations; the crowning city, whose merchants are princes, whose traffickers are the honourable of the earth;' and Ezekiel, alluding to old Tyre, places her 'at the entry of the sea;' and, in another passage, to the new city, 'in the heart of the seas,' recounts the various nations that carried on a lucrative commerce with the Tyrians. The pride and luxury which her unrivalled power and riches produced among all ranks of her citizens, and above all, the cruel and unbrotherly triumph in which the Tyrians indulged, when the chosen people of God yielded to the arms of Nebuchadnezzar, and were led away captive beyond the rivers of Babylon, excited against them the displeasure of Heaven. As a just punishment of their crimes, continental Tyre was taken and destroyed by the Chaldeans, and remained in a state of ruin and desolation seventy years,—a term of equal duration with the captivity of Judah, whom they had so barbarously insulted in the hour of her distress. At the end of that period, Tyre recovered her wealth and splendour, an event which the prophet Zechariah describes in these striking terms:—'And Tyrus did build herself a stronghold, and heaped up silver as the dust, and fine gold as the mire of the streets.' But with her commerce and prosperity, her wickedness returned; and the judgments of God quickly followed. In fulfilment of ancient prophecies which sealed her doom, and even described the manner of her future destruction, Alexander besieged, took, and set the city on fire; but so great was the forbearance of Heaven, notwithstanding the pride and wickedness of Tyre, so numerous and efficient were her resources, that in the short period of nineteen years she was able to withstand the fleets and armies of Antigonos, and to sustain a siege of fifteen months, before she was taken. But the time of her final desolation at length arrived; and nothing could divert or retard the full accomplishment of the divine purpose long before expressed by an inspired prophet:—"Thus saith the Lord God, Behold, I am against thee, O Tyrus, and I will cause many nations to come up against thee, as the sea causeth his waves to come up. And they shall destroy the walls of Tyrus, and break down her towers: I will also scrape her dust from her, and make her like the top of a rock. It shall be a place for the spreading of nets in the midst of the sea: for I have spoken it, saith the Lord God." Ezek. xxvi. 3-5. To show the certainty of this fearful sentence, it is repeated, 'I will make thee like the top of a rock: thou shalt be a place to spread nets upon; thou shalt be built no more: for I the Lord have spoken it, saith the Lord God.' And again:—"I will make thee a terror, and thou shalt be no more: though thou be sought for, yet shalt thou never be found again, saith the Lord God." Ezek. xxvi. 14, 21. The exact fulfilment of this prediction, in all its parts, is attested by so many travellers of unimpeachable veracity, who have beheld and examined the ruins of this once great, and powerful, and splendid city, that the most stubborn unbeliever is awed into silence."

U.

UBIQUITY, omnipresence; an attribute of the Deity, whereby he is always intimately present to all things, and in all places. See OMNISCIENCE.

ULAI, a river which runs by the city Shushan, in Persia. Dan. viii. 2, 16. See SHUSHAN.

UNBELIEF, the refusing assent to testimony. It is often taken for distrust of God's faithfulness, but more particularly for the discrediting the testimony of God's word concerning his Son. John iii. 18, 19, xvi. 9. "It includes," says Dr Guise, "disaffection to God, disregard to his word, prejudices against the Redeemer, readiness to give credit to any other than him, inordinate love to the world, and preferring of the applause of men to the approbation of God."—"Unbelief," says Charnock, "is the greatest sin, as it is the foundation of all sin; it was Adam's first sin; it is a sin against the gospel, against the highest testimony; a refusal to accept of Christ upon the terms of the gospel. It strikes peculiarly at God; is the greatest reproach of him, robs him of his glory, is a contradiction to his will, and a contempt of his authority. The causes of unbelief are Satan, ignorance, pride, and sensuality. The danger of it is great; it hardens the heart, fills with presumption, creates impatience, deceives with error, and finally exposes to condemnation. John iii. 36.

UNBELIEVERS are of three sorts:—1. Those who, having heard the gospel, reject it. 2. Those who verbally assent to it, yet know not to what they assent, or why they believe. 3. Those who, whatever knowledge they may have of certain speculative points of divinity, yet obey not the truth, but live in sin. See INFIDELITY.

The following is a striking description, given by Massillon, of an unbeliever: "He is a man without morals, probity, faith, or character; who owns no rule but his passions, no law but his iniquitous thoughts, no master but his desires, no check but the dread of authority, no God but himself; an unnatural child, since he believes that chance alone hath given him fathers; a faithless friend, seeing he looks upon men merely as the wretched fruits of a wild and fortuitous concurrence, to whom he is connected only by transitory ties; a cruel master, seeing he is convinced that the strongest and the most fortunate have always reason on their side. Who could henceforth place any dependence on such? They no longer fear a God; they no longer respect men; they look forward to nothing after this life; virtue and vice are merely prejudices of education in their eyes, and the consequences of popular credulity. Adulteries, revenge, blasphemies, the blackest treacheries, abominations which we dare not even name, are no longer in their opinion but human prohibitions established through the policy of legislators. According to them the most horrible crimes or the purest virtues are all equally the same, since an eternal annihilation shall soon equalize the just and the impious, and for ever confound them both in the dreary mansion of the tomb. What monsters, then, must such be upon the earth!"

UNCHANGEABLENESS OF GOD. See FAITHFULNESS—IMMUTABILITY OF GOD.

UNCLEAN. See ANIMAL.

UNCLEANNES is either physical (Matt. xxiii. 27), or ceremonial (Lev. xv. 31), or moral, that is, includes all kinds of sin (Ezek. xxxvi. 29), and particularly all the various forms of lewdness, which marriage was ordained to prevent. Eph. v. 3; Col. iii. 5; 2 Pet. ii. 10; 1 Cor. vii. 2.

UNCTION, in matters of religion, is used for the character conferred on sacred things by anointing them with oil. Unctions were very frequent among the Hebrews. They anointed both their kings and high priests at the ceremony of their inauguration. They also anointed the sacred vessels of the tabernacle and temple, to sanctify and consecrate them to the service of God. Hence Jesus Christ is called the Messiah, or the Anointed One, or the Christ of God, as being the anointed prophet, priest, and king of his people; and all the followers of Jesus bear the name of Christians, and are said to "have an unction of the Holy One."

Extreme unction, or the anointing persons in the article of death, the Romish church has advanced to the dignity of a sacrament. It is administered to none but such as are affected with some mortal disease, or are in a decrepit age. It is refused to impenitent persons, as also to criminals. The parts to be anointed are, the eyes, the ears, the nostrils, the mouth, the hands, the feet, and the reins. The laity are anointed on the palms of the hands, but priests on the back of them, because the palms of their hands have been already consecrated by ordination.

The passage in James respecting the anointing with oil, has been a source of difficulty to some pious minds; but, in order to understand it, it is necessary to observe, that anointing with oil was an ordinance for the miraculous cure of sick persons. Mark vi. 13. But since those extraordinary gifts are ceased, as being no longer necessary for the confirmation of the gospel, of course there is no warrant now for using that ceremony.

UNDER. (1.) Beneath, in respect to place; so things on the earth are under the sun, under the heavens. Judg. i. 7; Deut. iv. 11. (2.) Beneath, in respect of condition, state, power, authority. Hence we read of being under foot. Rom. xvi. 20. Under sin, under the law, under grace, under the curse; that is, under the impression, influence, and reign thereof. Rom. iii. 9, vi. 14. Men are under God, when subject to his laws. Hos. iv. 12. (3.) Beneath, in respect of protection; thus the saints are under the shadow, feathers, or wings of God in Christ. Cant. ii. 3; Matt. xxiii. 37; Ps. xci. 1-3. (4.) Beneath, in respect of effectual support; so the arms of God and Christ are under his people to uphold them under every burden. Cant. viii. 3; Deut. xxxiii. 27. (5.) Ready to be brought forth; so good and bad language is under the tongue when in the heart and ready to be uttered. Cant. iv. 11; Ps. cxl. 3.

UNDERGIRD. To undergird a ship is to bind her round with ropes, that she may not be torn asunder. Acts xxvii. 17.

UNGODLINESS, wickedness in general; but it particularly comprehends all sins against the first table of the law, as ignorance, atheism, idolatry, superstition, blasphemy, neglect of the worship of God, &c. Tit. ii. 12.

UNHOLY—(1.) Common, as the blood of a beast unsanctified. Men so account of Christ's blood when they look on him as an impostor, or plead his righteousness to encourage them in sinful practices. Heb. x. 29. (2.) Not sanctified according to the ceremonial law. Lev. x. 10. (3.) Without renewing grace, wicked. 2 Tim. iii. 2.

UNICORN (Heb. reem). Numb. xxiii. 22, xxiv. 8; Deut. xxxiii. 17; Job xxxix. 9, 10; Ps. xxii. 21, xxix. 6, xcii. 10; Isa. xxxiv. 7. The derivation of the word, both in Hebrew and Ethiopic, says Mr Bruce, seems to be from erectness or standing straight. This is certainly no particular quality in the animal itself, which is not more, or even so much, erect as many other quadrupeds, for its knees are rather crooked; but it is from the circumstances and manner in which the horn is placed. The horns of all other animals are inclined to some degree of parallelism with the nose, or os frontis. The horn of the rhinoceros alone is erect or perpendicular to this bone, on which it stands at right angles; thereby possessing a greater purchase or power, as a lever, than any horn could possibly have in any other position.

This situation of the horn is very happily alluded to in the sacred writings: "My horn shalt thou exalt like the horn of the reem." Ps. xcii. 10. And the horn here alluded to is not wholly figurative, but was really an ornament worn by great men in the days of victory, preferment, or rejoicing, when they were anointed with new, sweet, or fresh oil—a circumstance which David joins with that of erecting the horn.

It is difficult to imagine why some writers have been induced to consider the unicorn as being of the deer or antelope kind, since this is of a genus whose very character is fear and weakness, quite opposite, as Mr Bruce remarks, to the qualities by which the reem is described in Scripture. Besides, it is plain that the reem is not of the class of clean quadrupeds; and a late modern traveller very whimsically takes him for the leviathan, which certainly was a fish. Balaam, a native of Midian, and so in the neighbourhood of the haunts of the rhinoceros, and intimately connected with Ethiopia (for they themselves were shepherds of that country), in a transport, from contemplating the strength of Israel, whom he was brought to curse, says, they had as it were "the strength of the reem." Numb. xxiii. 22. Job makes frequent allusions to his great strength, ferocity, and indocility. Chap. xxxix. 9, 10. He asks, "Will the reem be willing to serve thee, or to abide at thy crib?" That is, Will he willingly come into thy stable, and eat out of thy manger? and again: "Canst thou bind the reem with a band in the furrow, and will he harrow the valleys after thee?" In other words, Canst thou make him to go in the plough or harrow?

Some recent writers have supposed the unicorn, or Hebrew reem, to refer to the giraffe or camelopard.

UNIFORMITY, regularity, a similitude or resemblance between the parts of a whole. The word is particularly used for one and the same form of public prayers, administration of sacraments, and other rites, &c., of the Church of England, prescribed by the famous statute called the Act of Uniformity.

UNION HYPOSTATICAL is the union of the human nature of Christ with the divine, constituting two natures in one person: not consubstantially, as the three persons in the Godhead; nor physically, as soul and body united in one person; nor mystically, as is between Christ and believers; but so as that the manhood subsists in the second person, yet without making confusion, both making but one person. (See JESUS CHRIST.) It was miraculous. Luke i. 34, 35. Complete and real: Christ took a real human body and soul, and not in appearance. Inseparable. Heb. vii. 25. (See INCARNATION.) For the reasons of this union, see article MEDIATOR.

UNION TO CHRIST is considered as—(1.) Visible, consisting in outward profession of the Christian faith. John xv. 2, 6. (2.) Virtual, resting only in the divine purpose from eternity. Eph. i. 4. (3.) Vital or spiritual, formed in the moment of our regeneration. John xvii. 26; 1 John iv. 13.

It is represented in the Scripture by the strongest expressions language can admit of, and even compared to the union between the Father and the Son. John xvii. 11, 21, &c. It is also compared to the union of a vine and its branches. John xv. 4, 5. To the union of our food with our bodies. John vi. 56, 57. To the union of the body with the head. Eph. iv. 15, 16. To the conjugal union. Eph. v. 23, 30. To the union of a king and his subjects. Matt. xxv. 34, 40. To a building and its foundation. 1 Pet. ii. 4, 5; Eph. ii. 21, 22. It is also represented by an identity of spirit. 1 Cor. vi. 17. By an identity of body. 1 Cor. xii. 12, 27. By an identity of interest. Matt. xxv. 40; John xx. 17.

This union must be considered not as a mere intellectual union only in opinions; nor a physical union, as between the head and the members; nor as an essential union, or union with the divine nature; but as a cordial, spiritual union. Eph. v. 32. Honourable union. 1 John iii. 1, 2. Supernatural union. 1 Cor. i. 30. Holy. 1 John iii. 24. Necessary. John xv. 4. Inviolable. Rom. viii. 38, 39.

Some state it thus:—(1.) An union of natures. Heb. ii. 11. (2.) Of actions, his obedience being imputed to us, and our sins reckoned to him. 2 Cor. v. 21. (3.) Of life. Col. iii. 4. (4.) Of sentiment. 2 Cor. v. 17. (5.) Of interest. Matt. xxv. 34, &c. (6.) Of affection. 2 Cor. v. 14. (7.) Of residence. John xvii. 24.

The advantages of it are knowledge. Eph. i. 18. Fellowship. 1 Cor. i. 2. Security. John xv. Felicity. 1 Pet. i. 8. Spirituality (John xv. 8); and, indeed, all the rich communications of blessings here and hereafter. Col. i. 22.

The evidences of union to Christ are—Light in the understanding. 1 Pet. ii. 9. Affection to him. John xiv. 21. Frequent communion with him. 1 John i. 3. Delight in his word, ordinances, and people. Ps. xxvii. 4, cxix. Submission to his will, and conformity to his image. 1 John ii. 5.

UNITARIANS, a name assumed by those who confine the glory and attributes of divinity to the Father, and refuse them to the Son and Holy Spirit. As the unity of the Godhead is not distinctively a tenet of that body, but is held by Trinitarians as strenuously as by them, the legitimate use of the term has never been conceded to them. (See UNITY OF GOD—TRINITY.) For a greater length of time, and more appositely, they have been called SOCINIANS (which see).

UNITED BRETHREN. See MORAVIANS.

UNITED PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH. This name has been adopted by that large and influential body of Christians which was formed by the union of the United Secession and Relief Churches—a union which was happily effected in May 1847. The following are the articles of the Basis of Union, as finally agreed upon by the respective synods of Secession and Relief:—

“I. That the word of God, contained in the Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments, is the only rule of faith and practice in this church.

“II. That the Westminster Confession of Faith, and the Larger and Shorter Catechisms, are the confession and catechisms of this church, and contain the authorized exhibition of the sense in which we understand the Holy Scriptures; it being always understood that we do not approve of anything in these documents which teaches, or may be supposed to teach, compulsory or persecuting and intolerant principles in religion.

“III. That Presbyterian government, without any superiority of office to that of a teaching presbyter and in a due subordination of church courts, which is founded on, and agreeable to, the Word of God, is the government of this church.

“IV. That the ordinances of worship shall be administered in the United Church as they have been in both bodies of which it is formed; and that the Westminster Directory of Worship continue to be regarded as a compilation of excellent rules.

“V. That the term of membership is a credible profession of the faith of Christ as held by this church—a profession made with intelligence, and justified by a corresponding character and deportment.

“VI. That with regard to those ministers and sessions who think that the second section of the 26th chapter of the Confession of Faith authorizes free communion—that is, not loose or indiscriminate communion, but the occasional admission to fellowship in the Lord's supper of persons respecting whose Christian character satisfactory evidence has been obtained, though belonging to other religious denominations—this church allows them what they enjoyed in their separate communions—the right of acting on their conscientious convictions.

“VII. That the election of office-bearers of this church in its several congregations belongs, by the authority of Christ, exclusively to the members in full communion.

“VIII. That this church solemnly recognises the obligation to hold forth, as well as to hold fast, the doctrine and law of Christ, and to make exertions for the universal diffusion of the blessings of his gospel, at home and abroad.

“IX. That as the Lord hath ordained that they who preach the gospel should live of the gospel—that they who are taught in the Word should communicate to him that teacheth in all good things—that they who are strong should help the weak, and that having freely received, they should freely give the gospel to those who are destitute of it—this church asserts the obligation and the privilege of its members, influenced by regard to the authority of Christ, to support and extend, by voluntary contribution, the ordinances of the gospel.

“X. That the respective bodies of which this church is composed, without requiring from each other an approval of the steps of procedure by their fathers, or interfering with the right of private judgment in reference to these, unite in regarding as still valid the reasons on which they have hitherto maintained their state of secession and separation from the judicatories of the Established Church, as expressed in the authorised documents of the respective bodies, and in maintaining the lawfulness and obligation of separation from ecclesiastical bodies in which dangerous error is tolerated, or the discipline of the Church, or the rights of her ministers or members, are disregarded.

“The United Church, in their present most solemn circumstances, join in expressing their grateful acknowledgment to the great Head of the Church for the measure of spiritual good which he has accomplished by them in their separate state—their deep sense of the many imperfections and sins which have marked their ecclesiastical management—and their determined resolution, in dependence on the promised grace of their Lord, to apply more faithfully the great principles of church fellowship—to be more watchful in reference to admission and discipline, that the purity and efficiency of our congregations may be promoted, and the great end of our existence as a collective body may be answered with respect to all within its pale, and to all without it, whether members of other denominations or the world lying in wickedness. And, in fine, the United Church regard with a feeling of brotherhood all the faithful followers of Christ, and shall endeavour to maintain the unity of the whole body of Christ, by a readiness to co-operate with all its members in all things in which they are agreed.”

The United Presbyterian Church adheres to the theological doctrines taught in the Westminster Confession of Faith, and the Larger and Shorter Catechisms. The system of church government is in all respects identical with the other Presbyterian Churches in Scotland, the supreme court being a General Synod which meets once a-year, and is composed of all ordained ministers having charges, with a delegated elder from each session.

The grand distinguishing feature which marks the United Presbyterian Church, is that it is a voluntary church, not formally avowed in any portion of her standards, but understood to be a principle held by all her members. She sets herself accordingly against all state establishments of religion, and all public and national endowments for the maintenance of Christianity in the country. The number of congregations in connection with this body amounts, by the most recent calculations, to 505; the number of members in full communion to 158,000; and the aggregate attendants on their churches to 400,000. The students of divinity attending the theological hall of the body are about 180. According to this calculation, nearly a fifth part of the population of Scotland belongs to the United Presbyterian Church.

UNIVERSALISTS. The grand distinguishing characteristic of this sect is their belief in the final holiness and happiness of the whole human family. Some of them believe that all punishment for sin is endured in the present state of existence, while others believe it extends into the future life; but all agree that it is administered in a spirit of kindness, is intended for the good of those who experience it, and that it will finally terminate, and be succeeded by a state of perfect and endless holiness and happiness. See RESTORATIONISTS.

UNLEARNED, such as are but little instructed in science (Acts iv. 13), or little acquainted with the mind of God and the teaching of his Spirit. 2 Pet. iii. 16. Unlearned questions are such as minister no true and substantial knowledge. 2 Tim. ii. 23.

UNPARDONABLE SIN. See SIN.

UNPROFITABLE, useless, tending to no real advantage, but hurt. Job xv. 3. Wicked men are unprofitable, are spiritually unfruitful, and abominable to God, neither studying his glory nor the real good of themselves or others. Ps. xiv. 3; Philem. 11. The ceremonial law was unprofitable; it could not really remove the guilt or power of sin by the observance of all its rites. Heb. vii. 18. The grieving of ministers is unprofitable to their people, as it mars their studies and the discharge of their office, leading them to complain of the injury to God, who will not fail to punish it in this or in the world to come. Heb. xiii. 17.

UNWORTHY, not meet, not deserving. 1 Cor. vi. 2. The Jews judged themselves unworthy of everlasting life, when they acted as if they were set upon ruining themselves. Acts xiii. 46. Men eat and drink unworthily at the Lord's table, when they do it in an unworthy state of voluntary subjection to sin and Satan, and while under the broken law; in an unworthy frame of spirit, ignorant, unbelieving, impenitent, envious, malicious; and with an unworthy end of self-applause, self-righteousness, or to qualify for a civil office; and when the elements are used as if they were common provision, not as the symbols of Jesus' person, righteousness, and blessing. 1 Cor. xi. 27, 29.

UPHAZ, a place mentioned in Jer. x. 9, and Dan.

x. 5, as abounding in fine gold. Its exact situation is unknown, but Calmet supposes it to be the country on the east of the Black Sea.

UPHOLD, to sustain by power, by providence (Heb. i. 3), by promise or by spiritual influence. Isa. xlii. 1; Ps. cxix. 116.

UPPER ROOM. In former times, when houses in the East consisted of two flats, the ground floor was used for accommodating the horses and inferior servants, while the upper flat was appropriated to the family. This is beautifully described in the following extract from an observant traveller:—

"The house in which I am at present living," says Jowett, "gives what seems to be a correct idea of the scene of Entychus' falling from the upper loft while Paul was preaching. Acts xx. 6-12. According to our idea of houses, the scene is very far from intelligible; and, besides this, the circumstance of preaching generally leaves on the mind of cursory readers the notion of a church. To describe this house, which is not many miles distant from the Troad, and perhaps, from the unchanging character of Oriental customs, nearly resembles the houses then built, will fully illustrate the narrative. On entering my host's door, we find the first floor entirely used as a store: it is filled with large barrels of oil, the produce of the rich country for many miles round: this space, so far from being habitable, is sometimes so dirty with the dripping of the oil, that it is difficult to pick out a clean footing from the door to the first step of the staircase. On ascending, we find the first floor, consisting of an humble suite of rooms, not very high: these are occupied by the family for their daily use. It is on the next storey that all their expense is lavished: here my courteous host has appointed my lodging; beautiful curtains and mats, and cushions to the divan, display the respect with which they mean to receive their guest. Here, likewise, their splendour, being at the top of the house, is enjoyed by the poor Greeks with more retirement, and less chance of molestation from the intrusion of the Turks: here, when the professors of the college waited upon me, to pay their respects, they were received in ceremony, and sat at the window. The room is both higher and also larger than those below; it has two projecting windows; and the whole floor is so much extended in front beyond the lower part of the building, that the projecting windows considerably overhang the street. In such an upper room, secluded, spacious, and commodious, Paul was invited to preach his parting discourse. The divan, or raised seat, with mats or cushions, encircles the interior of each projecting window; and I have remarked, that, when the company is numerous, they sometimes place large cushions behind the company seated on the divan, so that a second tier of company, with their feet upon the seat of the divan, are sitting behind, higher than the front row. Entychus, thus sitting, would be on a level with the open window; and, being overcome with sleep, he would easily fall out from the third loft of the house into the street, and be almost certain, from such a height, to lose his life. Thither Paul went down, and comforted the alarmed company by bringing up Entychus alive. It is noted that 'there were many lights in the upper chamber.' The very great plenty of oil in this neighbourhood would enable them to afford many lamps; the heat of these and so much company would cause the drowsiness of Entychus, at that late hour, and be the occasion, likewise, of the windows being open."

UR, the birth-place of Abraham. Mr Ainsworth thinks that Kalah Sherghat corresponds to Ur. See ABRAHAM—CHALDEA.

URIM AND THUMMIM. These words, which literally mean light and perfection, were employed to denote among the ancient Hebrews a certain oracular manner of consulting God, which was done by the high-priest dressed in his robe, and having on his pectoral or breast-plate. The use made of them was to consult God in difficult cases relating to the whole state of Israel, and sometimes in cases relating to the king, the sanhedrim, the general of the army, or some other great personage. There has been no small discussion among the learned as to the manner in which the answer of God was given in such cases. The explanation which Josephus and Philo give is, that the stones in the high-priest's breastplate shone with more than their wonted brightness when the answer was favourable, and that they appeared dim and obscure when the answer was unfavourable. Several of the Jewish rabbies among the ancients, and Spencer, Michaelis, Jahn, and Gesenius, among the moderns, contend that they were something entirely distinct from the pectoral, and deposited within the pocket or bag made of its folds. Some of the earlier Hebrew doctors say that what is called the Urim and Thummim were nothing else than an inscription upon a plate of gold of the Tetragrammaton or four-lettered name of Jehovah, by the mystic virtue of which the high-priest was enabled to pronounce luminous and perfect oracles to the people. Spencer supposes that the Urim were the same with the Teraglim, and that they were nothing more than small divining images put into the lining of the breastplate, which were miraculously made to speak with an articulate voice and utter oracles from God. Professor Bush argues that the view of Josephus and many of the Hebrew doctors is correct, viz., that the Urim and Thummim were identical with the stones of the pectoral, and that these were lodged within the lining of the breastplate, and entirely out of sight to any eye but that of Omniscience. Some have supposed that the law is referred to. "By Urim and Thummim," argues the Rev. J. J. Bonar, "was meant something well known among the Israelites; and this was the case with the law. The law received frequently an appellation from the aspect in which it was viewed; and so it might be called light and perfection, from the admonitions it uttered. Both the breastplate and the Urim and Thummim are expressly called, 'The law of Israel.' The law is the only thing in Scripture characterised as light and perfection, and therefore the only thing entitled to these epithets. We can scarcely suppose that the Almighty would give forth his oracles above a few chosen gems; but how accordant with all his procedure to reveal his will by the mouth of the law! And, lastly, by making Urim and Thummim to represent the law, the typical fulness of the Mosaic priest is completed. An alternative inference, therefore, is not left. The Urim and the Thummim can signify nothing else than the law—the whole Mosaic code—just the manuscript of the law as written by Moses, to the dictation of God, in Sinai."

USURY, the gain taken for the loan of money or wares. The Jews were allowed to lend money upon usury to strangers (Deut. xxiii. 20), but were prohibited to take usury from their brethren of Israel, at least if they were poor. Exod. xxii. 25; Lev. xxv. 36, 37.

From the Scriptures speaking against the practice of usury, some have thought it unlawful. Ps. xv. 5; Prov. xxviii. 8; Ezek. xviii. 8. But it is replied, that usury there only means immoderate interest, or oppression, by taking advantage of the indigent circumstances of our neighbour; and that it seems as lawful for a man to receive interest for money, which another takes pain with, improves, but runs the hazard of in trade, as it is to receive rent for our land, which another takes pain with, improves, but runs the hazard of in husbandry.

UZ, the eldest son of Aram, and grandson of Shem, is thought to have peopled Trachonitis, a province beyond Jordan, having Arabia Deserta east, and Batanea west. The ancients say that Uz founded the city of Damascus; and the Arabians affirm that Uz had Ad for a son, who was father of a people called Adites, in Arabia Felix.

UZ, LAND OF. See JOB.

UZAL, the sixth son of Joktan (Gen. x. 27; 1 Chron. i. 21), is commonly placed in Arabia Felix.

UZZAH, son of Abinadab. 2 Sam. vi.; 1 Chron. xv. 13. Considerable discussion has arisen among critics as to the occasion of Uzzah's death. The following is the account which the sacred historians give of it, 2 Sam. vi. 3, 6, 7:—"And they set the ark of God upon a new cart, and brought it out of the house of Abinadab that was in Gibeah; and Uzzah and Ahio, the sons of Abinadab, drave the new cart. And when they came to Nachon's thrashing-floor, Uzzah put forth his hand to the ark of God, and took hold of it; for the oxen shook it. And the anger of the Lord was kindled against Uzzah; and God smote him there for his error: and there he died by the ark of God." It must be observed that Uzzah was a Levite, and ought therefore to have known the laws that had been laid down by God in reference to the removal of the ark. In defiance of these, however, he caused it to be conveyed on a cart drawn by animals, instead of being borne on the shoulders of the Levites by means of staves, and that, too, openly, instead of having it concealed and hid within curtains. He ought to have taken warning, besides, from the judgment which had been already inflicted for intruding on the sanctity of the ark at Bethshemesh. 2 Sam. vi. 11. The arrangements of the law of Moses were such as to maintain with the utmost strictness the sanctity of divine things. Thus we find it declared in Numb. iv. 15, "And when Aaron and his sons have made an end of covering the sanctuary, and all the vessels of the sanctuary, as the camp is to set forward; after that the sons of Kohath shall come to bear it: but they shall not touch any holy thing lest they die." If such a regulation was enforced in regard to other sacred things, it was more especially applicable to the ark, which was uniformly viewed by the Jews as invested with peculiar sacredness. But Uzzah, though a Levite, and therefore from his office one who might have been expected to pay all due attention to the precepts of the law, yet seems to have totally disregarded the solemn injunctions laid down in regard to sacred objects. We cannot therefore fail to admit that the punishment of Uzzah, severe and summary though it might appear, was entirely suited to the heinous and aggravated nature of the offence, in profaning the symbol of Jehovah's presence.

VALENTINIANS, a sect who sprang up in the second century, and were so called from their leader, Valentinus. The Valentinians were only a branch of the Gnostics, who realized or personified the Platonic ideas concerning the Deity, whom they called Pleroma or Plenitude. Their system was this: The first principle is Bythos, that is, Depth, which remained many ages unknown, having with it Ennoe or Thought, and Sige or Silence; from these sprang the Nous or Intelligence, which is the only Son, equal to, and alone capable of comprehending, the Bythos. The sister of Nous they called Aletheia or Truth; and these constituted the first quarternity of æons, which were the source and original of all the rest; for Nous and Aletheia produced the world and life, and from these two proceeded man and the church. But, besides these eight principal æons, there were twenty-two more; the last of which, called Sophia, being desirous to arrive at the knowledge of Bythos, gave herself a great deal of uneasiness, which created in her Anger and Fear, of which was born Matter. But the Horos or Bounder stopped her, preserved her in the Pleroma, and restored her to Perfection. Sophia then produced the Christ and the Holy Spirit, which brought the æons to their last perfection, and made every one of them contribute their utmost to form a Saviour. Her Enthymese or Thought, dwelling near the Pleroma, perfected by the Christ, produced every thing that is in this world by its divers passions. The Christ sent into it the Saviour, accompanied with angels, who delivered it from its passions without annihilating it: thence was formed corporeal matter.

In this allegorical manner did they romance concerning God, nature, and the mysteries of the Christian religion. See GNOSTICS.

VALLEY. See CANAAN.

VANITY, emptiness. It is often applied to the man who wishes you to think more highly of him than what he really deserves; hence the vain man flatters in order to be flattered—is always fond of praise—endeavours to bribe others into a good opinion of himself by his complaisance, and sometimes even by good offices, though often displayed with unnecessary ostentation. See PRIDE.

The term is likewise applied in Scripture to this world, as unsatisfactory (Eccles. i. 2); to lying (Ps. iv. 2); to idols (Deut. xxxii. 21); to whatever disappoints our hopes (Ps. lx. 11).

VAUDOIS CHURCH, a branch of the Christian Church occupying the Canton de Vaud, in French Switzerland, which has recently attracted the attention of the Christian world, in consequence of a disruption which has taken place in that country, similar to that which led to the formation of the Free Church of Scotland. To understand the circumstances which led to this important event, it will be necessary to retrace the history of the Vaudois Church.

In no part of Continental Europe was the Reformation so complete as in Switzerland. The clear, strong mind and fervent heart of Zuingli, filled by the grace of God and holy truth, led him right on to the adoption of those great and sacred principles which characterize the Reformed Church. And when, further, we advert to the extensive learning, deep piety, and profound judgment, so eminently bestowed on Farel, and Calvin, and Beza—all combining to perfect the system which Zuingli had begun—we cannot be surprised that the Reformed Church of Switzerland became the model for those of many other lands. But, however complete the Reformation, and however admirably it was conducted for one or two generations, it had to encounter the peril to which all things administered by fallen man are exposed. A time of declension came. The first aspect of that declension was the feeble and cold theology which began to be promulgated by the very men who ought to have opposed it—by the professors in the celebrated academy founded at Geneva by Calvin. Ere long the downward progress ended in absolute Socinianism; and the false teachers consummated their guilt by introducing such changes into the standards framed by sounder and abler men, as entirely to pervert them, and thus to poison the very fountains of instruction. This declension began early in last century, and continued throughout its entire course, till Evangelical or Gospel truth was almost expelled from Switzerland, and particularly from Geneva.

But at length the Divine Head of the Church was pleased graciously to return and revisit Geneva, and revive his work in the midst of that important city. We may trace some portion of the instrumentality by which this was effected to the operations of the Bible Society, which drew the attention of all Churches to the Word of God more directly than had been the case for a time. There were, however, two men whom God chiefly honoured to carry forward this sacred work, namely, the Rev. Cæsar Malan and the late Robert Haldane, Esq. It appears that Dr Malan's views were very dark and crude when he began his ministry; but he was led by a gracious hand, and about the end of 1815 his eyes were opened to see clearly the way of salvation, and his tongue enabled to declare to others those glad tidings which had brought such great joy to himself. Immediately the Socinian pastors were alarmed and indignant, and set themselves to check the progress of that truth which they hated and feared with equal intensity. Attempts were made to induce Dr Malan to retract, and he was forbidden to preach such doctrines in any of the pulpits within Geneva. The struggle was not long. Grace was granted to him to be faithful among the faithless, and in the autumn of 1818 he was deprived of his situation, and his office declared vacant.

During the very period of this contest the steps of Robert Haldane were providentially guided to Geneva. Falling into conversation with a student, Mr Haldane found the young man entirely ignorant of the gospel, but greatly struck with what he heard, and eager to hear more. Gladly did Mr Haldane devote his time to the instruction, not only of this young man, but of many other students who were brought to him by their class-fellows. Mr Haldane was not a man to neglect such a precious opportunity of doing good, and he spent six months of the winter season of 1816-17 in the important task of endeavouring to imbue the minds of these young men with the strong and clear doctrines of Calvinistic, or rather Pauline theology. It is recorded, that of the eighteen students who availed themselves of Mr Haldane's instructions, sixteen experienced a saving change, and gave evidence, by their subsequent life and labours, that they had been brought out of darkness into God's marvellous light. And when we state, what is not concealed by himself, that Merle D'Aubigné was one of these converted students, our readers may appreciate the inestimable value of Mr Haldane's providential visit to Geneva, and of the blessing which God bestowed on his labours there.

The heaven of Evangelical truth thus introduced continued to work and diffuse itself, though almost imperceptibly for a time; but the period came for its more decided development. The Rev. Dr Gaussen commenced his ministry in the parish of Santigny, in the Canton of Geneva, though not within the city, in the year 1815. Early in his ministry his own mind became awakened to the knowledge of the truth as it is in Jesus; and as his own knowledge increased, he grew more and more dissatisfied with the mutilated Catechism used in the Genevan Church. In his instruction of the young he abandoned it, and betook himself to the Bible itself. This appeared to the Venerable Company of Genevan pastors to be an intolerable innovation, and they commanded him to re-introduce the Catechism, and confine his instructions to what it contained. He consented so far as to be ready to re-introduce it, on condition that he might supplement its defects from the Word of God; and at the same time published his letters to the Company, stating and defending his reasons for so acting. But to state reasons was an additional offence, and he was commanded immediately to withdraw these letters, and submit implicitly. To this imperious demand Dr Gaussen was enabled to present a firm and uncompromising refusal. He was forthwith censured and suspended. The crisis was now come, and strength was given to Dr Gaussen and his friends adequate to the emergency. They resolved to protect the reviving truth to the utmost of their power; and for this purpose instituted "The Evangelical Society of Geneva," the first proceedings of which were procuring a place in the city where the gospel might be preached without hindrance, and forming a theological seminary for the instruction of young men in Evangelical truth. In this noble enterprise Dr Gaussen obtained the aid of the Rev. Messrs Galland and Merle—the latter of whom our readers will better know by the name D'Aubigné—a name which needs no praise. This important society was formed toward the close of the year 1831.

It would lead us too far from our immediate subject, were we to attempt to trace the proceedings of the Evangelical Society of Geneva, and its distinguished professors and ministers. Suffice it to state, that it has been the means, under God, of reviving Evangelical religion both in Geneva and the adjacent cantons to a very considerable extent. In the Canton de Vaud, in particular, situated on the opposite side of the Lake of Geneva, a similar Evangelical Society was formed; deficient, however, to this extent, that while it aimed equally at the diffusion of the gospel, it did not, till very recently, attempt to form a theological seminary. Yet, so successful have been its operations, that a few years ago it was reported, that at least one-half of the ministers entertained Evangelical sentiments. Such an increase in the number of faithful ministers was, doubtless, an omen of good, and would be so regarded by themselves, and by all who knew it.

The progress of Evangelical truth in Switzerland provoked the hostility of the rulers, who set themselves to check its progress. In 1839 the state prohibited subscription to the Helvetic Confession of Faith, which had, till that time, been the standard of the National Church—a Confession highly esteemed by the great men of the first Scottish Reformation. At the same time, the reviving gospel had to encounter the disapprobation of a very large proportion of the people, who had been too long demoralized to relish its purity, and were too much filled with the proud and lawless spirit of irreligion and infidelity to submit to its humbling restraints. To meet this unpropitious state of matters, the faithful pastors exerted double faith, zeal, and energy, in holding meetings for prayer and preaching wherever the opportunity could be found. In several of the larger towns buildings were procured or erected, in which these meetings might be held at times when the use of the city churches would not have been allowed. These buildings were termed oratoires, and public worship was maintained in them by the various Evangelical ministers of the adjoining districts. Such was the state of matters in various parts of Switzerland, particularly in Geneva and the Canton de Vaud, when an event occurred which precipitated the crisis.

We have already drawn attention to the fact that Evangelical truth had begun rapidly to pervade several of the Swiss cantons. But wherever God gives rise to a good work, and causes good seed to be sown, Satan hastens to sow tares. The Jesuits directed their attention to the religious movement in Switzerland, and hastened to propagate their deadly system. Their activity and arrogance provoked the wrath of the infidel masses of the people, who resolved to expel them by force, though tolerated, and even protected, by the governments. The consequence was a revolution in the Canton de Vaud, and the establishment of a government, not merely on what are termed Radical principles, but on principles little short of downright Atheism. In the midst of the conflict which issued in this revolution, while some shouted, 'Down with the Jesuits!' scarcely less loud or less frequent arose the horrid cry, 'Down with God! down with Jesus Christ!' From such a revolution, and a government constituted on such principles, Evangelical Christianity could expect no favour. This was at once anticipated by the faithful pastors, and very speedily felt. The new government were resolved to degrade the Christian ministry, and to degrade the National Church into a condition of the most abject slavery. This seemed quite within their power, in consequence of the Erastianism already existing in the state, which it was by no means the intention of these Radical magistrates to mitigate or abolish. Themselves the slaves of sin, they hated spiritual liberty with a perfect hatred. But for a time they had no other work on hand. They had, however, to model afresh the constitution of the canton into conformity with their own views. When this new constitution was nearly ready, the executive power, or council of state, issued a proclamation exclusively of a political character, defending their own conduct, and recommending the constitution to the adoption of the people. This proclamation they ordered to be read by the pastors from all the pulpits throughout the canton. But there had been a law passed on the 23d of May 1832, enacting that the pastors should read from the pulpit no acts of government, except those which had a religious object in view. There was no time for the pastors to deliberate. Many read the proclamation, but forty-three refused to do so, and in several instances the emissaries of the government took forcible possession of the pulpits, and proceeded to read the proclamation, while pastors and people were leaving the places thus violently desecrated. The council of state framed an official accusation of rebellion against the pastors, and summoned them to answer for their conduct before the four district Church courts of the canton. These Classes or Church courts met on the 22d of October 1844, there being one hundred and seventy pastors present. Of these, only two concurred in the opinion of government, while one hundred and sixty-eight approved the conduct of those who had refused to violate the Lord's-day and house by reading such a proclamation. Fifteen of the most eminent lawyers in the canton signed a memorial addressed to the government, declaring that the pastors had violated no law by refusing to read the proclamation. This all but unanimous decision did not check the arbitrary course which the council of state had begun, but rather increased their hostility against a Church which showed such indications of determining to obey God rather than man. The council had previously forbidden the pastors to hold meetings in the oratoires, and suspended three of them for refusing to submit. On the 3d of November, the council, on its own authority, and in defiance of all existing laws, pronounced the sentence of suspension from the office of the ministry against all the pastors who had refused to read the proclamation, assigning various degrees of duration to this sentence, according to the degrees of delinquency of which they arbitrarily judged the ministers guilty.

What was now to be done? Were the pastors to submit to this degradation of their office, and to be thenceforth slaves indeed—the mere tools of godless politicians? They could not by force resist the civil government: that was neither within their power, nor would it have been their duty if it had been otherwise practicable. Some of them decided at once, and on the 9th of November took leave of their congregations, declaring they could no longer remain in a Church so degraded and enslaved. But this was a premature step, and it was not extensively followed. On Tuesday the 11th, and Wednesday the 12th of November, a general convocation of the ministers was held at Lausanne. About two hundred pastors, suffragants, and ministers, were present. After two days of most solemn and interesting discussion, an overwhelming majority drew up and signed an Act of Resignation, or Deed of Demission, as we would term it, accompanied with an Address to the churches, explaining the motives and the necessity of this decisive step, and calling upon the people to stand by their ministers, and set up and maintain in the country a Free National Church.

VEDAS, the sacred books of the Hindus, believed to be revealed by God, and called immortal. They are considered as the fountain of all knowledge, human and divine, and are four in number. The principal part of them is that which explains the duties of man in methodical arrangement. The fourth book contains a system of divine ordinances. See HINDUISM.

VEIL (radid.) Women were wont to cover their faces with veils, in token of modesty, of reverence, and subjection to their husbands. Gen. xxiv. 65; 1 Cor. xi. 3, &c. Dr Paxton thus describes the veil:—

“In modern times, the women of Syria never appear in the streets without their veils. These are of two kinds—the furragi, and the common Aleppo veil; the former being worn by some of the Turkish women only, the latter indiscriminately by all. The first is in the form of a large cloak, with long straight sleeves, and a square hood hanging flat on the back. It is sometimes made of linen, sometimes of a shawl or cloth. This veil reaching to the heels, conceals the whole of the dress, from the neck downwards, while the head and face are covered by a large white handkerchief over the head-dress and forehead, and a smaller one tied transversely over the lower part of the face, hanging down on the neck. Many of the Turkish women, instead of the smaller handkerchief, use a long piece of black crape stiffened, which, sloping a little from the forehead, leaves room to breathe more freely. In this last way the ladies are completely disguised; in the former, the eyes and nose remaining visible, they are easily known by their acquaintances. The radid is a species of veil, which Calmet supposes is worn by married women, as a token of their submission and dependence, and descends low down on the person. To lift up the veil of a virgin is reckoned a gross insult; but to take away the veil of a married woman is one of the greatest indignities that she can receive, because it deprives her of the badge which distinguishes and dignifies her in that character, and betokens her alliance to her husband, and her interest in his affections. This is the reason why the spouse so feelingly complains: “They took away my veil (radid) from me.” Cant. v. 7. When it is forcibly taken away by the husband, it is equivalent to divorce, and justly reckoned a most severe calamity; therefore God threatened to take away the ornamental dresses of the daughters of Zion, including the radidim, the low-descending veils: “In that day the Lord will take away the changeable suits of apparel, and the mantles, and the fine linen, and the hoods, and the veils.” Isa. iii. 18, &c.

“The ordinary Aleppo veil is a linen sheet, large enough to cover the whole habit from head to foot, and is brought over the face in a manner to conceal all but one eye. This is, perhaps, alluded to by the bridegroom in these words: “Thou hast ravished my heart with one of thine eyes.” Cant. iv. 9. In Barbary, when the ladies appear in public, they always fold themselves up so closely in their hykes, that, even without their veils, one can discover very little of their faces. But, in the summer months, when they retire to their country seats, they walk abroad with less caution, though, even then, on the approach of a stranger, they always drop their veils, as Rebecca did on the approach of Isaac. But, although they are so closely wrapped up that those who look at them cannot see even their hands, still less their face, yet it is reckoned indecent in a man to fix his eyes upon them; he must let them pass without seeming at all to observe them. When a lady of distinction, says Hanway, travels on horseback, she is not only veiled, but has generally a servant, who runs or rides before her to clear the way; and on such occasions the men, even in the market-places, always turn their backs till the women are past, it being thought the highest ill manners to look at them. A lady in the East considers herself degraded when she is exposed to the gaze of the other sex; which accounts for the conduct of Vashti in refusing to obey the command of the king. Their ideas of decency, on the other hand, forbid a virtuous woman to lay aside or even to lift up her veil in the presence of the other sex. She who ventures to disregard this prohibition inevitably ruins her character. 1 Cor. ii. From that moment she is noted as a woman of easy virtue, and her act is regarded as a signal for intrigue. Pitts informs us, that in Barbary the courtesan appears in public without her veil; and in Prov. vii. 13, 14, the harlot exposes herself in the same indecent manner: "So she caught him, and kissed him, and with an impudent face," a face uncovered and shameless, "said unto him, I have peace-offerings with me; this day have I paid my vows." Veils were thrown over the head, and concealed the features, sometimes the entire face, sometimes leaving one eye exposed, and at other times enveloping only the under part of the face below the nose.

VENERATION, an affection compounded of awe and love, and which, of all others, it becomes creatures to bear toward their infinitely perfect Creator. See DEVOTION—ADORATION.

VENIAL SINS. Roman Catholics, adopting a distinction, first framed by the schoolmen in the dark ages, divide sins into mortal and venial. This distinction has not the slightest warrant from the Word of God. On the contrary, that Word declares, Gal. iii. 10, "For as many as are of the works of the law are under the curse: for it is written, Cursed is every one that continueth not in all things which are written in the book of the law to do them;" Rom. vi. 23, "For the wages of sin is death;" Ezek. xviii. 4, "The soul that sinneth, it shall die." All sin is disobedience to God, and Scripture says, "He that offendeth in one point is guilty of all." Did Christ atone for what are called venial sins, or did he not? If he did not, then he did not atone for all sin. If he did atone for them, they must be worthy of death, since he died for them. The truth is, there is no sin which the blood of Christ cannot cleanse from, and nothing but that can take away any sin.—Ed.

VERACITY OF GOD is his truth, or an exact correspondence and conformity between his word and his mind. Moses says, "He is a God of truth." He is true in and of himself; he truly and really exists; he is the true and living God; all his perfections are true and real; truth is essential to him; it is pure and perfect in him; it is the first and original in him; he is the fountain of truth; all his works, in creation, providence, and grace, are according to truth. See TRUTH—FAITHFULNESS OF GOD.

VERMILION. This well-known paint, from the brightness of its red colour, was much used in painting images and idols. Hence we find it mentioned in connection with Chaldean idolatry. Ezek. xxiii. 12-14: "She doted upon the Assyrians her neighbours, captains and rulers clothed most gorgeously, horsemen riding upon horses, all of them desirable young men. Then I saw that she was defiled, that they took both one way; and that she increased her whoredoms: for when she saw men portrayed upon the wall, the images of the Chaldeans portrayed with vermillion."—Ed.

VIAL. See CENSER.

VICAR, a priest of a parish, the predial tithes whereof are improper or appropriated; that is, belong either to a chapter, religious house, &c., or to a layman, who receives them, and only allows the vicar the small tithes, or a convenient salary.

VICE, a fault; the opposite of virtue. See SIN.

VICTORY. The Hebrews celebrated their victories by triumphal processions, the women and children dancing, and playing upon musical instruments, and singing hymns and songs of triumph to the living and true God. The song of Moses is one of those triumphal hymns, and also the song of Deborah and Barak. We have an account of a triumphal procession in 2 Chron. xx. 27, 28: "Then they returned, every man of Judah and Jerusalem, and Jehoshaphat in the fore-front of them, to go again to Jerusalem with joy: for the Lord had made them to rejoice over their enemies. And they came to Jerusalem with psalteries, and harps, and trumpets, unto the house of the Lord." On some occasions the victor cut off the head of his enemy, and carried it in triumph on the point of a spear. Mr Harmer thinks that the head of Saul was carried in this way by the Philistines from the field of Gilboa, and that David cut off the head of Goliath, for the purpose of presenting it to Saul on the point of a lance. The Roman conquerors used to carry branches of palms in their hands, when they went in triumph to the capitol. Hence the appearance of the redeemed in heaven: "After this I beheld, and, lo, a great multitude, which no man could number, of all nations, and kindreds, and people, and tongues, stood before the throne, and before the Lamb, clothed with white robes, and palms in their hands." Rev. vii. 9.—Ed.

VIGIL, the eve or day before any solemn feast, because then Christians were wont to watch, fast, and pray in their churches.

VINE (gephen—Gen. ix. 9; ampelos—Matt. xxvi. 29; Mark xiv. 25; Luke xxii. 18; John xv. 4, 5; James iii. 12; Rev. xiv. 19), a noble plant of the creeping kind, famous for its fruit, or grapes, and the liquor they afford. The vine is a common name, or genus, including several species under it; and Moses, to distinguish the true vine, or that from which wine is made, from the rest, calls it gephen hayayin, the wine vine. Numb. vi. 4. Some of the other sorts were of a poisonous quality, as appears from the story related among the miraculous acts of Elisha. 2 Kings iv. 39-41. See GRAPES.

VINEGAR (chemets, Numb. vi. 3; Ruth ii. 14; Ps. lxix. 21; Prov. x. 26, xxv. 20; oxos, Matt. xxvii. 48; Mark xv. 36; John xix. 29, 30), an acid produced by a second fermentation of vinous liquors. The law of the Nazarite was that he should "separate himself from wine and strong drink, and should drink no vinegar of wine, nor vinegar of strong drink, nor any liquor of grapes." This is exactly the same prohibition that was given in the case of John the Baptist (Luke i. 15), "Wine and sikera he shall not drink." Any inebriating liquor, says Jerome, is called sikera, whether made of corn, apples, honey, dates, or other fruits. One of the four prohibited drinks among the Mohammedans in India is called sakar, which signifies inebriating drink in general, but especially date wine. From the original word, probably, we have our term cider or sider, which, among us, exclusively means the fermented juice of apples.

Vinegar was used by reapers for their refreshment. Boaz told Ruth that she might come and dip her bread in vinegar with his people. It made a very cooling beverage. It was generally diluted with water. When very strong, it affected the teeth disagreeably. Prov. x. 26. In Prov. xxv. 20, the singing of songs to a heavy heart is finely compared to the contrariety or collocation between vinegar and nitre; untimely mirth to one in anxiety serves only to exasperate, and, as it were, put into a ferment by the intrusion.

VINTAGE. It followed the wheat harvest and the thrashing (Lev. xxvi. 5; Amos ix. 13), about June or July, when the clusters of the grapes were gathered with a sickle, put into baskets (Jer. vi. 9), and carried and thrown into the wine-vat, or wine-press, where they were probably first trodden by men, and then pressed. Rev. xiv. 18-20. It is mentioned as a mark of the great work and power of the Messiah, that he had trodden the figurative wine-press alone; and of the people there was none with him. Isa. lxiii. 3; Rev. xix. 15. The vintage was a season of great mirth. Of the juice of the squeezed grapes were formed wine and vinegar. See WINE.

VIOL. This musical instrument, which is mentioned, among other passages, in Isaiah v. 12, and Amos v. 23, is the only stringed instrument besides the harp spoken of in Scripture before the time of David. It seems to have been the same with the Egyptian guitar, which had anciently only three strings. It was played on exactly in the same manner as with us, the chords being struck with the fingers. The same Hebrew word which in Isaiah and Amos is rendered viol, is in other passages translated psaltery. Josephus says that it had twelve musical notes, and was played on with the fingers. Besides the psaltery, Josephus describes a viol which, he says, had ten strings, and was played on with a bow. The use of the bow in bringing out the sound distinguishes it from the guitar, which it otherwise resembled. This was probably the ten-stringed instrument referred to in the Book of Psalms.

VIPER (aphoah, Job xx. 16; Isa. xxx. 6, lix. 5; echidna, Matt. iii. 7, xii. 34, xxiii. 33; Luke iii. 7; Acts xxviii. 3), a serpent famed for the venomousness of its bite. So remarkable, says Dr Mead, has the viper been for its venom, that the remotest antiquity made it an emblem of what is hurtful and destructive. Nay, so terrible was the nature of these creatures, that they were very commonly thought to be sent as executioners of divine vengeance upon mankind, for enormous crimes which had escaped the course of justice. An instance of such an opinion as this we have in the history of Paul. Acts xxviii.

VIRTUE, a term used in various significations. Some define it to be, "living according to nature;" others, "universal benevolence to being." Some again, place it "in regard to truth;" others, in "the moral sense." Some place it in "the imitation of God;" others, "in the love of God and our fellow-creatures." Some, again, think it consists "in mediocrity," supposing vice to consist in extremes; others have placed it in "a wise regard to our own interest." Dr Smith refers it to the principle of sympathy; and Paley defines it to be the doing good to mankind, in obedience to the will of God, and for the sake of everlasting happiness.

VISION, the art of seeing, but in Scripture language it implies a supernatural appearance, by which God made his will known. Thus, Isa. i. 1, "The vision of Isaiah" denotes that God manifested his will to the prophet in some supernatural way which is not related. From the earliest times God appeared to patriarchs and prophets and holy men in vision, sometimes by dreams during the night, and sometimes by angels during the day, whereby their minds were illuminated, they heard his voice and beheld things unutterable, and, by minds uninspired, inconceivable. Paul was in a vision when he was transferred to the third heavens. The apostle beheld Christ in vision on the Mount of Transfiguration, and the glorious view which the redeemed shall enjoy in heaven of the unveiled splendours of Jehovah is called sometimes the beatific vision.

VISIT—(1.) To go to see, and meet with. Acts vii. 23, xv. 36. (2.) To take a view of, in order to redress grievances, and do service: so magistrates and ministers ought to visit their people. Jer. xxiii. 2. God visits men, either in mercy, when he manifests his presence, grants them their requests, delivers them from distress, and upholds and comforts them (Zech. x. 3; Luke vii. 16; Gen. xxi. 1; 1 Sam. ii. 21); or in wrath, when he visits their iniquities in chastising or punishing for them. Exod. xx. 5; Jer. vi. 6; Isa. xxvi. 14; Ezek. xxxviii. 8. Christ, the day-spring from on high, visited men when he assumed our nature, and when he sends his Word and Spirit that we may have fellowship with him, and share of his blessings. Luke i. 78. To visit the fatherless and widow, or the sick and imprisoned members of Christ, is to show them regard and pity, and to help them according to their need and our ability. James i. 27; Matt. xxv. 36, 43.

VISITATION, the survey or inspection performed by a bishop in his diocese, to examine into the state of the church. In the Scriptures, it is taken either for a signal communication of divine love, or for any period of signal calamity affecting a nation.

VOCATION. See CALLING.

VOICE. See BATH-KOL.

VOID—(1.) Empty, without inhabitants or furniture. Gen. i. 2. (2.) Destitute of, quite wanting. Deut. xxxii. 28. (3.) Clear from. Acts xxiv. 16. (4.) Of no force or effect: hence vows are said to be made void when they are broken. Numb. xxx. 12-15.

God's law is made void when men break it, and live as if it had no obligation upon them (Rom. iii. 31; Ps. cxix. 126); and faith is made void when it is useless; as all the promises of God, and our faith that embraces them, would be, if justification and happiness could come by the works of the law. Rom. iv. 14.

VOW, a gratuitous, solemn, and religious promise or oath. (See OATH.) It is more particularly taken for a solemn promise made to God, in which we bind ourselves to do or forbear somewhat for the promoting of his glory. Under the Old Testament dispensation, vows were very common. Judges xi.; Numb. xxx. (See JEPHTHAH.) But in the New Testament there is no command whatever for the observation of them. Hence it is supposed that vows belong more to the ceremonial law than to the gospel; and that we are to be more dependent on divine grace to keep us, than to make resolutions and vows which we do not know that we shall be able to perform: and we certainly ought not to vow anything but what we are able to perform.

VULGATE, a very ancient translation of the Bible into Latin, and the only one acknowledged by the Church of Rome to be authentic. See BIBLE.

VULTURE, a large bird of prey declared unclean by Moses. Lev. xi. 14; Deut. xiv. 13. See BIRD—EAGLE.

W.

WAFER, a very thin cake of bread, used in the Jewish sacrifices. In Exod. xxix. 2, the wafers are spoken of as unleavened, and anointed with oil. The preparation of such wafers is still practised among the Jews.

WAGES, a reward for work performed. In regard to the payment of wages the Mosaic law is very strict. Thus, Lev. xix. 13: "Thou shalt not defraud thy neighbour, neither rob him: the wages of him that is hired shall not abide with thee all night until the morning." The prophets complain frequently of the withholding of wages as a prevailing sin in their age and country. Thus, Jer. xxii. 13: "Woe unto him that buildeth his house by unrighteousness, and his chambers by wrong; that useth his neighbour's service without wages, and giveth him not for his work;" and Mal. iii. 5: "And I will come near to you to judgment; and I will be a swift witness against the sorcerers, and against the adulterers, and against false swearers, and against those that oppress the hireling in his wages, the widow, and the fatherless, and that turn aside the stranger from his right, and fear not me, saith the Lord of hosts." In Rom. vi. 23, it is said, "The wages of sin is death."

WAGON, a vehicle commonly drawn by oxen. It differed from the chariot, in having four wheels instead of two. These wheel-carriages were early used in Egypt, as appears from Gen. xlv. 19: "Now thou art commanded, this do ye; take you wagons out of the land of Egypt for your little ones, and for your wives, and bring your father, and come." It would seem that wagons were not at that time used in Palestine, as when Jacob saw them, he knew they must have come from Egypt. Perhaps, however, he knew this from their peculiar shape. "The only wheel-carriages," remarks the editor of the Pictorial Bible, "in Western Asia, with which we are acquainted, are, first, a very rude cart, drawn usually by oxen, and employed in conveying agricultural produce in Armenia and Georgia; and then a vehicle called an arabak, used at Constantinople and some other towns towards the Mediterranean. It is a light covered cart without springs, and exclusively used by women, children, and aged or sick persons. No wheel-carriage is, however, now used in a journey." See CART.

WAIL. See MOURNING.

WALDENSES, VALLENCES, or VAUDOIS, names applied to the Churches of the valleys of Piedmont, extending along the eastern foot of the Cottian Alps, which divide Italy from France, Switzerland, and Germany. It would appear that the gospel was preached in the Cottian Alps so early as the second century, and that Irenæus acquired the Celtic language for the purpose of ministering among the mountaineers. In these secluded valleys the truth remained inviolate for centuries, while those who maintained the truth in other countries had been massacred by thousands, or driven into exile. Towards the middle of the thirteenth century, an attempt was made, but unsuccessfully, to introduce the Inquisition into Piedmont. Their sovereigns, the Dukes of Savoy, for a long period protected them against the persecuting violence of Popery. In the year 1400, however, the storm of persecution which had so long been threatening, burst upon them with tremendous fury, and the Waldenses were massacred in great numbers, while others who survived the massacre perished from cold amid the snow-covered Alps. A season of comparative tranquillity followed; but at length, in 1487, Pope Innocent VIII. issued a bull against the Waldenses of Lyons and those of the Swent, giving a commission to Albert, his lieutenant, to march against them, and "tread them under foot as venomous adders." For many years a cruel, harassing warfare was maintained against the weak, defenceless inhabitants of the valleys, until the rise of the Reformation in Germany gave them renewed courage. It is refreshing to think that, amid the darkness which prevailed before the period of the Reformation, these Churches remained firm in witnessing for the truth as it is in Jesus, amid the general apostasy. All eyes being turned towards Germany, the seat of the labours of the lion-hearted Luther, the Churches in the humble valleys of Piedmont were permitted for a time to worship in peace, until, in 1536, Francis I., King of France, conquered Piedmont, and immediately, instigated by Pope Paul III., he set himself to extirpate, if possible, the heretics of the Alps. This persecution raged during the ascendancy of France in Savoy; but in 1559 Piedmont was restored to Philibert Emanuel, Duke of Savoy, at the general peace. Nor were the Waldenses much bettered by the change of government. The new ruler maintained a fierce and determined war against them, which was only arrested by their indomitable courage, which so awed the sovereign, that he was compelled to grant an edict, guaranteeing their safety, and declaring their immunities inviolate. But this was merely a delusive calm, for, in 1565, a new edict was issued, commanding every one of the Duke's subjects to conform to the Church of Rome, or quit the country in two months. On this occasion the Elector Palatine of the Rhine addressed a long and impressive remonstrance against this cruel and tyrannical edict, and not without effect, for, until 1571, the valleys enjoyed a season of tranquillity, when their Duke, having joined a Catholic league of persecution, began to menace his Waldenses with new severities; but, shocked by the horrors of the massacre of St Bartholomew, which occurred the following year, he continued to protect the Waldenses till his death, in 1580. The same protection was awarded by his son and successor for twenty years; but, changing his policy, he commenced a system of hot persecution, at first against the Salucean Waldenses, in the neighbourhood of Piedmont, and extending it gradually to the whole Churches of the valleys. From 1601 to 1637, they were incessantly exposed to vexations, exactions, and persecutions; after which a season of repose occurred for thirteen years. But in 1650 the violence of the gathered storm began to burst, in consequence of the establishment of a council at Turin for the propagation of the Romish faith, and the extinction of heresy. The amount of the slain in this persecution is estimated at more than six thousand—a fearful slaughter, when we take into account the comparative smallness of the population among whom it happened. Cromwell, the Protector of England, besides heading a handsome subscription, raised for the relief of the Waldenses, endeavoured to interest the French king and the Protestant states of Europe in their behalf, and despatched an envoy to the Duke of Savoy, requesting him to restore his exiled subjects to their homes. A treaty was obtained, but clogged with so many restrictions, that Cromwell declared it “a more concealed course of hostility, under the guise of peace.” Any further exertions in behalf of the Waldenses were checked by the death of the Protector. This miserable state of things continued till 1672, when a war broke out between the Duke of Savoy and the Republic of Genoa. The Waldenses nobly supported the Duke; and, such was his gratitude for their services, that till his death the Churches of Piedmont were permitted to enjoy rest. Even after his death, also, his Duchess continued to protect them; but on the accession of Victor Amadeus II., the valleys were once more to be swept with desolation; and in 1686 a proclamation was published, ordering every Protestant church and chapel to be destroyed, and commanding every person professing the Protestant faith to abjure his creed within fifteen days, under penalty of death or banishment. All infants, also, born among them from that date, were to be brought up in the Roman Catholic religion, under the penalty of their fathers being condemned to the galleys. The astonished victims remonstrated against this injustice, and their plea was aided by several of the Protestant states of Europe; but all was in vain: the Duke, incited by the King of France, proceeded to execute the merciless decree, upon which the unfortunate Protestants of Piedmont flew to arms in their own defence. Their numbers had been so wasted, that not more than two thousand five hundred could be mustered capable of military service; and yet this small band repeatedly defeated the united forces of France and Savoy that were sent to reduce them. But the conflict was too unequal to continue, and after a heroic struggle the men of the valleys were overborne, and almost buried under the numbers of the invaders; while their hamlets, and homes, and peaceful families, were visited with such atrocities as could only be paralleled by those of 1655. More than three thousand perished on this occasion, by torture or the sword; fourteen thousand were imprisoned; and whole flocks of helpless children were torn from their parents, and carried away, to be educated in that creed against which their fathers had testified to the death. And such was the fate of those who were imprisoned, that they had good cause to envy the happier lot of their brave brethren who perished in the field, or even on the scaffold; for so great was the severity of their confinement, that at the end of six months, only three thousand survived. For this poor remnant supplications were poured in from the Protestant states, and Victor Amadeus did not dare to refuse; but his tender mercies released the captives in the middle of winter, and upon the condition that they should banish themselves forthwith and for ever from Piedmont. Such was the command announced to a band of sufferers, sick, and attenuated almost to skeletons by imprisonment and horrible privations; and at five o'clock in the evening of the same day, they were obliged to commence a march of four or five hundred miles. The ground during that midnight pilgrimage was strewn with bodies, for at least one hundred and fifty had perished; and on the next morning, when the exiles saw a tempest gathering and darkening upon the summit of Mount Cenis, they implored the officer who superintended their expulsion to suffer them to halt, until it had passed away. But he was more merciless than the tempest, and he compelled them to march forward; in consequence of which eighty-six more were overwhelmed, and buried beneath the snow. The survivors at last reached Geneva; but many of them reached it only to die, exhausted by sickness and fatigue. Little more than two thousand thus reached the Swiss and Genevese territories, where they were received with Christian sympathy and hospitality by those who shared with them in the same light of the gospel. Victor Amadeus had thus recklessly thrown away the brightest gem of his ducal coronet, at the suggestions of his blind guides and a merciless superstition; after which he proceeded to fill the depopulated valleys with Roman Catholic inhabitants, and to man the forts with French and Piedmontese soldiers. And now the triumph of the enemy was complete, for they thought they had rooted out heresy from the land for ever, and that the people who had cherished it were fallen beyond recovery. Fools, and blind!—they knew not that the scattered remnant would soon return with a terrible retribution, and would again raise up the fallen cause, which at present was broken and trodden under foot. Scarcely had the exiles been driven into banishment, than, with that ardent longing for their native land which so strongly characterizes the people of a mountainous country, several of them attempted to return; but they were a mere handful of men, without arms, leaders, or arrangement, and their attempt came to nothing. Another attempt that was made in June 1688 was detected by the governor of the Swiss Cantons, and frustrated, as the effort was premature. A third expedition was undertaken, under the superintendence of Henri Arnaud, one of their pastors, that, whether for the boldness with which it was planned, or the energy with which it was carried into execution, has scarcely a parallel in the whole range of history. The Waldenses fought with almost supernatural bravery. They were obliged, however, to traverse a hostile country, and even a succession of triumphs would soon have been sufficient to destroy them. But one of those interpositions of Providence occurred by which the great Ruler of kingdoms makes even the wrath of men to praise him. Louis XIV. and Victor Amadeus II., who had hitherto been leagued together for the destruction of the Waldenses of Piedmont, suddenly became enemies, and commenced against each other a rancorous warfare; but in such a contest the dukedom of Savoy would have been an unequal match for a kingdom like France, now at the height of its prosperity and power. It was then that the gallant exiles showed to the whole world what patriotism true religion can inspire. They forgot their injuries and sufferings, and remembered only their sovereign and their country, to the defence of which they now hurried with their wonted alacrity and courage. Splendid offers, indeed, were made to them on the part of France, to win them over as auxiliaries. They were promised a safe re-establishment in their native valleys, and the free exercise of their religion; but they would not compromise their native land by accepting such a boon from a national enemy. With Arnaud at their head, they united themselves to the troops of Savoy; and the good service which they did on this occasion subdued the heart of their sovereign, as well as the arms of the foes whom they encountered. At an interview, therefore, with the leaders of the exiles, Amadeus thus affectingly addressed them:—"You have only one God and one prince: serve them faithfully. Hitherto we have been foes; henceforward we must be friends. To strangers are your misfortunes to be attributed; but if, as is your duty, you expose your life for me, I will also expose mine for you; and as long as I have a morsel of bread, you shall have your share." Eight hundred exiles returned to their native mountains. From that period treaties between the English and Piedmontese governments secured the undisturbed exercise of their religion to the Waldenses. But the wrongs of this injured people were not at an end. Their sovereigns, under their new title of Kings of Sardinia, have often harassed and oppressed them.

"During the French empire of Napoleon," says Dr Gilly, "when the iron crown of Italy was placed on the head of the Corsican, the Valdenses enjoyed equal rights and privileges in common with the rest of their countrymen. But, at the restoration of the house of Savoy to the kingdom of Sardinia, four days after the king had taken possession of his palace at Turin, they were replaced under their former disabilities, and bare toleration only was conceded to them. The restored prince acknowledged, on more occasions than one, 'the constant and distinguished proof which the Valdenses had ever given to his predecessors of attachment and fidelity,' and bore this testimony to their merit: 'I know I have faithful subjects in the Vaudois: they will never dishonour their character.' But still he listened to evil counsel, and the yoke was again placed upon their necks. And evil counsellors still prevail. In 1832, the measures adopted against the Valdenses were so threatening, that the British parliament took up their cause; and extracts of the treaties between Great Britain and the dukes of Savoy and kings of Sardinia, were ordered by the House of Commons to be printed, on the motion of Sir R. Inglis, with the correspondence of the British minister at Turin, relative to the treatment of the Protestants in Piedmont.

"The reigning king of Sardinia, Charles Albert, is disposed to show them kindness, and to place them on a level with his other subjects. He has proved this by numberless acts of favour; but the tiara and the mitre are too strong for the crown in Piedmont; and the baneful influence of the Papal authority, so late as September 1837, wrung from the reluctant king two articles in the new code of Sardinia, by which the intolerant edicts of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries are renewed, and may be put in force as soon as the Roman hierarchy shall feel itself strong enough to do so. In the meantime another engine is employed against the hapless Valdenses. The rich order of St Maurice and St Lazarus has contributed 238,617 francs (£9544) and an income of 17,000 francs (£680) a-year, towards the establishment of a fraternity of missionary priests at La Tour, whose business it will be to make proselytes from among the descendants of a race which has never yet swerved from its faith, but which will now be exposed more than ever to the threats and artifices of an adversary who knows well how to turn opportunities to advantage.

"The Protestants of England have not been inattentive to the condition of their brethren in the valleys of Piedmont. Public collections have on several occasions been made throughout the kingdom; and the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts is the trustee of considerable funds raised in their behalf. A committee in London, consisting of the Archbishop of Canterbury, several bishops, and other persons of distinction, has also been employing contributions in aid of the clergy, hospitals, and schools of the Valdenses, and watching over their interests since the year 1825.

"The difficulties with which the Valdenses have now to contend are, poverty and reduced numbers, being confined to limits which do not produce subsistence for more than a very limited population. They also labour under the disadvantage of having to learn three languages before they can receive competent instruction. Their national language is Italian; their vernacular tongue is a provincial dialect, peculiar to their district; and the language of instruction is French, because in that only they can obtain books of devotion used by Protestants."

In the good providence of God, the changes which have taken place in 1848 in Italy, as well as in other European nations, have been productive of great advantage to the long-tried Waldenses. They are now permitted to enjoy complete toleration, and are at liberty to observe all their forms of worship, without interference on the part of the Sardinian government.

WALDO, PETER. This individual, from whom the Waldenses of Piedmont are supposed to have derived their name, was a rich merchant of Lyons, a city of France, which, in the second century, was very eminent for Christianity, as it also was for the sufferings and death of its martyrs. But in the time of Waldo, Lyons was not what once in this respect it had been; it was sunk in the grossest superstition, and the people were utterly ignorant of divine truth, for the Scriptures were not allowed to be ever read by them. Though the doctrines of Christianity were sadly altered from those the early Christians taught from the Scriptures, still some very great errors were not then generally admitted into the religious creed of persons who belonged to the Roman Catholic Church; one of these was the doctrine of transubstantiation, or the belief that the bread and wine used in the sacrament of the Lord's supper were really the body and blood of our Lord, and not merely symbols of that body and blood. But about the year 1160, the Pope and his ministers ordered every man to believe that they were actually converted into the wafer and the wine, and, in consequence, people were obliged to fall down and worship the consecrated wafer as if it were God. The idea is very shocking, and appears very absurd: it appeared so to Waldo, who, though he was a member of the church whose rulers commanded this doctrine to be believed and this homage to be paid, was so struck by its impiety and unreasonableness, that he boldly opposed it, and freely declared what he thought both of the doctrine and the worship which was the consequence of believing it. Waldo was not at this time a truly religious man; he acted in this respect merely because he thought the thing opposed to common sense, not because divine grace had taught him better things; but a circumstance happened soon after which produced a great effect on his own mind. One evening, as he sat conversing with a party of friends after supper, one of them suddenly fell down dead on the floor. It seemed to Waldo as if the death of this man brought to him the message, "Be ye ready." He reflected on the shortness and the uncertainty of life, and began to inquire after the things of another world, where men must live for ever. Waldo then felt himself a sinner, and he knew not how to appease an uneasy conscience. Penances, almsgivings, and absolutions would not do: he did not find any to direct him aright. In this dilemma he thought of the Word of God, that Word which is profitable for reproof, for example, for instruction in righteousness; but the Bible was scarcely known to the people, and had he not been a more learned man than in those days was commonly met with, he must probably have remained ignorant of it. Waldo, however, knew something of the Latin tongue; he obtained a New Testament in that language; he read it, and found in it the blessing and the peace he sought; he found he was indeed a sinner, but he found he had a Saviour; he discerned the love of God in sending his well-beloved Son to die for mankind; he felt the love of Christ in undertaking the redemption of a sinful race that could not save themselves; he saw how vain it was to think of other saviours, to apply to other intercessors, when, by his one offering, he hath perfected for ever them that are sanctified, and now ever liveth to make intercession for us. And having received this blessed knowledge, and this sweet store of holy comfort from the sacred Scriptures, Waldo could not think of locking within his own breast the knowledge he had gained, and refusing to impart to others the blessings bestowed upon himself. This is ever the effect of divine grace, that it makes those who have received it willing to give, and glad to distribute, of the spiritual good so freely given unto them. Waldo having learned the value of the sacred Scriptures, set about translating them, in order that he might be able to impart to others the glad things they contained. He then began to teach and preach; great crowds came to hear him; he explained the Scriptures, he taught the truth in simplicity, he set an example in his own life how Christians ought to walk and fear God, and he laboured to convince those who heard him, that the religion which then prevailed was not the religion of the Bible, nor were the lives of men then at all like the lives of those who at first professed the doctrines of the Bible. You may easily conceive that such conduct would soon draw upon him the indignation of the Romish clergy. The Archbishop of Lyons was exceedingly irritated, and would have apprehended him; but Waldo had a large party in that place; he had formed a church there, and its members were so attached and faithful to him, that he lived concealed three whole years among them. But the Pope, Alexander III., heard at last of these transactions, and was very angry. He instantly excommunicated Waldo, and commanded the archbishop to proceed against him and his followers with the utmost rigour. In consequence of this order, Waldo was obliged to flee from Lyons, and his followers were all scattered about as sheep having no shepherd. Waldo himself was a wanderer from place to place, being persecuted from city to city, even as our Lord told his disciples they should be. At length he retired into a distant country, where he died, after having laboured for twenty years in the work of his Lord. Wherever he went, he had preached the gospel; and as his scattered flock, like the disciples, when they were driven from Jerusalem by persecution, also went everywhere preaching the kingdom of God, the doctrines of the Bible were widely diffused, and the new translation of the Bible was carried into different lands. These people were called Waldenses; they increased greatly, and were severely persecuted, but they retired into peaceful and secluded valleys, where they cherished their religion in retirement; others, scattered over the south of France, became soon conspicuous by the persecutions raised against them.

WALK. This word, in Hebrew, says Mr Taylor, signifies not merely to advance, step by step, steadily, but to augment a moderate pace till it acquires rapidity. Under this idea, he examines Isa. xl. 31.

It often signifies the conduct of life, the general course of a party, his deportment, demeanour, &c. To worship and serve God truly is to walk before him. Enoch walked with God, maintained and increased in piety towards him: so did Noah. God promises to walk with his people, and his people desire his influence, that they may walk in his statutes. To walk in darkness (1 John i. 6, 7), is to be involved in unbelief and misled by error; to walk in the light, is to be well informed, holy, and happy; to walk by faith, is to expect the things promised or threatened, and to maintain a conduct accordingly; to walk after the flesh, is to gratify fleshly appetites; to walk after the Spirit, is to pursue spiritual objects, to cultivate spiritual affections, to be spiritually minded, which is life and peace.

WALL, an inclosure for defence or separation. The Lord tells the prophet Jeremiah (i. 18, xv. 20), that he will make him as a wall of brass, to withstand the house of Israel. Paul says (Eph. ii. 14), that Christ, by his death, broke down the partition wall that separated us from God, or rather the wall that separated Jew and Gentile, so that these two people, when converted, may make but one.

WASHING, purification. See ABLUTION—BATHING—BAPTISM.

WASHING THE FEET. In Oriental countries it was a universal custom on the arrival of a stranger to present him with water to wash his feet,—a practice which was all the more necessary, as travellers in the East walked with sandals, which only partially covered their feet. The office of washing the feet was commonly performed by the humblest servants or slaves. Buckingham mentions that an Arabian widow at whose house he lodged showed him great kindness, and insisted upon washing his feet with her own hands. Paul, when he speaks of an exemplary Christian widow, describes her as one who washed the saints' feet. 1 Tim. v. 10. Our blessed Lord gave a beautiful illustration of Christian kindness and humility by washing the disciples' feet. John xiii. 5, 6.

WATCH. Among the Romans the night was divided into four watches, each of three hours' length, the first watch extending from six to nine, the second from nine to twelve, the third from twelve to three, and the fourth from three to six. This explains several passages in the New Testament.

WATCHERS. See ACOEMETÆ.

WATCHFULNESS, vigilance, or care to avoid surrounding enemies and dangers. We are to watch against the insinuations of Satan, the allurements of the world, the deceitfulness of our hearts, the doctrines of the erroneous, and, indeed, against everything that would prove inimical to our best interests. We are to exercise this duty at all times, in all places, and under all circumstances. 1 Cor. xvi. 13; Luke xii. 37.

To Watch, is also to wait for and expect: thus we are—1. To watch the providence of God. 2. The fulfilment of the prophecies. 3. God's time for our deliverance from troubles. Ps. cxxx. 6. 4. We are to watch unto prayer. Eph. vi. 18. 5. For death and judgment. Mark xiii. 37.

WATER. This in Oriental countries is held in the highest estimation, being one of the necessary comforts, and all the more appreciated as being frequently rare. To the traveller who is wandering over the dry parched deserts, the appearance of a fountain of water is hailed as a signal blessing. The following very graphic delineation of the sufferings which an Oriental traveller is often doomed to endure, is given by Dr Jamieson in his "Eastern Manners." "Of all the accidents to which these journeys are liable, that which the parched character of the country renders the most frequent, and which is attended with the most disastrous effects, is the want of water. That element may be said to be in these regions the greatest necessary of life, and no idea can be formed by Europeans of the vast quantity required, during a march over the desert, by a single person, whose palate is continually parched by the effects of the fiery atmosphere and ground, and whose food, consisting of preparations of flour and butter, is calculated to excite thirst in the greatest degree. 'The usual computation is, that about twenty pounds of water are required for the daily consumption of a man. To drink four or five times a day is considered a scanty allowance; few drink less than six or seven times; and when the south wind is blowing, no quantity of water is sufficient to keep the mouth moist; and an appeal to the Girbah is made every quarter of an hour.' To guard against such exigencies, the first care of every traveller is to provide himself with a plentiful supply of the necessary fluid—the number of leathern skins he fills with it, depending on the opportunities afforded in the course of the journey of replenishing them—and, as the knowledge must always be of primary importance in a region where water is so essential to the maintenance of life, the route is invariably determined by the situation of such places of refreshment, which, in the absence of roads and tracks, serve as geographical points in the face of the country; and a deviation to which from the line of march, even although it be long and circuitous, is little thought of in comparison of procuring this rare and inestimable treasure. But between the traveller and that cup of blessedness many obstacles often unexpectedly intervene—the springs are generally but few and scanty all over the desert, in that part of it especially where Ishmael wandered—a traveller who crossed it, having found only four in the space of a hundred and fifteen miles, situated at a distance of four, six, and even eight days' journey from each other; and, besides the danger of missing them—always liable to happen in a trackless solitude, but particularly so in the wilderness of Paran, which, in many places, is full of rugged and precipitous cliffs, around the base of which the traveller has to seek his way—it may happen, that after the greatest exertions have been made to reach these springs, they are found entirely choked with the moving sand, or that they prove, to the mortification of the luckless traveller, so impregnated with brackish qualities, from the beds of sulphur or salt over which they roll, as to increase, instead of allaying his already insufferable intensity of thirst. And then follows a scene of the most dreadful and protracted sufferings which a human being can experience. The burning thirst, rendered more violent by the fierce heat of the glowing firmament and the fiery sand, produces an intense agony in every part of the frame—and the dry and contracted feeling of the skin—the eyes appearing like balls of coagulated blood—the unnatural swelling and hardness of the tongue and lips—increasing difficulty of seeing and hearing—the total loss of speech—together with the most painful sensations in the throat; all these, which are invariably consequences of unalleviated thirst, indicate a universal derangement of the bodily system—produce languor and insensibility—and at last bring the unhappy sufferer, after many a struggle, to drop on the ground—happy if, like Ishmael, he can purchase a brief respite from his misery by sheltering his scorched head under one of the dwarfish acacias that are strewed around. In such circumstances, it is said that five hundred dollars have been given for a draught of water. But, in general, where one is placed in such extremities, all who are with him are more or less in a similar state of distress—and then no bribe, however great—no entreaties, however importunate, can produce a single drop; for what use would all the wealth of the Indies be, in a place where death would be the inevitable consequence of parting with the precious beverage. The master of a whole caravan is then not better privileged than the meanest of his slaves; and as the desire of self-preservation triumphs over every consideration, when one drops the victim of thirst, his companions, however they may commiserate the sufferer, are obliged to pass on without delay, and abandon him to his fate. And how terrible such a situation, to be exposed in a savage interminable desert! In vain does he exert his expiring energies, in a last effort to cry out for help, or to hoist the signal of distress. Not a soul is near to whisper the accents of sympathy, or to pour a drop of water on his burning lips—not even an echo responds to his cries—and he lies there, dreaming of the murmur of limpid streams, and of wandering along the verdant banks, and stooping to swallow the delicious draught, till the effort to obey the impulse of imagination dissipates the enchantment, and awakes him to all the horrible realities of his situation, a helpless and forsaken wanderer, perishing of thirst in 'a waste howling wilderness.'"

Water sometimes signifies the element of water (Gen. i. 10); and, metaphorically, trouble and affliction. Ps. lxxix. 1. In the language of the prophets, waters often denote a great multitude of people. Isa. viii. 7; Rev. xvii. 15. Water is put for children or posterity (Numb. xxiv. 7; Isa. xlviii. 1); for the clouds. Ps. civ. 3. Waters sometimes stand for tears (Jer. ix. 1); for the ordinances of the gospel. Isa. xii. 3, xxxv. 6, 7, lv. 1; John vii. 37, 38. "Stolen waters" denote unlawful pleasures with strange women. Prov. ix. 17. The Israelites are reproached with having forsaken the fountain of living water, to quench their thirst at broken cisterns (Jer. ii. 13); that is, with having quitted the worship of the all-sufficient God, for the worship of vain and helpless idols. And this is now the guilt and folly of every sinner. "Be astonished, O ye heavens, at this!"

WAX (duneg, Ps. xxii. 14, lxxviii. 2, xcvi. 5; Mic. i. 4). Thus the Septuagint throughout, kērōs, and Vulgate cera; so there is no room to doubt but this is the true meaning of the word; and the idea of the root appears to be, soft, melting, yielding, or the like, which properties are not only well known to belong to wax, but are also intimated in all the passages of Scripture in which this word occurs.

WAYFARING MEN. Hospitality to strangers and travellers was, and still is, a virtue held in high repute in Oriental countries, and strongly inculcated in various passages of Scripture; "given to hospitality," is laid down by the apostle as one of the prominent graces of the Christian. In early ages this was all the more necessary, as there were no inns in which the weary traveller might find rest and refreshment. And after public inns and caravanseries were erected, this amiable virtue continued and still exists in the East. Buckingham, in his "Travels among the Arab Tribes," says, "A foot passenger could make his way at little or no expense, as travellers and wayfarers of every description halt at the sheik's dwelling, where, whatever may be the rank or condition of the stranger, before any questions are asked him as to where he comes from, or whither he is going, coffee is served to him from a large pot always on the fire; and a meal of bread, milk, oil, honey, or butter, is set before him, for which no payment is ever demanded or even expected by the host, who, in this manner, feeds at least twenty persons on an average every day in the year from his own purse; at least I could not learn that he was remunerated in any manner for this expenditure, though it is considered as a necessary consequence of his situation, as chief of the community, that he should maintain this ancient practice of hospitality to strangers. We had been directed to the house of Eesa, or Jesus. Our horses were taken into the courtyard of the house, and unburdened of their saddles, without a single question being asked on either side; and it was not until we had seated ourselves that our intention to remain here for the night was communicated to the master of the house; so much is it regarded a matter of course, that those who have a house to shelter themselves in, and food to partake of, should share those comforts with wayfarers."

WEASEL. This animal is mentioned only in

Lev. xi. 29. Bochart thinks the Hebrew word choled ought rather to be rendered the mole.

WEDDING. See MARRIAGE—MARRIAGE CEREMONY.

WEDNESDAY, ASH, the first day of Lent, when, formerly, in the Roman Catholic Church, notorious sinners were put to open penance thus: They appeared at the church-door barefooted and clothed in sackcloth, where, being examined, their discipline was proportioned according to their offences; after which, being brought into the church, the bishop singing the seven penitential psalms, they prostrated themselves, and with tears begged absolution; the whole congregation having ashes on their heads, to signify that they were both mortal, and deserved to be burned to ashes for their sins.

WEEDS. The Hebrew word suph is found in various places of Scripture, but is only rendered weeds in Jonah ii. 6. According to Parkhurst, as a collective noun, it means plants or weeds which grow on the borders of a river or sea, and are continually brushed or swept by the waves. What is now called in Hebrew the Red Sea, is in Hebrew iam suph, the weedy sea, which Dr Shaw thinks arises from the variety of algæ and fuci which grow in it, and at low water are often left in great quantities on the shore of the sea.

WEEK. Seven nights and days constituted a week; six of these were appropriated to labour and the ordinary purposes of life, and the seventh day, or Sabbath, was appointed by God to be observed as a day of rest, because that on it he had rested from all his work which God had created and made. Gen. ii. 3. This division of time was universally observed by the descendants of Noah; and, being lost during the bondage of the Israelites in Egypt, was revived and enacted by Moses agreeably to the divine command. This is evident from the word Sabbat or Sabbata, denoting a week among the Syrians, Arabians, Christian Persians, and Ethiopians. In addition to the week of days, the Jews had three other seasons denominated weeks. Lev. xxv. 1-17; Deut. xvi. 9, 10. 1. The week of weeks. It was a period of seven weeks, or forty-nine days, which was succeeded on the fiftieth day by the feast of Pentecost (see PENTECOST), Deut. xvi. 9, 10. 2. The week of years. This was a period of seven years, during the last of which the land remained untilled, and the people enjoyed a Sabbath or season of rest. 3. The week of seven sabbatical years. It was a period of forty-nine years, and was succeeded by the year of jubilee. Lev. xxv. 1-22, xxvi. 34. See YEAR.

WEeping. See BURIAL—TEARS.

WEIGHTS. The Hebrews weighed all the gold and silver they used in trade. (See MONEY.) The shekel, the half-shekel, the talent, are not only denominations of monies, of certain values, in gold and silver, but also of certain weights.

The following are the Jewish weights reduced to Troy:—

	lbs.	oz.	dwt.	gr.
The Gerah, the 28th part of a shekel,	0	0	0	12
The Bekah, half a shekel,	0	0	5	0
The Shekel,	0	0	10	0
The Maneh, 60 shekels,	2	6	0	0
The Talent, 50 manehs, or 3000 shekels,	125	0	0	0

WELLS, or SPRINGS, are frequently mentioned in Scripture. The Hebrews call a well beer; whence this word is often compounded with proper names, as Beersheba, Beeroth-bene-jaakan, Beeroth, Beerah, &c.

"The knowledge of the great importance," says Dr Paxton, "that is attached to, and the extreme jealousy felt about, the possession of a well, will serve to throw light on several particulars in the history of Abraham, Isaac, and their contemporaries. Like the modern shepherds of the East, those patriarchal chiefs had certain tracks in Canaan, which they visited in succession every year, to which custom, the law of wandering tribes, gave them exclusive possession. As the pastures were exhausted in one place, they removed to another, the plains of Moreh, Bethel-Mamre, and others, being the regular halting-places where they pitched their camps, whenever they traversed their annual circuit, and at some distance from each of these places (for the tents are seldom pitched very close to a well), they had digged wells to which they gave names, and of which, therefore, they became the rightful proprietors, such as Abraham's at Beersheba, Isaac's at Esek, Sitnah, and Rehoboth, Laban's at Haran, and Jacob's at Sichem. Abraham being a man of energy and enterprise, and Jacob and his sons showing themselves both able and disposed to repel aggressions, we nowhere read of either being disturbed in the possession of the wells they had digged, and consequently the names originally bestowed upon them continued in use for ages after the decease of those venerable patriarchs, showing that they were universally acknowledged as the inheritance of the Hebrew tribe. But the more timid and passive disposition of Isaac allowed the assaults of his rude neighbours with impunity—one remarkable instance of which occurred during his temporary sojourn among the Philistine tribe, when that people, fearing lest he might claim a hereditary right to the wells which his father had digged, while here as the ally of a former king of Gerar, and by ultimately settling among them abridge the range of their free pastures, fell upon the expedient of changing the name, in order to obliterate all traces of the origin of the wells; but Isaac having found means to restore the wells, asserted his claim by 'calling their names after the names by which his father called them.' As the water is often sold at a very high price, a number of good wells yield to the proprietor a large revenue. Pitts was obliged to purchase water at sixpence a gallon; a fact which illustrates the force of the offer made by Moses to Edom: 'If I and my cattle drink of thy water, then will I pay for it.' It is properly mentioned as a very aggravating circumstance in the overthrow of Jerusalem, that the ruthless conqueror forced the Jews to purchase with money the water of their own wells, and the wood of their own trees: 'We have drunken our water for money; our wood is sold unto us.' Even a cup of cold water cannot always be obtained in Syria, without paying a certain price. It is partly on this account our Lord promises, that 'whosoever shall give to drink unto one of those little ones a cup of cold water, in the name of a disciple, should in no wise lose his reward.'"

WELSH, DAVID, D.D. The name of this eminent man will ever occupy a conspicuous place in the page of history, from the part which he was honoured to take, as Moderator of the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland, in the events of the 18th May 1843, when the ever-memorable Disruption took place. David Welsh, the son of pious parents, who early devoted him to God, was a native of Dumfriesshire. He was educated at the grammar school of Moffat; and on passing to the University of Edinburgh, he surpassed most of his fellow-students, both in talents and industry. He attracted the attention particularly of Dr Thomas Brown, and was honoured with the special friendship of that eminent metaphysician. After being licensed to preach the gospel he received a presentation to the parish of Crossmichael, where he laboured several years with remarkable acceptance and success, after which he was translated to St David's parish, Glasgow. On a vacancy occurring in the chair of Church History in the University of Edinburgh, his eminent talents, and extensive and varied acquirements, pointed him out as peculiarly qualified for that chair. The emoluments of that professorship being considered inadequate, Government conferred upon him the additional appointment of secretary to the Board for authorizing the printing of the Bible. Dr Welsh soon rose to eminence as a Professor, and, being held in high estimation in the Church, he was fixed upon to occupy the chair of the General Assembly of the Scottish Church at a very important period—the year 1842. It devolved upon him, accordingly, to open the eventful Assembly of 1843, and to lay upon the table that solemn protest, the reading of which was followed by the separation of four hundred and seventy faithful ministers of Christ, and the erection of the Free Church of Scotland. The high station which Dr Welsh occupied at the time of the Disruption, and his meek and dignified deportment at that memorable crisis, freed as it was from the least appearance of pride or human passion, invested him latterly with a peculiar and almost sacred interest. The wisdom, humility, and calm fortitude which he displayed in the presence of the opponents of the Church's claims, and the simple but sublime devotions with which, on opening the proceedings at Canonmills, he elevated and composed the minds of the vast assemblage, met in sorrow and amazement, endeared him to multitudes. Nothing, perhaps, can prove more clearly the influence which he exercised, and the confidence which he had acquired, than the fact that, by means of his quiet and noiseless correspondence, he succeeded, in the course of a few weeks, in obtaining, from twenty individuals, the sum of £21,000, to erect a college for the benefit of those who had virtually been driven, not only from the Church, but also from the universities established by the State. Dr Welsh died suddenly on the 24th April 1845.

WESLEY, JOHN, the founder of the Wesleyan Methodist body, was born at Epworth, in Lincolnshire, on the 17th June 1703. His father, who was a clergyman of the Church of England, paid particular attention to the education of his son, who early began to manifest an assiduity and application to his studies which rendered him a favourite with his teachers. At the age of seventeen he was entered at Christ Church College, Oxford, where he prosecuted his studies with great diligence and success. In 1725, he was ordained by the Bishop of Oxford, and obtained a fellowship at Lincoln College, notwithstanding much opposition, in the following year. The strictness of his religious profession and principle attracted considerable notice at college, and he succeeded in forming a small religious association, among the members of which were Hervey, the author of the "Meditations," and the celebrated George Whitefield. This little band of pious youths drew upon them the ridicule of their fellow-students, and they received the name of Methodists. At length the elder Wesley died in 1735, and the same year John and his brother Charles were prevailed upon to set out for America, with the view of preaching the gospel in the new colony of Georgia. In that place, however, Mr Wesley's labours were not so successful as might have been wished from the rigid discipline which he enforced. He accordingly returned to London, and after passing through a severe mental struggle, he obtained a peace which he had never known before. From this time he commenced those extraordinary labours which resulted in the formation of a body, which, both during the last and the present century, has occupied a conspicuous place in the religious history of England. The foundation may be said to date either from 1738, which Wesley considered the year of his conversion, or, at all events, from the year following, when the first Methodist chapel was built, and the society divided into bands after the Moravian plan. For some time Mr Wesley was associated with the Moravians in the great work of preaching the gospel, but a division took place. He then co-operated with Mr Whitefield, but the latter having formed strong Calvinist views, withdrew along with a number of followers from the connection, and from that period, 1740, the Methodist body became split into two divisions, the Calvinistic or Whitefield, and the Arminian or Wesleyan Methodists. The doctrine and arrangements of Mr Wesley's adherents are fully noticed under the article METHODISM (which see.) Suffice it to say here, that in the furtherance of the good cause, in the perfecting of the machinery of the system, in the formation of new congregations, and the building of new chapels, Mr Wesley laboured with untiring energy and zeal during a long life, and peacefully departed this life in his eighty-eighth year, on the 2d of March 1791. His works amount to sixteen volumes 8vo, and are highly prized by the large and respected body which form the Society of Wesleyan Methodists.

WHALE (tan and tunnim. Gen. i. 21; Job vii. 12; Ezek. xxxii. 2; ketos, Matt. xii. 40), the largest of all the inhabitants of the water. A late author, in a dissertation expressly for the purpose, has proved that the crocodile, and not the whale, is spoken of in Gen. i. 21. The word in Job vii. 12 must also be taken for the crocodile. It must mean some terrible animal, which, but for the watchful care of Divine Providence, would be very destructive. See CROCODILE—LEVIATHAN.

Merrick supposes David, in Psalm lxxiv. 13, to speak of the tunnie, a kind of whale with which he was probably acquainted; and Bochart thinks it has its Greek name thunnos, from the Hebrew thanot. The last-mentioned fish is undoubtedly that spoken of in Psalm civ. 26. We are told, that, in order to preserve the prophet Jonah, when he was thrown overboard by the mariners, "the Lord prepared a great fish, to swallow him up." What kind of fish it was, is not specified; but the Greek translators take the liberty to give us the word ketos, whale; and though Matthew (xii. 40) makes use of the same word, we may probably conclude that he did so in a general sense, and that we are not to understand it as an appropriated term to point out the particular species of fish. It is notorious that sharks are common in the Mediterranean.

WHEAT (chelah, Gen. xxx. 14; Deut. viii. 8; sitos, Matt. xiii. 25; Luke xvi. 7; 1 Cor. xv. 37), the principal and the most valuable kind of grain for the service of man. (See BARLEY—CORN—FITCHES.) In Lev. ii. directions are given for oblations, which in our translation are called meat-offerings; but as meat now means flesh, and all kinds of offerings there specified were made of wheat, it had been better to render it "wheaten offerings." Calmet has observed, that there were five kinds of these: simple flour, oven-cakes, cakes of the fire-place, cakes of the frying-pan, and green ears of corn. The word ber, translated corn (Gen. xli. 35), and wheat, in Jer. xxiii. 28; Joel ii. 24; Amos v. 11, &c., is undoubtedly the burr, or wild corn, of the Arabs, mentioned by Forskal. See CORN.

WHIRLWIND, a wind which seems to blow with violence from various points of the compass. These are very violent in oriental countries, and darken the heavens with pillars of moving sand they toss into the air. They are generally preceded by calms and great heats, and occur chiefly in warm countries. Such winds with their destructive and devastating effects are frequently referred to in the sacred writings. Thus Isa. xvii. 13, "The nations shall rush like the rushing of many waters: but God shall rebuke them, and they shall flee far off, and shall be chased as the chaff of the mountains before the wind, and like a rolling thing before the whirlwind." Nah. i. 3, "The Lord is slow to anger, and great in power, and will not at all acquit the wicked: the Lord hath his way in the whirlwind and in the storm, and the clouds are the dust of his feet." Ps. lviii. 9, "Before your pots can feel the thorns, he shall take them away as with a whirlwind, both living, and in his wrath." Such passages as these afford a description of phenomena, which, though comparatively unknown in more temperate climates, are quite familiar to the inhabitants of Eastern countries. It may be enough to refer to the observations of one or two travellers. "On the 25th," says Bruce, "at four o'clock in the afternoon, we set out from the villages of the Nuba, intending to arrive at Basbock, where is the ferry over the Nile; but we had scarcely advanced two miles into the plain, when we were inclosed in a violent whirlwind, or what is called at sea the water-spout. The plain was red earth, which had been plentifully moistened by a shower in the night time. The unfortunate camel that had been taken by Cohala seemed to be nearly in the centre of its vortex; it was lifted and thrown down at a considerable distance, and several of its ribs broken. Although, as far as I could guess, I was not near the centre, it whirled me off my feet, and threw me down upon my face, so as to make my nose gush out with blood; two of the servants, likewise, had the same fate. It plastered us all over with mud, almost as smoothly as could have been done with a trowel. It took away my sense and breathing for an instant; and my mouth and nose were full of mud when I recovered. I guess the sphere of its action to be about two hundred feet. It demolished one-half of a small hut, as if it had been cut through with a knife, and dispersed the materials all over the plain, leaving the other half standing." And Burchell remarks: "The hottest days are often the most calm; and at such times the stillness of the atmosphere was sometimes suddenly disturbed, in an extraordinary manner. Whirlwinds, raising up columns of dust to a great height in the air, and sweeping over the plains with a momentary fury, were no unusual occurrence."

WHITEFIELD, GEORGE. This eminent and highly gifted man, whose labours in the cause of the Redeemer have scarcely ever been equalled since the days of the Apostles, was born in 1714, in the town of Gloucester, where his parents kept the Bell Inn. At the early age of two years he was left, by the death of his father, to the sole care of his widowed mother, of whose kindness and attention he was often accustomed in after-life to speak in terms of the warmest gratitude. The account, however, which he has left of his conduct in his early days is by no means flattering, and if the picture be not too highly coloured, the tender heart of his parent must have been often wounded by the waywardness and follies of his youth.

At the age of twelve, George was placed at a school called St Mary de Crypt, in Gloucester. Here he acquired a peculiar taste for theatrical acting and display, and here, too, he seems, by his own account, to have been very unhappy in the choice of his associates. The company into which young Whitefield was thrown soon destroyed all relish for education, and his mother's circumstances being now on the decline, he began to assist her in the public-house, "till at length," to quote his own words, "I put on my blue apron and my slippers, washed mops, cleaned rooms, and, in one word, became professed and common drawer for nigh a year and a-half." While thus employed, he was not altogether inattentive to the duties of religion. He frequently read the Word of God, and although his mind was very slightly impressed with the importance and reality of divine things, he still maintained to a considerable extent an outward profession of Christianity. After he had continued about a year in the servile employment to which he had voluntarily surrendered himself, his mother was obliged to leave the inn, devolving the business upon his brother, while it was agreed that George should still continue there as an assistant. Matters, however, did not proceed so comfortably as was anticipated, and having disagreed with his sister-in-law, he left Gloucester to pay a visit to his elder brother, then settled in Bristol.

It was during this temporary stay in Bristol that the mind of George Whitefield was seriously aroused to the necessity of seeking to be a Christian indeed. He began to feel a pleasure in reading religious works. "Thomas A Kempis" was his chief delight; "and I was always impatient," says he, "till the bell rang to call me to tread the courts of the Lord's house." But amid all this apparent fervour, he was constantly visited with the impression that his present religious feelings would speedily evaporate. And indeed his fears in this respect were too speedily realized. On his return to Gloucester the warmth of his ardour soon abated. He felt little inclination for either the public exercises of the sanctuary, or the private devotions of the closet. But though his spiritual affections were thus deadened, he had lost all relish for the bustle and turmoil of an inn. He therefore gave up all connection with his former employment, and took up his residence under his mother's roof, until an eligible situation of some kind or other could be obtained.

Tired at length of an idle life, George was exceedingly anxious to resume his studies, if there could be any hope of his finding admission to Oxford. A prospect of this kind providentially opened up, and he was put for a time under the care of his old master, that he might prepare for entering college. During his attendance at school he began to be more and more serious, and the change which now displayed itself in his whole deportment was peculiarly gratifying to his friends.

At the age of eighteen it was judged proper that he should be sent to the university. By the recommendation and assistance of some kind friends, accordingly, he was entered at Pembroke College, Oxford. Here he found a spirit of irreligion and speculative scepticism prevailing to a great extent among his fellow-students, and with the exception of the Wesleys, and the few who adhered to their principles and habits, Mr Whitefield stood almost alone in his desire to maintain a Christian character and deportment. He was happily kept from walking in the steps of the ungodly around him, and to the conversation of Mr Charles Wesley he owed much. This good man, anxious to promote the spiritual welfare of such a promising youth as George Whitefield then was, put into his hands various books, chiefly of a practical nature; and in reference to one of these, Scougall's "Life of God in the Soul of Man," he says, "I never knew what true religion was, till God sent me that excellent treatise by the hands of my never-to-be-forgotten friend."

During his residence at Oxford, Mr Whitefield was not contented with a careful assiduity in his college studies; he spent his leisure hours in visiting the poor at their own houses, and in conversing and praying with the prisoners in the town jail.

The state of his health compelled Mr Whitefield to quit Oxford and return for a time to Gloucester. Here he felt himself very uncomfortable. His friends viewed him with pity as a fanatic and a fool. He had no associates, as at Oxford, with whom he could converse on the things of eternity. All around him was spiritual desolation and death. The very thought of this, however, instead of discouraging him, only roused his ardent and energetic mind. He set himself with redoubled zeal to the study of the Bible and to prayer.

His friends now became anxious that he should be ordained to the ministry without delay; but so deep was his feeling of the responsibility which attaches to the sacred office, that for some time he declined. Being as yet only twenty-one years of age, he was afraid that, by rushing precipitately into the ministry, he might incur the reprehension of the apostle, "Not a novice, lest being puffed up with pride, he fall into the condemnation of the devil." At length his scruples were overcome, and he resolved to offer himself to Bishop Benson for ordination. Soon after his ordination, Mr Whitefield returned to Oxford to take out his bachelor's degree. He had not been long there, when he received and accepted an invitation to officiate for two months in the chapel of the Tower of London. From that period his popularity began to increase. Flocks of people crowded to hear him, and multitudes who "went to scoff, remained to pray." The fickle breath of popular applause, however, was not what Mr Whitefield sought. Though admired and courted in London, he felt no desire to continue his labours there; his heart was set upon preaching the gospel in a foreign land. Some time previous, the attention of the religious public in England had been awakened to send the gospel to the British Colonies in America, and the Wesleys had located themselves in Georgia. The melancholy accounts sent home in reference to the moral condition of the people in these quarters deeply affected the heart of Mr Whitefield, and he was strongly inclined to emigrate to that country. Thither accordingly he proceeded in December 1737, and for thirty years did he divide his benevolent efforts between England and America, labouring with disinterested and unwearied zeal in advancing the cause of Christ, by preaching the unsearchable riches of Christ, providing for the godly education of the young, and promoting many useful and philanthropic objects. At length, in the midst of his almost superhuman labours, he was cut off at the age of fifty-six, on the 30th September 1770, at Newbury Port, in America.

Thus died one of the most honoured ministers of Christ with whom Britain has ever been blessed, a man of unwearied zeal, of matchless eloquence and apostolic fervour. His was the enviable pre-eminence of "turning many to righteousness," and we may rest assured, therefore, that in heaven "he shall shine as the stars for ever and ever." In few, but most appropriate words, Cowper has delineated his most prominent qualities:—

"He loved the world that hated him; the tear
That dropp'd upon his Bible was sincere;
Assail'd by scandal, and the tongue of strife,
His only answer was—a blameless life;
And he that forged, and he that threw the dart,
Had each a brother's interest in his heart.
Paul's love of Christ, and steadiness unbribed,
Were copied close in him, and well transcribed.
He follow'd Paul—his zeal a kindred flame,
His apostolic charity the same;
Like him, cross'd cheerfully tempestuous seas,
Forsaking country, kindred, friends, and ease;
Like him he labour'd, and like him content
To bear it, suffer'd shame where'er he went."

WHITSUNDAY, a solemn festival observed on the fiftieth day after Easter, in memory of the descent of the Holy Ghost upon the apostles, in the visible appearance of fiery cloven tongues, and of those miraculous powers which were then conferred upon them.

It is called Whitsunday, or White Sunday, because this being one of the stated times for baptism in the ancient Church, after Constantine, those who were baptized put on white garments, as types of that spiritual purity they received in baptism. As the descent of the Holy Ghost upon the apostles happened on that day which the Jews called Pentecost, this festival retained the name of Pentecost among the Christians.

WICKED, vicious, sinful. "The wicked one," taken absolutely, is generally put for the devil. "Deliver us from the wicked or evil one." Matt. vi. 13. "Then cometh the wicked one, and catcheth away that which was sown in his heart." Matt. xiii. 19. The evil day (Eph. vi. 13) is the day of temptation or trial, the day in which one is most in danger of doing evil.

WICKEDNESS. See SIN.

WICKLIFFE, JOHN, commonly called the first reformer, was born near Richmond, in Yorkshire, in the year 1324. Nothing is known about his parentage, but both at school and college he distinguished himself by his talents and acquisitions. He devoted much of his time to the study of the Bible; and such was the value attached to his notes and expositions, that he received the title of Doctor Evangelicus, or the gospel doctor, and was advanced to a high situation in the University of Oxford. His opposition, however, to the errors and abuses of the Romish Church, drew down upon him the vengeance of the Pope. "He attacked the jurisdiction of the Pope and the bishops.

He was for this twice summoned to a council at Lambeth, to give an account of his doctrines; but being countenanced by the Duke of Lancaster, was both times dismissed without condemnation. Wickliffe, therefore, continued to spread his new principles as usual, adding to them doctrines still more alarming; by which he drew after him a great number of disciples. Upon this, William Courtnay, Archbishop of Canterbury, called another council in 1382, which condemned 24 propositions of Wickliffe and his disciples, and obtained a declaration of Richard II. against all who should preach them: but while these proceedings were agitating, Wickliffe died at Lutterworth, leaving many works behind him for the establishment of his doctrines. He was buried in his own church, at Lutterworth, in Leicestershire, where his bones were suffered to rest in peace till the year 1428, when, by an order from the Pope, they were taken up and burnt. Wickliffe was doubtless a very extraordinary man, considering the times in which he lived. He discovered the absurdities and impositions of the Church of Rome, and had the honesty and resolution to promulgate his opinions, which a little more support would probably have enabled him to establish: they were evidently the foundation of the subsequent Reformation."

WIDOW. In the law of Moses the most humane and compassionate spirit is manifested toward the widow. Thus Exod. xxii. 22-24, "Ye shall not afflict any widow or fatherless child. If thou afflict them in any wise, and they cry at all unto me, I will surely hear their cry: and my wrath shall wax hot, and I will kill you with the sword; and your wives shall be widows and your children fatherless." Jehovah is declared by the Psalmist to be the guardian of the widow; thus Ps. lxxviii. 5, "A father of the fatherless, and a judge of the widows, is God in his holy habitation." And the Apostle James tells us (i. 27) that "pure religion and undefiled is to visit the fatherless and widows in their affliction." In forbidding his people to afflict widows and orphans, he does in fact enjoin it upon them to comfort and assist them, and to be ready on all occasions to show them kindness. Having no one else to complain and appeal to, if they cry unto God, he will assuredly hear and avenge them. If men do not pity them, He will. And this, no doubt, accounts for the fact that no particular penalty is prescribed for the violation of this statute. God himself undertakes to avenge their cause by the retributions of his providence, and nothing could more impressively show the divine abhorrence of the sin. The tender sympathy which our blessed Lord manifested towards this forlorn class, is beautifully manifested in the account of his raising to life the widow of Nain's son. When he beheld the melancholy funeral procession issuing from the gates of the city, and the bereaved widow following in the train, we are told that "when the Lord saw her he had compassion on her, and said unto her, Weep not. And he came and touched the bier: and they that bare him stood still. And he said, Young man, I say unto thee, Arise. And he that was dead sat up, and began to speak. And he delivered him to his mother."

Formerly there were widows in the Christian Church, who, because of their poverty, were placed on the list of persons to be provided for at the expense of the Church. There were others who had certain employments in the Church; as, to visit sick women, to assist women at baptism, and to do several things which decency would not permit to the other sex. Paul did not allow any woman to be chosen into this number, unless she were threescore years old, at least. 1 Tim. v. 9.

WILBERFORCE, WILLIAM. There are few names more closely and indissolubly associated with all that is benevolent and philanthropic than that of Wilberforce. It is enshrined in the hearts of thousands as encircled with immortal honour, and as emblazoning the page of history with a glory more pure and imperishable than aught that warrior ever won. This man was, in the most emphatic sense of the expression, a benefactor of his species; and it is interesting to trace the personal history of one who was the honoured instrument, in the hand of Providence, of effecting one of the most signal triumphs which have ever been accomplished in the cause of humanity.

Mr Wilberforce was born at Hull, on the 24th of August 1759. His early education was received at the grammar-school of that town, under the superintendence of the Rev. Joseph Milner.

At the age of twelve, Mr Wilberforce was removed to a school in the neighbourhood of London, where he resided with a pious uncle and aunt. It was here that he was first introduced to the Rev. John Newton, who appears to have been so much struck with the young man's countenance and manner, that fifteen years after, when, in very different circumstances, they again met, Mr Newton mentioned to Mr Wilberforce, that, from the period of the early introduction just mentioned, he had not failed constantly to pray for him. The fact is curious and interesting, and may well give rise to serious reflection, as to the probable effect of the prayers so assiduously and earnestly offered. The great day alone will reveal how much of Mr Wilberforce's progress in personal piety and public usefulness was due to the effectual fervent prayers of the devoted pastor of Olney. The intercessions of the righteous in our behalf are a greater boon than we imagine; and who can tell how many of his choicest blessings descend to him from above, in answer to the benevolent and disinterested prayers of a Christian friend?

Mr Wilberforce remained but a short time in London, when he was removed to a grammar school at Pocklington, Yorkshire, under the care of the Rev. Mr Baskett. There he continued for three or four years, at the end of which time he was entered as a student at Cambridge. During his studies at the university, he was exposed to many temptations, from the influence of ungodly companions; and although he never associated with them in their vicious schemes, the effect upon his mind was decidedly injurious. Religious impressions were to a great extent effaced, and worldly feelings and inclinations assumed the ascendancy in his heart. He entered as a fellow-commoner at St John's college, and while he prosecuted his studies with considerable diligence, he was accustomed to complain, in after life, that his progress had not been such as he could have wished. He obtained no academical honours; but his proficiency in classical acquirements was generally acknowledged. In 1781 he obtained the degree of Bachelor of Arts, and in 1788, that of Master. It was while at college that he became intimately acquainted with Mr Pitt, and their friendship continued unbroken till the death of the latter statesman in 1806.

When Mr Wilberforce had reached his majority, he was surprised and delighted by his unexpected election to represent his native town in parliament. The honour was the more gratifying to his feelings, as it was quite unsolicited on his part. This event was the commencement of his public life; and he entered upon his parliamentary duties, no doubt, under a deep impression of the responsibility of the office to which he had been chosen. In the first parliament in which he served, his youth and inexperience prevented him from taking an active part in public business. A new parliament having been summoned in 1784, he was re-elected for Hull, but immediately resigned it on being chosen member for the county of York. The honour of representing that large and important county he enjoyed in six successive parliaments, until he resigned the office in 1812, on account of his growing infirmities.

At the outset of his parliamentary career, Mr Wilberforce soon felt that the life on which he had entered, involving, as it did, much bustle and excitement, was by no means favourable to his progress as a Christian. His company was much courted, he found himself surrounded by men of mere secular ambition, his mind was engrossed with party questions at a period of peculiar political ferment, and the entire atmosphere which he breathed was one of all-absorbing worldliness. In these circumstances, it is not surprising that the tone of his piety should have been lowered. But it pleased the Almighty to arrest the progress of this carnality of mind, and through the instrumentality of private friendship, to lead Mr Wilberforce to reflect more seriously upon the things which belonged to his eternal peace.

At this period of his life, when Mr Wilberforce had openly avowed himself a professed follower of the Lord Jesus, several of his Christian friends, with more zeal than sound judgment, urged him to withdraw from public life, as exposing him to many temptations which might impede his advancement in the Christian course. To such a step, however, Mr Scott offered the most strenuous resistance, urging upon him the necessity of maintaining the position in which Providence had placed him. And it is well for the cause of righteousness and humanity that his judicious friend and pastor prevailed. Mr Wilberforce remained in parliament, and, without fettering himself with the trammels of any political party, exhibited to the world a bright but rare example of a senator actuated throughout by sound Christian principle, which he was not ashamed openly to avow. And, in the providence of God, few men have been more highly favoured in urging forward the great cause of pure benevolence and moral improvement in the world. To see the accordance of any measure with the revealed will of God was sufficient to summon to its support his most energetic and determined efforts. The great subject, however, with which his name is closely, nay, indissolubly connected, is negro slavery, a subject to which he dedicated his life; and he enjoyed the high privilege of living to see the triumphant issue of all his laborious exertions and his most fervent prayers.

Shortly after Mr Wilberforce was first honoured with a seat in parliament, the awful horrors of the slave trade, as carried on by British ships on the coast of Africa, had begun to awaken the sympathy of some individuals, more especially belonging to the Society of Friends. One young man, Mr Thomas Clarkson, who was at that time a student at Cambridge, was led to make inquiries into the subject, and so deeply was his mind impressed with its importance, that he resolved to abandon the Church, in which he had a fair prospect of preferment, and to devote himself to the cause of the injured Africans. It was in the end of the year 1785 that he commenced his great work. His first object was to call public attention to the subject in every possible way. With this view he published a prize essay, which he had written upon it at Cambridge, and seeking all the additional information he could acquire, took means to circulate it as extensively as possible. He waited on the leading members of the two houses of parliament, and endeavoured to put them in possession of the facts of the case, and to rouse them to take an interest in it. Amongst others, he called upon Mr Wilberforce, and it may be interesting to peruse, in Mr Clarkson's own words, the reception he met with from one who was destined, in the hand of Providence, to be the main agent in accomplishing the great design.

"On my first interview with him, he stated frankly that the subject had often employed his thoughts, and that it was near his heart. He seemed earnest about it, and also very desirous of taking the trouble of inquiring further into it. Having read my book, which I had delivered to him in person, he sent for me. He expressed a wish that I would make him acquainted with some of my authorities for the assertions in it, which I did afterwards to his satisfaction. He asked me if I could support it by any other evidence? I told him I could; I mentioned Mr Newton, Mr Nisbett, and several others to him. He took the trouble of sending for all these. He made memorandums of their conversation, and, sending for me afterwards, showed them to me. On learning my intention to devote myself to the cause, he paid me many handsome compliments. He then desired me to call on him often, and to acquaint him with my progress from time to time. He expressed, also, his willingness to afford me any assistance in his power in the prosecution of my pursuits."

From the date of this interview with Mr Clarkson commenced the interest which Mr Wilberforce took in the great question of the slave trade. Occasional meetings of the friends of abolition were now held at his house, and measures were concerted with the view of forwarding their purpose. At length in 1787 Mr Wilberforce came forward as the parliamentary leader of the abolitionists; and though, even from the first, he met with warm support from Mr Pitt and Mr Fox, the leaders of the two opposite sides of the house, he had the utmost difficulty in exciting a general interest in the question. By the great majority of the members he was viewed as advocating not merely an inpolitic but an impracticable measure. His, however, was not a mind to be daunted or discouraged by difficulties or opposition. He felt conscious that he was engaged in the cause of injured humanity, and though repulsed again and again, he persisted in urging the woes of the oppressed negro upon the notice of parliament. And it was not until twenty years had elapsed, that the victory was gained, and the act for the abolition of the slave trade passed both houses, and received the royal sanction. The joyful feelings of Mr Wilberforce on that occasion it is easier to conceive than describe. He had borne much obloquy and unmerited reproach; his virtues had been misrepresented, his feelings had been lacerated, his personal character had been attacked, but nothing could divert him or drive him away from the great design to which he had dedicated his life. Instead, however, of dilating upon this point, let us give place to the eloquent language of Sir Samuel Romilly.

"'But, sir,' said that distinguished statesman, 'if such be the feelings of those who have borne only part in this transaction, what must be the feelings of my honourable friend Mr Wilberforce? What is there in the wide range of human ambition which could afford pleasure so pure, gratification so exalted, as he must enjoy? When I look at the man at the head of the French monarchy, surrounded as he is with all the pomp of power, and all the pride of victory, distributing kingdoms to his family, and principalities to his followers, seeming, as he sits upon his throne, to have reached the summit of human ambition, the pinnacle of earthly happiness; and when I follow him into his closet, or to his bed, and contemplate the anguish with which his solitude must be tortured, by recollections of the blood he has spilt, and the oppressions he has committed; and when I compare with these pangs of remorse the feelings which must accompany my honourable friend from this house to his home, after the vote of this night shall have accomplished the object of his humane and unceasing labours—when he shall retire into the bosom of his delighted and happy family—when he shall lay himself down on his bed, reflecting on the innumerable voices that will be raised in every quarter of the world to bless his name—how much more enviable his lot, in the consciousness of having preserved so many millions of his fellow-creatures, than that of the man with whom I have compared him, on a throne to which he has waded through slaughter and oppression! Who will not be proud to concur with my hononred friend in promoting the greatest act of national benefit, and securing to the Africans one of the greatest blessings which God has ever put in the power of man to confer on his fellow-creatures?'"

While thus engaged with the most unwearied activity, in promoting the great public undertaking in which he had engaged, Mr Wilberforce had not been the less attentive to the study of divine truth. No cause appeared in his eyes to equal in importance the salvation of the never-dying soul. Meditation and prayer, therefore, combined with the diligent study of God's holy Word, were the habitual employment of his retired hours; and the result of this well-spent time, was the publication, in 1797, of a volume, which has done incalculable benefit to the cause of evangelical truth in England. Previous to the appearance of this work, which is entitled, "A Practical View of the Prevailing Religious Systems of Professed Christians," the peculiar doctrines of our most holy faith were rarely dwelt upon from the pulpits of the Establishment, and among the higher classes of the laity they were held in little or no esteem. The object of the distinguished author of the "Practical View" was to contend, not with the infidel or sceptic, but with the nominal professor of Christianity, or, in his own words, "to point out the scanty and erroneous system of the bulk of those who belong to the class of orthodox Christians, and to contrast their defective scheme with a representation of what the author apprehends to be real Christianity."

A work exhibiting such a design in the very front of it, and issuing, too, from the pen of a layman, who had acquired no small celebrity from his parliamentary talents, soon attracted a notice almost unprecedented. Men of all classes eagerly perused the strange and unexpected volume. It became the general talk, not merely in London, but throughout the country; and the ability and eloquence, and high-toned piety, which pervaded every page, recommended it alike to the man of refined and cultivated intellect, and to the illiterate but simple-hearted Christian peasant. This was evidently an extraordinary performance, a literary as well as a religious phenomenon; and though its arguments might be resisted by those whom no argument can reach, they were such, at all events, as commanded respect. None could deny that the author was at once a man of sincere piety, of refined taste, and high talent.

That a work of this nature, issuing from such a quarter, should excite opposition, was nothing more than what might have been expected; but instead of checking, this served only to promote the sale of the work. The Socinians, particularly, poured forth, both from the pulpit and the press, the most virulent attacks. All, however, was unavailing. The author remained unmoved, and deigned not to pen a single line in reply to any of his numerous opponents.

After Mr Wilberforce retired, in 1812, from the responsible situation which he had so long held as one of the representatives for the county of York, he continued to sit for the borough of Bramber till the close of his parliamentary life, in 1825. Though he faithfully attended to his duties in the House, he seldom took that prominent part in its discussions which he had formerly done. In the cause of the negro he still felt a lively interest, and by his speeches, his writings, and his votes, he endeavoured to carry forward the great work of slave emancipation with as much energy as he had sought to promote the abolition of the slave trade, which he had the privilege of seeing so happily brought to a close, at least as far as the legal sanction of Great Britain is concerned. Wherever the interests of religion were likely to be advanced, Mr Wilberforce was at his post; and more especially when the question was under discussion, in 1813, as to the renewal of the East India charter, it was mainly to the exertions of this enlightened Christian statesman that the vast empire of the East was thrown open to the labours of the missionaries of the cross.

It was observed by Mr Wilberforce's friends, that as he advanced in years, he became more habitually absorbed in spiritual and divine things, and so great was the happiness he felt in the contemplation of eternity, that he remarked, "The last year has been the happiest of my life." He declared himself "quite prepared for the worst." Baxter's "Dying Thoughts" was the companion of his dying pillow, and he died as he had lived, trusting solely to the merits of the Redeemer. "As for me," said he, "I have nothing to say but the publican's plea, 'God be merciful to me a sinner.'" In the exercise of this lively faith, his happy spirit winged its flight to the regions of immortal bliss, on Monday, July 29, 1833, in the seventy-fourth year of his age.

WILDERNESS. See DESERT.

WILL, the voluntary principle, or the power of choice in an intelligent being. Its office is to determine between motives, that is, between the conflicting opinions and desires raised in the soul, by different objects, circumstances, law, evidence, authority, sanctions, arguments, and persuasions. Hence its exercise differs little from the final judgment of the mind. When man was created, he was fully disposed and freely preferred to do what was pleasing in the sight of God; but by the fall he lost his former disposition to spiritual good; nor has he since, whatever may be his wishes, hopes, and fears, any will to that which is good, until divine grace enlightens the understanding and changes the heart.

"The nature of the will, indeed, is in itself indisputably free. Will, as will, must be so, or there is no such faculty; but the human will, being finite, hath a necessary bound, which, indeed, so far may be said to confine it, because it cannot act beyond it; yet, within the extent of its capacity, it necessarily is, and ever will be, spontaneous. The limits of the will, therefore, do not take away its inherent liberty. The exercise of its powers may be confined, as it necessarily must, in a finite being; but where it is not confined, that exercise will correspond with its nature and situation."

This being understood, it is easy to perceive that man, in every supposable state, wills only according to the moral condition of his faculties, habits, and affections; that these, being wrongly fixed, hold his will in bondage; and that however freely his volitions may flow within their extent, he cannot possibly overpass them. He, therefore, while a sinful, carnal, and perverse apostate from God, wills only according to the nature of his apostasy, which is continually and invariably evil, without strength of purpose to exceed its bounds into goodness, purity, and truth; for otherwise he would will contrary to, or beyond his nature and situation, which is equally impossible in itself, and contradictory to the revelation of God. Hence his need of the remedial power of Christianity.—See MORAL AGENCY—LIBERTY—NECESSITY.

WILL OF GOD is taken—1. For that which he has from all eternity determined, which is unchangeable, and must certainly come to pass; this is called his providential or secret will. (See DECREES OF GOD—PREDESTINATION.) 2. It is taken for what he has prescribed to us in his Word as the rule of duty; this is called his preceptive or revealed will. (See LAW—MORAL OBLIGATION.)

A question of very great importance respecting our duty deserves here to be considered. The question is this: "How may a person, who is desirous of following the dictates of Providence in every respect, know the mind and will of God in any particular circumstance, whether temporal or spiritual?" Now, in order to come at the knowledge of that which is proper and needful for us to be acquainted with, we are taught by prudence and conscience to make use of—1. Deliberation. 2. Consultation. 3. Supplication; but, 1. We should not make our inclinations the rule of our conduct. 2. We should not make our particular frames the rule of our judgment and determination. 3. We are not to be guided by any unaccountable impulses and impressions. 4. We must not make the event our rule of judgment.

1. Unless something different from our present situation offer itself to our serious consideration, we are not to be desirous of changing our state, except it is unprofitable or unlawful. 2. When an alteration of circumstances is proposed to us, or Providence lays two or more things before our eyes, we should endeavour to take a distinct view of each case, compare them with one another, and then determine by such maxims as these:—Of two natural evils choose the least; of two moral evils choose neither; of two moral or spiritual good things choose the greatest.

3. When, upon due consideration, nothing appears in the necessity of the case or the leadings of Providence to make the way clear, we must not hurry Providence, but remain in a state of suspense, or abide where we are, waiting upon the Lord by prayer, and waiting for the Lord in the way of his providence. In all cases, it should be our perpetual concern to keep as much as possible out of the way of temptation to omit any duty, or commit any sin. We should endeavour to keep up a reverence for the Word and providence of God upon our hearts, and to have a steady eye to his glory, and to behold God in covenant as managing every providential circumstance in subserviency to his gracious purposes in Christ Jesus.

WILLOW, a well-known tree. See BABYLON, CITY OF.

WILL WORSHIP, the invention and practice of such expedients of appeasing or of pleasing God as neither reason nor revelation suggests.

WIND. Palestine in common with the neighbouring regions of the East, is subject to violent and destructive winds, such as the WHIRLWIND (which see), the hot winds, the hurricane, accompanied with lightnings, and thunder, and rain. "But the ordinary winds that prevail in that country observe a regularity in their character, the time of their appearance, and their duration, equally singular and unknown in our insular situation. 'Both in Egypt and Syria,' says Volney, 'the winds blow from the four cardinal points periodically, at different seasons of the year. For instance, when the sun approaches the tropic of Cancer, the winds, which before blew from the east, change to the north, and become constant in that point. In June, they always blow from the north and northwest; they continue northerly in July, but vary sometimes towards the west and east. About the end of July, during all the month of August, and half of September, they remain constantly in the north, and are moderate,—brisker in the day, however, and weaker at night. Towards the end of September, when the sun repasses the line, the winds return to the east; and, though not fixed, blow more regularly from that than any other point except the north; this lasts all October and part of November. As the sun approaches the other tropic, the winds become more variable and more tempestuous; they most commonly blow from the north, the northwest, and west, in which points they continue during the winter months of December, January, and February. About the end of February, and in March, when the sun returns towards the equator, the winds are southerly more frequently than at any other season. During this last month, and that of April, the south-easterly, south, and south-westerly winds prevail; and at times, the west, north, and east,—the latter of which becomes the most prevalent about the end of April, and during May it divides with the north the empire of the sea.'"

WINDOWS. The peculiar construction of windows in eastern houses requires to be known that we may understand many passages of Scripture. Professor Paxton thus describes this part of an oriental dwelling: "The windows which look into the street are very high and narrow, and defended by lattice work; as they are only intended to allow the cloistered inmate a peep of what is passing without, while he remains concealed behind the casement. This kind of window the ancient Hebrews called Arnbah, and is the same term which they used to express those small openings, through which pigeons passed into the cavities of the rocks, or into those buildings which were raised for their reception. Thus the prophet demands, 'Who are these that fly as a cloud, and as the doves, (el arubothem) to their small or narrow windows?' The word is derived from a root, which signifies to lie in wait for the prey, and is very expressive of the concealed manner in which a person examines, through that kind of window, an external object. Irwin describes the windows in Upper Egypt, as having the same form and dimensions; and says expressly, that one of the windows of the house in which they lodged, and through which they looked into the street, more resembled a pigeon hole than any thing else. But the sacred writers mention another kind of window, which was large and airy; it was called halon, and was large enough to admit a person of mature age being cast out of it; a punishment which that profligate woman Jezebel suffered by the command of Jehu, the authorised exterminator of her family."

WINE (ain, Gen. xix. 32; oinos, Matt. ix. 17), a liquor expressed from grapes. See VINE—GRAPES.

WINE-PRESS. See PRESS.

WINNOWING. In the East, after the grain is trodden out, they winnow it by throwing it up against the wind with a shovel—the fan of the Gospels, according to Matthew and Luke. The text should rather run, whose shovel or fork (which is a portable instrument) is in his hand, agreeably to the practice recorded by Isaiah, who mentions both the shovel and the fan: "The oxen likewise, and the young asses that ear the ground, shall eat clean provender, which hath been winnowed with the shovel and with the fan." Isa. xxx. 24.

WISDOM, a comprehensive knowledge of things, in their proper nature and relations, together with the power of combining them in the most useful manner. In a moral sense, it signifies much the same as prudence, or that knowledge by which we connect the best means with the best ends. Some, however, distinguish wisdom from prudence thus: wisdom leads us to speak and act what is most proper; prudence prevents our speaking or acting improperly. A wise man employs the most proper means for success; a prudent man the safest means for not being brought into danger. Both are united in "being wise unto salvation." 2 Tim. iii. 15.

Spiritual wisdom consists in the knowledge and fear of God. It is beautifully described by James, as "first pure, then peaceable, gentle, easy to be entreated, full of mercy and good fruits, without partiality, and without hypocrisy." James iii. 17. See DEVOTION—RELIGION.

WISDOM OF GOD is that grand attribute of his nature by which he knows and orders all things for the promotion of his glory and the good of his creatures. This appears in all the works of his hands (Ps. civ. 24); in the dispensations of his providence (Ps. xcvi. 1, 2); in the work of redemption (Eph. iii. 10); in the government and preservation of his Church in all ages (Ps. cvii. 7). This doctrine should teach us admiration (Rev. xv. 3, 4); trust and confidence (Ps. ix. 10); prayer (Prov. iii. 5, 6); submission (Heb. xii. 9); praise (Ps. ciii. 1-5).

WITCHCRAFT, a juggling pretence of supernatural knowledge or power gained by entering into a compact with the inhabitants of the spiritual world, called "familiar spirits." Sad mistakes on this subject have been made, which have led to sanguinary scenes. Hence some have denied the existence of witchcraft altogether. But this arises usually from confounding the fact of such pretences having been made with the reality of the thing pretended. The latter may be doubted, but not the former. That such persons have been found among men seems evident from the Scriptures. Deut. xviii. 10; Exod. xxii. 18; Gal. v. 20; Lev. xix. 31, xx. 6. The inconsistency of holding such persons in estimation, or having recourse to fortune-tellers, diviners, charmers, and such like, appears in this: 1. It is imitating the heathen, and giving countenance to the foolish superstition and absurd practices of pagans. 2. Such characters are held in abhorrence by the Lord, and their very existence forbidden. Lev. xx. 6; Exod. xxii. 18. 3. He threatens to punish those who consult them. Lev. xx. 6. 4. It is wrong to have any thing to do with them, as it is setting an awful example to others. 5. It is often productive of the greatest evils, deception, discord, disappointment, and incredible mischief.

WITNESS. In the case of capital crimes, the law in regard to witnesses is thus laid down in Deut. xvii. 6, 7: "At the mouth of two witnesses, or three witnesses, shall he that is worthy of death be put to death; but at the mouth of one witness he shall not be put to death. The hands of the witnesses shall be first upon him to put him to death, and afterwards the hands of all the people: so thou shalt put the evil away from among you." There are several striking points of difference between the Mosaic penal code, and that of most modern states. One of these is the requiring of two witnesses for every capital crime, and that the witnesses should aid in the execution of the guilty. This is a very remarkable provision among such a people as the Hebrews; wonderfully calculated to prevent false testimony, and perhaps not altogether unworthy of imitation. In Rev. i. 5, Jesus Christ is called "the Faithful Witness," a title having an obvious reference to the prophetic office of Christ. The word properly signifies a martyr, and suggests the idea of a testimony confirmed by suffering. Much discussion has arisen as to the meaning of the Two Witnesses, referred to in the book of Revelation (xi. 3), and of whom it is foretold that they should prophesy a thousand two hundred and threescore days, clothed in sackcloth; but the most general opinion is, that the name applies to the friends of truth in the times of Antichrist; and they are supposed to be called two, from the number necessary to establish any litigated point.

WOE. "Woe to such an one!" is, says Dr Campbell, a threat or imprecation, which comprises a wish for some calamity, natural or judicial, to befall a person; but this is not always the meaning of the word in Scripture. We have the expression, "Woe is me!" that is, alas for my sufferings! and, "Woe to the women with child, and those who give suck," &c., that is, alas for their redoubled sufferings in times of distress! It is also more agreeable to the gentle character of the compassionate Jesus to consider him as lamenting the sufferings of any, whether person or city, than as imprecating, or even as denouncing them, since his character of judge formed no part of his mission. If, then, we should read, "Alas for thee, Chôrazin! alas for thee, Bethsaida!" we should do no injustice to the general sentiment of the passage, or to the character of the person speaking. This, however, is not the sense in which woe is always to be taken; as when we read, "Woe to those who build houses by unrighteousness, and cities by blood;" woe to those who are "rebellious against God," &c., in numerous passages, especially of the Old Testament.

WOLF (zab, in Arabic, zeeb, Gen. xlix. 27; Isa. xi. 6, lxxv. 25; Jer. v. 6; Ezek. xxii. 27; Zeph. iii. 3; Hab. i. 8; lukos, Matt. vii. 15, x. 16; Luke x. 3; John x. 12; Acts xx. 29; Eccles. xiii. 17). Majus derives it from the Arabic word zaab or daaba, "to frighten;" and hence the German word dieb, "a thief." The wolf is a fierce, strong, cunning, mischievous, and carnivorous quadruped, externally and internally so nearly resembling the dog, that they seem modelled alike, yet have a perfect antipathy to each other. The Scriptures observe of the wolf, that it lives upon rapine—is violent, bloody, cruel, voracious, and greedy—goes abroad by night to seek its prey, and is a great enemy to flocks of sheep. Indeed, this animal is fierce without cause, kills without remorse, and by its indiscriminate slaughter, seems to satisfy its malignity rather than its hunger. The wolf is weaker than the lion or the bear, and less courageous than the leopard; but he scarcely yields to them in cruelty or rapaciousness. His ravenous temper prompts him to destructive and sanguinary depredations; and these are perpetrated principally in the night. This circumstance is expressly mentioned in several passages of Scripture.

WOMAN. The creation of woman is minutely detailed in Gen. ii. 18-25. On this subject Dr Candlish well remarks: "Man in paradise was a social, as well as a sentient and religious being; and in respect of this part also of his nature, God provided for him. Ver. 18-25. Among the lower animals man could find subjects to whom, in token of his authority, he gave names; but he could find no fellow, no help-meet for him. He needed an equal, and one was found for him: not a servant, not an inferior, but a companion—another self—whom he must love and cherish as his own body. Eph. v. 28. Hence arose an intercourse pure and blessed, without sin, and without shame. Blameless and fearless, the two walked together in the sight of Him who made them for one another, and made both of them for himself." The state of woman in heathen countries is degrading in the extreme. The natives of the East have kept her in a state of ignorance and slavery. Among the Greeks she occupied a very inferior sphere. But much does woman owe to Christianity. What the Bible has done for woman is thus beautifully noticed by Dr Spring of New York: "It asks not to hear her gentle voice in the popular assembly, and even 'suffers her not to speak in the church of God.' It claims not for her the right of suffrage, nor any immunity by which she may 'usurp authority over the man.' And yet it gives her her throne; for she is the queen of the domestic circle. It is the bosom of her family. It is the heart of her husband and children. It is the supremacy in all that interesting domain, where love, and tenderness, and refinement of thought and feeling preside. It is the privilege of making her husband happy and honoured, and her sons and her daughters the ornaments of human society. It is the sphere of piety, prudence, diligence in the domestic station, and a holy and devout life. It is the sphere that was occupied by Hannah, the mother of Samuel; by Elizabeth, the mother of John; and by Mary, the mother of Jesus. It is 'the ornament of a meek and quiet spirit, which, in the sight of God, is of great price.' It is the respect and esteem of mankind. It is that silent, unobserved, inobtrusive influence by which she accomplishes more for her race than many whose names occupy a broad space on the page of history. More than this, too, does the Bible do for woman. It opens to her the stores of knowledge. It proscribes her no intellectual advancement. It commits to her intelligent culture the minds of the rising generation. It tells her that her peculiar province is to embellish and adorn. It opens before her the loveliest spheres of active benevolence. And while it tells her to be a 'keeper at home,' it at the same time points her to the poor, the afflicted, the widow, the orphan, the sick, and the dying, and says, 'Pure religion and undefiled before God and the Father, is to visit the fatherless and widows in their affliction, and to keep herself unspotted from the world.' It does more for her than for the stronger sex, because it gives her more piety than it gives to pious men; more ardency and devotion in her religious affections; more numerous, as well as more illustrious examples of converting grace; a greater reward, and a brighter crown. Nor can she ever know what she owes to the Bible until she is presented by her great Lord and Husband faultless before the throne."

WOMB. The fruit of the womb is children (Gen. xxx. 2), whom the Psalmist (cxxxvii. 3) describes as the blessing of marriage.

WONDER, any thing which causes surprise by its strangeness. "It expresses," says Mr Cogan, "an embarrassment of the mind after it is somewhat recovered from the first percussion of surprise. It is the effect produced by an interesting subject which has been suddenly presented to the mind, but concerning which there are many intricacies, either respecting the cause or manner in which the event has taken place, motives of extraordinary conduct, or other circumstances." How it differs from admiration, see ADMIRATION.

WORD. See LANGUAGE.

WORKS, GOOD, are those actions which spring from pure principles, and are conformable to truth, justice, and propriety; whether natural, civil, relative, moral, or religious. The phrase is often used for acts of charity.

The qualities of a good work in the scriptural sense of the term, are—(1.) That it be according to the will of God. (2.) That it spring from love to God. 1 Tim. i. 5. (3.) That it be done in faith. Rom. xiv. 23. (4.) That it be done to the glory of God. 1 Cor. x. 31; Phil. i. 11. The causes of good works are—(1.) God himself. Heb. xiii. 20, 21. (2.) Union to Christ. Eph. ii. 10. (3.) Through faith. Heb. xi. 4, 6. (4.) By the Word and Spirit. Luke viii. 15; Eph. v. 9; 2 Tim. iii. 16. As to the nature and properties of good works in this world: (1.) They are imperfect. Eccles. vii. 20; Rev. iii. 2. (2.) Not meritorious. Tit. iii. 5; Luke xvii. 10. (3.) Yet found only in the regenerate. Matt. vii. 17. The necessary uses of good works: (1.) They show our gratitude. Ps. cxvi. 12, 13. (2.) Are an ornament to our profession. Tit. ii. 10. (3.) Evidence our regeneration. John xv. 5. (4.) Profitable to others. Tit. iii. 8. See HOLINESS—SANCTIFICATION.

WORLD, the whole system of created things, but particularly belonging to the earth. See CREATION.

In some places it is used to designate all its rational inhabitants; or, more distinctively, that great body of them who are not really Christians, whether Gentiles or Jews, profligate or sober, profane or devout. This distinctive use of the term is very frequent in the language of our Lord, and of John. John vii. 7, xiv. 17, xv. 17, 18, xvii. 9, 23.

It is taken also for a secular life, the present state of existence, and the pleasures and interests which steal away the soul from God. In this last sense the Greek terms kosmos and aiōn, are used indiscriminately; though properly the first relates rather to place, and the last to duration.

The love of the world does not consist in the use and enjoyment of the comforts God gives us, but in an inordinate attachment to the things of time and sense. "1. We love the world too much," says Dr Jortin, "when, for the sake of profit or pleasure, we wilfully, knowingly, and deliberately transgress the commands of God. 2. When we take more pains about the present life than the next. 3. When we cannot be contented, patient, or resigned, under low and inconvenient circumstances. 4. We love the world too much when we cannot part with anything we possess to those who want, deserve, and have a right to it. 5. When we envy those who are more fortunate and more favoured by the world than we are. 6. When we honour, and esteem, and favour persons purely according to their birth, fortunes, and success, measuring our judgment and approbation by their outward appearance and situation in life. 7. When worldly prosperity makes us proud, and vain, and arrogant. 8. When we omit no opportunity of enjoying the good things of this life; when our great and chief business is to divert ourselves till we contract an indifference for rational and manly occupations, deceiving ourselves, and fancying that we are not in a bad condition because others are worse than we."

WORM, the general name in Scripture for little creeping insects. Several kinds are spoken of:—(1.) Those that breed in putrefied bodies, rimah, Exod. xvi. 20, 24; Job vii. 5, xvii. 14, xxi. 26, xxiv. 20, xxv. 6; Isa. xiv. 11: skōlēx, Eccles. vii. 17, x. 11; 1 Mac. ii. 62; 2 Mac. ix. 9; Judith xvi. 17; Mark ix. 44, 46, 48; Acts xii. 23. (2.) That which eats woollen garments, sis, Isa. li. 8; sēs, Matt. vi. 19, 20; Luke xii. 33. (3.) That which, perforating the leaves and bark of trees, causes the little excrescences called kermes, whence is made a crimson dye, hula, Deut. xxviii. 39; Job xxv. 6; Ps. xxii. 6; Isa. xiv. 11, xli. 14, lxvi. 24; Exod. xvi. 24; Jonah iv. 7. (4.) The worm destructive of the vines, referred to in Deut. xxviii. 39, which was the pyralis vitanæ, or pyralis fasciana, of Forskal, the vine-weevil, a small insect extremely hurtful to the vines.

WORMWOOD, lagah, Deut. xxix. 18; Prov. v. 4; Jer. ix. 15, xxiii. 15; Lam. iii. 15, 19; Amos v. 7, vi. 12; apsinthos, Rev. viii. 11. In the Septuagint the original word is variously rendered, and generally by terms expressive of its figurative sense, for what is offensive, odious, or deleterious; but in the Syriac and Arabic versions, and in the Latin Vulgate, it is rendered "wormwood;" and this is adopted by Celsius, who names it the absinthium santonicum Judaicum. From the passages of Scripture, however, where this plant is mentioned, something more than the bitterness of its qualities seems to be intimated and effects are attributed to it greater than can be produced by the wormwood of Europe. The Chaldee paraphrase gives it even the character of "the wormwood of death." It may therefore mean a plant allied, perhaps, to the absinthium in appearance and in taste, but possessing more nauseous, hurtful, and formidable properties.

WORSHIP (cultus Dei), amounts to the same with what we otherwise call religion. This worship consists in paying a due respect, veneration, and homage to the Deity, under a sense of an obligation to him. And this internal respect, &c., is to be shown and testified by external acts, as prayers, thanksgivings, &c.

Private worship should be conducted with—1. Reverence and veneration. 2. Self-abasement and confession. 3. Contemplation of the perfections and promises of God. 4. Supplication for ourselves and others. 5. Earnest desire of the enjoyment of God. 6. Frequency and regularity. Some who have acknowledged the propriety of private worship have objected to that of a public nature, but without any sufficient ground. For Christ attended public worship himself (Luke iv. 16); he prayed with his disciples (Luke ix. 28, 29, xi. 1); he promises his presence to social worshippers. Matt. xviii. 20. It may be argued also from the conduct of the apostles (Acts i. 24, ii. 4, vi. 4; Rom. xv. 30; 1 Cor. xiv.; Acts xx.; 2 Thess. iii. 1, 2; 1 Cor. xi.), and from general precepts (1 Tim. ii. 2, 8; Heb. x. 25; Deut. xxxi. 12; Ps. c. 4).

Public worship is of great utility, as—1. It gives Christians an opportunity of openly professing their faith in, and love to, Christ. 2. It preserves a sense of religion in the mind, without which society could not well exist. 3. It enlivens devotion and promotes zeal. 4. It is the means of receiving instruction and consolation. 5. It affords an excellent example to others, and excites them to fear God, &c.

Public worship should be—(1.) Solemn, not light and trifling. Ps. lxxxix. 7. (2.) Simple, not pompous and ceremonial. Isa. lxii. 2. (3.) Cheerful, and not with forbidding aspect. Ps. c. (4.) Sincere, and not hypocritical. Isa. i. 12; Matt. xxiii. 1-3; John iv. 24. (5.) Scripturally pure, and not superstitious. Isa. lvii. 15.

We cannot conclude this article without taking notice of the shameful and exceedingly improper practice of coming in late to public worship. It evidently manifests a state of lukewarmness; it is a breach of order and decency; it is a disturbance to both ministers and people; it is slighting the ordinances which God has appointed for our good; and an affront to God himself! How such can be in a devotional frame themselves, when they so often spoil the devotions of others, we know not.

WORSHIP, DÆMON, the worship of a class of spirits which were thought to be superior to the soul of man, but inferior to those intelligences which animated the sun, the moon, and the planets, and to whom were committed the government of the world, particular nations, &c. Though they were generally invisible, they were not supposed to be pure disembodied spirits, but to have some kind of ethereal vehicle. They were of various orders, and, according to the situation over which they presided, had different names. Hence the Greek and Roman poets talk of satyrs, dryads, nymphs, fauns, &c. &c. These different orders of intelligences, which, though worshipped as gods or demigods, were yet believed to partake of human passions and appetites, led the way to the deification of departed heroes, and other eminent benefactors of the human race; and from this latter probably arose the belief of national and tutelar gods, as well as the practice of worshipping these gods through the medium of statues cut into a human figure. See IDOLATRY—POLYTHEISM.

WRATH, great and permanent anger. See ANGER—ATONEMENT.

WRATH OF GOD is his indignation at sin, and punishment of it. Rom. i. 18. The objects of God's anger or wrath are the ungodly, whom he has declared he will punish. His wrath is sometimes manifested in this life, and that in an awful degree, as we see in the case of the old world, of Sodom and Gomorrah, the plagues of Egypt, the punishment and captivity of the Jews, and the many striking judgments on nations and individuals. But a still more awful punishment awaits the impenitent in the world to come; for the wicked, it is said, shall go away into everlasting punishment, where the worm dieth not, and the fire is not quenched. Matt. xxv. 46; Rom. ii. 8, 9, i. 18. See ABIDE—HELL—SIN—RETRIBUTION.

It has been justly remarked, that those are shallow philosophers who reject the plain popular style of the Scriptures, and attempt to prove that there is nothing in the Divine nature which can properly be called wrath, indignation, or avenging justice. For whatever use may be made of these speculations, in excluding from our conceptions of the infinite and holy God every idea which originates in the corruption and turbulence of human passions, it is evident that the moral sentiments and affections must subsist in perfection in the Infinite Mind. (See ATONEMENT.) The best method, therefore, of addressing mankind is that adopted in the Scriptures. It speaks to the heart; it adapts itself to the nature of man in all conditions; it rouses the conscience through the medium of the imagination; and is thus evidently the most intelligible, impressive, and useful. In a word, it is the style chosen by the only wise God himself.

Y.

YEAR. Mr Horne, in his Critical Introduction to the Study of the Scriptures, makes the following valuable remarks in elucidation of this portion of time among the Hebrews. "The Jews," he says,

"had four sorts of years, one for plants, another for beasts, a third for sacred purposes, and the fourth was civil and common to all the inhabitants of Palestine.

"1. The year of plants was reckoned from the month corresponding with our January, because they paid tithes-fruits of the trees which budded at that time.

"2. The second year was that of beasts; for when they tithed their lambs, the owner drove all the flock under a rod, and they marked the tenth, which was given to the Levites. They could, however, only take those which fell in the year, and this year began at the month Elul, or the beginning of our August.

"But the two years which are the most known are the civil and ecclesiastical years.

"3. The civil year commenced on the fifteenth of our September, because it was an old tradition that the world was created at that time. From this year the Jews computed their jubilees, dated all contracts, and noted the birth of children, and the reign of kings. It is said also that this month was appointed for making war, because the great heats being passed, they then went into the field. In 2 Sam. xi. 1, we read that David sent Joab and his servants with him, and all Israel, to destroy the Ammonites, at the return of the year (marginal rendering), at the times when kings go forth to battle, that is, in the month of September.

"4. The ecclesiastical or sacred year began in March, or on the first day of the month Nisan, because at that time they departed out of Egypt. From that month they computed their feasts, and the prophets also occasionally dated their oracles and visions. Thus Zechariah (vii. 1) says that the word of the Lord came unto him in the fourth day of the ninth month, even in Chisleu, which answers to our November, whence it is evident that he adopted the ecclesiastical year, which commenced in March. The month Nisan is noted in the Old Testament for the overflowings of Jordan, Josh. iii. 15; 1 Chron. xii. 15; which were common at that season, the river being swollen by the melted snows that poured in torrents from Mount Lebanon.

"The Jewish months being regulated by the phases or appearances of the moon, their years were consequently lunar years, consisting of twelve lunations, or 354 days and 8 hours; but as the Jewish festivals were held not only on certain fixed days of the month, but also at certain seasons of the year, consequently great confusion would, in process of time, arise by this method of calculating; the spring month sometimes falling in the middle of winter, it became necessary to accommodate the lunar to solar years, in order that their months, and consequently their festivals, might always fall at the same season. For this purpose the Jews added a whole month to the year, as often as it was necessary; which occurred commonly once in three years, and sometimes once in two years. This intercalary month was added at the end of the ecclesiastical year, after the month Adar, and was therefore called Ve-Adar, or the second Adar."

YESTERDAY is used to denote all time past, however distant, as to-day denotes time present, but of a larger extent than the very day on which one speaks. Exod. xxi. 29: "If the ox was wont to push with his horn in time past;" Heb., yesterday. "And it came to pass, when all that knew him beforetime;" Heb., yesterday; "whereas thou camest but yesterday," or lately. 2 Sam. xv. 20. "Jesus Christ, the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever." Heb. xiii. 8. His doctrine, like his person, admits of no change; his truths are invariable. With him there is neither yesterday, nor to-morrow, but one continued to-day.

YOKE. The yoke which was bound upon the neck of the animal was often galling and uneasy, and it was frequently difficult to train it to the use of this necessary restraint. The animals chiefly used in ploughing were oxen, and hence the following passage, in which the severity of the divine procedure against apostate Ephraim is described. Jer. xxxi. 18, "I have surely heard Ephraim bemoaning himself thus; Thou hast chastised me, and I was chastised, as a bullock unaccustomed to the yoke: turn thou me, and I shall be turned; for thou art the Lord my God." But when it was found impossible by any means to subject an animal to the yoke, it was customary to bore a hole in his nostrils, and introduce an iron or wooden ring, which, being attached to a rope, gave the driver so complete a command over the most furious beast, that he could turn it in any direction he pleased.

ZABIANS are said to be ancient Chaldeans, addicted to astrology, and to the worship of the stars. See IDOLATRY—CHALDEANS—MAGI—SABIANS.

ZACCHEUS, chief of the publicans; that is, farmer-general of the revenue. Luke xix. See PUBLICAN—SYCAMORE—RESTITUTION.

ZACHARIAH, son of Jehoiada, high priest of the Jews, and probably the Azariah of 1 Chron. vi. 10, 11, was slain by order of Joash, A.M. 3164. 2 Chron. xxiv. 20-22.

It has been much disputed among commentators and Bible critics who this Zachariah was to whom our Lord refers in Matt. xxiii. 35, "That upon you may come all the righteous blood shed upon the earth, from the blood of righteous Abel unto the blood of Zacharias, son of Barachias, whom ye slew between the temple and the altar." Calmet thinks that Zachariah, son of Baruch, is referred to, but the most general opinion is, that it refers to Zachariah, son of Jehoiada, who was slain by order of King Joash, and that as two names were often applied to the same individual, Jehoiada may have also been called Barachiah.

ZADOK, or SADOE, son of Ahitub, high priest of the Jews, of the race of Eleazar. From the decease of Eli the high priesthood had been in the family of Ithamar; but it was restored to the family of Eleazar, in the time of Saul, in the person of Zadok, who was put in the place of Ahimelech, slain by Saul, A.M. 2944. 1 Sam. xxii. 17, 18. While Zadok performed the functions of the priesthood with Saul, Ahimelech performed them with David; so that till the reign of Solomon there were two high priests in Israel—Zadok, of the race of Eleazar, and Ahimelech, of the race of Ithamar. 2 Sam. viii. 17, xv. 24; 1 Kings i. 5–10, ii. 35.

ZAMZUMMIM, ancient giants who dwelt beyond Jordan, in the country afterwards inhabited by the Ammonites. Deut. ii. 20. See ANAKIM.

ZARED, a brook beyond Jordan, on the frontier of Moab, which falls into the Dead Sea. Numb. xxi. 12; Deut. ii. 13, 14.

ZAREPHATH, a city of the Sidonians, between Tyre and Sidon, in Phœnicia, on the coast of the Mediterranean Sea, and afterwards called Sarepta. It is between Tyre and Sidon, and was the residence of the prophet Elijah, with a poor woman, during a famine in the land of Israel. 1 Kings xvii. 9, 10.

ZARETAN, a town in the land of Manasseh on this side Jordan, called Zartanah, in 1 Kings iv. 12. It is said to be near Beth-shean, which was in the northern limits of Manasseh. From Adam to Zaretan the waters dried up (Josh. iii. 16), from Zaretan upwards they stood on a heap. The brazen vessels for the temple were cast in the clay ground between Zaretan and Succoth. 1 Kings vii. 46.

ZEAL, a passionate ardour for any person or cause. There are various kinds of zeal, as—(1.) An ignorant zeal. Rom. x. 2, 3. (2.) A persecuting zeal. Phil. iii. 6. (3.) A superstitious zeal. 1 Kings xviii.; Gal. i. 14. (4.) A hypocritical zeal. 2 Kings x. 16. (5.) A contentious zeal. 1 Cor. xi. 16. (6.) A partial zeal. Hos. vii. 8. (7.) A temporary zeal. 2 Kings xii. and xiii.; Gal. iv. 15. (8.) A genuine zeal, which is a sincere and warm concern for the glory of God, and the spiritual welfare of mankind. Gal. iv. 18; Rev. iii. 19.

This is generally compounded of sound knowledge, strong faith, and disinterested regard, and will manifest itself by self-denial, patient endurance, and constant exertion. The motives to true zeal are—(1.) The divine command. Rev. iii. 19. (2.) The example of Christ and the end of his death. John ii. 17; Acts x. 38; Tit. ii. 14. (3.) The importance of his service. (4.) The advantage and pleasure it brings to the possessor. (5.) The instances and honourable commendation of it in the Scriptures—Moses, Phinehas, Caleb, David, Paul, &c. Gal. iv. 18; Rev. iii. 15, &c. (6.) The incalculable good effects it produces on others. James v. 20.

ZEALOTS, an ancient sect of the Jews, so called from their pretended zeal for God's law, and the honour of religion. They were the followers of Judas of Galilee, and committed all manner of excesses, affirming it would dishonour God to submit to any earthly potentate, especially a heathen.

ZEBOIM, one of the cities of the plain, which were destroyed by fire and brimstone from heaven. Gen. xiv. 2, xix. 24. To this destruction Hosea alludes in the case of Zeboim, when describing the unwillingness of God to punish Israel (xi. 8), "How shall I give thee up, Ephraim? how shall I deliver thee, Israel? how shall I make thee as Admah? how shall I set thee as Zeboim? Mine heart is turned within me, my repentings are kindled together." Jerome speaks of a city called Zeboim as existing in his time, on the west of the Dead Sea; but this must have been a place erected long after this catastrophe, and bearing the name of one of the doomed cities.

ZEBULUN, the sixth son of Jacob and Leah. No particulars are recorded of his private history; but the blessing which Jacob pronounced upon him is so remarkable as to merit a brief notice. "Zebulun," said the dying patriarch, "shall dwell at the haven of the sea; and he shall be for a haven of ships: and his border shall be unto Zidon." "The word rendered 'haven' occurs elsewhere five times, in each of which instances it is rendered either 'seashore' or 'sea-coast,' and properly implies 'a maritime region' rather than a 'haven' or 'port.' This is to be inferred also from the use of the term yishkon, 'he shall tabernacle,' as dwelling in tents is not a mode of habitation adapted to a sea-port, but to the interior of a country; although it is unquestionable that a portion of the tribe occupied the havens upon the coast, and addicted themselves to seafaring pursuits. This prophetic designation, uttered two hundred and fifty years before the event took place, corresponds with remarkable exactness with the geographical character of the lot of Zebulun in Canaan. It extended from the vicinity of the Mediterranean Sea on the west to the Lake of Gennesaret on the east, and lay therefore very commodiously for the purposes of trade and navigation. Gr. 'Zebulun shall be a maritime dweller.' Moses accordingly, in the parallel blessing, Deut. xxxiii. 18, adopts a kindred language: 'And of Zebulun he said, Rejoice, Zebulun, in thy going out,'—i. e., in thy voyages, in thy trading expeditions. Nothing but the inspiration of the speaker can account for this clear and accurate designation of the country which Zebulun was to occupy in Canaan. Jacob says concerning the inheritance of this tribe what would not have been true had it been said of any other of the inheritances of the twelve tribes, except Asher, and yet was strictly true concerning them, that they should dwell at the haven of the sea, and enjoy the advantages of commodious harbours in the neighbourhood of the ancient city of Zidon. How could Moses, too, when he committed this prophecy to writing, have known that it would be verified? In no other way but by his faith in the Word of God. There could be no artifice used to effect an agreement between the lots used in the division of the land and the prophecies of Jacob or Moses; but the whole disposing of the lot is of the Lord.

ZECHARIAH. This prophet informs us that he was the son of Berachiah, the son of Iddo the prophet; but to what family or tribe his parents belonged we are not told. All that is known of him is simply that he was a captive Jew in Babylon, who returned to Jerusalem in consequence of the decree of Cyrus.

ZECHARIAH, BOOK OF. Zechariah is the longest and most obscure of the twelve minor prophets. His style, like that of Haggai, is for the most part prosaic, though more obscure towards the beginning on account of his types and visions. Towards the close he is more plain, as well as more elevated and poetical. This difference in style has induced Mr Mede, Dr Hammond, and some other modern critics, to suppose that chapters ix., x., and xi., of this prophet were written by Jeremiah; because in Matt. xxvii. 9, 10, we find his name quoted instead of Zechariah's. And, as these three chapters form, in their opinion, but one prophetic discourse, they have concluded that they belonged to Jeremiah. As, however, the language of Zechariah corresponds with that of the age in which he lived, and incidental expressions show that he flourished after the captivity, it is most probable that the name of Jeremiah has slipped into the text of Matthew through some mistake of the transcribers. The style, general structure of the poetry, external or historical testimony, and argument of the latter part of this prophet, all concur to prove that it was written by the author of the former part; and consequently that it was not written by Jeremiah, as Mede and others have supposed, nor before the time of that prophet, as Archbishop Newcome conjectured, whose opinion was adopted by Archbishop Secker, and also by Doederlein.

ZEDAD, a city of Syria, in the most northern part of the land of promise. Numb. xxxiv. 8; Ezek. xlvii. 15.

ZEDEKIAH, son of Josiah, and the last king of Judah before the Babylonish captivity. When his nephew Jeconiah was carried to Babylon, Nebuchadnezzar appointed him king of Judah, changing his name from Mattaniah to Zedekiah. He began to reign at the age of twenty-one, and after a wicked reign of eleven years, he was taken to Babylon in chains with his eyes put out. Thus was fulfilled the prophecy of Jeremiah concerning him, xxxii. 4, 5, "And Zedekiah king of Judah shall not escape out of the hand of the Chaldeans, but shall surely be delivered into the hand of the king of Babylon, and shall speak with him mouth to mouth, and his eyes shall behold his eyes; and he shall lead Zedekiah to Babylon, and there shall he be until I visit him, saith the Lord: though ye fight with the Chaldeans, ye shall not prosper"—and also that of Ezekiel (xii. 13), "My net also will I spread upon him, and he shall be taken in my snare: and I will bring him to Babylon, to the land of the Chaldeans; yet shall he not see it, though he shall die there." With Zedekiah expired the kingdom of Judah.

ZEDEKIAH, son of Maaseiah, a false prophet, who always opposed Jeremiah. Against him and Ahab, son of Kolaiah, the prophet pronounced a terrible curse (chap. xxix. 21, 22): "Of them shall be taken up a curse by all the captivity of Judah which are in Babylon, saying, The Lord make thee like Zedekiah, and like Ahab, whom the king of Babylon roasted in the fire," &c.

ZEEB, a prince of Midian, was found at a winepress, and slain by the Ephraimites, who sent his head to Gideon beyond Jordan, whither they pursued their enemies. Judg. vii. 25.

ZENAS, a Jewish doctor of the law, and afterward disciple of Paul. Tit. iii. 13.

ZEND, or ZENDAVESTA. See ABESTA or AVESTA.

ZEPHANIAH was the son of Cushi, and was probably of a noble family of the tribe of Simeon. He prophesied in the reign of Josiah, about B.C. 630. He denounces the judgments of God against the idolatry and sins of his countrymen, and exhorts them to repentance; he predicts the punishment of the Philistines, Moabites, Ammonites, and Ethiopians, and foretells the destruction of Nineveh; he again inveighs against the corruptions of Jerusalem, and with his threats mixes promises of future favour and prosperity to his people, whose recall from their dispersion shall glorify the name of God throughout the world. The style of Zephaniah is poetical; but it is not distinguished by any peculiar elegance or beauty, though generally animated and impressive.

ZEPHATH, a city of Simeon (Judg. i. 17), probably the same as Zephathah, near Mareshah, in the south of Judah. 2 Chron. xiv. 10. It was called Hormah, or Anathema, after the victory obtained by Israel over the king of Arad. Numb. xxi. 3; Judg. i. 17.

ZEPHATHAH, THE VALLEY OF, near Mareshah, is mentioned 2 Chron. xiv. 10. It was, perhaps, near Zephath, or Hormah; or, perhaps, it should be read Shephalah, instead of Zephathah.

ZERED, a brook or torrent, which takes its rise in the mountains of Moab, and, running from east to west, falls into the Dead Sea. It seems to be the stream which Burckhardt calls Wady Beni Hammad, south of the Arnon, and about five hours north of Kerek, the ancient Charak Moab.

ZERERATH, a city in Manasseh, not far from Beth-shan. Judg. vii. 22. Also called Zereda (1 Kings xi. 26), and Zeredathah (2 Chron. iv. 17), perhaps also Zaretan, the narrow dwellings (Josh. iii. 16; 1 Kings vii. 46), and Zartanah. (1 Kings iv. 12.)

ZERUBBABEL, or ZEROBABEL, was son of Salathiel, of the royal race of David. Matt. i. 12, and 1 Chron. iii. 17, 19, make Jeconiah king of Judah to be father to Salathiel; but they do not agree as to the father of Zerubbabel. The Chronicles say Pedaiah was father of Zerubbabel; but Matthew, Luke, Ezra, and Haggai, constantly make Salathiel his father. We must therefore take the name of son in the sense of grandson, and say that Salathiel having educated Zerubbabel, he was always afterwards looked upon as his father. Some think that Zerubbabel had also the name of Sheshbazzar, and that he has this name in Ezra i. 8. Zerubbabel returned to Jerusalem at the beginning of the reign of Cyrus, A.M. 3468, fifteen years before the reign of Darius, son of Hystaspes. Cyrus committed to his care the sacred vessels of the temple, with which he returned to Jerusalem. Ezra i. 11. He is always named first, as being the chief of the Jews that returned to their own country (Ezra ii. 2, iii. 8, v. 2); he laid the foundation of the temple (Ezra iii. 8, 9; Zech. iv. 9, &c.); and restored the worship of the Lord, and the usual sacrifices.

ZIDON. See SIDON.

ZIKLAG, a city that Achish, king of Gath, gave to David, when he took shelter among the Philistines (1 Sam. xxvii. 6), and which, after that time, always belonged to the kings of Judah. The Amalekites took it, and plundered it, in the absence of David. Joshua had allotted it to the tribe of Simeon. Josh. xix. 5. Eusebius says it lay in the south of Canaan.

ZIMRI, a general of half the cavalry of Elah, king of Israel, when he rebelled against his master (1 Kings xvi. 9, 10), killed him, and usurped his kingdom. Although he reigned but seven days, he cut off the whole family of Elah, not sparing any of his relations or friends; whereby was fulfilled the word of the Lord, denounced to Baasha, the father of Elah, by the prophet Jehu.

ZIN, a city south of the land of promise (Numb. xxxiv. 4), perhaps the Senaah of Ezra ii. 35. Eusebius mentions Migdol-senna, or the tower of Senna, eight miles from Jericho, north; but this cannot be the Zin, or Senaah, of Numbers.

ZION. See SION.

ZIPH, the second Hebrew month. 1 Kings vi. 1. (2.) Son of Jehaleleel, of Judah, and of the family of Caleb (1 Chron. iv. 16); he probably gave his name to the city of Ziph, in Judah. (3.) A city of Judah (Josh. xv. 24), near Hebron, eastward, and in the wilderness of which David kept himself concealed for some time. 1 Sam. xxiii. 14, 15. (4.) Another city near Maon and Carmel of Judah. Josh. xv. 55.

ZIPPORAH, or SEPHORAH, wife of Moses, daughter of Jethro, and mother of Eliezer and Gershom. Exod. ii. 16, &c. See MOSES.

ZOAN, a royal city of Egypt, and extremely ancient; called in Greek Tanis (Judith i. 10), and built, no doubt, by emigrants. Numb. xiii. 22; Ps. lxxviii. 12, 43; Isa. xix. 11, 13, xxx. 4; Ezek. xxx. 14.

ZOAR, a city of the Pentapolis, on the southern extremity of the Dead Sea, was destined, with the other four cities, to be consumed by fire from heaven; but at the intercession of Lot it was preserved. Gen. xiv. 2, xix. 20–22. It was originally called Bela; but after Lot entreated the angel's permission to take refuge in it, and insisted on the smallness of this city, it had the name Zoar, which signifies small or little.

ZOHELETH, a stone near the fountain of Rogel, or En-rogel, just under the walls of Jerusalem. 1 Kings i. 9. The rabbins tell us, that it served as an exercise to the young men, who tried their strength by throwing it, or rather rolling it, or lifting it. Others think it was useful to the fullers, or whitsters, to beat their clothes upon, after they had washed them.

ZOPHAR, the Naamathite, a friend of Job (ii. 11). The Seventy call him Sophar, king of the Minrans: the interpreter of Origen makes him king of the Nomades.

ZORAH, a city of Dan, and the birth-place of Samson (Judg. xvi. 31), on the frontier of Dan, and of Judah, not far from Eshtaol. Eusebius places it ten miles from Eleutheropolis, towards Nicopolis, not far from Kaphar-sorek. Calmet thinks the Zorites (1 Chron. ii. 54), and the Zorathites (1 Chron. iv. 2), were inhabitants of Zorah.

ZOROASTER, an ancient philosopher, of whose history little or nothing that is authentic is known. There are supposed to have been several of the name. The most celebrated, however, the Zerdusht of the Persians, is believed to have been the reformer of the Magian system of religion, and the author of the Zendavesta, which contains the doctrines that he taught. Irreconcilable differences exist among the learned as to the time in which he flourished. See ZEND—MAGI.

ZUINGLIANS, a branch of the Reformers, so called from Zuinglius, the celebrated Swiss divine, who took so active a part in the Reformation of the sixteenth century. His chief difference from Luther was concerning the eucharist. He believed that the bread and wine were only significations of the body and blood of Jesus Christ, whereas Luther believed in CONSUBSTANTIATION (which see.)

ZUPH, a Levite, great-grandfather of Elkanah, the father of Samuel, and head of the family of the Zuphim, who dwelt at Ramath; whence it had its name of Ramathaim Zophim (1 Sam. i. 1; 1 Chron. vi. 35), and the land of Zuph. 1 Sam. ix. 5.

ZUR, a city of Judah (Josh. xv. 58; Neh. iii. 16; 1 Chron. ii. 45; 2 Chron. xi. 7), called Bethsura, and described as a strong town, in 2 Mac. xi. 5.

ZUZIM, certain giants who dwelt beyond Jordan, and were conquered by Chedorlaomer and his allies. Gen. xiv. 5. The Chaldee and the Seventy have taken Zuzim in the sense of an appellative, for stout and valiant men. Calmet conjectures the Zuzim to be the Zamzummim of Deut. ii. 20. See ANAKIM.
